1. Counting is an elementary capability of human perception. For distinguishing and communicating the amount of what has been counted, human beings have used numerical symbols, from which (1) systems of numbering have developed. These have formed the basis for (2) methods of calculation, which have organized inter-personal relations for the economy—first of all, numerically organized exchange. Then, in the wake of societal differentiation, methods of calculation were found grouped according to norms of tradition, in (3) scientific disciplines like mathematics or astronomy.

All three levels correspond to respective—culturally specific—material and spiritual appropriations of the world, including religious conceptualizations. The development of mathematical sciences from foundational operations of calculation is characterized by increasing abstraction. In parallel, the corresponding qualities are transferred to the area of religious concepts and ideas.

2. Numbers are expressed through arbitrary mental, oral, or written symbols. Their basis is the series of 'natural numbers,' for which each 'natural number' is the sum of its antecedents. The original image of this rule is additive symbolism (e.g., 3 = three fingers, or one, one, one; III; and so on), whose orientation is most often to the extremities of the body. This type of symbol is evidenced as early as the Neolithic Age, in the engravings on buried bones. The eye of Egyptian falcon-god Horus is found on the oldest hieroglyphic fragments (cf. illus.). 'Numeral symbolism' uses abstract signs. In the binary number system, foundation of all digital signs, any succession of 0 and 1 governs the value of the sign. The system of notation in Arabic 'ciphers' (sifr, Arab., 'zero'), used today worldwide, developed, through various Arabic intermediate stages, from the Indian brahmi system. Number systems come from the hierarchization of units. Their symbolical expression is spelling. Their systematic division, on the other hand, corresponds to cosmological, mythological, and numerological concepts. Thus, the Central American Maya, on the basis of a 'twenty' system, divided their liturgical year into thirteen parts, with each day referring to a god of the sky. The Sumerian sexagesimal system, from which today's division of time derives, is based on the 'natural' solar year of 360 days supplemented by five 'leap days.' From the Phoenician alphabet, toward the beginning of the first millennium BCE, the Greeks and Hebrews adopted a letter-notation that ascribed a numerical value to each letter of each of the two alphabets. This schema of notation survived in the mathematical symbolic speech and numerical speculation on letter-values of religious Semitic texts. The Jewish Tetragrammaton is a visible expression of the twelfth-century tradition known as → Kabbalah. Islamic folk belief shares certain ideas and techniques with the Kabbalah and other mystical traditions, as well (in the form of talismans and → amulets, worked into magical series of letters and chronograms or numerical word codings). Contemporary 'numerologists,' as well, on the basis of an assumed codification, seek to unlock the 'secret meaning' of religious texts (e.g., in Nostradamus, but even in texts of literary authors like Shakespeare and Goethe).

3. The construction of numerical systems was co-determined by methods of calculation and their application. The elementary tasks of the practice of calculation include the measurement of time, space, and weight. Global conquest by the 'Indian' decimal system was survived only in relics by measurements of time founded in religion. The Jewish and Islamic division of the week simulates, in rhythmical enumeration, the creation event. The Western, as well as most of the Eastern, calendar systems rest on religious myths of origin. Thus, in relation to the likewise mythically charged Christian year 1, the 'beginning of time' in the Byzantine era is 5509 BCE, in the Jewish 3761 BCE, with the Maya 3114 BCE, and in the Ethiopian era 8 BCE. In many cultures, the connection between clergy and mathematics has lent encouragement to the development of certain methods of calculation. These include, especially, astrological calculations for the interpretation of destiny, the astronomical regulation of the ritual year (date of Easter, beginning of → Ramadan and the month of pilgrimage), and procedures in the measuring of distance (speculatively systematized in geomancy), mathematical 'rule of three' calculations for fiscal and juridical purposes, and—on a higher level—theoretical numerical knowledge for evidence of divine dispositions. In the Islamic milieu, the ritual obligation of a precise observance of the lunar year occasioned a gigantic boom in astronomy. In the wake of the precise adjustment of the directing of prayer toward → Mecca (→ Orientation), Arab astronomers developed spherical trigonometric procedures

The elements of the eye of Horus represent respectively the six fractions ½, ¼, ⅛, $^1/_{16}$, $^1/_{32}$, $^1/_{64}$. According to the ancient Egyptian myth, Seth had treacherously crushed Horus's eye (as well as his body), but Thot, Lord of the sciences and of the calendar, later recomposed its fragments. Of course, since the sum of the values of these parts is only $^{63}/_{64}$, god Thot must have magically 'embezzled' the missing part.

as early as the ninth century. For the lawful alcohol content of fermented juices, society's expert calculators supplied simple methods of determining it according to religious standards, methods that were useful for other purposes as well. Theologians used discoveries of harmonic phenomena in numerically direct relationships ('befriended' pairs of numbers: the sum of the factors of 220 is 286—and vice versa!) to underpin the universality and meaningfulness of creation.

The Conflict between Religious and Mathematical Knowledge

4. The scientific tradition of mathematics is rooted in antiquity. As sovereign source of knowledge, it fertilized the development of Eastern and Western culture. In the latter, the ancient Greek Pythagoreans' conceptualization of the world as the divine 'order' (in Gk., kósmos) of mathematical nature was the clear mark of a seemingly inalterable, and certainly tenacious, conflict between religious and mathematical knowledge from the sixth century BCE onward. As a propedeutic discipline, mathematics enjoyed a status in Platonic philosophy that, amidst increasing disagreement, was assigned it in the theologies of the religions of revelation. Christian and Islamic dogmatics alike saw their doctrinal structures threatened by an elementary construction of the world on astronomic and mathematical knowledge. The disturbing experience of the fact of 'irrational' numbers, the observably discontinuous movements of the celestial bodies, and, not least of all, the withdrawal of the absolute validity of a mathematical demonstration of any divine intervention, describe the historical developmental stages of the conflict. On the other hand, the development of modern physics (Einstein's general and special theory of relativity, Heisenberg's quantum physics), promoted attempts to reverse the process of the mathematical → disenchantment of the world, and to synthesize the 'meaning of the whole' in a universal formula.

Literature

Brach, Jean-Pierre, La symbolique des nombres, Paris 1994; Idem, "Number Symbolism," in: Hanegraaff, Wouter J. et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, Leiden 2005, 874-883; Burkert, Walter, Lore and Science in Ancient Pythagoreanism, Cambridge 1972; Godwin, Joscelyn, Harmonies of Heaven and Earth, London 1987; Ifrah, Georges, The Universal History of Numbers: From the Prehistory to the Invention of the Computer, London 1998; Rebstock, Ulrich, Rechnen im islamischen Orient, Darmstadt 1992; Schimmel, Annemarie, The Mystery of Numbers, New York 1993.

→ Calendar, Cosmology/Cosmogony, Esotericism, Kabbalah, Orientation, Platonism

Ulrich Rebstock

Occultism

The Term 'Occultism'

The term 'occultism' has been defined in a variety of manners since its first appearance in France (as occultisme), in the first half of the nineteenth century. The earliest occurrence appears to be in a 'dictionary of new words' by Jean-Baptiste Richard, Enrichissement de la langue française (1842), but it was thanks to the pen of Eliphas Lévi (ps. of Alphonse-Louis Constant, 1810–1875), that the term acquired an increasing popularity since the 1850s. Later on, and mostly under the influence of Lévi's writings, the term passed into other languages. In English, it was probably introduced by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1861; → Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society) in one of her earliest articles, published in an American spiritualist journal ("A Few Questions to Hiraf," 1875).

'Occult Philosophy' and 'Occult Sciences'

Despite being relatively recent, the term was obviously derived from the adjective occultus (Lat., 'hidden'), which had a much older history. In this respect, as it has often been remarked, the term 'occultism' presents similarities with the related noun → 'esotericism,' also originating in France in the nineteenth century and derived from the much older adjective 'esoteric.' In the case of occultism, the reference was to sets of beliefs, ideas, and practices, which had been defined, especially since the Renaissance, with expressions such as 'occult philosophy' and 'occult sciences' (→ magic, → astrology, and alchemy being the most commonly included in this category). In the view of the authors who propounded them, among whom Paracelsus (ps. of Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim, 1493–1541) and Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa (1486–1535) may be mentioned as being among the most representative and the most widely read by later occultists, the object of these disciplines was the study and the use of those forces or properties of nature that had been traditionally defined as 'occult' (qualitates occultae), because, their reality notwithstanding, they were considered to be impenetrable to the normal human senses. In creating and popularizing 'occultism,' authors such as Lévi and his later emulators clearly aimed at reorganization and a new systematization of this body of knowledge, which had been increasingly marginalized in Europe since the seventeenth century. At the same time, this attempt at a new synthesis would add new elements to the traditional frame of → Renaissance philosophia occulta. In this respect, especially in its earliest phase, very important influences are those of Swedenborgianism and of Mesmerism, which offered to the occultists a wealth of ideas concerning, on the one hand, the otherworld and the destiny of man after death, and, on the other hand, the existence and the manipulation of a vital force permeating both nature and the human body. Other new elements of notice were the popularization of the Tarot cards as a symbolic system belonging specifically to the Western esoteric tradition and, to some extent, the influence of concepts and practices derived from eastern religious traditions (especially, albeit not exclusively, from India).

Important Representatives

After Lévi, occultism spread especially in France and in England. In France, the authors who contributed the most to its development were Stanislas de Guaïta (1861–1897), Joséphin Péladan (1858–1918), Papus (ps. of Gérard Encausse, 1865–1916), Matgioï (ps. of Albert de Pouvorville, 1861–1940), and Jean Bricaud (1881–1934). In the English-speaking countries, the most prominent figures were, apart from the aforementioned H. P. Blavatsky and several authors associated with the early period of the Theosophical Society (founded in 1875), Paschal Beverly Randolph (1825–1875), Emma Hardinge Britten (1823–1899), William Wynn Westcott (1848–1925), Samuel Liddell Mathers (1854–1918), Arthur Edward Waite (1857–1942) in the first part of his career, Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), Dion Fortune (ps. of Violet Mary Firth, 1890–1946), and Israel Regardie (1907–1985). Towards the end the nineteenth century, occultist ideas began to reach other European countries such as Germany, the Austrian empire, and Italy, and found later on an audience all over Europe and America.

Main Characteristics of Occultism

Despite the variety of ideas and of practices associated to occultism, it is possible to focus on certain common features. Some have already been mentioned, but others may be highlighted. Lévi puts a heavy emphasis on the need to solve the conflict between → science and → religion, which was felt as particularly strident and painful in his times. In his view, the solution was to be found in the ancient wisdom of the initiates, which he equates with → 'magic,' and which has been secretly handed down from the remotest antiquity up to our days. The core of the message of this hidden → tradition consists in a symbolic, non-dogmatic reading of the sacred texts, which would allow the initiate to perceive the inner truth of all religious traditions and to see that this hidden core is also compatible with the findings of modern science. It should be noted that, in this context, Jewish → Kabbalah assumes a fundamental role in offering the keys (through its traditional methods of hermeneutics) to unlock the mysteries that lie beyond the literal interpretation of the sacred texts. This call for a solution of the religion-science (or faith-reason) problem will remain a constant feature of occultism. However, the search for a legitimation both from a religious and from a scientific point of view have not hindered occultists from criticizing the dogmatism of religious institutions and the materialism of contemporary science—while, at the same time, creating new institutional spaces for themselves in the form of occult orders and societies.

Another important element, also connected to the occultists' relationship with religion, is the fact that many of them distanced themselves outspokenly from Christianity, in some cases even developing a full-blown anti-Christian attitude (exemplary in this respect is the case of A. Crowley). Occultism presents therefore clear signs of the impact that → secularization was having also on the most heterodox fringes of European culture and represents an important development in the history of Western → esotericism. The estrangement from Christianity led many occultists to look for inspiration either in pre-Christian, pagan traditions (→ Paganism/Neopaganism), or in Eastern religious doctrines, or in both (→ Orientalism/Exotism). The contrast between those who gave preference to the idea of a Western esoteric tradition (independently from the role played by Christianity in it) and those who chose to align themselves with the idea of an Eastern esoteric tradition was sometimes sorely felt, and has been one of the recurring causes of dispute among occultists. This is particularly visible in the early history of the → Theosophical Society.

Another important aspect of occultism is the importance given to the spiritual realization of the individual, to be achieved through various techniques. Undoubtedly occultism contributed significantly to the shaping of that 'religion of the self,' which would feature so prominently in the second half of the twentieth century in phenomena such as the → New Age and the human potential movement. In the context of occultism, the traditional 'occult sciences' play an important, if controversial (even among occultists), role for the achievement of spiritual attainment. However, at the turn of the century, other techniques taken from exotic traditions, such as → Yoga, began to be adopted and to be added to the more traditional ceremonial magic and alchemy.

Finally, it should be noted that occultism tried to construct its identity in demarcating itself from other contemporary heterodox movements, in particular from spiritualism (→ Spiritism). Occultists felt that their ideas differed from those of the spiritualists in several respects. First and foremost was the problem of the nature of the entities from which the spiritualists claimed to receive communications. Their identification by the spiritualists as the souls of deceased persons was considered as very problematic by most occultists. For them, moreover, the world of non-human, discarnate entities was much more complex than most spiritualists would allow. Secondly, while the idea of an esoteric tradition transmitted through the ages by initiates was fundamental to the occultists, this was in most cases rejected by spiritualists, who usually preferred to emphasize the purely empirical, matter-of-fact nature of their practices and their independence from any ancient tradition. Thirdly, occultists consistently insisted that spiritualism was potentially dangerous for the practitioner, because of the latter's passivity as a medium during the contact with the entities, which bordered on → possession. Occultists claimed that their knowledge of traditional techniques such as magic could teach them how to take an active control of their intercourse with discarnate entities.

Despite the recurrent presence of these features, and the efforts made by some of the most representative authors mentioned above in constructing a specific identity for occultism, one should not lose sight of the fact that, especially on a popular level, boundaries between occultism in the strict sense and other contemporary phenomena were frequently blurred. In some cases the term occultism could be used, especially by outsiders, to describe more generally all those activities involving the study of, or an interaction with, a hidden (i.e., 'occult') dimension of reality, which was considered as yet unexplored by mainstream science. In that sense, spiritualism and psychical research would have fallen into the broader category of occultism.

Academic Concepts

Although the word 'occultism' has been used increasingly by specialists in the study of Western esotericism as indicating the specific historical current that has been described so far, it should be remembered that some authors have also used the term to indicate different meanings. Directly influenced by the popular understanding of the term, some have used it as indicating a more or less universal attitude or tradition, encompassing all ages and all cultures. In this sense occultism has easily become a synonym for loosely defined categories such as 'magic' or the 'irrational' (→ Rationality/Irrationality). It is in the latter sense, for instance, that Theodor Adorno has used the term in his famous "Theses against Occultism." Other authors, such as Robert Amadou, have restricted their definition of occultism to the idea of a Western esoteric tradition, making it a superfluous synonym of what present specialists in the field define as Western esotericism. A particularly influential definition of occultism, which had its roots in the occultist literature itself, but was reformulated by the sociologist Edward A. Tiryakian in the early 1970s, sees occultism not as a synonym, but as the practical, technical counterpart of esotericism. The latter would, on the other hand, refer only to ideas and doctrines. This definition, implying an artificial separation between the level of ideas and that of practices, has been criticized by several authors (we may mention here Robert Galbreath and Wouter J. Hanegraaff), and has been discarded by most specialists working in the field. Finally, W. J. Hanegraaff has proposed in the mid-1990s a new, original definition of occultism. In his view, traditional (i.e. pre-Enlightenment) esotericism would have been modified so deeply and dramatically during the nineteenth century, under the impact of secularization, that it would be advisable to refer to it by another name, i.e. occultism. Occultism may be seen, therefore, as encompassing all those movements that have tried, starting from an esoteric perspective, to come to terms with a disenchanted secular world (→ Disenchantment/Reenchantment). This label would also include, therefore, movements such as spiritualism, psychical research, human potential, and New Age. Occultism understood as a specific current would then be but a particular phenomenon in a larger category. It may be argued, however, that the use of the same term for two different phenomena may render Hanegraaff's definition of difficult practical use.

Literature

Adorno, Theodor W., The Stars Down to Earth and Other Essays on the Irrational in Culture, London/New York 1994; Amadou, Robert, L'Occultisme: Esquisse d'un monde vivant, Paris 1950; Eliade, Mircea, Occultism, Witchcraft, and Cultural Fashions: Essays in Comparative Religions, Chicago/London 1976; Faivre, Antoine, "Questions of Terminology proper to the Study of Esoteric Currents in Modern and Contemporary Europe," in: Idem/Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (eds.), Western Esotericism and the Science of Religion, Louvain 1998, 1-10; Galbreath, Robert, "Explaining Modern Occultism," in: Kerr, Howard/Crow, Charles L. (eds.), The Occult in America: New Historical Perspectives, Urbana/Chicago 1983, 10-37; Godwin, Joscelyn, The Theosophical Enlightenment, Albany 1994; Hammer, Olav, Claiming Knowledge: Strategies of Epistemology from Theosophy to the New Age, Leiden 2001; Hanegraaff, Wouter J., New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought, Leiden 1996; Laurant, Jean-Pierre, L'Esotérisme chrétien en France au XIX[e] siècle, Lausanne 1992; Idem, L'Esotérisme, Paris 1993; McIntosh, Christopher, Eliphas Lévi and the French Occult Revival, London 1975; Owen, Alex, The Place of Enchantment: British Occultism and the Culture of the Modern, Chicago/London 2004; Pasi, Marco, "La notion de magie dans le courant occultiste anglo-saxon (1875–1947): approches historiques et méthodologiques", in: Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes / Section des Sciences Religieuses, Annuaire: Résumé des conférences et travaux, 110 (2001–2002), 419-423; Secret, François, "Du De Occulta Philosophia à l'occultisme du XIX[ème] siècle," in: Charis: Archives de l'unicorne 1 (1988), 5-30; Tiryakian, Edward A., "Toward the Sociology of Esoteric Culture," in: Idem 1974, 257-280; Idem (ed.), On the Margin of the Visible: Sociology, the Esoteric, and the Occult, New York 1974; Webb, James, The Occult Underground, La Salle 1974; Idem, The Occult Establishment, La Salle 1976.

→ Esotericism, Magic, Modernity/Modern Age, Paganism/Neopaganism, Romanticism, Science, Spiritism

Marco Pasi

Oedipus

1. The West knows no figure, transmitted from Greek antiquity, more important, and susceptible of being read in religious history as a prism, than Oedipus. In him, an era's respective religious and nonreligious images of the human being fail. Sophocles's tragedy "Oedipus Rex," as presented in a framework of the annual dramatic contest in honor of Dionysus, in Athens about 430 BCE, portrays Oedipus's self-revelation. The special urgency with which this piece of dramatic work was presented, has given repeated occasion to new interpretation. The more Oedipus seeks to elude his destiny as a patricide and as his mother's husband—the destiny predicted by the Delphic oracle—the more certainly it is fulfilled. And this scenario has raised questions about divine providence, freedom of will and choice, arrogance, guilt, responsibility, fate, the interconnection of events, the tragic, and their ultimately religious interpretation. In the mirror of the myth of Oedipus, every age finds its own responses to these questions. The enigmatic puzzle of the Sophoclean tragedy, borne by numerous double meanings and reversals, has made its material a source of inexhaustible interpretability. And this has lent it that 'malleability' (J.-P. Vernant) and enduring currency that still comes to expression today in so many literary, dramatic, musical, and filmic re-elaborations.

The 'Oedipus Complex'

The concept of the 'Oedipus complex,' for its part, was first formulated in a letter of Sigmund Freud to Wilhelm Fliess, on October 15, 1897. And it was especially through this concept, soon to become one of the most important foundation stones in the theoretical edifice of → psychoanalysis, that the → myth of Oedipus shifted so durably into the general consciousness. According to the theory of the Oedipus complex, in every family an elementary rivalry prevails between the son(s) and the father, who stands in the way of their love for their mother, therefore of their incest; just as (in Freud's original theory) between the daughter(s) and their mother vis-à-vis the father. Freud's psychological theory has not only marked the modern view of the myth; it has shifted it, as well. Today, the myth of Oedipus presents, more generally, the relationship between law and self-restraint.

The Ancient Myth

2. The principal source of the myth of Oedipus (Gk., Oidípous, 'swollen foot'), is Sophocles's pair of tragedies "Oedipus Rex" (Lat. "King Oedipus"; in Gk., Oidípous Tyrannos), presented before 425 BCE, and "Oedipus at Colonus" (in Gk, Oidípous epí kolóno), presented posthumously in 401. Otherwise, the myth is only fragmentarily handed down in ancient literature (Homer and Hesiod, with dramatic texts of Aeschylus and Euripides being lost). Abundant representational art has been preserved, however, especially of depictions of Oedipus's encounter with the Sphinx. The action of the tragedy omits an actual presentation of the pre-history of the events: Jocasta, Queen of Thebes, warned of the curse that her son would kill his fathe (her spouse King Laios) and marry his mother, has Oedipus exposed, three days after his birth, by a shepherd of the mountains of Cithaeron. The infant is discovered by a childless couple: Polybos, a servant of the King of Corinth, and his wife Periboia. Left in ignorance about his birth, prudent and cunning Oedipus grows up with his adoptive parents. As a youth, and derided by jealous persons for his bastardy, he inquires of the Delphic Oracle as to his true origin, and learns that he is destined for union with his mother and the murder of his father. To escape the curse, Oedipus avoids returning to Corinth. But on the way to Thebes, he unwittingly strikes down his father Laios, delivers Thebes from the murderous Sphinx by solving her riddle—the question of the human being—and as a reward is wedded to his mother as the new ruler of Thebes. The drama itself begins only with the marriage. Oedipus begins a search for Laios's murderer, as a plague suddenly besets Thebes and blind seer Teiresias proclaims the murder to be its cause. Sign by sign, Oedipus is revealed to be the true author. When he learns of his calamity, he blinds himself, and is led by his daughter Antigone into exile. In "Oedipus at Colonus," Oedipus repeatedly proclaims his innocence, alleging his ignorance in committing the crime. After years of sorrowful and laborious wandering, he dies in the sacred precinct of the Eumenides, on the hill of Colonus, where the gods at last snatch him up to the status of a hero. His grave is honored, because he blesses and protects his adoptive country.

Impact and Reception

3. Two particular moments have determined the history of the effect of the myth of Oedipus: the problematics of understanding and of destiny. Ernst Bloch saw every philosophical investigation ultimately as "akin to the Oedipus form."[1] As a detective story of self-blinding and self-knowledge, it still has its effects, again, in Max Frisch's 'report,' Homo faber (1957), and in Didier Lamaison's 'family detective story' Oedipus (1994). As exemplary 'tragedy of destiny,' it is especially German idealism (Schelling, Schiller, and Hegel) that has interpreted the 'tragic conflict' represented in various 'stage presentations' (Corneille, 1659; Voltaire, 1718; Hofmannsthal, 1906; Gide, 1931; Cocteau, 1934), operas (Stravinsky, 1927; Orff, 1959; Rihm, 1987), and films (Pasolini, 1967).

Modern Interpretation

4. The modern debate over whether the human being's nature is conditioned through its own universals or by history, comes to expression in the history of the interpretation of the myth of Oedipus in the twentieth century. As anthropological constants, Sigmund Freud saw as coming together in the 'Oedipus complex'—the rivalry that is to have led, in prehistory, to the very murder of the first parent, because he stood in the way of love for one's mother, of incest—the "beginnings of religion, morality, society, and art."[2] Claude Lévi-Strauss has exemplified the method of structural anthropology, with the example of the myth of Oedipus. The ethnological question is still disputed today, whether the 'Oedipus complex' arises in all cultures.[3] Gille Deleuze and Félix Guattari, in their Anti-Oedipus (1962), earnestly dispute the family entanglement that Freud emphasizes, in favor of self-determination. French legal historian and psychoanalyst Pierre Legendre, on the other hand, sees, in "Oedipus Rex," "ultimately a treatise on the foundations of proscription,"[4] and the fantasies of omnipotence of a son who finds no stability in the missing self-restraint of his father. Philologically, Freud's interpretation of Sophocles is especially called into question by Jean Bollack, who indicts the psychoanalytic interpretation of Oedipus as 'universally human' for failing to recognize the specifically literary quality of the tragedy. Finally, Egon Flaig has interpreted the Sophoclean tragedy historically, in the political context of Athenian democracy—as the pedagogical, cautionary account of a power-hungry politician who, in the service of his own continuance in power, acts rashly, and who lacks the 'composure,' the 'justice,' and the 'measure' needed to lead a polis.

1. Bloch 1960, 679.
2. Freud 1913, 439.
3. Cf. Edmunds/Dundes 1983.
4. Legendre 1989, 39.

Literature

Sources: Sophocles, The Tree Theban Plays: Antigone, Oedipus the King, Oedipus at Colonus, trans. Robert Fagles, London 1982; Freud, Sigmund, "Totem und Tabu" (1913), in: Studienausgabe, vol. 9, Frankfurt/M. 1982, 287-444 (Engl. in: The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, vol. 13, London 1955).

Secondary Literature: Bloch, Ernst, "Die Form der Detektivgeschichte und die Philosophie," in: Die Neue Rundschau 71 (1960), 665-668; Bollack, Jean, "Der Menschensohn. Freuds Ödipusmythos (1986)," in: Idem, Sophokles: König Ödipus, vol. 2, Frankfurt/M. 1994, 90-138; Edmunds, Lowell, Oedipus: The Ancient Legend and Its Later Analogues, Baltimore 1985; Edmunds, Lowell/Dundes, Alan (eds.), Oedipus: A Folklore Casebook, Madison 1995 ([1]1983); Legendre, Pierre, Das Verbrechen des Gefreiten Lortie. Abhandlung über den Vater, Freiburg 1998 (French original: La crime du caporal Lortie: Traité sur le père, Paris 1989); Lévi-Strauss, Claude, Structural Anthropology, London 1968; Moret, Jean-Marc, Œdipe, la sphinx et les Thébains: essai de mythologie iconographique, 2 vols., Geneva 1984; Vernant, Jean-Pierre, "Ambiguité et renversement. Sur la structure énigmatique d' «Œdipe Roi» (1970)," in: Vernant, Jean-Pierre/Vidal-Naquet, Pierre, Œdipe et ses mythes, Paris 1988, 23-53.

→ Antiquity, Freud, Myth/Mythology, Psychoanalysis

Martin Stingelin

Olympic Games

Organization and Conception

1. Since the first Olympic Games of modern times, which were held in Athens in 1896, the Olympic Summer Games, and since 1924, the Winter Games (Chamonix) are held every four years. Only three times (1916, 1940, 1944) have the Games been cancelled. The organizer of the Olympic Games is the International Olympic Committee (IOC), with headquarters in Lausanne (founded in Paris, 1894). At the head of the IOC stands the President, who is elected by the whole body. The 194 National Olympic Committees (NOC), and the IOC-recognized 31 International Sports Unions (Olympic sports), are understood to comprise the Olympic Movement, which is to hold an Olympic Congress at least every eight years. The rules of the Olympic Movement are collected in the Olympic Charter. The five rings symbolizing the unity of the five continents have constituted the Olympic emblem since 1914.

Ancient Games

2. The ancient games held in Olympia were the outstanding event of the four great pan-Hellenic festival games (along with the Pythian in Delphi, the Isthmian near Corinth, and the Nemeian in Nemeia). Their origin is disputed. It is presumed that, long before the beginning (probably in 776 BCE) of the first games, cultic contexts were held whose beginnings lay in pre-Hellenistic cults of the dead. With the introduction of the cult of Zeus, the solemnities assumed the status of sacred, divine games. For the further development of the games, to be sure, an additional element had to be added: it was the outstanding culture of the contest (in Gk., agón) that lent the games a meaning beyond that of its cultic origins.

The five-day games took place every four years, in August/September. During this time, as well as for a month and a half before, and again after, weapons were laid down in Greece and the provinces. Violation of the divine peace was regarded as blasphemy. Participants in the games, as well as the audience, were free male Greeks. Only later did professional athleticism appear, which included non-Greeks as well. While at first there were only simple races along the stadium track, additional disciplines such as the relay race, distance race, pentathlon, boxing, wrestling, and chariot and horse racing, were added to the program. The athletes strove for victory, which brought them not only honor, but material rewards, as well.

The heyday of the Olympic era was in the sixth and fifth centuries BCE. From the fourth century onward, a new, professionalized approach was in control, which corresponded to the expectations of a body-conscious, achievement-oriented audience. The games became a 'show,' calculated precisely to attract an audience. It retained this character until their end. According to a twelfth-century testimonial, in 394 the Emperor Theodosius prohibited all pagan festivals, including the Olympic Games.

The Olympic Games of Modern Times

3. The ancient exemplar revealed in Ernst Curtius's excavations in Olympia (1875–1881) inspired Pierre de Coubertin (1863–1937) to cast a modern equivalent. The Olympic Movement became his impelling idea. From the ancient exemplar, the cultic and religious character was adopted. The liturgical and ritual course of the opening and closing ceremonies of all Olympic Games, whose procedure is specified in the Olympic Charter, is altogether consciously reminiscent of a solemn church celebration. Hymns, flags, oaths, and (since 1936) the flame carried from Olympia by relay runners generate a 'sacred' atmosphere, intended to foster peace and understanding among peoples. The Olympic spirit was enriched with the foundations of the English sportive understanding: in regulated competition, participants are to govern their efforts by fair confrontation. The best achievement is to determine the victor ('higher, faster, farther'). It was the concept of amateurism that merged this modern understanding of sports with the ancient exemplar. For the competitor, personal victory or the opponent's defeat must now be less important than simple enjoyment in sports ('participation is everything').

From the very outset, the Olympic project was a diffuse undertaking—although, of course, one with a centuries-old power of conviction. The emphatic claim of consecration, and presumed disinterest, always stood in contrast with egoistic demands and claims. A two-pronged situation: on the one side, the IOC abides by its unworldly, idealistic conception; on the other, there are the very worldly marketing rights accruing to participants in the Games. That this dilemma might entail the abandonment of ironclad 'basics' was shown by the admittance of professional athletes, whose participation was at least officially prohibited until the 1970s. Meanwhile, renunciation was made only reluctantly of the opportunities for income of a lucrative participation by tennis pros, or the American basketball 'dream team,' at the 1992 Games in Barcelona. Not least of all, this concession has today made the Games the commercial 'Olympic media event' that it is. Without consideration of the athletes, the schedule is pre-directed according to the TV-viewing habits of the most profitable media markets. Since 1992, for optimal enhancement of the commercial value of the Games, the summer and winter Games have been held in two-year alternation.

The situation is similar with respect to the alleged apolitical intent of the Games. The Games had always been both the object and forum of national and nationalistic interests, but the notorious climax was reached at the 1936

Games, held in Berlin. Under the sign of the Olympic rings, a criminal regime organized those 'apolitical Games' that are still regarded by Olympic functionaries as being ideal typical.

In spite of all complications, the Olympic Games are one of the success stories of the twentieth century. They are still able to confirm the grounding idea of peaceful understanding among peoples. Of course, this is less the merit of those who stage the games than it is that of the athletes and audiences.

Literature

Guttmann, Allen, The Olympics: A History of the Modern Games, Urbana 2002; Rürup, Reinhard (ed.), 1936. Die Olympischen Spiele und der Nationalsozialismus. Eine Dokumentation, Berlin 1996; Tames, Richard, Ancient Olympics, Oxford 1996; Sinn, Ulrich, Olympia: Cult, Sport, and Ancient Festival, Princeton 2000; Young, David C., The Olympic Myth of Greek Amateur Athletics, Chicago 1985.

→ Collective Representations, Popular Culture, Sports, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Hans-Georg Lützenkirchen

Oracle

The concept 'oracle' (from Lat., oraculum; from orare, 'to speak') is strongly marked by the ancient system of prophecy. It designates, as a way of entering into contact and → communication with gods or powers, two meanings: (1) the 'verdict,' or answer of the deity to a concrete question, usually posed in a received formulation; and (2) the place where this sentence is pronounced, usually in 'sacred' locales, such as springs or glades. Thus, oracles are always the phenomenon of a particular place (as well as, frequently, of a particular time). As institutions, they are staffed with cultic personnel (→ specialists, such as priests or prophets), whose presence as 'speakers' (mediums) or interpreters precludes an arbitrary elucidation of the 'verdict.' The inquiry can be made in view of decisions relating to affairs of state, can be of a cultic or political kind (e.g., the founding of colonies), or indeed can bear on one's future personal destiny (→ Oedipus), one's present activity ("Ought I to do this or not?"), or the elucidation of events that lie in the past (e.g. the causes of a disease).

Doubtless the best-known ancient oracle of utterance is that of Apollo in Delphi. Images on ancient vases show the female medium Pythia on a tripod, over a crevasse, in the vicinity of the Omphalos, the 'navel of the world.' It is often assumed that what occurred was an ecstasy, although a controlled one, in which, after the inhalation or ingestion of intoxicants, the medium fell into a kind of possession. True, this interpretation is not undisputed, any more than the function of tripod, Castalian spring, or bay tree, which are likewise cited in connection with the oracle. Nor are details of the inquiry known. Priests probably recorded Pythia's words (often ambiguously fixed in hexameters) and transmitted them to the counselees. Along with the oracle of utterance, the system of oracle by lots was especially important, as with the Roman Fortuna Primigenia in Praeneste, which was conducted with small 'lots,' or pieces of wood kept in the sanctuary, that gave simple

A healer and soothsayer of the tribe of Tikar questions this oracle in Banso, in Cameroon, by shaking out the contents of a basket. The inquirer places a gold monetary bill before him in compensation. In the basket are all manner of small objects, as cola shells, kauri snails, pebbles, ceramic pearls, shards, and old coins. The outcome of the oracle is decided not only the overall configuration of the objects shaken out, but also the way each piece lies. Kauri snails and coins, for example, represent material wealth and property. In addition, the soothsayer's intuition, feeling, and knowledge of human beings all contribute especially to the interpretation of the oracle. (Benita von Behr)

yes-and-no responses. Dream oracles were curative oracles especially connected with the cult of Asclepius in Greece. Here it was not the divine utterance that revealed the causes of the disease, but a dream.

For help in making decisions in situations of crisis, and for certitude in choosing one's own activities, as well as to satisfy the longing to know one's own destiny, persons avail themselves of ancient techniques once more, even today—although, as a state and cultic institution, the classical system of the oracle no longer plays any role in the West. (Cf., on the other hand, the Tibetan state oracle that resided in Nechung Gompa; → Lamaism). Thus, the 'inquiry' has shifted altogether into the area of the individual. Collections of oracles or utterances, such as the Chinese I-Ging ("Book of Transformations"), or the rune oracles, especially enjoy great popularity. They belong in the broad area of esoteric cult-reception, which is reviving many techniques of divination, while at the same time subsuming them under a diffuse concept of oracle.

Literature

Burkert, Walter, Griechische Religion der archaischen und klassischen Epoche, Stuttgart 1977, 184-190 (Engl. as: Greek Religion, Cambridge 1985); Fontenrose, Joseph, The Delphic Oracle: Its Responses and Operations. With a Catalogue of Responses, Berkeley 1978; Loewe, Michael (ed.), Oracles and Divination, Boulder 1981.

→ Antiquity, Communication, Prophecy/Divination

Jutta Bernard

Oral Tradition

One could say that Western culture is coming to the end of a phase in its history, which has been characterized by literacy and the dominance of the written texts. Technologies like telephone and radio as well as computers

Vedic-Brahmanic Oral Tradition

'Oral tradition'—oral transmission—is a salient characteristic of the Indian religious traditions. The hymnic collections of the four Vedas (c. 1500–1000 BCE), still looked on today as the cornerstone of Hindu texts and the highest authority in Hinduism, are regarded as having been 'exhaled' by creator god Brahma. They are classified not as human creations, but as revelation, to which the Vedic poets only 'listened' (in Sansk., śruti) in the formulation of the hymns they repeated. This mythic origin is thought of as the antecedent of a transmission in several scholastic traditions (śākhā). The means of this transmission was to have been direct oral communication from teacher to pupil (paramparā). These hymns of divine origin were introduced into the Vedic sacrificial cult, where no syllable might be wrongly applied or wrongly pronounced, for these were regarded as magical, and such misuse would entail lethal consequences for the person who had commissioned the sacrifice. The adoption of complicated mnemonic measures ensued, to guarantee the most precise transmittal. The hymns are composed in verse, so that the rhythmic patterns of the meters fix the correct succession of syllables. Oral teaching, melodics, and repetition are prescribed in the second, the Sāma Veda (Skt., sāman, 'song'), which arranges the hymns of the first, the Rig Veda ("holy song"), for liturgical use. These musical aspects, as well, facilitate rote learning. Further didactic methods are found in the form of schooling. In boyhood, the Veda pupil leaves his home and ritually enters the family of the teacher (gurukula). Then oral instruction is implemented, during all daily activities, as well as in a special lesson, at which teacher and pupil sit on the floor facing each other. The teacher tilts the pupil's head, in an established schema, corresponding to the sound of the syllables in the text to be memorized. This fixes the text in the pupil's mind by bodily motor conditioning. Hand gestures, representing the pitch of the notes to be sung, complete the holistic pedagogical procedure. In this fashion, the boys assimilate massive amounts of text, which are produced in utterance only in a later step in the pupil's formation. Thus, the Rig Veda comprises more than 100,000 double lines of verse, and the Sāma Veda some 1,800. Even today, family names like Trivedi (from tri, 'three') are used to indicate descent from ancestors of immense mental capacity. By means of these methods of oral retention of knowledge, Hindus have been able to preserve these hymns, verbatim, in unbroken tradition, to the very present. It is precisely oral transmission that is of decisive importance here, since Indological research has had to cope with later alterations much more often in texts handed down by writing. There are also, it is true, oral traditions in which there was no question of exact transmission, but situational narrative freedom with a fixed thematic core, such as the culture of the epic bards. The spread of writing for as yet unofficial texts was probably actually impeded in India by its strong oral tradition. Here the criticism is often voiced that an understanding of the text may have been neglected in favor of its memorization, so that, when it comes to tradition, a tendency to uncritical belief may have been reinforced in Indian history. In today's research, 'oral tradition' denotes the transmission of myths or narratives, folk or tribal, and usually regional, that have not been fixed in writing.

Although the Vedic sacrificial ceremonies of modern Hindu ritual have given way, the oral tradition of Vedic recitation has rudimentarily survived. The accompanying photograph shows two Veda specialists, engaged in an annual recitation contest in the temple of Kadavalloor in the state of Kerala (Southern India). They are representatives of the most respected and most learned priestly caste of Kerala (Namboodiri), and have been memorizing the Sāma Veda since their childhood, as was formerly the case with the greater proportion of male offspring of the Namboodiri. For this, there is a traditional school, that of the Brahmasvammatham, in the nearby city of Trissur. The contest is called anyonyam ('alternating'). Two pairs of contestants from the same team alternate in the recital of uninterrupted series of verses, according to the strict prescriptions of the Sāma Veda: with expanded melodies, repetition, and alternating insertions. Traditional didactic method is represented by the movements of their heads and (as shown by the priest in the right of the picture) by the gestures of their hands. Today, only one other school of the same sort exists in Kerala; thus, the contest has mostly a character of self-competition. It represents a dying art. Today, most persons educated in this tradition enter normal professions, but stand in the high regard of most of society. They are glad to be consulted as specialists by Indologists and anthropologists, as, for instance, in 1975, by Fritz Staal, at the re-presentation of a Vedic sacrifice (agnihotra) that lasted several days.

Elmar Stapelfeldt

controlled by speech contribute to the rise of a new type of oral tradition, as do cultural trends toward deviating from traditional prescribed texts or agendas, such as the value placed on improvisation in → music, → theater and religious services. The current emphasis on → discourse, especially spoken discourse, for example in legal and political decision-making processes, also indicate a strong oral culture.

Therefore we must reassess the claims of scholars and scientists who continue to describe contemporary Western culture as a fundamentally written culture (→ Book). This view often includes the claim that writing must be seen as the very foundation of human culture and of historical understanding of culture. This emphasis on writing involves a certain maneuvering for power; written texts that have gained recognition and respect can be set up as the only grounds for making claims to knowledge so that open discussion is marginalized. This idea has been expressed in the words of absolutist legal scholars: "What is not written down in the acts simply does not exist."

'Writing' and the Proclamation of Religion

The development of written culture is relevant to the study of religion in that it requires a religious community to deal with questions concerning the relationship between texts and divine truth, between human → language and

God's word. A number of religions can be characterized by their possession of a → canon, that is, a written, established, and closed corpus of texts recognized as scripture and seen as the foundation of that religion. This corpus gains its authority from its age and from the belief that it originated with God. Some traditions claim that their texts were directly dictated by God (oral inspiration) as in the case of the → Qur'an (see sura 97:1), or were actually written down by God, as in the case of the Ten Commandments (Exod 32:16; cf. Deut 6:6). The authority of the canon also serves to establish the authority of special groups of people, such as priests, who have the exclusive right to read, expound, and interpret the canon.

By contrast, prophetic speech also claims divine origin but bypasses priestly institutions and claims to ancient authority. God is believed to speak directly through a human being, or a prophet may report a direct inspiration by proclaiming it with the introduction "Hear the word of the Lord . . ." or "The spirit of the Lord came upon me . . ." In scriptural religions this option is limited, or may be excluded, as it is important for the authority of the texts to see them as the final and complete divine revelation, which logically excludes direct oral revelation to individuals today, i.e. there is an 'end of prophecy.' Some scriptural religions do allow for continued non-verbal revelation in the form of mystical visions or 'natural revelation' through gaining spiritual understanding of the created world (→ Mysticism).

Words as Independent Entities

Most religions do not reflect a belief of unlimited access to direct divine revelation. God is believed to speak to a privileged few, usually through signs (→ Oracle). However, the word of God is sometimes personified in such a way that it does interact with the entire world, as in Judaism, where the world is created through God's word, or in Christianity when it takes on the form of God's son (John 1:1-8) and God's invisible voice is called his daughter.

Religious words can also be seen as gaining independence from the text inasmuch as even scriptural religions require oral → media. Reading scripture aloud, singing Psalms, and preaching about scripture all constitute an effort to make written revelation manifest as the oral proclamation of an abstract set of beliefs called the 'word' of God. These spoken forms give separate life to the text so that the author—God, for instance, or an ancient prophet—is made to say something without actually being directly present. Scripture can also be enlivened and set apart from ordinary discourse through music and singing, which endows the word with sacred or liturgical character.

Writing as the Preservation of Memory and Tradition

When the founders or reformers of a religion die, the community is faced with the question of how they will survive as a unit without their original leader. The identity of the group can be maintained by a posthumous appeal to the leader's 'authentic' words (Gk, logia). In most cases, the founder has not written anything himself or has failed to answer every question relevant to the community. Thus disciples who can claim direct contact with the founder during his or her life and knowledge of his teachings are needed to arbitrate disputes and to continue the 'authentic' teachings. The establishment of these teachings in writing usually occurs around the third generation after the founder's death, when the last of the disciples have died.

Besides establishing a chain of authority, words in this scenario are also used to interpret the community's current condition and role, and to invest the founder's fate with meaning, especially if his or her death was violent.

Thus one might say that texts of this type serve the primary purpose of 'community formation.' The texts gain authority despite their recent composition through their identification with eyewitnesses, disciple's names, and indications of exact times and places in which the events recorded took place.

These texts also include characteristic turns of phrase, which are believed to be exact repetitions of the founder's words or teachings. These are particularly important to the community because they have adequate authority for use in rituals and recitations. Community identity and the memory of the founder and his or her teachings can further be maintained through ritual uses of verse and rhyme as well as non-verbal elements such as particular movements and gestures or the order in which ritual acts are performed (e.g. the Indian Brahmin's → Caste).

Oral Tradition and its Relation to the Public

Even in writing cultures, there are certain fields of knowledge that are considered appropriate only for oral transmission (→ Mysteries). For example, the Celtic druids (→ Celts) did not record their wisdom in writing. Similarly, Plato makes a distinction between knowledge that can be written down and made accessible for anyone to study, and knowledge that is esoteric, i.e. accessible only to an inner circle and which must be protected by being transmitted only in an oral form.

On the other hand, there are ritual acts that are oral but require hearers consisting of the general public. In religious law, an objection to a marriage must be expressed before witnesses and for all to hear, as stated in many wedding ceremonies (". . . let him speak now [i.e. in front of the entire assembly] or forever hold his peace . . ."). In the same way, vows made at baptism or the profession of faith in a conversion ceremony must not be spoken in private but rather before an entire assembly.

Oral Cultures

Many cultures dispense with writing altogether, or use it in only a few specific contexts. It is important to remember that these cultures have not simply failed to develop into writing cultures, but are instead structured in an entirely different way.

In some cultures narratives or genealogies 'belong' to individual families or clans (→ Aborigines). These texts can be applied as the basis for a comprehensive elucidation of the world and of life. Although other professional literature, such as legal documentation, does not exist, the narrative texts can still serve to hold society together. The narrative form plays the role that formal documentation plays in other cultures and serves to enforce order. For example, riveting recitals of the unscrupulous wealthy person who loses everything overnight (Luke 12:15-21), of suitors who exhaust the goods of the wife of an absent man (Odyssey), of the city that denies impoverished foreigners hospitality (Gen 18-19) all show authoritatively to persons living in an oral culture that the strong must not take advantage of the weak or the rich take advantage of the poor. Similarly, in myths that tell of gods and heroes who hold sway over all people, even the dominant members of a society, the basic order of society is publicized, grounded, and protected through a narrative of just punishment. The conviction that the strong are not actually able to wield their power arbitrarily can function even in competition with everyday observations to the contrary.

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph, Der drohende Untergang, Berlin 1991; Bultmann, Rudolf, The History of Synoptic Tradition, Oxford 1963; De Jong, Irene, A Narratological Commentary on the Odyssey, Cambridge 2001; Goody, Jack, The Logic of Writing and the Organization of Society, Cambridge 1986; Ong, Walter, Orality and Literacy: The Technology of the Word, London 1986; Richter, Michael, The Formation of the Medieval West: Studies in the Oral Culture of the Barbarians, Dublin 1994; Wenzel, Horst, Hören und Sehen, Schrift und Bild. Kultur und Gedächtnis im Mittelalter, Munich 1995.

→ Book, Communication, Language, Literature, Memory, North America (Traditional Religions), Text/Textual Criticism, Tradition, Writing

Christoph Auffarth

Order / Brotherhoods

Concept

1. The term 'religious order' (from Lat., ordo) denotes a union of women or men in a community that obligates itself, most commonly according to determinate rules, to live together permanently or for a given time, and usually under a superior. Shutting out familial or societal areas, they devote themselves primarily to religious activities. The order community here functions as a second family, which is often made clear by the adoption of a new name. As they constitute a sign that is visible to the outside, members of orders frequently wear garb indicative of their order (→ Clothing). The assemblage of persons for the exercise of such religious practice is represented in nearly all religions, and plays an important role in Islam (Sufi brotherhoods) and in Buddhism, in addition to being familiar in Christianity.

Christian Orders

2. In Roman Catholic regulation, ecclesiastical law (CJC 488) determines which associations or cloistered communities are to be reckoned as orders. Persons who enter the Christian orders universally obligate themselves by the three vows of obedience, poverty, and celibacy, with the purpose of progressively gaining Christian perfection. According to their tasks and services, orders are divided into contemplative, active, or 'mixed' orders. They are also distinguished into orders of priests and orders of laity, depending on the ecclesiastical status of the majority of their members. In terms of their 'system,' they are divided into monastic, canonical, mendicant, clerical, and chivalric. This differentiation of the orders is the result of secessions and reform movements since the High Middle Ages, especially since the withdrawal of the Cistercians from Cluny. Besides the monks, who live their entire lives in common in the monastery, twenty-four hours a day, there are choir monks, or canons, who spend only parts of the day in common, especially divine service. Women, widows in particular, who wished to enter an order, seldom found admittance, so that they formed order-like associations themselves, such as the Beguines. Without ecclesiastical 'ordering,' they often fell under the suspicion of deviation from church doctrine. The knightly orders produced, on the one hand, organizations that work without ecclesiastical ties, such as the Knights of Malta, and, on the other hand, social communities whose 'orders,' signed with medals or the like, are bestowed on them in token of special recognition.

Brotherhoods

3. In Islam, particularly today, Sufi brotherhoods play a significant, to some extent even political, role (→ Sufism). Sufi movements emphasize the subjective, mystical experience of faith. Knowledge of God—the ultimate goal of a Sufi (Arab., 'wool-clad')—becomes possible through special practices that tend to be 'hostile to law' (antinomian). These may be of a meditative, ascetical nature, and are practiced alone or in the company of other Sufis. Beginning in the thirteenth century, Sufi movements have repeatedly organized themselves in orders or brotherhoods (tariqa), in the veneration of special saints who mediate salvation. The 'whirling dervishes' of Turkish Konya, who enter a meditative trance by way of special clothing and circular motion, are a familiar tourist attraction. In recent times, the brotherhoods have been the object of new esteem and regard—particularly, indeed, in the region of the former Soviet Union. The opportunity to belong to a ritual community was adopted especially among the Turkish minorities of Europe, as an alternative to the identity-loss of an existence in the diaspora. The success of the brotherhoods, both within and without the nuclear Islamic countries, is also due to a reaction to the political and cultural tendencies to secularization in the Islamic world. Thus, for example, the Mevlevije or Bectasije Brotherhoods in Turkey, long banned, have come once more to enjoy great popularity and success.

→ Buddhism, Charitable Organizations, Christianity, Endowment/Foundation, Islam, Jesuits, Monasticism, Sufism

Hendrik Bechmann

Orientalism / Exoticism

Exotism

1. The term 'exoticism' (from Gk., exotikós, 'foreign-style') denotes a certain manner of confrontation with foreign cultures. The latter are perceived as distant—whether temporally, spatially, or socially—and as different from one's own culture. This presumes, on the one hand, a division between one's own culture and the culture thought of as foreign. On the other hand, a foreign culture is necessarily perceived against the background of one's own. That perception is reflected in the conceptualizations formed of exotic worlds, of course, but also of one's own reality—the wishes and dreams, as well as the renunciations, that each given society demands of its members.

A relation to foreign cultures is therefore usually ambivalent—marked by fear and a sense of estrangement, as well as by enchantment and fascination. All of this inspires the arts, but also fosters the formation of cult and religion. Frequently, only fragments of the foreign culture are perceived, such as, for example, palm trees, beaches, teeming bazaars, veiled women, or 'bearded fanatics.' A genuine confrontation with the culture in question is impeded by the constant repetition of these deeply engraved stereotypes (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes).

European exoticism's great historical importance is owed especially to its ethnocentric variants, where it often went hand in hand with colonialism. The European view of the 'other world' has ordinarily been typified by a satisfaction in power, a pleasure justified by the supposition of a higher stage of development in the home society (→ Evolutionism).

The Foreign as the Exotic: Contacts and Projections

2. European contact with other cultural circles dates from long before the middle of the first pre-Christian millennium. During the time of the Hellenic empires (fourth to first centuries BCE), encounters between Greeks and Persians, together with Alexander the Great's campaigns of conquest and exploration (which reached India), created a religious melting pot. The Roman Empire, which succeeded Hellenic dominance, extended this process of the extension of religious concepts between East and West. To an extent, these concepts turned into new 'Easternizing' cults, such as one whose orientation was to the Egyptian cult of the goddess Isis, or another that was directed to the Persian cult of Mithras (→ Mysteries).

Frequently, the rule of the Islamic Omayyad dynasty in Spain, crusades, pilgrimages to the Holy Land, and trading expeditions were conflict-ridden sources of a first-hand experience of foreign cultures in the Middle Ages. That experience became structured in legends, literature, and fantasy-filled reports of fabulous journeys. The capture of Constantinople by the Turks (1453), and the collision with the peoples of Central and South America in the sixteenth century, did open fresh horizons, but the new impressions rapidly crystallized into hostile caricatures and racist appraisals.

An ambivalent perception of the 'foreign' was shown precisely in ethnographic compositions of the sixteenth century especially, concerning the newly discovered lands of the Latin American continent. There the figure of the 'noble savage' was formed, and served as a screen for the projection of an image of the oppressed and displaced of one's own society. To many, the 'savage' represented a primitive ideal worth striving for, the figure of an incorrupt, happy, and natural human being. Reports like those of sailor-scientist Louis-Antoine de Bougainville (1729–1811) gave life to this idealized type of person in the second half of the eighteenth century, with a new proclamation of life in the → South Sea. Here seemed to be an earthly paradise, populated by noble, constantly happy 'savages.' Many artists took inspiration in this, such as Paul Gauguin, Emil Nolde, Max Pechstein, August Macke, and Paul Klee, to name but a few. A negative image was established by the evolutionistic, Darwinistic thought of the nineteenth century, in combination with a racist colonial spirit. The 'primitives' were no longer the enviable 'firstborn of this earth,' but now were the uncultured, immoral, and irreligious 'natives,' subsisting on a particularly low rung of the developmental ladder. In fact, 'fetishist' (→ Fetish/Fetishism), 'heathen,' and 'animist' were the most innocent eponyms for the members of ethnic groups and tribal cultures.

Orientalism

3. A special fascination for Europeans had always been exerted by the → Ancient East, the nearest region to Europe. Until well into modern times, the Near East was reckoned as the space of an aggressive Islam, against which Christian and European wars had been waged for centuries (the crusades, the Spanish reconquista). Here, political and religious interests often entered an unholy alliance. With the failure of the Ottoman assault on Vienna (1683) at the latest, the East lost much of its ominous character. The West now began its definitive overpowering of the East. Napoleon's Egyptian campaign (1798/99) did something additional, as well: it lent impulse to a special admiration for traditionally Islamic cultures. It is no coincidence, then, that, with the end of the eighteenth century, a special branch of scholarship appeared—Oriental Studies, along with its sub-discipline, Islamic Studies.

It was the Christian Palestinian literary scholar Edward Said who in the 1980s criticized the attitude and hidden agenda of these disciplines as

After his enlightenment, the Mahavagga (1, 3) tells, the Buddha sat and enjoyed the condition. A thunderstorm suddenly arose. Cold wind and rain began to assail him. And the Buddha received unexpected protection: the Cobra King wrapped itself seven times around him, and spread its hood over the head of the Enlightened One, lest he suffer some harm. After seven days the storm ceased, and the Cobra King transformed itself into a beautiful young man, who offered the Buddha homage. Might this be the reason why this legendary scene was chosen in Europe around 1930 for the scene of a popular art offering in postal card format? Actually, it probably was not. It may be supposed that this presentation of the Buddha in the Khmer style was solely chosen to show the scantily clad woman in the foreground and thus provide the connoisseur with additional reason for shopping. The suggestion is that of a favorite scenario of exotic fantasies: the temple dancer (devadasi) who performs lascivious dances before her 'idols'—the series of offerings that extends from Mata Hari to Fritz Lang's late work, Der Tiger von manifestation of what was to become known as 'Orientalism.' In Said's opinion, the East and its mainly Islamic culture, as it appears in Western literature and scholarship, is a construction emerging from the dominance of the West. Here, the East had been erected against the West as a monolithic block. For most persons, travel in the East was altogether impossible. Thus, in this respect as well as in others, travelogues, accounts, and descriptions by merchants, missionaries, and military figures were the only sources of information. The Tales from the Thousand and One Nights, translated into French by Antoine Galland between 1704 and 1717, were determinative for many eighteenth-century Europeans' image of the East. These soon enjoyed great favor throughout Europe (→ Fairytale). Here the world of the East no longer appeared as the breeding ground of an anti-God (read, 'one unfriendly to Christianity') and an 'anti-Christ,' but was an enticing, sensual, mysterious place. This Orientalism performed several functions. For example, the East was used to transfer erotic fantasies to a distant stage. Painting was the most obvious medium: with the 'Orientalists' (J. A. D. Ingres, E. Delacroix, J.-L Gérôme), harems and baths were frequent and favorite motifs. But criticism of political and social relations, as well, or of the Christian Church, was shifted to the East.

The reception of these images by European writers (J. G. Herder, J. W. von Goethe ["West-Östlicher Diwan," with Marianne von Willemer; 1819/1827]), F. → Nietzsche, G. Flaubert (Salammbô, 1862) assisted in their extension. The best known examples of a mix of the East of the folktale and the East of realism are the narratives of Karl May (1842–1912), actually trivial literature, which have remained part of the Eastern image in German-speaking countries until today.

Literature

Buruma, Ian/Margalit, Avishai, Occidentalism: A Short History of Anti-Westernism, London 2004; Carrier, James G. (ed.), Occidentalism: Images of the West, Oxford 1995; Haddad, Emily A., Orientalist Poetics: The Islamic Middle East in Nineteenth-Century English and French Poetry, Aldershot 2002; King, Richard, Orientalism and Religion: Post-Colonial Theory, India and the Mystic East, London/New York 1999; Kohl, Karl-Heinz, Entzauberter Blick. Das Bild vom Guten Wilden und die Erfahrung der Zivilisation, Berlin 1981; Macfie, A. L., Orientalism, London 2002; Macfie, A. L. (ed.), Orientalism: A Reader, Edinburgh 2000; Said, Edward W., Orientalism, London 1985; Tavakoli-Targhi, Mohamad, Refashioning Iran: Orientalism, Occidentalism, and Historiography, Basingstoke 2001; Turner, Bryan S., Orientalism, Postmodernism and Globalism, London/New York 1994; Turner, Bryan S. (ed.), Orientalism: Early Sources, 12 vols., London 2000–2002.

→ Ancient East (illustration), Colonialism, Gender Stereotypes, Islam, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Reception, Veil

Silvia Kuske and Astrid Czerny

Orientation

1. Originally, the word 'orientation' meant directing someone or something in the direction of 'sunrise.' (The Latin root of the word is [sol] oriens,

'rising [sun],' 'morning.') Hence the further meaning of 'East' as an area of the earth. The chief types of orientation are (1) astronomical orientation: the laying out of cultic installations for example, according to the chief directions of the compass; (2) environmental orientation: as the erection of churches and chapels at the highest point of an area (hill, mountain); (3) anthropocentric orientation, that takes the human body as its point of departure: thus, the higher dignity is accorded the right side of the body in many (but not all) cultures; (4) cultural orientation: for example, the layout of buildings in such a way that they will 'point' toward religious centers, as Rome, Jerusalem, or Mecca.

Eshnapur/Das indische Grabmal (Ger., "The Tiger of Eshnapur/The Indian Tomb"; 1958/59). The fact that religion, here, is merely a veil for this trivial erotic aesthetics, and the image of the Buddha merely an exotic code, may also be recognized from the fact that temple dance was practiced only in Hinduism, and not before a Buddha. (Hubert Mohr and Kirsten Holzapfel)

2. Directional phenomena are found in nature even at the lowest level (bacteria). Ants, bees, and the intercontinental flight of birds or carrier pigeons are familiar examples of the accomplishments of orientation in the animal kingdom. Even at an early stage of development, the human species must have oriented itself for an optimal use of resources in space and time. Many of the wild animals hunted in the Paleolithic Age were draught animals, and hence it was important to know not only when they were on the move, but also which territory they would traverse. This lifestyle presupposed an intimate knowledge of the environment, and a corresponding orientation in it.

3. The irreversible transition from the maintenance of life by hunting and gathering, to the sedentary lifestyle of agriculture and animal husbandry, bestowed importance on an astronomical orientation to the sun (and to a lesser degree, to the stars; cf., in Egypt, the rising of Sirius), on which life itself depended. The important thing then became an optimization and stabilization of the harvest yield. One of the measures of optimization consisted in a determination of the favorable moment for planting. For this a sufficiently accurate → calendar was necessary. In many cultures, four fixed 'cardinal points' of the year were established by astronomical observation: the summer and winter solstices and the two equinoxes. Further important data could be established in relation to these fixed points, for instance by counting out a definite number of days after a solstice. The orientation of sacred premises (temples, tombs) was frequently such that key points on the horizon could be glimpsed at which the sun rose or set on a given date. Thus, the monumental stone installation in Stonehenge (England, Period II, c. 2160 BCE) provided the bearings of the sunrise on the day of the summer or winter solstice; and the sunsets on these days could be observed also over other of these monumental stones. Finally, the orientation of other stones indicated the direction of sunrise and sunset at the equinoxes. Another example is the sacred installation at Uaxactun, in Petén, in Guatemala. It consists of a temple pyramid, opposite which three other temples are positioned on a raised platform. From an observation point marked by a projecting stone along the pyramid's stairway, three points of orientation can be observed: over the north corner of the temple on the left, sunrise at the summer solstice; over the south corner of the temple on the right, sunrise at the winter solstice; and through the gate of the midmost temple, sunrise at the equinoxes.

Ritual Orientation, Cult of the Ruler

4. a) Ritual orientation is governed by the fixed points of nature, inasmuch as it corresponds to cultural (religious, political) models. It is responsible for the fact that, in China, traditionally, the important side is the left, even though most Chinese are right-handed. The superior direction was the direction pointing to the sun, the south. Accordingly, the majority of dwellings and other buildings have their orientation toward the south. The Emperor was enthroned in the north of the palace, with a view to the south. The next most important orientation was that of the direction of the sunrise, the east; and from the viewpoint of the Emperor, the East lay to the left. Accordingly, left was also the side of honor for guests. As the southerly orientation, then, was the preferable one, and the one ritually reserved to the ruler, so also second place fell to the easterly. The (polar opposite) north (the Emperor's 'back') is the region of the demons, of winter, of bad influences by the weather.

The village of the African Dogon is a symbol of the human being: "This is a person, and must lie in a north-south direction; the smithy is the head, certain altars are the feet. The east-west oriented huts, used by women during menstruation, are the hands; residences of families fashion the breast. And the symmetrical nature of the entire group finds its expression in a foundational sanctuary, in the form of a cone (the male genital organ) and an excavated stone (female genital organ), on which the fruit of lannea acida is laid in order to press oil from it."[1]

Religious Centers

b) In ritual orientation, natural models of direction can be replaced with others. In Gothic cathedrals the altar stands at the eastern end of the nave. East is the direction of Jerusalem. It was from the East that the Second Coming of Christ was expected, and thus also the general resurrection. In similar fashion, the prayer niches in mosques, in which the mullahs make their prayer, always face Mecca. This direction is the one in which pious Muslims face, as well, as they prostrate themselves to pray. A constantly reliable determination of the direction of Mecca, in the expansion into Asia, was one of the chief motives for the development of Arab astronomy in the Middle Ages.

This compass enables Muslims to determine the direction of Mecca, to which they direct their prayer from wherever they may be. An instruction booklet featuring a numerical key to all cities of any considerable size assists the user in via: the faithful direct the compass needle to the numeral corresponding to the nearest large city, and then, holding the compass horizontally, determine the direction of Mecca by the small minaret. (Benita von Behr)

c) In China, when someone had just died, the corpse in state had to be positioned in such a way that the feet lay in the direction of the gates. The reason was that, in case the deceased became a spirit, that person would immediately see the gates when emerging from the corpse, and would have to abandon his property through these gates. Otherwise that person might wander about in the house and harass the survivors. For the lie of the tombs, even today the laws of geomancy (feng shui, 'wind and water') apply. Graves are situated in a high place, facing south, and thus are positioned in such a way that the 'energy-laden mountains' and 'shielding waters' may be able to develop the remaining energy (qi) of the dead as fully as possible, and thus have the effect of a blessing (ling) on descendants.

Concerned for their immortality, the Egyptian pharaohs of the Old Kingdom had their pyramids built in such a way that the axis would have its orientation toward the north, and that a 'shaft of wind' in the sarcophagus chamber would indicate the direction of the pole star. The pole star, as the center of Ursa Major, the constellation that revolves about it, the 'Never-Disappearing,' was linked to hope in the resurrection.

1. See Griaule/Dieterlen 1954, 96.

Literature

Feuchtwang, Stephan D. R., An Anthropological Analysis of Chinese Geomancy, Vithagna 1974; Granet, Marcel, La pensée chinoise, Paris 1934; Griaule, Marcel/Dieterlen, Germaine, "The Dogon of the French Sudan," in: Forde, Daryll (ed.), African Worlds, Oxford 1954; Park, Chris C., Sacred Worlds: An Introduction to Geography and Religion, London/New York 1994; Poorthuis, Marcel/Chana, Safrai (eds.), The Centrality of Jerusalem: Historical Perspectives, Kampen 1996; Ruggles, Clive (ed.), Archaeoastronomy in the 1990s, Loughborough 1993; Smith, Jonathan Z., Map Is Not Territory: Studies in the History of Religions, Chicago/London 1978.

→ Calendar, Grave/Tomb, Landscape, Place (Sacred)

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

Origin

The Question of Origins in Myth and Philosophy

1. A concern with the origins of the human being and the world—a concern with anthropogony and → cosmogony—is characteristic of all societies rooted in tradition. As early as the Indian Upanishads, the question is posed as to the origin of all—the ultimate, total ground, from which the multiplicity of phenomena has emerged. Interpretations of the origin of the world are found in the cosmogonic myths of all of the peoples of the earth. Enuma Elish and the Gilgamesh epic can be cited as myths of origin from the Mesopotamian culture. In a biblical context, the creation and paradise narratives attempt to answer the question of beginnings. In Greece, as well, philosophies at first still closely tied to myth attempt to answer the question of origins. Thus, the concept arché ('origin,' 'beginning,' 'principle'), in the Pre-Socratics of the sixth and fifth centuries BCE, designates that from which 'being' arises. According to Thales of Miletus, all things have arisen from water; according to Anaximenes, from air; according to Empedocles, from the four elements; according to Democritus, from atoms. Anaximander calls the original ground of all being the 'unlimited,' or 'infinite' (apeiron). A classic definition for arché is Aristotle's: "The first, from out of which something becomes."[1]

From its very beginnings, then, Western philosophy poses the question of first origins, which is usually interpreted as the question of God (God as 'unmoved mover'). Remnants of this traditional orientation to beginnings are still found in the modern quest for wisdom, for example with Descartes, who seeks a fundamentum inconcussum (Lat., 'unwavering foundation'), a first, 'unshakable,' Archimedean original point in the search for knowledge. Modern science renounces the question of God, it is true, but not the quest for certitude, and thereby not the quest for a fixed, 'secured' point of departure for scientific methodology. The quest for a point of departure fixed in time, alongside the teleogical thinking directed toward a goal of history, can be designated as the axis of a Western understanding of reality. That question has persisted, until now, from its mythic beginnings to the present "leave-taking of the principle" (O. Marquard).

Thought without Origin: The Hindu Tradition

2. In the associations of Western tradition, the thought that there might possibly be no first beginning, no origin, is grasped only with difficulty. Only go back far enough—according to European categories of thought—and one must inevitably get to a first point of departure. In a framework of thought accustomed to move, in linear fashion, from a fixed point of departure toward a fixed target, 'being without a beginning' is sheerly unthinkable. The question of what there actually was before the first beginning, then, is seen as nonsensical—or even, as in the case of Augustine's opponents, the Manicheans, heretical.

But that the beginning can be conceptualized in an entirely different way is proven by, for instance, the Hindu teaching of the world ages, which reckons with the eternal return of an immeasurable multiplicity of time-worlds and space-worlds, and knows no first beginning at a determinate temporal position.

Sri Aurobindo

Granted, neo-Hindu philosopher Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950) also posits the question of the beginning: "When was the beginning, then?" But he answers: "At no moment in time, for the beginning is at every moment. The beginning has always been, is always now, and will ever be. The divine beginning is forever before time, in time, and beyond time. The eternal, infinite, and one, personal or impersonal, is an endless beginning."[2] In a framework of Aurobindo's 'spiral' concept, there is neither a first beginning nor an ultimate end, since each seeming end is simultaneously a new beginning. In the same way, birth and death become relative, whether of the individual human being or of the whole human race in a permanent process of cosmic transformation, with the rise and demise of entire world ages.

The Question of Origin in Modern Science

3. Modern science, as well, was long marked by the search for an absolute beginning. Subsequent to the Enlightenment, inquiry has been conducted into the origin of the human race, the origin of religion, and the origin of the universe, although it is a matter, here, of basic questions that cannot be univocally answered with the means of empirical science. Corresponding attempts at interpretation run the risk of themselves becoming a substitute for faith or belief.

The Study of Religion

In the study of religion, the search for the beginnings of religion became a downright fixed idea. As early as the heyday of → evolutionism, at the end of the nineteenth century, the history of religion was extended to prehistory, by way of ever 'more original' phases and cultural horizons. After E. B. Tylor's theory, 'animism,' a 'pre-animism' (Andrew Lang) was postulated, followed by 'dynamism' (Marett), or the 'enchantment' theory (W. Preuss), each alleging to have identified the 'most primitive' form of religion, the one nearest the origins of the human race. In his Der Ursprung der Gottesidee (Ger., "The Origin of the Idea of God"), 12 volumes, 1926–1955, Father Wilhelm Schmidt, in orientation to still surviving 'remnants' of the oldest culture, believed that he could reconstruct 'primitive religion,' in the form of a belief in a 'high God' (primitive monotheism). Here he appealed to a personal primitive revelation of God, thus appealing as well to a theological search for the ultimate foundation that would be in accord with Catholic teaching. The → polytheism of the ancient high cultures—as with all such manner of decadence theories since the Enlightenment—was regarded as a fall from an ideal primitive condition.

Is Culture 'Originally Religious'?

Still more comprehensive, it would seem, is a certain (merely implicit) premise of many cultural theories today. This proposition avers that any cultural expression, be it economic, artistic, or juridical, originally arose in the area of religion. It would have been only in the course of → pre- and early history, then, that independent cultural areas untrammeled by religion had been differentiated.

Like all other theories of origins, these theories have turned out to be false. We have no opportunity to investigate a 'primitive culture,' or 'primitive religion,' in their pure form. Accordingly, today's academic study of religion has by and large surrendered its repeated (and always futile) quest for the origin of religion.

A radical turn can be observed in the state of the question when it comes to philosophical hermeneutics, in an a priori renunciation of the search for an Archimedean point untainted with interpretation, and thus, with Dilthey, acknowledging that any proposition of a beginning is arbitrary. Not even empirical research ever gains the opportunity of finding a beginning without premises. For lack of adequate sources of light, the beginnings of history (including religious history) are lost in the dark.

1. Aristotle, Metaphysics, 1013a, 17ff. Cf. A. LUMPE, "Der Terminus arché von den Vorsokratikern auf Aristoteles," in: Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte 1 (1955), 104-116.
2. SATPREM, Sri Aurobindo oder das Abenteuer des Bewußtseins, Weilheim 1970, 227f. (French [1]1964; Engl. as: Sri Aurobindo or, The Adventure of Consciousness, New York 1968).

Literature

AUDRETSCH, Jürgen/MAINZER, Klaus (eds.), Vom Anfang der Welt. Wissenschaft, Philosophie, Religion, Mythos, Munich 1989; ELIADE, Mircea, Myth and Reality, New York 1963; GEBSER, Jean, Ursprung und Gegenwart, 3 vols., Stuttgart 1973; MARQUARD, Odo, Fairwell to Matters of Principle: Philosophical Studies, New York 1989; MASUZAWA, Tomoko, In Search of Dreamtime: The Quest for the Origin in Religion, Chicago 1993.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Colonialism, Cosmology/Cosmogony, Eliade, Evolutionism, God/Gods/The Sacred, Time

Wolfgang Gantke

Orthodox Churches

Concept

1. A distinction is made among (a) the "Orthodox churches of the two Ecumenical Councils," that have accepted only the first two Councils, Nicaea I (325) and Constantinople I (381)—namely, the Old Church of the East and the Old Church of the East in India, (b) the "Orthodox churches of the three Ecumenical Councils," which also accepted the Council of Ephesus (451), namely, the Syrian Orthodox Church, the Orthodox Syrian Church of the East in India, the Coptic Orthodox Church, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, and the Armenian Apostolic Church, and (c) the "Orthodox churches of the Seven [Ecumenical] Councils," which also accept the Councils of Chalcedon (451), Constantinople II (553), Constantinople III (680–681), and Nicaea II (787). These latter churches include, among other ecclesiastical entities, the

The picture shows a typical monastic religious service of the Orthodox Church, celebrated by a bishop, with several archimandrites, abbots, deacons, and monks. As spiritual superior, the bishop stands in the center of the podium, facing the altar. He wears the sakkos and the omophorion (corresponding to the Western pallium). To the right and left of the bishop stand two deacons, and one sub-deacon who holds the bishop's crosier. To the left of the altar stand four archimandrites (highest monastic title), wearing miters as a sign of their dignity. To the right of the altar stand several igoumens (abbots) and priest-monks, who wear the klobuk (a high hat with a veil in the back) as a sign of their priesthood and monasticism. The sub-deacons (left), who carry fans (repids) or candles, underscore the festal character of the divine service.

Even the divine services of a simple city parish or village are saturated with an atmosphere that 'brings heaven to earth': in the light of burning candles—reflected in their multiple images in the icons—with their splendid liturgical raiment and their solemn, beautifully harmonized singing. (F. Schnider)

Patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, the Russian Orthodox Church, and the Orthodox National churches in the Balkans. According to their self-understanding, these churches all stem from the Byzantine (East-Roman) Church. Confessionally, they all denominate themselves 'the Orthodox Church' (in the singular).

The Orthodox Churches and the Western Churches

2. Already in late antiquity, there were distinctions within the Roman Empire between the traditionally Greek/Hellenistic East and the traditionally Latin West. In the West, a polarity developed between secular (imperial) and ecclesiastical (papal) power. A hierarchically structured papal church appeared (→ Papacy). The East knew no clear division between secular and spiritual power. Further, the Eastern Church remained composed of independent (autocephalous) local churches, headed by a patriarch or archbishop ('metropolitan'), together with synodal councils. Over the course of history, dogmatic, liturgical, and canonical differences between West and East led to a multiplicity of tensions and conflicts. In 1054, the Papal Legate and the Patriarch of Constantinople exchanged bulls of excommunication. The capture of Constantinople by the crusaders in 1204 was traumatic for the Eastern Church. The prohibition of communicatio in sacris (Lat., 'community of sacraments') with priests not standing in full union with Rome by the Roman Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1729, and the denial of the character of Roman Catholic sacraments as instruments of divine grace by the Patriarch of Constantinople in 1755, led to the Eastern Church's official breach with Rome. Only in the twentieth century did a rapprochement finally occur: the overwhelming majority of the Orthodox churches participated in the preparation and founding of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in 1948, with the churches from the regions under Communist power following in 1961. Contacts with Rome were strengthened at the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). The "Pan-Orthodox Conference" of Rhodes (1961) decided to participate in official theological conversations with Catholics, Anglicans, and Lutherans. In 1995, Pope John Paul II and Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomaeos I of Constantinople jointly acknowledged their churches to be 'sister churches.'

The Liturgy

3. The Orthodox house of God is modeled after the biblical temple in Jerusalem. The narthex (entrance hall) corresponds to the temple entrance courts, the nave to the temple hall, and the sanctuary, divided from the nave by an iconostasis (image wall), to the Holy of Holies. Arriving at the liturgical service, the believer abandons the worldly everyday (the 'earthly'), and transfers to the sanctuary of God (the 'heavenly'). The liturgy has the character of a divine apparition ('theophany'). In the celebration of the Eucharist, the risen Christ enters into the holy of holies of the temple both as High Priest and as sacrificial Victim.

The mystery of the individual feasts and/or the ecclesiastical year is celebrated with a multiplicity of prayers and hymns. No music of organ or orchestra is used. Only the human voice, of the celebrants and the deacon, and of the choir, proclaims the word of the liturgy. The liturgy lasts a fairly long time (for non-Orthodox visitors), but gives the believer the freedom to walk about in the house of God, and to pray before various icons. The liturgy usually makes use of an old sacred language (such as old Church Slavonic). Not only abroad, but even in the Orthodox countries themselves, there is a growing tendency to use the contemporary popular language in the liturgy. The liturgical language (old or new, respectively) corresponds to the church calendar that is used (the old Julian or the new Gregorian). But nearly all of Orthodoxy still calculates the Easter season according to the old, Julian calendar.

The Orthodox liturgy involves all of the senses of the believer, and thus leads him or her into an 'atmosphere of the Holy.' For the eye, there are the rites, the icons, the frescos, the vestments, and the gleaming wax lamps; for the ear, the singing of the officers of the liturgy and the choir; for the sense of smell, the aromatic scent of incense and lamps; for the taste, the holy gifts of bread and wine. The faithful enter into the sacred act. They stand before God, they bow and cross themselves repeatedly, they fall on their knees and touch the floor with their foreheads, they kiss the icons, and they light lamps and candles.

Clergy and Laity

4. Considered historically, the Orthodox churches constitute a clerical religion. Even earlier, however, laity were included in the national Orthodox church councils. But the leadership of the Church ultimately remained in the hands of the clergy (patriarchs, metropolitans, holy synods, bishops' conferences). The secularization process of the twentieth century, with the separation of church and state, has brought it about that educated (even theologically educated) laity are consulted by the bishops in certain areas, so that the influence of the laity has grown in the churches and in the parishes. In the Russian Orthodox Church, the status of laypersons is now canonically regulated. In the parishes, the parish councils are responsible for all questions (administrative, charitable, and so on), with the exception of those pertaining to the liturgy.

Among the people, monks, as 'God-bearing fathers,' enjoy great respect, occasionally even more than do the ordinary, married secular clergy. Pilgrimages to monasteries, especially to those with startzy (elders), who possess the gift of 'reading hearts,' mark the spiritual life of many believers. In post-Communist Russia, the number of monasteries is increasing (480 in 1999), and monasticism is growing strong. (Things are otherwise in, for example, the Serbian, Bulgarian, and Greek churches).

In the Russian Orthodox Church, works of charity are centrally administered by the Patriarchate's Department of Beneficence and Social Services. Of special importance are the medical programs of the central Clinical Hospital of Saint Alexei, as treatment is provided there free of charge. In 1990, a church youth organization was founded, which, among other things, engages youth helpers in the construction of churches and monasteries, organizes pilgrimages, and offers foreign contacts. In the parishes, catechesis for the laity, via Sunday schools, adult circles, and groups preparing for baptism, are held in high regard. The church also maintains its own kindergartens and schools. In today's critical economic situation, much value is also attributed to the material and spiritual care of socially deprived segments of the population.

Literature

Aumann, Jordan, Christian Spirituality East and West, Chicago 1968; Bulkakov, Sergej N., The Orthodox Church, Crestwood 1988; Meyendorff, John, The Byzantine Legacy in the Orthodox Church, Crestwood 1982; Idem, The Orthodox Church, Crestwood 1981; Schmemann, Alexander, Sacraments and Orthodoxy, New York 1965; Idem, The Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy, Crestwood 1977; Idem, The Eucharist, Crestwood 1988; Ware, Kallistos, The Orthodox Way, Crestwood 1986.

→ Christianity, Europe II

Franz Schnider

Orthodoxy / Orthopraxis

Orthodoxy may refer primarily either to right faith or right behavior. When we consider religion as a social phenomenon, orthodoxy as right behavior is the more relevant understanding of this term. On this understanding orthodox persons are concerned to follow certain patterns of behavior such as giving alms, praying, fasting and appearing at religious services. Conformity with these patterns identifies certain individuals as parts of a given community, while failure to conform identifies others as other—heterodox, outsiders.

Orthodoxy may also be understood as referring primarily to right faith, i.e. adherence to a correct set of doctrines and rejection of beliefs condemned as heretical or unorthodox.

Although concern with theological questions tends to be somewhat distant from the lives of ordinary laypersons, a concern with orthodoxy as right faith became especially prevalent as a result of the Reformation, which polemicized pious behavior as empty ritualism.

→ European History of Religion, Fundamentalism, Group, Heresy, Religion

Christoph Auffarth

Osho Movement

1. The Osho Movement is a new religious movement, whose name is the one last adopted by its founder, who had become known as Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh. Other names of the Movement are Shree Rajneesh Foundation and Neo-Sannyas Movement, the latter being derived from the Sanskrit samnyāsa, 'renunciation,' 'abandonment of all that is worldly,' or from samnyāsin, 'one who has surrendered all.' This abandonment is traditionally the fourth and last stage of a Hindu's life, in which he abandons all possessions and status. 'Sannyasin' is also the name adopted by the members of this movement. Until 1986, they wore only orange outer → clothing, and a necklace of wooden pearls (called a mala) bearing the likeness of Rajneesh.

History

2. The founder, Rajneesh Chandra Mohan, was born in 1931, the son of a Jain merchant, in Kuchwara (Madhya Pradesh) in India. He was a docent of philosophy in the University of Jabalpur, until in 1966 he gave up his scholarly vocation. After three years of public lectures in many parts of India, he founded an → ashram in Bombay, where he settled with a few disciples. His group gradually grew, however, with an influx from the United States and Europe. As their → guru, he adopted the name Bhagwan ('Divine Lord'), and initiated his disciples into Neo-Sannyas. After local public pressure, he moved to Poona, in 1974, with his discipleship, where a large ashram appeared, purporting to be the greatest therapy center in the world, and which by the time of its temporary dissolution in 1981 was visited by as many as 300,000 persons. Then the group settled in the United States, on land purchased in the vicinity of Antelope, Oregon, and founded and built a city, Rajneeshpuram ("Holy City of the King of the Full Moon"; → Commune). It developed into a well-nigh autarchical community entity, with as many as 4,000 inhabitants and up to 15,000 visitors at once, its own infrastructure, and its own administration, including even a police force. Like the ashram in Poona, Rajneeshpuram was built and maintained by unpaid and strictly hierarchically organized labor of young persons, while meditation courses, nourishment, lodging, and so on, had to be paid for. Only a lengthy, regular term of labor entitled the young persons to gratuitous maintenance. Work, then, for the Osho Movement is not a means to the end of survival, but is seen as → meditation, as an 'end in itself,' and an 'opportunity to meet yourself.' Besides Rajneeshpuram, followers of the Sannyas Movement founded ashrams, vegetarian restaurants, discotheques, and the most varied small businesses, all over the world, all organized in the Rajneesh Service International, a million-dollar organization. Rajneesh always returned to Rajneeshpuram, and left the leadership of the city in the care of Ma Anand Sheela. Under her direction, occasional punishable offenses were committed, including conspiracy and attempted murder, leading to a serious crisis within the Movement, and the imprisonment of Sheela and other members of her governing clique. Rajneesh, who took his distance from these deeds, and rejected the group around Sheela, was indicted in 1985 for violations of immigration law, but was later only expelled from the United States. One of the consequences of the crisis was that the orange garments were abandoned, and sometimes publicly burned. After a brief odyssey, Rajneesh returned to Poona in 1986, to the old ashram, where he kept on rallying disciples. At this time he changed his name, abandoning 'Bhagwan'—a joke, he said, that had been in the world long enough—and thereafter calling himself Osho, which, in his interpretation, stood for the subject of 'oceanic experience,' as described by William James. On 19 January 1990, the sickly Osho died. His more than six hundred books, mostly transcripts of his addresses, in more than 41 languages, are still published today, in large editions. The ashram in Poona, still visited by hundreds of thousands of persons annually, as well as other Osho Centers throughout the world, still enjoy great popularity.

Teaching

3. In his lectures, Osho returned to the most varied traditions, from → Tantra, → yoga, and the Indian Upanishads, to Buddhist Mahayana literature and Zen masters, to Lao Tse, Sufi traditions, ancient Greek philosophers, the Gospels, Gurdyieff, Martin Buber, and Friedrich → Nietzsche. Just so, Osho was influenced by Western psychologies, especially humanistic and transpersonal psychology. True, Osho was not concerned to build a doctrinal edifice; rather, he saw his message as "a certain alchemy, a science of transformation." It was a transformation to be reached by the help of Tantric techniques, just as by group psychotherapy, and whose goal is the dissolution of the ego and of critical thought—a total acceptance of things 'as they are,' and an absolute dedication. By limit experiences, says Osho, modern persons, alienated from their original being, can be delivered from their constricting egos, and reach enlightenment in the condition of the All-One-Being. To this purpose, various therapy groups and meditation methods are offered. Especially, a fear of sexuality and death are to be overcome. In the groups, in an effort to transcend these spheres through their acceptance, free sexuality, and aggression and violence, are experienced. Only after the appearance of AIDS was the practice of free sexuality gradually appraised as being of less importance, and special emphasis placed on appropriate protective measures.

Literature

Sources: Osho, Life's Mysteries: An Introduction to the Teachings of Osho, New Delhi 1995.

Secondary Literature: Fox, Judith M., Osho Rajneesh, Salt Lake City 2002; Goldman, Marion S., Passionate Journeys: Why Successful Women Joined a Cult, Ann Arbor 1999; Guest, Tim, My Life in Orange, London 2004; Mann, W. E., The Quest for Total Bliss: A Psycho-Sociological Perspective on the Rajneesh Movement, Toronto 1991; Palmer, Susan J./Sharma, Arvind (eds.), The Rajneesh Papers: Studies in a New Religious Movement, Delhi 1993; Webber, Bert (ed.), Rajneeshpuram: Who Were Its People? An Oregon Documentary, Medford 1990.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Ashram, Commune (ill.), Esalen Institute, Guru, New Age, New Religions

Karl-Peter Gietz

Paganism / Neopaganism

Paganism

'Paganism' is a term historically applied to any and all religions outside the Abrahamic traditions of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, and in particular to the polytheistic religions indigenous to Europe (→ Heathen). In the twentieth century, various species of revived, reconstructed, and invented paganism have gained adherents throughout Europe and North America. In recent religious studies—and sometimes on the borderline between religious practice and historical research—attempts have been made to conceptualize 'paganism' (with a lower-case P) as a 'world-religion' or 'root religion,' while 'Paganism' (with an upper-case P) should refer to its newer, self-conscious manifestations.[1] Only the latter, a modern self-identified Paganism, or Neopaganism, diverse in its sources and its manifestations, will be described in this article.

Origins and History

1. The first developments of modern Paganism are evident in the Romantic movement of the nineteenth century. Other contributions come from occult magic as developed by the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the Woodcraft societies which attempted to adopt ritual elements from Native American culture, various ideas popularized from academic anthropology, folklore studies, and the witch-cult theories of Margaret Murray.[2]

The Birth of the Wicca Religion

a) In England during the 1940s and '50s, Gerald B. Gardner led a small group in the development of a system of religious witchcraft, which he alleged to be a perpetuation of an earlier initiatory tradition. With the repeal of the 1736 Witchcraft Act in 1951, it became possible for the initiates of Gardner's system to undertake various sorts of publicity, in addition to Gardner's own books on the topic. Gardner's coven, its successors, allies, and kindred rivals eventually formed a large and varied movement sometimes denominated as Wicca or Wicce, which became a cornerstone of later Paganism, and served as a model to many other Pagan groups.

The Gardnerian witches and their imitators maintained that their religion was a revival of suppressed pagan worships from earlier ages, and they identified themselves with the pre-Christian religions of Europe, and with those condemned by medieval and Renaissance witch trials. In modern Pagan lore, those trials assumed vast proportions, and supported a narrative in which modern witches viewed themselves as survivors of genocide. More recently, some Wiccan adherents have become critical of their received history, acknowledging the inventive aspects of Gardner's organizing, and the mythic dimensions of the 'burning times' story.

Ancient Gods and Goddesses Revived

b) With migration outside of Britain, and by becoming engaged with the mass counterculture of the 1960s (→ New Age; Esalen Institute), Neopagan witchcraft became more diverse, and it was joined by a variety of other groups that rallied to the generic Pagan banner. Some of these were efforts to reconstruct ancient pagan religions on the basis of historical or archeological ideas, focusing on one or another ethnic or historical window, such as the Druids, ancient Egypt, Hellenic mystery cults, or pre-Christian Scandinavian religion. In addition, some Pagan groups were confessedly inventive, such as the Church of All Worlds, which named itself after a religion in a science fiction novel (Robert Heinlein's Stranger in a Strange Land). Discordianism is a Neopagan religion dedicated to the ancient Greek goddess Eris, founded on the basis of an putative vision in a bowling alley. Inventive Paganisms often include environmentalist and feminist ideologies among their motives (→ Environmentalism).

Organization

2. Many contemporary Pagans describe themselves as 'solitaries,' and maintain no ongoing affiliation to any religious group. Their practices may be entirely private, and can be learned from book study, contacts on the Internet, and classes or workshops that require no membership investment.

When groups are organized, the most typical form is a 'coven' or comparable association of relatively few members, all of whom know each other personally. Such small groups can be extremely ad hoc with their own eclectic ritual agendas and doctrines, or they may participate in a 'tradition' with well-defined organizational filiation and standards of orthodoxy and orthopraxis. Some such 'traditions' are themselves institutionalized as larger-scale organizations, but many are not. Gardnerian witchcraft is highly decentralized and offers no administration above the coven level.

There have been various efforts to create larger-scale coalitions and umbrella groups to include differing sorts of Pagans, but none has been universal, and few have been enduring. Camping festivals throughout North America and in Britain have served as important venues for expressions of Pagan community, and opportunities for different Pagan groups to interact. The work involved in the production of such festivals has resulted in a number of persistent groups that are focused on festival organizing, maintaining land for camping events and rituals, and regional networking.

Doctrines

3. Pagan groups vary in the emphasis they place on doctrinal belief. Some are extremely open to diversity of opinion, while others are tightly catechized. Among those who do define their creeds, the beliefs vary from group to group.

Most Gardnerian-derived Pagans maintain that all gods and goddesses are reflections of a single God and Goddess pair. In practice, the Goddess tends to predominate, with the God often relegated to a consort role. In Dianic Wicca and some other feminist Pagan groups, thealogy (sic) emphasizes the Goddess to the exclusion of the God (→ Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism). Pagan reconstructionists often subscribe to → polytheism without any sort of emanationist or symbolist apologies.

Pagan religions typically emphasize some form of nature spirituality, many times taking on environmentalist tenets as religious doctrine (→ Environmentalism; Nature Piety). They often adopt non-mainstream positions on gender and → sexuality. They usually advocate → magic (or 'magick') as a spiritual practice. Some promote the idea of → reincarnation, or theories about the 'astral plane.' None of these features are universal, however.

Rituals

4. There is a great diversity of ritual forms within Paganism. The effort to distinguish among rival 'traditions' of recent vintage, the creative demands of reconstruction, and the openness to innovation in inventive Paganisms, all have led to a variety of ceremonies and systems of practice that resist uniform categorization.

Gardnerian witchcraft involves a three-degree system of → initiation that is in many respects reminiscent of → Freemasonry. These → rituals enjoin formal secrecy on their initiates. Other features of Gardnerian ritual—many of them adopted by other Pagan groups—include working in a circle, ritual nudity ('going skyclad'; see ill. at → Nudity), and addresses to the four quarters of the compass identified with the four classical elements of fire, water, air and earth. Ritual implements of various traditions include the dagger or athame, wands of several designs, cups, knotted cords, cauldrons and swords. A superficially Eucharistic ceremony of 'cakes and ale' is not uncommon.

Covens or other small groups may meet monthly for ritual work. In Wicca, it is common for such meetings to be timed to the phases of the moon. Seasonal rituals are also present among the Gardnerian practices, and prominent among the customs of Paganism generally. Celebrations may be held for the equinoxes and solstices, and even more commonly for the calendar midpoints between them.

Ceremonies may include ritual designated as magical in its intent. The most common sort of → magic among Pagans is directed towards healing, whether for a sick individual, social conditions, or environmental pollution. Other magic may be intended for a wide variety of individual or group benefits. Pagans generally acknowledge the possibility of malign magic, but insist that wise practitioners will abstain from such conduct.

1. On these controversial attempts, see Harvey 1997 and particularly York 2003.
2. As standard descriptions of modern pagan history see Luhrman 1989 and Hutton 1999.

Literature

Adler, Margot, Drawing Down the Moon: Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshippers, and Other Pagans in America Today, Boston 1986; Berger, Helen A. et al., Voices from the Pagan Census: A National Survey of Witches and Neo-Pagans in the United States, Columbia 2003; Dowden, Ken, European Paganism: The Realities of Cult from Antiquity to the Middle Ages, London/New York 2000; Faber, Richard/Schlesier, Renate (eds.), Die Restauration der Götter. Antike Religion und Neo-Paganismus, Würzburg 1986; Farrar, Stewart, What Witches Do: The Modern Coven Revealed, London 1971; Gardell, Mattias, Gods of the Blood: The Pagan Revival and White Separatism, Durham 2003; Gardner, Gerald B., Witchcraft Today, London 1954; Harvey, Graham, Contemporary Paganism: Listening People, Speaking Earth, New York 1997; Hutton, Ronald, The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles: Their Nature and Legacy, Malden etc. 1991; Idem, The Triumph of the Moon: a History of Modern Pagan Witchcraft, Oxford 1999; Jones, Prudence/Pennick, Nigel, A History of Pagan Europe, New York 1999; Lewis James R. (eds.), Magical Religion and Modern Witchcraft, Albany 1996; Luhrman, T. M., Persuasions of the Witch's Craft: Ritual Magic in Contemporary England, Cambridge 1989; Pearson, Joanna et al. (eds.), Nature Religion Today: Paganism in the Modern World, Edinburgh 1998; Pike, Sarah M., Earthly Bodies, Magical Selves: Contemporary Pagans and the Search for Community, Berkeley 2001; Orion, Loretta, Never Again the Burning Times: Paganism Revived, Prospect Heights 1995; Starhawk, The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess, San Francisco 1979; York, Michael, Pagan Theology: Paganism as a World Religion, New York 2003.

→ Antiquity, Celts (with time chart), Druids, Environmentalism, Esotericism, Europe, Gender Stereotypes, Magic, Nature, Nature Piety, New Age, North America, Occultism, Polytheism, Reception, Sexuality, Tradition, Witch/Persecution of Witches, Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism

Matthew D. Rogers

Pagan Religions and Paganism: The Pre-Christian Religions of Ancient Europe and the Mediterranean Regions, and Their Reception [Time Chart]

Era 1: Late Antiquity: Paganism as formation of reaction to Christendom

253–268	Under the influence of his mentor Plotinus, Emperor Gallienus fosters Greek philosophy and the Mysteries of Eleusis	Egypto-Greek philosopher Plotinus (205–270) develops the Platonic teaching to the religio-philosophical system of "Neoplatonism."
361–363 (reg.)	Emperor Flavius Claudius Julianus (Julian the Apostate)	After a personal, philosophically grounded conversion, Julian fosters the Greco-Roman religion at the cost of Christianity (reconstruction of temples), lecturing privileges for pagan rhetors, pamphlet Against the Galileans. His utopia of a peaceable coexistence of Christian and pagan worship fails. To this day, Julian remains a figure of identification for critics of Christianity and free thinkers.

394	Battle at the Frigidus (Julian Alps)	Christian Emperor Theodosius I defeats the (last) pagan counter emperor Eugenius.
438–485	Proclus (412–485) as Head of the Platonic Academy in Athens	High point of "Neoplatonism": Proclus, who, in his personal piety, adores the sun, and is a successful healer, seeks, in the footsteps of his teacher Syrianus, a harmonizing of the normative 'pagan' theological delineations of antiquity, and founds a 'theological reading' of Plato. Works: Syrianus, Agreement of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Plato with the Chaldaean Oracles (following the tradition of philosophers Porphyrius, c. 234–310, and Iamblichus, c. 240–325). Proclus, Elements of Theology; Platonic Theology in Six Books. The Athenian Academy remains a refuge of the old believers, up to its compelled closing in 529.
c. 1355–1452	Gemistos Plethon	Plethon designs a system of "Hellenic religion," with a national direction in terms of civil religion, using Neoplatonic 'allegorics'—the pagan counter-design to Roman Christian state ideology of Byzantium breaks down (banning of Plethon to Mistra), with his sojourn at the Council of Florence (1439), and in common with his pupil, Cardinal Bessarion, Plethon sets the most decisive impulse to refound the Platonic Academy, which occurred in 1459 (v. in loco).

1453	Capture of Constantinople by Osman Mehmed II	The (Hellenic) ancient cultural continuity ends. The intellectual transfer of books and scholars to Italy gives strong impulses there to humanism and its reception of antiquity.
Era 2: "Renaissance," Humanism, and Baroque: Revitalization of mythology in representational art, architecture, and literature; "Political paganism," "esoteric paganism": Hermeticism, "natural magic," and "occult philosophy"
1326	Triumph of the Condottiere Castruccio Castracani in Lucca	In ancient Roman style, Castracani stands as a Roman Emperor on a 'triumphal chariot.' First example of the revitalization of the triumph as the ritual of a 'political paganism.' Further stations: 1443, adventus of Alphonse the Great into Naples (through the first triumphal arch; c. 1480–1495, monumental image cycle of Caesar's Triumphal March of Andrea Mantegna for the Court of Mantua (attempt at a reconstruction in terms of history and antiquities); 1509, Louis XII's entry into Milan, which Leonardo da Vinci co-shaped (e.g., the Triumphal Chariot of Victory).

1422	Discovery of the Hieroglyphica of Horapollo	Publication: Venice 1505; beginning of a speculative, esoteric 'Egyptosophy.'
1459–1522	Florentine Academy under the Patronage of Cosimo de' Medici (1389–1464) and Lorenzo de' Medici (1449–1492)	Reception of Plato in the tradition of religious Neoplatonism; attempt at a synthesis of Christianity and ancient philosophy; representatives: Pico della Mirandola; Marsilio Ficino (→ Platonism; Renaissance); translation of the Corpus Hermeticum by Ficino into Latin (pub. 1471).
1510/1531	Agrippa of Nettesheim: De occulta philosophia	Reception of, e.g., ancient philosophy, the art of healing, and magic as an esoteric intellectual religion (magician type: Dr. Faust).
1541	Physician Theophrastus of Hohenheim (1493–1541) dies	As "Against/Over Celsus" (Paracelsus), he stands at the beginning of modern medicine and natural healing, introducing chemical methods, as well as methods of popular healing.

1515–1547 (reg.)	Francis I and the Courtly Culture of Fontainebleau	High point of the French Renaissance: cult of Diana, inspired by his beloved Diane de Poitiers; representation of the royal state as Olympus; court poet Pierre de Ronsard (1524/25–1584) and his colleagues of the poets' circle Pléiade glorify the King and his regime with the help of ancient myths of gods and heroes.
1575–1634	Inquisition's Trial of Benandanti in Friaul	The Benandanti can be described as shamanistic healers, who experienced flight in a cataleptic trance, and battled the demonic powers (malandanti) for the fertility of the community and a good harvest.
1651–1714	Louis XIV represents himself as Roi Soleil (Fr., "Sun King")	He is thereby attached to the imperial political mythology of the ruler as (Apollo-) Sol Invictus (Lat., "Unconquered God of the Sun") (Aurelian, Constantine I).
Era 3: Late Enlightenment and age of revolution: classical aesthetics ("art religion"); philhellenism and pagan revolutionary cults
1717–1768	Johann Jakob Winckelmann	Foundation of the archaeology of art studies design of a paganizing regard of art that celebrates physical and especially male beauty (Apollo Belvedere; → Art Religion)

1772ff.	Johann Wolfgang Goethe's Genie-Oden (Ger., "Genius Odes")	celebrate a 'cult of the creative' and vital powers of nature, in the spirit of the Sturm und Drang. Among the key mythic conceptions arises the form of → Prometheus, the rebel.
1787	Wilhelm Heinse, Ardinghello oder die glückseligen Inseln (Ger., "Ardinghello, or the Blessed Isles")	With this artistic novel, reflecting the German art scene of Rome, Heinse writes the first 'Dionysiac novel,' a high point of free-spirited, 'hedonistic paganism.'
1789–1795	French Revolution	Paganism as state and civil religion: worship/cult of nature ("Sacred Mountains"), philosophy, and reason (Robespierre's Culte de la Raison), along with hero cult; attempt to establish an agrarian pagan calendar (→ Revolution, French), that adopts the ancient Egyptian system of decades.
1796/97	System Program of German Idealism	In this anonymous fragment, variously ascribed to Hölderlin, Hegel, or Schelling, a demand is raised for a 'new mythology,' indeed a 'mythology of reason.'
1790–1806	Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843)	Poetry constructing a 'new mythology,' with the intent of connecting antiquity and Christianity in the spirit of Enlightenment and revolution (mythic concept of Dionysus/Bacchus-Christ).

Era 4: Modernity: Romantic revitalizations, academic and artistic paganism, politicizations
1859	Johann Jakob Bachofen, Das Mutterrecht (Ger., "The Maternal Law")	Contrary to Bachofen's conservative Christian intent, his work is 'counter-read' in the spirit of matriarchy, and reinterpreted: by Friedrich Engels, by the Cosmics around 1900, and by the women's movements of the 1920s and 1970s.
1862	Gustave Flaubert: Salammbô	Attempt at a historical reconstruction of life (including cultic practices) in ancient Carthage, in the genre of the dramatic novel. In parallel with the painting of the 'Orientalists' (Delacroix), the antiquarian, fussily recherché scenarios here paint a picture charged with (colonial) fantasies of an elegant, cruel East. Thus Flaubert presages the pagan aestheticism of symbolism and décadence (Stefan George).
1872 1883–1885	Friedrich Nietzsche: Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik (Ger., "The Birth of Tragedy out of the Spirit of Music") Also sprach Zarathustra (Ger., "Thus Spoke Zarathustra")	Classical philologist → Nietzsche (1844–1900) is doubtless the most influential propagandist of a pagan Weltanschauung in modernity: he radicalized Romantic art-religion with the concept of the "Dionysiac,"

1888	Antichrist (Ger., "Antichrist")	wrote with Zarathustra a 'pagan gospel,' and thrust the anti-Christian impulse right through to anti-Semitism. At the end, he identified himself with Dionysus.
1899	Charles Leland: Aradia, or, The Gospel of the Witches	Scholar of folk traditions Leland (1824–1903) publishes invocations of ancient divinities (Diana), and conjurations of a Tuscan strega (Ital., 'witch') of unclear origin. Although probably largely fictitious, Leland's publication belongs today to the basic texts of the modern Wicca religion and feminist witch movement.
1899–1903	Circles of Artists and Intellectuals of the "Cosmics" in Munich (Schwabing)	The circle to which, e.g., Alfred Schuler, Stefan George, and Ludwig Klages belong, seeks to inaugurate the revitalization or maternalistic and 'Dionysiac' cults (cult of the Magna Mater/ Cybele and Dionysus/ Bacchus).
1929/1933	Walter F. Otto: Die Götter Griechenlands, or Dionysos (Ger., "The Gods of Greece," or, "Dionysus")	The academic presentation of the 'figures' of the Greek gods becomes to classical scholar Otto the sketch of a Hellenistic theology, on the basis of Nietzsche, Schelling, the Cosmics, and Heidegger.

1935 (November 9)	Nazi hero cult: Transfer of the "Movement's Fallen" of 1923 to the "Temple of Honor" at Königsplatz (Ger., "King's Square") in Munich	As a → political religion, alongside the Teutonic, National Socialism also used backdrops of a Greco-Roman paganism. Hitler, and his official architect Albert Speer, designed, for purposes of military religion especially, gloomy scenarios and rituals out of the aesthetic arsenal of an archaicist, brutal, 'Doric' antiquity (e.g., plans for a "Germania-Berlin"). To the cult of the hero were dedicated over-proportioned presentations of naked combatants, in the classicist manner, for example that of sculptor Arno Breker.
1962	Hermann Nitsch publishes the first "manifest" of the Orgic Mystery Theater ("Orgien Mysterich Theater," O. M. T.)	Collaborating in the inauguration of "Vienna Actionism," the Austrian artist designs "Actions," as cultic plays, after the exemplar of, e.g., the ancient Greek cult of Dionysus: Bloody sacrifice, the shredding (sparagmós) of (dead) animals, Bacchic-like wine rituals. Reversing the Freudian theory of sublimation, vital energies are supposed to be cathartically released, by way of an orgiastic 'basic excess.' In a special castle in Prinzendorf, maintained for this purpose, Nitsch gradually produces his "Partituren" (Ger., "scores"), in 'plays' lasting sometimes for days.

Era 5: Postmodern Paganism as part of the alternative culture and internet religion

1971	Zsuzsanna Budapest founds the first coven (cultic group) of a feminist Dianic Wicca	The spiritual → women's movement prefers ancient myths, rites, and sketches of femaleness. Its purpose is to practice new forms of a pagan (nature-) piety. With Zsuzsanna Budapest (→ Witch/Persecution of Witches, with illus.), as also with others, the ancient cults are transmitted by way of imaginations and scientific theories of the nineteenth century. Some instances are: matriarchal theories through J. J. Bachofen, rites of fertility and regeneration through J. G. Frazer, 'female festivals' through Jane E. Harrison.
1998	Declaratio Religionis Romanae (Lat., "Declaration of the Roman Religion") of the neopagan Internet organization, Nova Roma (Lat., "New Rome")	A cooperative charter of an Internet "Republic" has the purpose of virtual reliving of ancient Rome, with all of its offices, cults, and rites. The organization counts itself among the 'reconstructionist Pagans.' The internet generates new forms of veneration and organization (online-Temple, Networks).

Hubert Mohr

Pain

1. Bodily pain, occasioned by corporeal injury, represents a total, holistic reaction calculated to protect the health of the organism. Persons can feel pain from birth onward. Further, within a multifaceted process of learning and integration during individual development, a person becomes heir to the ability to bear, and, precisely, to process or manage, repeated painful physical experiences (of fright or fear, shame and embarrassment, guilt, disappointment, illness, timidity). As fundamental human experiences, bodily and emotional pain are both bound up with one's individual life history, and, as such, experienced as having an acutely or chronically painful, defeating, meaning. Persons are involved in community, and as such, marked with more than their biological premises. They are also formed by the perception, evaluation, interpretation, and communication (reporting) of pain—again, owing to the historical and societal reality of their immediate, 'existential' experience (→ Socialization). One of the functions of religion, among other purposes, is to make pain comprehensible and understandable, and therefore endurable (→ Suffering).

Experience of Pain in Worship and Religion

2. In connection with worship and religion, experiences of pain appear in the most varied forms. They can be part of individual religiosity and piety (e.g. penance through mortification of the flesh, self-castigation, self-wounding, or self-injuring, all on grounds of a consciousness of real or imagined → guilt), or indeed assume social or collective functions (e.g., self flogging, martyrdom, initiation). Pain and suffering take on a manifold collection of meanings, in the most widespread rites of initiation among indigenous peoples. From a religious viewpoint, pain is frequently regarded in a character of → sacrifice, and as a sign of a sanctified existence in contact with the ancestors (and in participation in the divine). In symbolic and mystical death, the personhood of initiands is extinguished, by way of ordeals that are corporeally or psychically traumatizing. Under the effect of pain, a permeability of the personhood is produced ('transpersonality'), which is then solidified by spiritual taboos that stabilize relationships, and mythic notions of contact with the world of the ancestors. Simultaneously, the rites performed occasion a regeneration and solidification of the tribal community as such. The pains that women and girls suffer in many countries of Islamic tradition at their circumcision, on the other hand, win no mythic elevation of this sort. Their mutilation is the production of social notions of chastity, virginity, and honor.

Pain in Intercultural Comparison

3. Christian theology and piety, in the Western cultural milieu, provide a manifold, indeed a shifting, fund of responses and behavioral challenges in confrontation with pain. As a phenomenon that can generate myth and cult, an experience of pain on the part of Christianity's living source appears at the wellspring of the Christian religions. By way of his torture and execution, → Jesus of Nazareth became the quintessential Man of Sorrows. Representations of pain have dominated the world of Christian images throughout the centuries. In Nocera Terinese, in Calabria, a usage still prevails in which, in every Good Friday procession, a young man is presented who whips himself, in an obvious reference to the Passion of Christ. These vattienti (roughly translated, 'self-strikers') are part of Catholic piety in Southern Italy. In the course of history, the custom became part of a folk festival, and was gradually extracted from the reference to → penance characterizing a religious movement. Nevertheless, on grounds of its socio-political, symbolic signification of independence, pride, and comradeship, it continues to bestow an identity on the community. At the same time, participants also reveal the dualism of death and life, sadness and solace, pain and joy.

In the present, in Western industrial countries, attitudes and actions in dealing with pain within the Christian religions have changed. In parallel fashion, new approaches have arisen at the hands of the → liberation theologies of Central and South America. The content of both has been the integration of a practical 'love of neighbor,' in the real defeat of pain, which has led to certain new manners of addressing pain by Christians of the 'First' and 'Third World.' Previously, any dealing with pain seemed sporadic, and pathetic, so that the exclusion and repression of persons in the 'Third World' could become conscious in neither the 'First' nor the 'Third' (theological fatalism). According to a remarkable viewpoint of murdered Bishop Romero of El Salvador, the Church will heal when pain is shared.

In Islam, pain is accounted a test sent by God, so that, in patience and perseverance, it can be endured, when it is borne as a foreordained lot, in trust in the divine grace. God often creates suffering as a punishment for human sin, in order that a person may be converted, may 'turn back.' In Egypt in 1998, some 14,000 men were imprisoned and tortured without having first been put on trial, simply because the police related to their milieu as possibly being one of Islamic extremists. Believing Muslims saw even this violation of human rights as a God-given destiny.

At the very center of Jewish thinking is the confidence entertained by the 'pious' in the Torah and their sanctifying obedience to it. Suffering and pain, either befallen individuals or imposed on the whole community, are consciously interpreted as the 'birth pangs' of the Messiah, and thereby as warranty of future glory (→ Apocalypse).

In the Buddhist and Shintô worldviews, physical pain, just like other suffering, is seen as simply belonging to humans as decreed by fate (→ Suffering). A spectacular form of demonstratively provoked suffering is found among Hindu → Sadhus, as part of their role as religious persons and as constituting a religious group. To be sure, paramount here are sensationalistic aspects of the elimination of pain, through → trance.

In the Chinese and Confucian tradition, pain and suffering, while by no means the effect of divine destiny, are an essential attribute of existence. In the framework of a cosmic order, at whose center stands the human being, pain is interpreted as a disturbance of currents of energy, within polar relationships that ought to be standing in equilibrium.

Magical and demonic conceptualizations of the emergence of pain and sickness characterize a world image to be found still today among indigenous peoples, in different forms, in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Examples appear in New Guinea, Melanesia, and on Bali, as well as with the Navajo Indians of the Southwestern United States, and the Cuna Indians of Panama. With the prairie nations of North America, in the context of their initiation, experience of pain becomes the subject of the supreme ceremony of ritual life: the sun dance. At the climax of this dance, individual young men prove their will, and their power of perseverance, by dancing around a centrally located shoot that has thorns that wound the upper chest. The initiands continue the dance until all of the thorns have been torn out of the shoot and are piercing the flesh. The end being pursued in this ritual or ceremonial is, on the one hand, a religious one, but on the other, a military one. It qualifies a young man for reception among the warriors, and whites have been denied admission to the sun dance since 1975.

Western Battle with Pain

4. Scientific research into the phenomenon among the industrial countries of the West has waged a general struggle with pain, but has also occasioned deep alterations in the evaluation of pain. More and more, pain is appraised as a disturbance, and an evil, to be excluded through special techniques and therapies. A pathological fear of pain ('algophobia'), the widespread abuse of 'pain-killing' drugs, and the immersion of 'pain patients' in a passive attitude, have meanwhile provoked interpretations heavily colored with cultural pessimism. Political philosopher Jerzy Kolakowski speaks, indeed, of a veritable culture of analgesics, and concludes that a society growing less capable of bearing its own suffering is more easily inclined to tolerate the suffering of others. Deficit or immaturity with respect to the ability to deal with spiritual or mental pain stands in close relationship with psychic diseases (e.g. alcohol and drug abuse, through which a fear of pain becomes tolerable; masochism). On the other side lies a ritualized conquest of pain, now enjoying a new vogue in → New Age milieus. Seminars are offered here in 'personal experience with pain,' in which the 'fire walk' is practiced (a passage by foot through glowing embers).

Pain, Violence, and Power

The various aspects of the experience and management of pain stand at the opposite pole from the intentional infliction of pain. This act is closely amalgamated with the exercise and maintenance of power and 'authority.' The relationship can be observed in the area of the family, when corporal violence serves as a method of rearing children. Until recently, in many Western countries this behavior was regarded as socially legitimate. In an extreme form, real human pain, as punishment, is transferred into the political fiction of governmental authority. To wound or to kill human beings is also a foundation of the structural logic of war, even though theoreticians of war never speak of it. Public institutions or persons who address pain in their discourse include Amnesty International, medicine, psychology, and tribunal law, which are concerned with evidence relevant to injury, poets and other authors who deal with pain, and artists.

Literature

Bates, Maryann S., Biocultural Dimensions of Chronic Pain: Implications for Treatment of Multi-Ethnic Populations, New York 1996; Chopp, Rebecca S., The Praxis of Suffering: An Interpretation of Liberation and Political Theologies, New York 1986; Christie, Nils, Limits to Pain, Oxford 1981; Eckstein, Barbara J., The Language of Fiction in a World of Pain: Reading Politics as Paradox, Philadelphia 1990; Good, Mary-Jo Del Vecchio et al., Pain as Human Experience: An Anthropological Perspective, Berkeley etc. 1992; Kleinman, Arthur, Social Origins of Distress and Disease: Depression, Neurasthenia, and Pain in Modern China, New Haven/London 1986; McGrew Bennett, Anne, From Woman-Pain to Woman-Vision: Writings in Feminist Theology, Minneapolis 1989; Morowitz, Harold J., Cosmic Joy and Local Pain: Musings of a Mystic Scientist, New York 1987; Morris, David B., The Culture of Pain, Berkeley etc. 1991; Price, Donald D., Psychological and Neural Mechanisms of Pain, New York 1988; Scarry, Elaine, The Body in Pain: The Making and Unmaking of the World, New York 1985; Schneiderman, Leo, The Literary Mind: Portraits in Pain and Creativity, New York 1988; Sternbach, Richard A., The Psychology of Pain, New York 1986; Stoller, Robert J., Pain and Passion: A Psychoanalyst Explores the World of S & M, New York/London 1991; Villella, Edward (with Larry Kaplan), Prodigal Son: Dancing for Balanchine in a World of Pain and Magic, New York 1992; Weiner, Eugene/Weiner, Anita, The Martyr's Conviction: A Sociological Analysis, Atlanta 1990.

→ Asceticism, Body, Emotions/Feelings, Illness/Health, Martyr, Psyche, Suffering, Socialization/Upbringing

Monika Frank

Palestine / Israel

History

1. Palestine/Israel is the designation for that part of the Near East that today makes up the territory of the state of Israel and the Palestinian Autonomous Region. Beginning in the fourteenth century BCE, Israelite nomads wandered into the region. According to biblical narrative—which is not attested by archeological evidence—the 'twelve tribes of Israel' were bound together in a sacred alliance that reverenced the god YHWH. Simultaneously, the seafaring people of the 'Philistines' settled the coasts. About 1000 BCE, David succeeded in uniting the tribes in a single realm, and overcame the Philistines. David's son Solomon had a temple erected in the capital → Jerusalem. After Solomon's death, the realm split into the northern state of Israel and the southern state of Juda. In 721 BCE, Israel was conquered by the Assyrians, and in 597 BCE, Juda by the Babylonians. The Temple was destroyed, parts of the population were abducted to Babylon. Beginning in 538, the second generation of descendants returned, after the Persians had taken power in Babylon. A semi-autonomous state appeared, ruled by priests, under ultimate Persian control. In the third century, the region was Hellenized; Jewish uprisings led to occasional temporary autonomy. From 63 BCE onward, the Romans exercised rule over Judea as part of the Roman Province of Syria. In this space of time falls the history of → Jesus's activity, the point of departure for the appearance of → Christianity. The first uprising against the Romans (66–70 CE) was ended with the destruction of the Temple. After the crushing of the second revolt (131–135 CE), the Romans renamed the region in Palestine "Philistine Land," and prohibited Jews from living in → Jerusalem. Then the → diaspora began. As the Erets Yisrael, however, the "Land of Israel," Palestine remained the point of reference in matters of religion and nationalism. In competition, Christian and Islamic claime to Palestine were raised: in the fourth century, Christianity became the state religion, and Palestine the Christians' 'Holy Land.' Since the Islamic conquest in the seventh century, the region has stood under various Islamic governments that marked the land and its inhabitants in their ethnic, religious, and cultural identity.

The Middle East Conflict

2. Since the end of the nineteenth century, especially in the context of → Zionism, a Jewish immigration occurred once more, concentrated in five great waves of immigration (aliyot, literally meaning 'ascend' to Israel). In 1917, the British occupied Palestine. With the Balfour Declaration, they promised the Jewish people a 'national home-state' in Palestine, without prejudice to

LEBANON
SYRIA
Banyas Spring and sanctuary of the "Green Prophet," al-Khadr
Banyas/Caesarea Philippi
City of the Scholars and Kabbalists; Graves of Yizhak Luria ("Ari") and other rabbis
Zefat/Safed
Kafarnaum/Kapernaum/Kefar Nahum
Synagogue from the fourth century; place of Jesus's activity
Montfort/Qal'at Qurein
Grave of the Baha'u'llah ("Glory of God")
Bahji
Elijah's Cave, Carmelite monastery, shrine and mausoleum of Mizra Ali Mohammed el-Bab Akko
Tabgha
Church of the Multiplication of the Loaves; church of Primate Haifa
Carmel
Lake Gennesaret (Yam Kinneret)
Bitanya
'New' baptismal site
1 Grave of Rabbi Meir
2 Grave of the Nabi Shu'eib (Jitro/Jethro)
3 Grave of Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Maimonides)
Church of the Annunciation
Nazaret/Nazerat/En-Nasra
Oldest kibbutz (1910)
Deganya
Mythic Harmagedon of the Revelation of John Belvoir
Meggido/Tell-el-Mutesellim
Tabor/Har Tavor/Djebel et-Tur
Church of the Transfiguration
Caesarea
WEST-BANK
Jacob's Well; Temple of Baal
Nablus/Sichem/Shekhem
Grave of John the Baptist or of Nabi Jahia
Sebastije/Samaria/Shomron
"Mount of the Blessing"; sacred place of the Feast of Pesach
Garizim/Djebel et-Tor
Shiloh
Ma'ale Efraim
Tel Aviv/Yafo/Yaffa
Jordan
Grave of St. George, Church of St. George, and Mosque of al-Khadr
Lod/Lydda
Bet-El
White Mosque; grave of the Nebi Saleh
Ramla
Jericho
Ma'ale Adumim
El-Maghtas
'Old' baptismal site of Jesus; today a military off-limits
City map of Jerusalem
Jerusalem/Yerushalayim
Nabi Musa
Grave of Moses in Islamic tradition
Birthplace of King David; Rachel's Grave; Grotto of Jesus Nativity and Church of the Nativity Bethlehem
Efrat
Qumran
Former center of the community of the Essenes; site of discovery of the "Dead Sea Scrolls" DEAD SEE
Gaza
Hebron/Hevron/el-Khalil
Kiryat Arba
'Eizariya/Bethany
Grave of Lazarus
GAZA
Haram el-Khalil: Graves of the Patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their wives
Grush Qatif
Masada/Mezada
Fortress of Herod; last bastion of the Zealot uprising against the Romans
Sodom/Sedom
Sede Boquer
Academic college; Grave of David Ben-Gurion
J O R D A N
I S R A E L
EGYPT
0 50 100 km
F.D.2005

PALESTINE/ISRAEL

Sacred topography
- Mountain
- Ancient Israelite biblical site
- Judaism: medieval and modern
- New Testament site / Christian sanctuary
- Crusader fortress
- Islam
- Samaritans
- Druses
- Baha'i
- National memorial / Zionism
- Jewish settlements since 1967

- Occupied area
- Autonomous Palestinian areas
- Occupied areas that are a subject of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian autonomous authority; partly autonomous Palestinian areas

The new state of Israel, established in 1948, embraced the places that, by then, for the history of the Jewish people, had been but narrative. They were then within arm's reach. But they were unattainable. New places, then, became symbols of the state: the new soldiers, for instance, pronounced their oath in the wilderness fortress of Masada, where the last defenders against the Romans preferred to die rather than to submit. The soldiers swore: "Never another Masada!" In the Six Days' War of 1967, the Israelis occupied the Old City of Jerusalem, heart and soul of the national identity—but legally consigned to the Palestinians. Today, recruits are sworn in on the square before the Temple mount, on which the Islamic Dome of the Rock stands. In the picture, Minister President Netanyahu and his followers celebrate the thirteenth anniversary of this conquest. The skullcaps indicate that this is a sacred action and a sacred place. The national flags, with their Magen David (the 'Shield of David'), also have a religious meaning, since, more than 3,000 years ago, David captured the city from the Jebusites, and selected Mount Zion for the sanctuary of God. (Christoph Auffarth)

the rights of others. The time of the British mandate, however, is marked by conflicts between immigrating Jews and the Arab population, both of whom claimed the land. In 1947, the United Nations General Assembly decided on the separation of the region into an Arab and a Jewish state. On May 14, 1948, the state of Israel was proclaimed on Jewish territory. The 1948–1949 war for Israel's existence, begun by the Arab states, was won by the Jews. Survivors of the → Shoah, and Jewish refugees from Arab states, immigrated to the new state of Israel. For the Arab population, the years 1948–1949 became the nakba, the catastrophe of flight and expulsion. Israel won all of the wars of the Near East conflict, and in 1967 took over Palestinian areas as well. But the national question of the Arab inhabitants, designated 'Palestinians,' has remained an unresolved problem. By means of terrorism, the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization), founded in 1964, has attempted to call the world's attention to that question. In 1987, the Intifada began in the occupied territories: the Palestinian uprising against the Israeli occupiers. In 1988, the Palestinian National Council in Algeria proclaimed the establishment of the State of Palestine. Only in 1993, however, did negotiations between Israel and the PLO substantiate a readiness for mutual recognition. The implementation of previous agreements was sluggish, however, and was impeded by acts of terrorism on the part of Jewish and Muslim fundamentalists. The ultimate status of the territories of Palestine has not yet been determined.

Religious Communities

3. True, Israel was founded as a Jewish state; but it accords all religious communities religious freedom and autonomy with respect to their public feasts and festivals and the administration of sacred or holy places (cf. map). At the beginning of the year 2000, the inhabitants numbered some 6.2 million, of whom some eighty percent are Jews. Of the twenty percent non-Jews, fifteen percent account themselves Islamic, two percent Christian, and three percent Druse and other minorities. Reliable statistical data are not available on the Palestinians living in the autonomous or still occupied areas. Their number is estimated at some 1.9 millions in autonomous or still occupied land west of the Jordan, and some 1 million in the autonomous Gaza strip.

The Sunnites form the great majority; even in once-Christian Arab cities like Nazareth or Bethlehem, Christians today are in the minority. So far, however, precise information can be given on religious communities only in Israel.

Judaism

a) Israel's Jews can be divided into two large groups. The Ashkenazim (the Middle and Eastern European Jews from the 'northland,' with a reference to Jer 51:27) immigrated to Palestine, beginning at the end of the nineteenth century, and created the Jewish state with its Western orientation. Although Ashkenazim exerted a strong influence on fundamentalist movements in Israel, the majority of this group tends less to a religious lifestyle and more to a Western, secular one. Today, the Jews from North and South America, as well as from Australia, are reckoned as members of this group. Sephardim was the term used to designate, at first, the originally Spanish Jews (from Heb., Sepharad, 'Spain'), who settled around the Mediterranean after their expulsion in 1492. Many Sephardim also fled to Islamic North Africa, and joined Eastern Jews who had already settled in the Near East and North Africa since the destruction of the Temple. Today, many common elements bond the two groups, so that the concepts Sephardic and Oriental or Eastern are often applied synonymously. Most Sephardim fled the Arab states to Israel in the 1950s.

While religious pluralism and tolerant attitudes vis-à-vis non-Jewish communities are altogether prevalent in Israel, this cannot be claimed for intra-Jewish currents. Official Jewish authority has only the (Orthodox) High Rabbinate, on whose double summit sit an Ashkenazi and a Sephardic rabbi. Israel's Orthodoxy can be divided into so-called 'Ultra-Orthodox' and 'National Orthodox.' The Ultra-Orthodox strictly follow Jewish religious law (Halakha), and believe that Jewish sovereignty in the land of Israel can be established only after the coming of the Messiah. Certain Hasidic groups, especially, reject the state of Israel, pay no taxes, and cooperate with the Palestinians. The National Orthodox, also called the National Religious, live according to the Halakha, but endorse the state of Israel, which they look on as a first step toward the coming of the Messiah and redemption. Among them are also extreme nationalistic coalitions such as the religious settler movement. Many Israelis, however, are not Orthodox; indeed, most have a non-religious leaning. On the basis of the legal standing of persons, however, all are constrained to bow to the stipulations of Orthodoxy. Also, two minorities live in Israel who are not recognized by Orthodoxy: some 15,000 Karaites, who traditionally appeal only to the five Books of Moses, and about 800 Samaritans, who acknowledge only the five Books of Moses and the Book of Joshua.

Muslims

b) As for the non-Jewish portion of the population, Sunnite Muslims constitute the clear majority. Some ten percent of them are Bedouins. In two villages of Galilee, furthermore, live some 2,500 Circassians, who originate from the Caucasus, and are non-Arab Sunnite Muslims.

Christians

c) Christians are the second-strongest minority in Israel. Among the thirty confessions represented in Israel, the Roman Catholics form the strongest group. There are also numerous 'Orthodox' communities united with Rome, such as the Melchites, Maronites, Greeks, Syrians, or Chaldeans. To the churches separated from Rome belong the Greek and Russian Orthodox, Armenians, Copts, Ethiopians (Abyssinians), Syrian Jacobites, and Protestants.

d) The Arabic-speaking Druses live especially in the Carmel mountain range in Galilee, and in the Golan Heights taken over by Israel in 1967. Their secret religion, which originates in an eleventh-century separation from Shia Islam, permits no mixed marriages or conversions, and reserves its doctrine to the initiated.

Druses

e) The → Baha'i, as well, persecuted in Iran, have their sacred places in Israel, the Temple with the shrine of the Bab in Haifa, and the shrine of the Baha'u'llah in Bahji, in the vicinity of Nahariya. The Baha'i who fulfil their functions for the sanctity are the only ones living in Israel.

Baha'i

4. The rather indistinct separation of state and religion has provoked constant tensions. Instead of religion, the secular founders of the state would have preferred to posit the nation as the element conferring identity. With a view to the cooperation of Orthodoxy, however, compromises were struck (Status Quo accords). Religion, then, has been a strong social force ever since the establishment of the state. The Status Quo and the religious parties have influenced institutions and laws; religious traditions and symbols have even penetrated the everyday life of secular Israelis. Beginning in the 1970s, a reinforcement of Eastern traditions has been observable, such as ethnic festivals, or pilgrimages to tombs of the venerated. The political elite, as well, have made selective use of religious symbols and content, to strengthen nationalism and social integration. Phases of biblical statehood, and Jewish insurrections, were emphasized, and archaeological finds were used in view of a new approach to national history, such as the fortress of Masada or the "Shrine of the Book" in the National Museum, which houses the oldest manuscript of the Torah. The → civil religion thus arising addressed secular Israelis, as well. Since the 1967 conquest, both a politicization of religion and a religious revision of politics can be observed. The captured biblical territory reinforces the Messianic expectations of the National Religious and the settlers. The Orthodox seek to 'tip the scales' of Israeli coalition governments, and thus to extend their rights, while non-Orthodox believers and secular Jews feel this to be a violation of the democratic character of the state. Areas of tension include, for example, exemption of the Orthodox from military service, as well as laws rooted in the Status Quo and bearing on autopsy, abortion, archaeology, and public Sabbath rest (→ Sunday/Sabbath). The polarization of society also comes to expression in the contrariety of the two largest cities: while the Zionist creation Tel-Aviv represents the capital of Western-liberal laissez-faire, Jerusalem with its sacred places attracts the pious of all shades. The murder of Minister President Rabin by a National Religious student in 1995 shows the menacing import of polarization.

Judaism and the State of Israel

Literature

Finkelstein, Israel/Silberman, Neil Asher, The Bible Unearthed: Archaeology's New Vision of Ancient Israel and the Origin of Its Sacred Texts, New York 2001; Gil, Moshe, A History of Palestine, 634–1099, Cambridge 1992; Krämer, Gudrun, Geschichte Palästinas: Von der osmanischen Eroberung bis zur Gründung des Staates Israel, Munich 2002; Nazzal, Nafez Y./Nazzal, Laila A., Historical Dictionary of Palestine, Lanham 1997; Wilken, Robert L., The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought, New Haven 1992; Wolffsohn, Michael, Israel: Polity, Society and Economy 1882–1986: An Introductory Handbook, Atlantic Highlands 1987.

→ Ancient East, Christianity, Fundamentalism, Jerusalem, Judaism, Islam, Mediterranean Region, Qumran, Shoah, Zionism

Annekathrin Kleefeld

Palestine / Israel (Near East / Eastern Mediterranean): Time Chart

Era 1: Emergence of the three monotheistic religions

1st millenium BCE	Emergence of Jewish religion
1st millenium CE	Emergence of Christianity
7th millenium CE	Emergence of Islam

Era 2: Crusades and Ottoman Empire

end of 11th until end of 13th cent.	Crusades	At the Synod of Clermont, Pope Urban II summons Christians to war with Islam. With the purpose of delivering the Holy Land from Islamic rule, masses of persons set out in the direction of the East. Capture of Jerusalem: 1099. By 1270, six more Crusades.
1453	Fall of Constantinople	In consequence: dismantling of Muslim rule in the Eastern Mediterranean region and on the Arabian Peninsula. Consequently: Complete Ottoman sovereignty in the Eastern Mediterranean area, and on the Arabian Peninsula. 1517: Ottomans take power in Egypt. From now on, the Ottoman Sultan has the title of Caliph.

end of 18th cent.	Slow collapse of the Ottoman Empire	With the fall of the Ottoman Empire, the influence of the European powers in the countries of the Near East grows.
1787	Wahhabism	With the death of Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab, founder of Wahhabism, a puritanical reform movement on the Arabian Peninsula. Under Muhammad al-Saud, Wahhabi powers capture Mecca, and protest the Ottoman Sultan.
Era 3: Western imperialism
1798–1801	Napoleon's Expedition to Egypt	With a host of scholars and scientists, Napoleon Bonaparte explores Egypt. The research is gathered in the Description de l'Égypte, which becomes an essential source for knowledge of the Egypt of the time. At first, Napoleon succeeds militarily as well, but cannot hold out against the British in the long term.
1844	Founding of the → Baha'i religion by Sayyid Ali Muhammad, known as 'the Bab' ('the Gate')	The Baha'i are understood as the most recent of the monotheistic world religions. Their second founder Baha'u'llah (1817–1892) died in Ottoman captivity in Palestine. The spiritual and administrative center of the Baha'i is in Haifa. In 2001, the terraced gardens of Carmel were dedicated, where Baha'u'llah is buried.

1869	Opening of the Suez Canal	With the Suez Canal, the importance of the region for trade grows for the great Western powers. Egypt becomes a protectorate of Great Britain.
1897	→ Zionism	Theodor Herzl convokes the first Zionist Congress, in Basle. Its programmatic goal is a 'home place for the Jewish people in Palestine.'
19th/20th cent.	Salafiya	Modernistic theologians such as Gamal al-Din al-Afghani, Muhammad Abduh, and Rashid Rida seek to bring Islam into line with Western European thought.
1909ff.	Jewish settlements in Palestine	Tel Aviv is the first Jewish urban foundation in Palestine. The first kibbutzim appear two years later. By 1914, 12,000 Jews already live in a total of fifty-nine economic colonies.
1915/16	Expulsion of Christian Armenians from Anatolia	The 'ethnic cleansing' prescribed by the Turkish state becomes genocide, as some 1,000,000 Armenians die in pogroms and hunger marches.

1917	Balfour Declaration	The British government supports the Zionists in the "creation of a national homeland in Palestine for the Jewish people."
1918	End of the Ottoman Empire
Era 4: Nationalism, pan-Arabism, Islamism
1919	Egyptian Revolution	Saad Zaghlul, Chair of the Wafd Party, directs the uprising against the British: Egypt becomes independent in 1936.
1924	Abolition of the Ottoman Caliphate	Under Mustafa Kemal, surnamed Ataturk ('Father of the Turks'), laicization is established in Turkey. From 1928 on, Islam is no longer the state religion.
1925/26	Wahhabite insurrection	Ibn Saud captures Mecca, thereby creating the base for the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (officially founded in 1932).
1925–1927	Druse insurrection	The Allies had granted the Druses wide-ranging autonomy (1921). In 1925, they rebelled against the French governor.
1928	Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt	Against the background of the national humiliation of the colonial dependency, Hassan al-Banna (1906–1949) founds the Community of Muslim Brothers (Jama'at al-ihwan al-muslimin). Goal: liberation of the Muslim world from the West and its influence. In 1949, al-Banna is murdered by the secret police. Along with Sayyid Qutb (see below), Banna ranks as one of the fathers of worldwide Islamism.

1933	Beginning of oil exploration on Arabian Peninsula	Oil, in the coming decades, replaces coal as the most important energy source of the industrialized nations, and is the foundation of their mobility (Benzine/gasoline: cars, ships, air travel), The principal 'oil states' (Saudi Arabia, later, the United Arab Emirate, Kuwait, Iraq, and, to an extent, Iran) become the objects of central policies of world political and economic interests.
1945	Founding of the Arab League in Cairo	Members: Egypt, Iraq, Yemen, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Transjordan.
1946	Independence	Transjordan becomes a kingdom; Syria and Lebanon become independent republics.
1947	UN Resolution on Palestine	The United Nations provides for a division of Palestine, and declares Jerusalem an international zone.

1948	Founding of the State of Israel	The end of the British Mandate in Palestine is followed by the founding of the Israeli state, followed, once more, by a number of wars with the neighboring Arab countries.
1954	Nationalization of Suez Canal	Egyptian Head of State Nasser nationalizes the Suez Canal, which, in 1956, leads to war with Israel. France and Great Britain support Israel, but are promptly collared by the UN. End of the gunboat policies of the European colonial powers. The position of power in Palestine is now in the hands of the United States and the Soviet Union.
1958–1961	United Arab Republic	Under Jamal 'Abdul Nasser, Egypt and Syria form a political union, as an expression of the Pan-Arabism propagated by Nasser. Yemen joins, in loose federation.
1964	Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)	Founding of the Palestinian Liberation Organization as an official organization of the Palestinians. Yasser Arafat becomes Chair in 1969.
1965	Sayyid Qutb	Qutb publishes Ma'alim fi t-tariq ("Signposts"), for which he is executed a year later. Unlike al-Banna, Qutb no longer proceeds against the West as such, but does foresee, in the Westernization of Arab society, a departure from Islam.

1967	Six Days' War	Israel occupies the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the Golan Heights and the Sinai Peninsula, and initiates the settlement of the occupied Palestinian areas. The conquest of East Jerusalem, with its Wailing Wall and the Islamic holy places (Dome of the Rock, Al-Aksar Mosque), restores to the Jewish religion its ancient center, but provokes ongoing conflicts in the area of religious politics—the latter being further inflamed by renewed Messianic expectations on the part of fundamentalist Jewish groups.
1971	United Emirates ('Gulf States') become independent	Great Britain yields the last colonial bastions 'east of Suez' to the extensive nationalization of oil.
1973	October War ("Yom Kippur War")	For the first time, Arab countries introduce oil as a 'weapon.' The elevated price of oil allots the oil-producing countries, especially the 'gulf states' of the Arabian Peninsula, an enormous wealth, and a speedy accession to the Western consumer culture and lifestyle.

1975ff.	Civil War in Lebanon	The civil war in religiously heterogeneous Lebanon is generated by the increasing confessionalization of social and political conflicts. In the process, the expulsion of Palestinians from Israel and Jordan has a disintegrating effect.
1977	Sadat visits Jerusalem	The visit to Israel by Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat stumbles on a lack of understanding in his own camp. On the part of the West, the gesture is welcomed, forming as it does the basis for the peace negotiations at Camp David between Egypt and Israel, under American leadership (1979 Peace Accord). Egypt is excluded from the Arab League, to be readmitted only in 1989.
1979	Islamic Revolution in Iran	After the overthrow of the Shah, Ayatolla Khomeini takes the country in hand and forms an "Islamic Republic." Leadership is reposed in an elite of the Shiite clergy (Mullahs). The persecution of religious minorities and of the Baha'i increases.
1980–1988	First Gulf War	Iran and Iraq battle for oil fields. In Iran, the Shiite martyr cult is placed in the service of the military leadership.

1981	Egyptian President Anwar al-Saddat murdered by Islamist Group Jihad Islami
1981	Coptic unrests in Egypt	In the Shubra quarter of the city of Cairo, bloody conflicts arise between militant Muslims and Christian Copts. Following the unrest, numerous Islamists are arrested, along with leaders of the opposition. Coptic leader Pope Shenuda III is banished to the Wadi Natrun Monastery for four years.
1984ff.	Kurdish insurrections	Kurdish uprising in Turkey, in 1991 in Iraq. The Kurds battle for the autonomy promised them as early as 1970.
1987–1993	First Intifada	Uprising of the Palestinians against Israeli occupation.
1990–1991	Second Gulf War	The entry of Iraqi troops into Kuwait triggers the Second Gulf War. Besides the United States, Great Britain and France take part.
1993	Oslo Accord	In Oslo, Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization enter into an accord, providing a limited autonomy for the Palestinians. The vague prospect of independence is included. Accord is to be renegotiated in 1995.

1995	Israeli Minister President Yitzhak Rabin murdered	The deed of a militant Jew, friendly to the radical settlement movement, is an indication of the deep division within Israeli society.
1997	Iran: President Muhammad Khatami	Reform politician Khatami seeks a gradual rapprochement with the West. The stalemate in religious policy leads to an incessant power struggle between the conservative 'Guardian Council' (Ayatollah Ali Khamenei as successor to Ayatollah Khomeini, d. 1989) and moderate forces.
2000	Second Intifada	Opposition leader Ariel Sharon pays a provocative visit to the Muslim sanctuaries on the Mount of the Temple in Jerusalem. Outcome: the Palestinians declare the peace process to have failed, and begin a new insurrection.

Katja Dorothea Buck

Pantheism

Two Scientists

1. "That conviction of reason—bound up with deep feeling—that is revealed in the experiential world, forms my concept of God. Thus, it can also be designated, in the customary manner of expression, as pantheistic (Spinoza)." So wrote Albert Einstein in 1934, thereby inserting his 'relation to the world'—that, in another connection, he also designated as 'cosmic piety'—into the tradition of Jewish philosopher Baruch de Spinoza (1632–1677).[1] Spinoza's formulation, sive deus sive natura (Lat., 'god or nature') had delivered for subsequent times the pattern of equating God and the world. But it did this from contrary points of departure: the world is God or through God ('acosmicist pantheism'), or the world in its entirety is divine ('pancosmicist pantheism').

Pantheism in the Enlightenment and Romanticism

2. The history of the word 'pantheism' begins with John Toland (1670–1722), in whose Pantheisticon of 1720 it is, granted, actually deism that continues to be represented. In the eighteenth century, the concept of pantheism finally serves to determine more precisely the possible intermediate positions between a theistic basic consensus and the newly founded natural sciences. Subsequently, with the 'pantheism battle' between Moses Mendelssohn and F. Jacobi of 1785 as point of departure, various positions were emphatically championed; ranging from the view that pantheism is atheism ('polite' atheism, A. Schopenhauer), all the way to the thesis that pantheism is 'genuine monotheism' (H. Scholz). The pantheism of the early Schleiermacher, designated by Eduard Spranger as a 'pantheism of feeling,' or 'religion of inner-worldly emotion,'[2] brings a new component into the discussion on pantheism. A latent or explicit pantheism became an element of the Romantic philosophy of nature, a nature mysticism corresponding to the form of intellection belonging to pantheism. In this specific connection, pantheism can develop into a 'religion of education,' and enter into competition with Christianity: "A pantheism of emotion consisting in a world piety has [. . .] to a large extent determined German intellectual life, and this as a substitute for a resolute Christian religiosity."[3]

3. Independently of bonds to a Romantic philosophy of nature, pantheism plays a role not to be underestimated in the European frame of reference, be it as a "secret, mystical religion of our time" (W. R. Corti), or be it as a widespread 'scientists' religion' (B. Gladigow). In a framework of the American nature philosophy and theology of the second half of the twentieth century, it is primarily Charles Hartshorne and Stephen Toulmin who undertook the attempt further to develop the pantheistic model of the interpretation of the world. Hartshorne, with his sketch of a 'divine relativity' provides a new pattern for the defeat of the classic dilemmata between divine person and pancosmism: 'surrelativism,' as a connection between panentheism ('everything is within God') and 'theopantism' ('yet God is over all'). It is especially Stephen Toulmin who connects pantheism to a modern nature theology whose cosmological perspective ('return to cosmology') integrates ethical components at the same time. In varying degrees of density, fundamental pantheistic motifs permeate scientific and 'postmodern' images of the world: what is common to them is that they connect a 'theoretical anti-dualism' with a pathetic 'sense and feeling for the world-whole.' There result, from this bond, a renewed connection between nature theology and 'cosmos,' and a new connection between ecology and 'world.'

1. Einstein, Albert, Mein Weltbild, Frankfurt/M. 1980, 18 (Engl.: The World as I See It, London 1940); see Fowler, D. R., "Einstein's Cosmic Religion," in: Zygon 14 (1979), 267-278.
2. Spranger, Eduard, Weltfrömmigkeit, Leipzig 1941, 13.
3. Klein, J., "Pantheismus II, philosophisch," in: Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3rd ed., 5 (1961), 41.

Literature

Corti, W. R., "Der Mensch als Organ Gottes. Studien zum dynamischen Pantheismus," in: Eranos-Jahrbuch 28 (1959), 377-405; Crosby, Donald A., A Religion of Nature, Albany 2002; Dilthey, Wilhelm, "Der entwicklungsgeschichtliche Pantheismus nach seinem geschichtlichen Zusammenhang mit älteren pantheistischen Systemen," in: Idem, Gesammelte Schriften 2, Leipzig 1914, 312-415; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Pantheismus als 'Religion' von Naturwissenschaftlern," in: Antes, Peter/Pahnke, Donate (eds.), Die Religion von Oberschichten, Marburg 1989, 219-239; Idem, "Pantheismus und Naturmystik," in: Bubner, Rüdiger et al. (eds.), Die Trennung von Natur und Geist, Munich 1990, 119-144; Harrison, Paul, Elements of Pantheism: Understanding the Divinity in Nature and the Universe, London/New York 1999; Hartshorne, Charles, The Divine Relativity, New Haven 1964; Jacob, Margaret C., The Radical Enlightenment: Pantheists, Freemasons and Republicans, London 1981; Scholz, H. (ed.), Die Hauptschriften zum Pantheismusstreit zwischen Jacobi und Mendelssohn, Berlin 1916; Idem, "Der Pantheismus in seinem Verhältnis zum Gottesglauben des Christentums," in: Preußische Jahrbücher 141 (1910), 439-464; Toulmin, Stephen, "Nature and Nature's God," in: The Journal of Religious Ethics 13 (1985), 37-52; Wood, H., "Modern Pantheism as an Approach to Environmental Ethics," in: Environmental Ethics 7 (1985); Yovel, Yirmiyahou (ed.), God and Nature: Spinoza's Metaphysics, Leiden 1991.

→ Environmentalism, God/Gods/The Sacred, Mysticism, Natural Science, Nature, Nature Piety, Paganism/Neopaganism, Polytheism, Romanticism

Burkhard Gladigow

Papacy

Title and Claim

1. The pope (from Gk., papas, 'father') is the spiritual and secular sovereign of the Catholic Church, with his seat in Rome: he is plenipotentiary of doctrine, ordination, and leadership, including the power of sanction. His full title reads: "Bishop of Rome, Vicar of Jesus Christ, Successor of the Prince of the Apostles [Peter], Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church, Patriarch of the West, Primate of Italy, Archbishop and Metropolitan of the Roman Province [of the Church], Sovereign of Vatican City State."[1] The title contains claims meant to provide sacred assurance of an absolutist position for the pope in doctrine and discipline, in a strictly centralistic hierarchy: since the death of the divine founder, the pope has been his vicar and representative (legitimate conveyor of God's revelation); an uninterrupted succession begins with the Apostle Peter ('apostolic succession'), whom Jesus himself has appointed as supreme apostle. Jesus's declaration, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church" (Matt 16:18-19) is in resplendent meter-high gold letters on the cupola of Saint Peter's Basilica in Rome. The pope carries the insignia of the keys for closing and opening the gates of heaven. The papal tiara, a triple crown worn on special occasions, consists of a series of three diadems, one atop the other, and was interpreted, in confrontation with secular rule, as representing the pope's claim of superiority even over kings and emperors. A pope exercises his office for life, once the conclave of the College of Cardinals has elected him. All of this makes him appear to the outside as an absolutist ruler.

Representing an Institution

2. On the other hand, the pope is tied and controlled in many ways:

a) His election is held in conclave. Walled into the Sistine Chapel, the cardinals must vote until they have agreed—often a lengthy battle. To the outside, the proceedings within are presented as if the vote had eventually followed God's decision ('unanimously'): white smoke frees the voting men, and proclaims to a waiting people, "Habemus papam" (Lat., "We have a [new] pope!"). Only de facto, but without exception, the pope is chosen from among the members of the College, to which he remains obligated. He already has a long probation behind him. An Australian bishop who as pope sells the treasures of the Church for money with which to succor the poor (as in Morris I. West, The Shoes of the Fisherman, 1963) is unthinkable.

b) The pope is part of an organization that, in the late Middle Ages, developed into a bureaucracy, and thereby became an exemplar for state order in Europe. A system of limited competencies and mutual control narrows the margin for decision. The pope cannot take decisions alone. But en revanche, it creates competency in the preparation of decisions. There are respective specialists. Possible successors have long since belonged to the elite of the 'government.' Contrariwise, tradition is steered and directed when able bishops are not summoned to the cardinalate and thereby do not become eligible.

c) The pope, therefore, is a representative, and not the ruler, of the Church. He becomes the object of criticism of the institution. In person, he represents the institution to the world outside—without, however, being able really to show his human side: first role, then personality.

Critique and Identification

3. a) Since the French Revolution, the geopolitical power of the popes has failed, as Napoleon dissolved the ecclesiastical state and humiliatingly imprisoned Pope Pius VII. It is true that the Congress of Vienna in 1815 restored the ecclesiastical state, and that the movement of → Romanticism fostered a limited advance for the papacy; but its powerlessness was unmistakable. Still, the more the real power shrank, the more fundamental was the claim: progress in the economic and scientific areas, and the revolutionary political changes occurring, were met with conservatism on the part of the papacy. At the First Vatican Council (1870), the 'infallibility' of the pope in matters of dogma was defined. The modern constitutional states were met with papal reaction and rebuff. In 1929, the sovereign Vatican State appeared by the Treaty of the Lateran, struck with Fascist Italy. That, and fear of the atheism of the Communist movement, had the effect of causing the 'Holy See' to shut its eyes to the horrors of the Second World War. Pius XII's (1939–1958) silence in the face of the Shoah involved the Vatican deep in guilt. Only his successor, John XXIII (1958–1963) sparked a development in which the Vatican finally faced events of the present constructively, although with varying results. The Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) opened a new dialogue with the other religions and Christian confessions ('ecumenism'), as well as with the socialist states. Since that time, the Vatican has addressed current social and political problems. Subsequently to the Council, → liberation theology appeared in Latin America, whose partly revolutionary approaches have gone too far for Rome.

A Polish Pope

b) Itinerant John Paul II (1978–2005), to be sure, repeatedly emphasized the shameful positions in which many persons live, and called for improvements. But, on the other hand, he strictly rejected political activities of a revolutionary kind, and actually maintained contacts with the world's dictatorships. He acted very conservatively in questions of sexual morality: he condemned any form of birth control, required strict → celibacy of priests, and refused women church offices. In dealings with the questions of the present, the Catholic Church currently finds itself in a phase of orientation in which tensions constantly arise among parts of that Church. Bishops demand more independence of Roman central authority, both in the theological and the secular areas. At the same time, the laity, especially in the West, demand more freedoms (e.g., through a 'participation of the laity' in the making and implementation of ecclesiastical decisions, for example at the parish level). Nevertheless, almost no one in the Catholic Church criticizes the papacy fundamentally. Today, it is true, the Church has precious little direct power; but it wields a great deal of influence over some one billion Catholics worldwide.

c) By contrast with the → Orthodox Churches of the East, which have patriarchs or metropolitans in supreme authority (autocephaly), the autonomous Coptic Christians of Egypt have called their supreme hierarchs 'popes' since antiquity. Both popes, the Roman and the Coptic, recognize each other.

1. Denzler 1997, 9.

Literature

Chadwick, Owen, A History of the Popes, 1830–1914, Oxford 2003; Cheetham, Nicolas, Keepers of the Keys: The Pope in History, London 1982; Denzler, Georg, Das Papsttum. Geschichte und Gegenwart, Munich 1997; Duffy, Eamon, Saints and Sinners: A History of the Popes, New Haven 1997; McBrien, Richard P., Lives of the Popes: The Pontiffs from St. Peter to John Paul II, San Francisco 1997; Shotwell, James T./Loomis, Louise Ropes, The See of Peter, New York 1991; Ullmann, Walter, A Short History of the Papacy in the Middle Ages, London [2]2003.

→ Catholicism, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Hierarchy, Orthodox Churches, Specialists (Religious)

Stephan Rademacher (§§ 1, 3), Christoph Auffarth et al. (§ 2)

Parapsychology

What Does Parapsychology Seek?

1. It is the aim of parapsychology to investigate, by means of academic scientific methodology, phenomena not to be reconciled with scientific images of the world known and acknowledged up until now. Here parapsychology recognizes the fundamental scientific premises that a phenomenon can be regarded as having been demonstrated only when it is inter-subjectively verifiable and experimentally repeatable. The results of parapsychological research have thus far been unable to supply a conclusive demonstration of the existence of the phenomena it investigates, in the sense of the premise just cited. Also, as for the repeatedly cited introduction of parapsychological methods in connection with various clandestine government-sponsored activities, no results are known that could be valid as a proof in the scientific sense.

"Psi" Phenomena

The subject area of today's parapsychology is that of the so-called Psi phenomena (after the initial letter of the Greek word psyché, 'soul'; → Psyche), among which a group of abnormal manners of experience and behavior are comprised. These can be divided into the following sub-groups:

a) Psi cognition, or extrasensory perception (ESP):

- Telepathy: transferal of psychic or mental content from one person to another without the intervention of known channels of communication ('thought transmission')
- Clairvoyance: registration of 'objective' facts that are shared by none of the persons involved
- Precognition: registration of future events that cannot be foreseen rationally

b) Psychokinesis (Pk): intentional influence over physical or biological systems without the intervention of recognized scientific interaction

Concept and Its Origin

2. Berlin psychologist and philosopher Max Dessoir introduced the concept of parapsychology in 1889. This concept is the one used by Dessoir to designate a group of extraordinary phenomena repeatedly reported in many cultures and in all ages, but neither explainable nor demonstrable in a framework of Western science. His effort had been preceded by, among other things, the founding of the groups, still active today, named "Societies for Psychical Research," in London (1882) and in the United States (1885). These societies had set themselves the goal of systematic and unprejudiced research into the 'occult.'

Prehistory

From the end of the eighteenth century, scientific interest in the 'occult' was stimulated especially by the mass movements of mesmerism and → spiritism. These were settled on the borderline of religion, → occultism, and the modern scientific cognitional claim.

Mesmerism

a) The designation 'Mesmerism' goes back to Franz Anton Mesmer, who first presented his method in 1775. Extending his hands over a patient's body, and combining this with a forerunner of hypnosis (→ Trance), he achieved astounding curative effects. Mesmer himself related this to 'magnetic' forces; critics spoke of fraud, or presumed auto-suggestive procedures. It is worth noting that, while the effect of autosuggestion has indeed come to be regarded as demonstrated, the phenomenon has not been adequately explained. True, Mesmer's curative method was by no means new in his time; but he was one of the first to generate a modern, scientific explanatory model.

b) The content of the → spiritism propagated by American John Fox, beginning in 1848, was primarily a contact with spirits of the departed. It subsequently stimulated numerous pertinent experiments throughout Western culture, even outside the spiritistic association that was developing into a religious community.

Parapsychological Experiments

Against this background, the founding of organizations like the Society for Psychical Research is to be understood as the first attempt to relocate an investigation of paranormal phenomena from the salons to scientific laboratories, and to practice serious research. In 1930, it was American psychologist Joseph Banks Rhine (1895–1980) who, at Duke University, first developed parapsychological experiments that satisfied the requirements of intersubjectivity and reiterability, as well as applying a set of safeguards that excluded any kind of deceit. At first, it was experiments in telepathy that were conducted, in which simple graphic signs were to be transmitted by a

'sender' to a 'receiver' sitting in another room. The series of symbols used was random. The results were then analyzed according to accepted methods of calculating probability, and results significantly above the standard deviation were evaluated as an indicator of the emergence of telepathic effects. In the following decades, parapsychological experiments were refined, and were extended to all relevant subject areas.

These experiments marked the beginning of academic parapsychology. Subsequently, chairs of parapsychology were established in several universities—in Europe in Edinburgh, Utrecht, and Freiburg, where, in the school of psychology, a chair of parapsychology was established. This chair was first occupied by Hans Bender (1907–1991), and since then by Hans Mischo. Along with performing laboratory experiments, Bender was especially known for his investigation of so-called poltergeist phenomena. Critics did reproach him with excessive credulity.

Current Situation

3. Since then, the methodology and theory of parapsychology have been objects of constant further development, and numerous interdisciplinary projects are carried out in cooperation with related human and physical sciences. Nevertheless, parapsychology still stands under pressure to legitimate itself, since a conclusive demonstration of the existence of Psi phenomena has not been forthcoming. Reports of success on the part of one generation of parapsychologists are relativized by the next, while the number increases even of parapsychologists who adopt a skeptical attitude. This increase in skepticism has had different consequences: various parapsychological institutions, such as the parapsychological institute at the University of Utrecht, have been closed, and other institutions undertake new fields of activity. Thus, the original "Parapsychological Consultation Center" founded by the "Scientific Society for the Promotion of Parapsychology," and currently headed by W. von Lucadou, operates primarily as a psychological and 'psycho-hygienic' consultation center. In the course of recent years, Hans Mischo has led large-scale empirical investigations on the theme of so-called youth occultism. Besides the classic areas of research, the psychological and sociological aspects of belief in 'paranormal phenomena' are now also being subjected to investigation. Meanwhile, the purposes of classic parapsychological research are being formulated more modestly, and a conclusive proof of the existence of Psi phenomena is now scarcely expected in the foreseeable future.

From the side of occultist and esoteric currents, it is objected to parapsychology that 'suprasensory' phenomena cannot be produced at will under laboratory conditions, so that the attempt to demonstrate the reality of such phenomena in a framework of the methodology of the rational sciences is, a priori, doomed to failure. This argumentation is countered, at least by way of approach, with recent knowledge of parapsychology, as they indicate that subjective components, such as the psychic apprehension of individuals in individual circumstances, as well as belief in the possibilities of an experiment succeeding, have an essential influence on the course of the same.

Whether, after more than a century, parapsychology can perhaps come up with a scientific legitimization after all, waits to be seen. Here, more essential impulses could be expected, if at all, in a framework of interdisciplinary research, than through the extensively exhausted classic parapsychological experiments.

Literature

Bauer, Eberhard, Grenzgebiete der Psychologie, Trier 1992; Bender, Hans, Parapsychologie. Die Wissenschaft von den okkulten Erscheinungen, ed. by E. Bauer, 1999; Edge, Hoyt L., Foundations of Parapsychology: Exploring the Boundaries of Human Capability, Boston 1986; Irwin, H. J., An Introduction to Parapsychology, Jefferson 1994; Rao, Koneru Ramakrishna (ed.), The Basic Experiments in Parapsychology, Jefferson 1984; Thalbourne, Michael A./Storm, Lance (eds.), Parapsychology in the Twenty-First Century: Essays on the Future of Psychical Research, Jefferson 2005; von Lucadou, Walter , Psyche und Chaos. Theorien der Parapsychologie, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Wolman, Benjamin B. (ed.), Handbook of Parapsychology, New York 1977.

→ Natural Science, Occultism, Psyche, Psychopathology, Science, Spiritism

Joachim Schmidt

Peace

Current Situation

1. On the level of the individual human being, peace means harmony with oneself, one's fellow human beings, the environment, or with God—a harmony that can be attained by way of efforts like that of meditation, observance of divine directives, or reflection on the conditions of a nonviolent cohabitation. This peace is regarded as the prerequisite for outer peace. While Jewish, Christian, and Islamic religion surmise the cause of the lack of peace in a false or faulty relationship with God, Buddhism seeks to exclude, from the human being's impulsive life, all that can lead to violence and war.

'Peace' denotes the ideal condition characterized by the absence of strife, struggle, and war. Thus, it is not available to positive definition. But normatively, peace should not constitute a special case, in the sense of an interruption of a normal condition, war. Instead, it ought to constitute the normal case. 'Peace,' therefore, is the contrary of → 'war,' with which it is necessarily associated.

2. Together, war and peace form a complementary opposition, which can be accompanied by clear sexual attributions that often are ascribed to them. Following such constructions, peace is understood as 'good,' and 'feminine,' and war as 'masculine.' Even militarists call peace 'good,' and a goal worth striving for, while war must be only a means to the attainment of this end. Given the fact that peace can be ascribed feminine connotations, it follows that in a context of the asymmetrical sexual hierarchy of 'masculine' and 'feminine' a downgrading and depreciation of the concept of peace is observable. The characterization of war as masculine is historically not inappropriate, inasmuch as war has always been a central component of male upbringing. At the same time, but the other way around, there is a line of tradition in which symbols and images are referred to positively, that present 'woman' as protector of peace. Since mid-nineteenth century, this line of approach has been taken up by elements of the feminist movement, which—without contesting the sexual ascriptions of the militarists (peace = womanly, war = manly)—do reverse their appraisals.

3. Along with the construction of such pre-political counter-worlds, which appeal to individual aspirations, there are also visions of peace that are explicitly political, such as the conceptualization of the return of paradise on earth, for example in the form of the communistic primordial society. Another such conception is the Christian notion of the establishment of the reign of peace by Christ the Prince of Peace (as the vision of the 'Third Reign' that ultimately goes back to the Revelation of John, or of the Christian idea of the emergence of an age of peace), or by the hidden Mahdi in Islam. The exploitation of visions of peace for interests unconnected with peace, or even set over against it, is abundantly attested historically. The designation of pacare (Lat., 'to pacify') for Caesar's military campaigns against the Gauls is well known.

4. Nourished by a yearning for peace, and bolstered by the power of ancient myths, religious and ideological utopias, and visions of the future, the history of humanity has repeatedly seen initiatives and movements for peace. For modern peace movements, since the nineteenth-century appearance of the national states, the notion of 'everlasting peace' has been the prime consideration. It goes back to medieval theology, and arose in the tradition of the Pax Romana, on the one hand, and on the other, the Hellenistic-Jewish idea of the Prince of Peace and the Reign of God—the Reign of Peace simpliciter. In particular, the Christian conception of this reign of peace, the 'New Jerusalem,' has always been a powerful stimulus for the peace movement. First and foremost, after the War of 1812, in which it was the question of free trade that was at issue, Congregationalists and Unitarians founded the first peace society organized as an association. In opposition to this war, they connected the idea of free trade with that of peace, establishing the specific Anglo-American line of tradition in the peace movement. Independently of other groups, it was English Quakers, mainly, who in 1816 introduced the beginnings of the European peace movement. France and Switzerland followed. Austria (1891) and Germany (1893), on the other hand, entered into the international peace movement only belatedly, with the founding of peace societies. However, the idea of peace had been promoted since mid-nineteenth century by the non-denominational and the Freethinkers.

Pacifism

Subsequently, a distinction had to be made between the peace movement and pacifism. The decisive trait of 'pacifism,' a concept introduced around 1901, is the total renunciation of any form of violence. After the First World War, pacifist initiatives were successfully undertaken in Europe, for example in Germany where the right to refuse military service was first demanded. In connection with the transfer of power to the National Socialists, the movements for peace and pacifism were destroyed, and many of their activists went into exile. After the Second World War, in a framework of the 'Cold War,' the West German peace movement was regarded as having been infiltrated by Communist elements, and was marginalized. In the societal system of West Germany, the peace movement was long unimportant quantitatively, and grew in strength only after the early 1980s—as in other countries such as the Netherlands—against a background of the nuclear arms race upon which the great powers had embarked.

The Churches

5. Collaboration with the peace movement was refused by the Catholic Church, which had likewise come out for peace about 1900. The Evangelical Reconciliation Union and the Peace Union of German Catholics were founded in 1914 and 1919 respectively. The best-known peace group today, Pax Christi, was born on July 14, 1944, in the state prison of Compiègne, among members of the French underground. In a context of prayers for peace, Pax Christi repeatedly celebrated the Way of the Cross. Since 1952, the Pope has recognized it as a "peace movement of the Church." All of its actions, such as its encouragement of refusal of military service, are drawn from the pacifist spirit.

The Peace Movement

6. Characteristic of 'the' peace movement is heterogeneity. It has always been bound up with the most varied social and ideological movements and their ideas, such as free trade, international justice and equality (League of Nations, the U.N.), human rights, an anti-nuclear stance, socialism, feminism, anti-globalization, preservation of nature—even with nationalism. To this heterogeneity corresponds a plurality of symbols, as there is no single, universal peace symbol. The 'peace sign' itself originates with the British anti-nuclear movement, and today it has become an important symbol of the Christian peace movement—especially in Germany, with its inscription "Swords into Plowshares," introduced by peace supporters in the German Democratic Republic. Granted, its reference is to a biblical citation, but it also stands in the symbolical tradition of Soviet socialism. Since the Vietnam War, the presence of the 'peace sign' in the media has become ever more important for the popularization of the peace concept. True, it does thereby subject the peace movements to the rules of the world of the media (simple, catchy symbols, spectacular actions) and interests (audience ratings, sales figures). Further, actions such as sitting blockades and nonviolent resistance have the character of stereotyped rituals. Accordingly, peace movements in our modern, media-oriented society must communicate with ever-new actions, and in modern forms of communication (Internet), in order to continue to attract the interest of the public to themselves and to the idea of peace.

The peace movements are caught in a dilemma. They wish to institutionalize the positive value of 'nonviolence' and peace against political resistance, but they seek to do so without using any violence themselves. At the same time, they find themselves in a defensive role vis-à-vis both their potential appropriation or utilization by extraneous interests, and a slide into the everyday, along with ritualization.

Literature

Breyman, Steve, Why Movements Matter: The West German Peace Movement and U.S. Arms Control Policy, Albany 2001; Day, Alan J. (ed.), Peace Movements of the World, Harlow 1986; DeBenedetti, Charles (ed.), Peace Heroes in Twentieth-Century America, Bloomington 1988; de Cuellar, Javier Perez (editor in chief), World Encyclopedia of Peace, 8 vols., New York [2]1999; Liddington, Jill, The Long Road to Greenham: Feminism and Anti-Militarism in Britain since 1820, London 1989; van den Dungen, Peter (ed.), West European Pacifism and the Strategy for Peace, London 1985.

→ Atheism, Conflict/Violence, Gandhi, War/Armed Forces

Ulrich Nanko

Penance / Penitent

Concept

1. When someone inflicts harm on another, the injured party may demand compensation for the injury. The injury must be 'repented.' In case of conflict, one appeals to a judge, to establish the seriousness of the injury and the degree of guilt attaching to it. Especially with a murder, for example, an injury can be 'condignly' compensated only by the death of a member of the opposing party; still, the 'capital' punishment (from Lat., caput, 'head') can be replaced with a money payment, the 'mulet' for homicide. But before the compensation—the re-balancing between the two parties—there stands another procedure. For example: when someone has violated a speed limit, he may have caused no injury, but he must pay a penitential fine, because he has injured the societal 'order.' Thus, first a clerical or secular court establishes the penance, which is not intended as an advantage to the injured party (consideration of the latter is a subordinate one, a civil process), but is to serve for the satisfaction of or restitution to the order of the state and the order of God. Judges may establish the amount that God or the state receives as compensation, as defined in their books of penal law.

2. The Hebrew Bible presents the concept of conversion as homonymous for 'doing penance.' Here conversion is understood as the abandonment of the wrong path, and the cessation of any veneration of foreign gods. With John the Baptist as well, baptism and conversion were the last chance for redemption, rescue in the nearing 'Judgment,' and this notion permeates the beginnings of the mission to the heathen. In post-apostolic times, one must confess one's sins before the Sunday Lord's meal (→ Lord's Supper/Eucharist); otherwise the meal has not been clean. Church Father → Augustine explained that outside the Catholic Church there is no salvation, and that therefore the sinner must seek refuge in the Church, humble her/himself, and publicly submit to penance. Only in the Middle Ages did the 'private penance' come into use, and the forgiveness of sin could be rehearsed as often as desired, in a non-public process between priest and sinner. The performance of a particular penance was established for every imaginable case, and listed in penance books. The practice arose, furthermore, of 'transforming' onerous penances or punishments, and replacing them with other deeds, such as money payments. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries there were ever new waves of out-and-out enthusiasm for penance, throughout the Church of the West, for example in the form of ascetical reforms, the foundation of mendicant orders, movements, and renewal of monasticism. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, emerging from Italy and spreading in Central Europe, there appeared a self-scourging movement, that of the Flagellanti of Central Europe, who submitted themselves to bloody, public, scourgings by way of penance. Martin Luther initiated criticism of the medieval teaching on penance. For him, penance ought to last lifelong, and as foundation of the forgiveness of sin he saw God's pardon rather than the human being's sorrow. According to Catholic understanding still today, Penance is one of the Seven Sacraments of the Church, and has been instituted by Christ.

Islamic Penitential Practice

3. In the → Qur'an the concept of tawba (Ar., 'sorrow'; properly, 'return') arises often. The validity of tawba depends on three things: (1) confession of the sin, (2) sorrow (nadam), and (3) the firm intent to refrain from sin

For hours, this Hindu penitent lies under a blanket of cow dung in silence, while his relatives keep the little oil lamps burning. This ceremony to the honor of the goddess Durga has the purpose of clearing and removing one's guilt or that of one's family, pronouncing a vow, or obtaining a grace. Cow dung, along with butterfat (ghee), milk, yogurt, and urine, is one of a cow's five sacred products, to all of which are attributed the salvific effect of ritual purification. (Benita von Behr)

in the future. When these conditions are fulfilled, God always accepts the sorrow, not because he is obliged to, but because he is pleased to. On the other hand, a 'deathbed regret' will not do (Sura 4:18). The Qur'an and later juristic writings imposed penitential fasting, when persons had not fulfilled their religious duty, or were being punished for some transgression. This fasting is called a kaffara (Ar., 'atonement,' 'expiation'). It can last three days for smaller transgressions like the breach of a vow, or for a great transgression, for instance the unintentional killing of a person, two months. The type of penance imposed is fitted to the type of the offense, in the form of (a) collective penance or (b) special penance. As a collective penance, one could cite the Muharram Processions of the Shia in Iran, as well as in other regions where a Shia majority prevails. The passion plays of the month of Muharram present the story of the passion of the Imams (Husain ibn 'Ali's battle and death at Kerbala), and the other martyrs of the Shia, in theatrical style. Self-scourging, and self-wounding with chains or swords, as a sign of grief for the imam martyrs, are established components of these festivities. In the scourging, the self-sacrifice is ritualized, and rendered reiterable in a fresh experience: now, by shedding his blood, the believer performs an annual penance for his own part in the guilt of a historical rejection of the 'party' (Ar., shia; → Iran) in these concrete situations. The Muharram rites last ten days, and are organized by city associations.

At midpoint in the cycle of festivals celebrated in the little farming town of Gurdia Sanfromondi (diocese of Telese), a spectacular ritual is performed: the penitential procession of the Flagellanti and the Battenti (It., 'Strikers'). On Sunday, the seventh day of the festival cycle, which has begun on the Monday after the Feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary into Heaven (September 8), a seven-hour procession is performed through the streets of the town, in which groups of figures from the history of Jesus's Passion (misteri) participate, along with both of the penitential groups and their assistants. While the self-scourging of the Flagellants is now only symbolical, the rite of the Battenti actually draws blood. Their faces veiled with a cowl, and a crucifix in their left hands, they torment themselves, by wounding their breasts with the spugna (It., 'sponge'), a waxed slice of cork studded with sharp nails. Assistants intensify the pain by occasionally cleansing the cork with white wine, along with the place on the breast being struck. In 1989, in Guardia Sanfromondi, more than six hundred Battenti performed this penitential rite, which is a widespread one today in Catholic countries (Spain, the Philippines). (Hubert Mohr)

The question of whether someone appreciates one's guilt is often regarded as of more importance by religion than by the state. Thus, in the religious area, mere sorrow often suffices to render God gracious again. But for the state, the highest purpose remains the restoration of order.

Literature

Ayoub, Mahmoud, Redemptive Suffering in Islām, The Hague etc. 1978; Hamilton, Sarah, The Practice of Penance, 900–1050, London/Woodbridge 2001; Frantzen, Allen J., The Literature of Penance in Anglo-Saxon England, New Brunswick 1983; Lualdi, Katharine Jackson/Thayer, Anne T. (eds.), Penitence in the Age of Reformations, Aldershot 2000; Mansfield, Mary C., The Humiliation of Sinners: Public Penance in Thirteenth-Century France, Ithaca 1995; Palmer, Paul F. (ed.), Sacraments and Forgiveness: History and Doctrinal Development of Penance, Extreme Unction and Indulgences, Westminster/London 1960; Pinault, David, The Shiites: Ritual and Popular Piety in a Muslim Community, New York 1992.

→ Flagellants, Guilt, Pain, Sin

Ayfer Yavuzyasar

Perception / Sensory System

1. "On Sundays, my father takes me to Mass, and when the ladies sing Hosanna I think I won't get out of there in a thousand years. Hosanna, Hosanna, they screech, without letup, and nobody can put the brakes on them, not the Chief of Police or anybody [. . .] The beautiful things about Mass are: all the lamps are lit, and all the flowers smell wonderful [. . .] The bad things about Mass are: you have to kneel too long, it lasts too long at Easter [. . .]"[1]

No one's tastes are the same, and so neither are their sense impressions. The Neapolitan grammar-school girl describes Sunday Mass in her

Pallazolo Aereide, Sicily, June 29, 1 p.m. “Now! A roar, as if a storm were brewing. Canons sputter sparks, and shoot long, colorful paper strips high into the air over the statue of the Patron. Cherry bombs explode, the church bells resound, applause, tinny music. The Paolo! Paolo!—cries, again . . . Clouds of smoke hang in the air and darken the sun, little colored cards rain down, with the saint’s picture on them.” German journalist Barbara Baumgartner portrays the high point of the local festival year of a farming town west of Syracuse, as an event that bewitches and stuns the senses. All senses are engaged, the whole town is buzzing, when, on the feast of his patronage, Saint Paul is borne from the church to the piazza by the male village youth—at least downtown; uptown has its Saint Sebastian. The feast of the saint of a quarter gives occasion to reverse the country drab of the everyday in one grand explosion: instead of ocher and gray, now yellow and red prevail, instead of the quiet of the noonday heat the noise of the crowd and the playing of the banda, the music band, instead of the abandoned spaces of siesta time the seething, shouting → mass. For many, this is too much, as for Sicilian writer Leonardo Scascia: “But what is a religious festival in Sicily? The simplest answer would be, ‘anything but a religious feast.’” But is this not being a ‘spoilsport’?

composition as a gladsome and painful 'festival of the senses.' She hears women's voices and singing, she smells perfume, she sees the sheen of the lights, she perceives her own bodily posture. Her knees hurt, as will happen in tradition-conscious Catholicism, and her ears fall off when the choir starts, but what happens to her eyes and nose makes up for it. A fascinating, unforgettable 'social field of stimulation' opens there, experienced and undergone physically, and inscribed through the disciplinary work of religious socialization right into the composition book. The Mass seems practically like a "collection of suitable circumstances" (J. J. Gibson), it seems an experiencing and trying of the senses in 'sacred play' (B. Lang). And we must add, a sensory elevation occurs that separates this special circumstance as 'cultic,' 'ritualistic,' vis-à-vis other patterns of perception.

The Sensory Apparatus: External Perception and Proprioception

2. a) As our example shows, the senses and perception make religion 'experienceable,' thus, in an elementary sense, rendering religions loci of sensory awareness. What does this mean? Like any animal, the human being is required to take an orientation in her and his environment, in order to live and survive. Sources of danger must be discerned, sources of nourishment must be made accessible, information must be transmitted, partners of the species found. To this end, every animal organism disposes of a special sensory apparatus. In the case of the human being, as of the higher species as a whole, the familiar five senses (see Table below), sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch.

b) Besides these outer-directed senses, animal organisms also possess inner-directed perceptions (body perception, 'proprioception'). In the human beings, these are:

- The sense of balance, in the inner ear;
- 'Kinesthesis': the feeling of motion or motor activity;
- The perception of position in space—standing, sitting, lying—;
- The experience of feeling of pain, which is essential for human organism: a personal corporeal alarm system, indicating illness and wounds.

c) Each sense functions as a system of perception, whose product is the 'stimulus-arousal transduction' between organ of perception and brain. The decisive thing is that the information does not deliver an immediate image of our outer and inner world, a mirror image, or 'impression' or 'print' as if made by a stamp (and whatever is expressed in traditional metaphors). It never consists of anything but coded signals, from which the central nervous system composes 'its picture' of the whole, its construct. Thus, human perception is in large measure a 'construction process': perceptions are continuously compared with stored perception patterns ('percepts'), and complemented in terms of these—"You only see what you know." The experiences that we have had since earliest childhood (and particularly there), the images of the holy and the saints, all find their representations in channeling and automated pattern-recognition. 'Inner perception' complements the outer and can lead a life of its own, in memories, fantasies, hallucinations—bases for epiphanies and visions. Witness everyday linguistic usage itself, in which the word 'perception' names, on the one hand, one's own percept, but in which it also speaks of perceptions by 'another person' or another religion—and thus calls for preconceived and stereotyped conceptualizations of 'otherness,' including, perhaps, their positive discernment and reception (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes).

True, sensory perception is largely 'automatic,' automatized, and unconscious. Contrary to appearances, however, it is a vigorous venture. The pupils of the eyes, for example, constantly screen the field of vision in minuscule movements ('saccades'). The old notions that a look is penetrating, that it shoots seeing-arrows, that the eye is 'sunlike,' a little sun, and shines outward, have their sensory-psychological foundation here. In a wider sense, it is correct to say that the senses are 'busy.'

Body-Space-Communication

3. a) This anatomic-physiological 'basic equipment' that forms an important part of mental grasp, of 'cognition,' is, in the case of the human being, culturally—and thereby religiously—shaped as well, but it is also addressed, 'stimulated,' and thematized, and this in many ways.

Body

It is the body that perceives, although it is seldom perceived, and with health and normal movement remains nearly insensible. Thus, the believer feels it all the more strongly when the body 'reports,' with a pleasant or unpleasant sensation.

→ Liturgy and custom prescribe postures that believers are bound to observe. They are to hear the instructive words of the → sermon sitting, attest their reverence by kneeling, indicate their submission to a highest being in prostration (→ Proskynesis). An elaborate liturgy is concerned with alternation, the body is periodically quieted and activated. Frequently onerous or even painful corporeal sensations are intended. When the Italian girl's knees press down against the hard 'kneeler,' when Muslim or Tibetan monks or nuns cast themselves to the ground for the umpteenth time in the rite of proskynesis, when pilgrims creep up the steep cliff of Irish Croagh Patrick

The elderly woman touching the figure of the Savior on a large processional cross in San Giuseppe al Trionfale (Rome) is performing a gesture in which reverential greeting and ritual reception of salvation are mixed. The wish to become a sharer in the power of blessing (→ Charisma) emitted by a saint or wonderworker to honor their saint, when the member of a brotherhood in Sicilian Trapani helps carry his mistero, his Passion assemblage, through the city to complete exhaustion, the feelings of → pain or weakness are not coincidental or meaningless: they are the result of an imitation, a mimetic participation. The faithful carry out the history of the mythic exemplar, and physically insure their faith: the burden of one's → body is at once a martyring burden of penitence, a gesture of humility, and a mirroring approach to that which is to be reverenced.

That religion can set bodies in motion just as successfully and impressively as can politics is well known. The advent of the ruler (→ Epiphany) occurs as does the entry of the bishop to the place of the episcopal throne, with grave and dignified footfall, the pedestrian pilgrimage leads the faithful long distances over asphalt, or even through night and mist. Even experiences of flight are possible, in mystical trance or ritual procedure, such as in the flight ceremonial of the Middle American Totonaki (→ Central America, with picture). An especially varied program of movement is the one carried out by Muslims on the pilgrimage to and within → Mecca, when, among other things, they circumambulate the Kaaba seven times and run back and forth between the two former hills of Safa and Marwa (the sa'y rite). The course measures 385 m and must be traversed a total of seven times, at a special gait (harwal). Afterwards the pilgrim must stand in prayer at the Jabal ar-Rahma from noon to sunset in the radiance of the sun, and cast stones in Mina.

Religion not only harasses and challenges the believer's body, however; it pampers it as well, and enfolds it in care and protection. Gestures of shelter and tenderness, the intimate joys, to be hugged, snuggled and kissed, are a privilege of small groups, such as Wicca covens (→ Paganism/Neopaganism), monastic communities, or the Hutterite settlements. But they also gladden Christian churchgoers at the Kiss of Peace. An old, established rite of the healer is to lay the hand, as the most important bodily tool and instrument, the organ of touch and care, on the part that hurts. The surface tension of the dermal organ then alters, and warmth flows. That 'good vibrations' generated in this way contribute to a sense of well-being is known from infant psychology. In the demonstrative public act, the concerned touch assumes characteristics of civil religion, when the politician cuddles children or Lady Di cares for AIDS patients alongside Mother Teresa. The most immediate bodily contact, sexual union with its orgasmic sensations, it is true, is extensively excluded from religious ritual (→ Sexuality). In cases where it is attested, as in ancient agrarian religions, it is in a highly determined symbolical framework that has as its goal not sensory pleasures but an activity of signification—namely, the warrant of → regeneration.

by embracing or kissing him is an old one. It is found even in the New Testament, where a woman is healed from a hemorrhage by touching the hem of Jesus's garment (Luke 8:43-48): "Someone touched me, for I noticed that power had gone out from me"—the experience of believers' multiply-attested perception that, contrariwise, the act of touching stimulates an affluence of the power of blessing. Nor is the living person needed: a residual power suffices, → relics, or, as here, an → image. Celebrated objects of such touches are the tombs of Sufi sheiks, in Islam, which shed blessings (baraka). Beyond this phenomenon, which, in order to objectify it, has been called 'contagious magic,' there appears a basic communicative form of spiritual desire, a palpable proximity that offers the boon of a tactual intimacy with the sacred person.

Spaces of Perception

b) Abstracting from the body's self-perception, the sensory organs serve environmental → orientation. Outer perception transmits the place and position of the body in space; without it we can neither move, drink, nor eat in safety. Individual, distinct bits of sensory information combine in the brain into an overall picture, and we may speak of a subjective and an objective space of perception. Objective perception space is determined by the physical condition of the surroundings, and is organized, in correspondence with the senses, into field of vision, sound- and smell spheres, and → materiality; the coordinates of weight- or falling direction of the position of the body in space, air pressure information, as well as sensation of warmth. Originally calculated to guarantee the organism's survival in a potentially hostile and

From the minaret of a small German 'backyard mosque,' a muezzin intones the call to prayer. He has laid his hands on his cheeks, in order the better to hear and control his voice. The office of 'proclaimer' (in Ar., mu'addin, 'one who issues the prayer call,' adan), of which there are at least two at every mosque, represents one of the key offices of Islamic worship. With his adan, the muezzin not only announces the community prayer (salat; → Islam), five times each day, but also has the task of reciting litanies and extracts from the Qur'an. The call to prayer, like the ringing of a church bell in Christianity, serves to announce and coordinate prayer time and ritual practice.

The melodic voices of the Muezzins, wafting over the roofs of an Islamic town, also generate a highly impressive sensation, an auditory representation of the umma, the 'community of believers.' As with the visual points of Christian belfry and Muslim minaret, controversies over the call of the muezzin in Western countries are questions of power—in this case, of domination of hearing. Today, as well, in its age of mechanization, the present rite has entered: amplifiers and loudspeakers facilitate the technique, and reinforce the effect, but diminish demands on the art of the presentation (cf. → Film II, with picture).

insecure natural environment, the sensory system is confronted, since the inception of cultural orientation, more and more by artificial surroundings, beginning with the 'cultural landscapes' of the planters to the 'stone deserts' of the modern metropolises (as well as of ancient ones). There arises a multiplicity of highly culture-specific—and we may add at once, highly religion-specific—perceptions of spaces, each with its own environmental design, each with its own religious repertoire of visual stimulation, 'acoustical design' (M. Schafer), and constellation of scents. Buddhist, Islamic, and Christian → architecture address the senses as differently as do the cultic ensembles to which they belong. Thus, they possess an independent aesthetics, in the broad sense: a panorama of perception. Depending on the compass of that panorama—be it a living space with a home altar and wall decoration, be it a church square, a sacred spring, or indeed an entire sacred → landscape—the religious aesthetic formation of the environment shifts believers' senses into a certain perceptual space. This space addresses its senses not only by attention-attracting objects such as church towers, minarets, or stupas, but directs, orients, and even deludes and dislocates the senses by way of streets or sacred architecture. Axes—symmetrical arrangements—not only lead the visitor to the center, but also permit the organization of great masses of persons, from the ancient American Teotihuacan (founded around the second century BCE) to the Nuremberg Reich Party tracts. On the other hand, the intentional asymmetry of the → labyrinth can lead a person astray—if not directly into the claws of a monster. That gods are conceived larger than life, gigantic, indeed colossal, is a fact antedating ancient Egyptian sculpture, Phidias's statue of Zeus in Olympia, or the some 32 m high Apollo Helios astride the entry of the harbor of Rhodes, the "Colossus" (in Gr., Kolossós). That 'high' corresponds to 'holy,' that heaven is 'above' and hell 'below,' every child of the Near-Eastern and European religious tradition, and many a region besides, has learned to think very well.

Information, Symbols, and Codes

c) This interpretation seems obvious to those who have grown up in this tradition; but it is not self-evident. Orientation in perceptive space does not occur in human beings—as it does, for instance, in frogs—'on its own,' in an automated stimulus-response reaction. The uncoupling of the instinct apparatus in man concerns not only the option to react to external stimuli with hesitation, consideration, or entirely without reaction, but also the opportunity to charge stimuli communicatively as culture-specific vehicles of information. This function endows the sensory stimulus with an additional dimension that can be established arbitrarily: it becomes a sign, whose meaning must be unified and known (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture). The 'language of the bells' (A. Corbin) can be decoded in the Christian parish only by that person who, in the first place, is a Christian, and in the second, knows the local codification of the bell-strokes—one who is able to distinguish the call to prayer (Angelus) from the alarm ('Fire!') or the bell for the dead. Identical sound-events can broadcast religious messages as well as secular ones, and must be correctly interpreted by the auditor. Even this simple example shows that the effect of sensory stimuli in cultural perceptual space is not only that of steering behavior, but also that of informing. And it shows that perception not only exhausts sensory channels, but is organized in 'sign sentences' and systems ('codes') that presuppose a knowledge in the believer that that person must learn. Now, religious communities, their specialists and their followers, can play very well with that knowledge: flowers or bodily gestures, colors, buildings, or articles of → clothing are subjected to the social coding of perception. A rich, sometimes highly specialized, even esoteric symbolism can develop around the cultic ordering of, for example, colors to deities. Of course, if it was specified in the agreement between Piero della Francesca and the Prior of the Brotherhood of Santa Maria della Misericordia that the proposed panel of a Madonna of Protection in the city of Sansepolcro in Umbria be gilded and colored with adequate ultramarine blue,[2] then the aim of contract consists in supplying the viewer's gaze with values of prestigious stimuli. However, not everlasting ones: after all, it is gold that everyone today (still) associates with wealth—scarcely, any longer, that precious Renaissance tint, 'ultramarine.'

The 'Play with the Senses'—Cultic Use of the Perceptual Apparatus

4. It is trivial that cultic acts presuppose sensory activity in order to be available to experience. Not so trivial are the methods and 'tricks' with which religious communities and cultic specialists operate in order to increase the → meaning, and intensity of feeling, of that which is ritual and liturgical. In

Sacred places are often so situated as to use the conditions of the → landscape to attract believers' eyes. The notion that → mountains, hills, and rocks are dwelling places of the gods, or at least are 'closer to heaven,' is to be found first of all in ethnic religions. Thus, the Oratoire Saint-Joseph, a Catholic church of pilgrimage in Montréal, is an eye catcher for the faithful and a mark of orientation as well. Its elevated position on the crest of a hill functions as an artificial landmark, and attracts pilgrims' attention to their goal even from afar—a target with a cupola, elevating natural conditions to the level of the monumental. The sacred ensemble itself, referring to miracle-worker Frère André (1845–1937), was dedi-

no case should the reproach, 'sleight-of-hand' or 'manipulation,' be invoked: many cultic means are anthropologically 'self-evident,' in that they address the sensory apparatus both obviously as purposefully, and thus practice an unconscious 'play with the senses.' Here the address to the senses always occurs in an eminently singular manner, established by tradition and religious milieu. The cultic framework, the sphere of cult, is the result of a testing of aesthetic arrangements that can be centuries old. Furthermore, this sphere is frequently broadened cognitively, by way of a network of mythological and symbolical meanings. A brief typological survey, in order of increasing complexity and intensity of means, may, perhaps, afford clarification.

- Signals: The above-cited bell signals, the cry of the muezzin, the swinging of the bullroarer before initiation rites among the → Aborigines, standardize the ritual procedures of a community, call it to divine service, and divide sacred → time from profane.
- The material nature of objects and substances (→ Materiality) utilized in the various cults, as in the case of sacred images, sacred apparatus and materials used in worship, supports and explains messages of faith (steps ascend to the 'high altar'; the 'Holy of Holies'—for example, in Orthodox church structural design—is sealed off from the profane or profaning by an image screen, the iconostasis). But it generates 'sensible' (and meaning-filled) impressions and experiences itself, produces an atmosphere, and accentuates prestige values, like the ultramarine of the Madonnas.
- Ritualization: Distinct senses can be ritualized separately. An especially striking example is the Hindu rite of the 'Viewing' (in Sanskrit, darshana; in Hindi, darshan) of the gods. It consists of direct eye contact between the believer, who 'takes' the sight (darshan lena), and the deity presented in the divine image, who 'grants' the sight (darshan dena). A 'wind' or 'current of energy' (C. Mallebrein) of spiritual strengthening is thought to overcome and 'fill' the venerator. Great, wide eyes betoken the presence of the divinity in the image, and attract the believer's gaze. They are painted on, or inserted, on the occasion of the production of the divine image, in a concluding rite. Even aniconic objects of devotion, such as stones, can be made serviceable for visual communication, by way of eye-sketches or markings. Another example is that of the 'smoke sacrifices,' widespread in ancient Eastern and contemporary Asian religions. The burning of aromatic essences, of incense and myrrh, is part of a tradition that survives today in Catholic and Orthodox divine services. In the form of incense sticks and aroma therapy, such experiences occur once again, at the end of the twentieth century, even in secular communities—in the border area of 'wellness,' alternative therapies and Buddhist reception.

- Sensory stimulation is eminently suitable for dramatic presentation in ritual: → liturgy and → ritual process each possess their repertoire, accommodated to each religion, which can range from single gesture (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture) to simple forms such as → baptism, where the body is immersed in → water, or at least the head is moistened, to complex and large-scale events such as a festival (→ Feasts and Celebrations), sacred → drama, or Gesamtkunstwerk. The ancient Greek bloody (state) → sacrifice is a good example. Persons and the sacrificial animal are adorned and crowned; a procession to the place of sacrifice is held; there is a bath (for purification) in anticipation, and then the hands are washed at the altar; incense is burned, and, ordinarily, a flute is played. The climax of the drama, the slaughtering blow, is marked by a shrill female cry (in Gk., ololygé); later, the time comes for direct participation in the sacrifice, when the innards are roasted in the altar fire and eaten, and then the remaining meat is boiled and distributed. Even before the concluding meal, a thick smoke has covered the scenery, mixed with the odor of the blood of the slaughtered animal, when bones and fat, together with some wine and cake are burned—heaven in olfactory satisfaction.[3]
- Reinforcement or strengthening: In the framework in which cults are celebrated, sensory impressions are not only directed and purposely addressed, but also artistically and skillfully reinforced: candles illumine the sacred image, torch processions (as at Lourdes) trace the route of the procession and render community visible, the organ accompanies community singing, the → rhythm of the drums guides the steps of the Santeria disciple into trance. The aesthetic 'steering' and directing applied in these cases elevates the mechanical sensory stimulation to the status of an actual emotional stimulation: it elevates, 'euphoricizes,' overwhelms. This extreme enhancement can also move in the opposite direction, however: to attenuation of environmental stimulation, or even its exclusion.

5. In a comparison of the church of Steinhausen in Germany, a little jewel of the Upper Swabian Baroque, with the Japanese garden and temple of the Tenryu-ji in → Kyôto, in all of its severe austerity—if one joins the Dome of the Rock in → Jerusalem, in all the brilliance of its late antiquity, with the Calvinist New Church in Delft, denuded of any images—the contrasts could not be greater. Here is the splendor of color, cupids, lofty and gladsome figures of saints, mosaics, lavish ornamentation; there is absence of adornment, there are clear lines, no images, covered colors—here sensuous cated in 1937, and is an arresting example of how architectonic forms of perception-stimulus and physical strain bolster spiritual purpose. The axial symmetry of the installation is determined by two opposite raised poles: statue and inscription of the monument to Joseph, on the one pole, in the foreground, challenge pilgrims, "Ite ad Josephum" (Lat., "Go to Joseph"), and indicates to them the way. The central axis along which they approach the sanctuary, the other pole, attracts them to the center, while the colossal size of the building makes the pilgrims seem small to themselves. Now they must climb to the building by way of the 'Sacred Stair,' a mighty triple set of steps. That some of the faithful creep up the steps on their knees is seemingly in emulation of famous exemplars like the Scala Santa (Lat., 'Sacred Stair') in Rome; of course, it is equally inspired by the overwhelming architecture of the present construction, and is a gesture of repentance and piety. None of which is in any way diminished by the fact of the pair of streets that, in tribute to the automobile, cut through the axis of the stairway.

That which is perceived with the senses must also be interpreted, as we observe in a special type of images of the Madonna, the 'Black Madonna.' In the optical construction of the holy, the black color of → icons of → Mary and sacred statues of European history of religion are visual signals requiring interpretation. Gods and saints were regularly presented as fair-skinned, just as the majority of the European and Near Asian population have always been light in color. Furthermore, black traditionally suggested the devilish and demonic in mythology. Black face-color was therefore a sign of something—sign of exactly what, however, had been forgotten, even by the time of the Enlightenment. Hence, ever more new patterns of explanation attached to the images of the Black Madonnas: they were supposed to represent the Beloved of the Song of Solomon (Song 1:5-6), who cried, "I am black and/but beautiful"—"nigra sum sed formosa"—or to be direct descendants of the dark Greek underworld deity Demeter of Phigalia (Jacob Grimm). More realistic were legends—however color, there aesthetic minimalism, here artistic presentation, there studied simplicity, here overflow of stimulus, there severest reduction. We are in the presence of two extreme possibilities of sensory variance and cultic framework—both of them, in their opposition, bearing testimony to different conceptualizations of faith, as well as supplying a platform for a correspondingly different religious practice. The feeling of community in parish churches, the contemplative 'sense' of the monastery, the reductionism of a hermitage—and then the edifice representing the state religion—counter each other not only in the stylistic opposition of their practical functions, however, but also in their respective contemporary value. In the quiet of pre-industrial times, the retreat of the hermitage possessed another psychoaesthetic rating and importance from that of its value in noise-polluted modernity. Here, monasteries are more and more sought out as 'oases of quiet' by 'stressed-out' city dwellers. The annual saint's day, and the accompanying church festival, the feast of the consecration of the church, brandished (and still do, in back 'farm country') a far greater attractiveness as sensual experience of the exception than the media-dominated 'event society' of the twenty-first century, where entertainment opportunities have become a free-time-devouring 'must.' Religion as founder of entertaining mass events (→ Masses) now seems to have to share its role with → sports and with musical and media 'events' of → popular culture.

However, it is precisely the reduction of perception that has achieved its own stimulus today, and it lives in a long liturgical, contemplative, and ascetical tradition.

Keeping silence, as a liturgical tool, was introduced in many sacred traditions, as an 'emphatic means' for the makeover of stimulus. Thus, the words of transformation (consecration) of the Catholic Mass have been simultaneous with the 'canonical silence.' At priestly ordination, during the act of ordination itself, 'epicletic' silence prevails—the silence of 'invocation.' The 'silent services' of the Quakers create the transition to contemplation—'ceremony-free meditation assemblies,' during which there is neither singing nor praying aloud, but only the awaiting of the individual participant's direct enlightenment by the Holy Spirit.[4]

The classic places of the reduction of perception were hermitages, wilderness monasteries and cloisters—stagings of inaccessibility. Here, renunciation of the world was synonymous with the asceticism of the senses. Instead of squandering itself on a destructive multiplicity of objects, the gaze of the contemplative specialist could be turned within, to reflection and meditation. True, the poverty of sensory stimuli sometimes has the contrary effect: with external stimulation lying fallow, production of images in the → fantasy, emerging from the unconscious, pierced the consciousness of the monks all the more stoutly—the sleep of the senses gave birth to monsters. The proverbial "temptations of Saint Anthony" were not confined to the Egyptian wilderness, however. Hallucinations, in the form of → visions and auditions, occurring because of the poverty of stimulation, are possibly also to be explained, precisely in the case of conceptions of demons and witches, by sensual deprivation in outlying areas—or, to put it another way, by a (too) low demand of external stimuli.[5] The extreme condition of 'sensory deprivation,' since the body is robbed of most or all of its senses, could even have been intentionally introduced by → cave artists of the Old Stone Age.[6] It can be relived today by the Western metropolitan person in the samadhi tank—a closed, windowless, and sound-muffling container in which the client is floating in a brine, or rather, is hovering without orientation—provided that the client awaits the coming of fantasies long enough. Besides tanks and caves, the senses' perception can be altered by intoxicants or drugs (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallocinogens). Drug-induced alterations or broadening of consciousness, in their sense-bewitching results, can have the same effect as their ritual production by → yoga and other → breathing techniques.

6. The senses are given downright doubtful marks by the religions, their founders and theological guardians. The history of doctrines is pervaded by a basic mistrust of these aggregates of turning to the world. The ambivalence of the senses—which, depending on the respective position of each, occasions the senses' experience of creation (and therewith of the creator), or else seduces them from the divine, through sensuality, to sensory rapture and inappropriate deviation from the divine—must address the alternatives: is the human being a sensory being to the greater glory of God or to that of the Devil? Thus, according to → Augustine and other Church Fathers, the eye is the 'window of the soul,' so that it occupies a special, if precarious, position among the senses: the 'lust of the eyes,' concupiscentia oculorum, stands at the start of a career as a sinner. Augustine has pangs of conscience even at a glance at a lizard catching flies—at any optical amusement that would afford thrust to the vice of curiositas, eagerness for sensation, and the thrust to be entertained.[7] Buddhism, again, sees in the 'craving' or 'desire' (in Sanskrit, trsna; in Pali, tanha), arising after pleasant sense impressions, one of the factors that condition 'attachment,' and therewith the cycle of births. In the → meditation of mindfulness (satipatthana), the purpose is to observe the appearance and disappearance of sense impressions exactly, without developing desire or repulsion. Sense impressions, too, are to be recognized as impermanent, as not constituting an 'I,' and ultimately as unsatisfying.

Because sensory stimulations are more or less exclusively evaluated and devaluated as a potential for seduction and temptation, and sensory organs are ordered to a corporality that is to be defeated, constructs of applied ethics come to include hostility to the senses, in which sense perception is polemically equivalated with sensuality. The enemies, in a like ethical rigorism, are 'sense pleasures,' which are identified with the familiar bodily stimulations of → dance, → music, alcohol, and women (the authors are usually men). The followers of English Puritanism, or of Swabian Pietism, or indeed Islamic groups such as the Wahhabites or the Algerian Mozabites, therefore sought, through continence and proscription, to keep the influence of seductive sensory stimulations as ineffective as possible. This can lead to systems that, to an outsider, seem downright joyless. The Mozabites in the Algerian Sahara, for example, are forbidden ostentious luxury, drugs including tobacco, perfume, and dancing or music even at weddings. Women may neither weep over a dead person, nor speak loudly, nor laugh. By the way, the economic result of this out-and-out 'Calvinistic' sensory ethics is that the profit of an enterprise cannot be consumed; it is therefore reinvested.[8]

When what is available to the senses is devalued as 'superficial' or 'external,' a spiritualized form of sensory perception frequently supervenes: that of 'inner sight,' of the visio Dei, of the 'third eye.' Here is the only means by which the experience of 'true belief,' of a 'perfect emptiness,' of a 'sacred' experience of the beyond that is inaccessible to the senses, can succeed. The much constructed after the fact—that saw the Madonnas as darkened by having been burned, as related in Altötting (Bavaria), or in the Swiss pilgrimage place of Maria Einsiedeln, whose miraculous image from the fifteenth century is shown in this small, indulgence-conferring, representation of today. It seems most probable, however, that the color black indicates a reverend age, and thereby semiotically fixes the devotional tradition, establishing it in the most distant time. The observation that wood eventually grows dark, that candle-smoke can give images a coating of soot, is re-shaped as a sign of prestige. Finally, images are purposely exposed to smoke, providing statues with a black skin-color after they have been painted, as in Einsiedeln. Not coincidentally, 'Black Madonnas' are to be found precisely in the most visited, most famous, pre-modern places of → pilgrimage of Europe: in Tshenstochau in Poland, in Loreto in Italy, in Le Puy in France, on the Catalanian Montserrat, in Altötting, and, as we see, in Einsiedeln. The embarrassment of a black color not understood has somewhat softened in modern times: Beginning in the nineteenth century, with Lourdes, then with Fatima, and most recently, Medjugorje, the age of the White Madonnas has dawned.

Table

	Visual System	Auditory System	Haptic System (Touch, Vibration)	Orientation in Space (Balance)	Smell and Taste (Olfacto-Gustative System)		Temperature	Pain (Nociceptive System)
Kind of Perception	Seeing	Hearing	Feel	Kinesthesis, physical balance, movement and ac-/deceleration	Smell	Taste	warm/cold	Sensation of pain
Stimulus	Electromagnetic vibrations	Mechanical (air-) vibration	Reconfiguration of skin; extension and shifting of the joints and muscular organs	Turning, acceleration, gravitational attraction	Chemical substances in the air	Chemical substances impinging on the tongue	Temperature changes	Painful materials (?)
Place of Reception of Stimulus	Eye (retina)	Ear (cortical organ in the inner ear)	Skin, connective tissue, mucous membrane, cartilage	Inner ear, hammer/anvil/stirrup: 'vestibular apparatus'	Nose	Tongue (taste-buds)	[as with haptic system]	[As with haptic system]
Receptor Cells	Photosensors: rods and cones	Mechano-sensors (inner and outer follicles)	Mechano-sensors (Meissner/Pacini/Merkel particles)	Mechano-sensors: (follicles in the macula/cupula)	Chemo-sensors	Chemo-sensors	Thermo-sensors (free nerve-endings?)	Chemo-sensors (free nerve-endings?)
Number	7 mid. rods, 120 mid. cones	13,500 inner follicles, 3,500 outer follicles	500,000	23,000	20,000,000	300,000	200,000	3,000,000
Channel Capacity (in bits/sec.)	3,000,000	35,000	100,000	10,000	10-100	10	1,000	?
Information	Light-dependent environmental structures: shape and color	Sound sources/events and their localization	Contact with the ground, shape of objects, materiality, mechanical characteristics	Direction of gravitation (orientation upward and downward; straight vs. slanted; dizziness vs. rest)	Sources of scent (aroma vs. stench, disgust, sexual stimulation)	Nutritional value and wholesomeness (fresh nutrients vs. decayed)	Outside temperature, body temperature (cold vs. warm)	Injuries, pathological alterations in organs
Devotional-(Cultic-) Ritual Activation (Examples)	Sacred → orientation (directions of the sky), → landscape (formation and experience of), sacred buildings with towers, architectonic visual direction and illumination, visual contact with sacred statues (Hinduism: darshan), light refraction and direction at church windows	Spoken forms of liturgy: → prayer, recitation, intonations, → sermon, → singing, → music, rhythm, audition	Touching, hand-clasping, embracing, kiss (of peace), anointing, bodily contact in the → masses (of persons), contagious → magic, ritual sexual intercourse	Courses of movement (motoric): jumping, walking (circumambulating the altar, etc., → procession), dancing, running (Greek agon as part of a religious exercise), kneeling and prostrating oneself (→ Proskinesis), ritual ball-playing, → flying)	Sacrificial odor (blood, incense sticks, foods, carthartic incensing in rites of purification)	Ritual → eating and → drinking, festive meal, sacrificial meal (e.g. → Lord's Supper [bread and wine])	Cold vs. hot foods, seasonal festivals (summer vs. winter), fire cults (sacrificial cults, hearth fire, midsummer fire	Carrying weighty cultic images or statues of saints and Misteri (scenes from the Passion) in Good Friday processions (→ Mediterranean Region)

Cultic Exclusion of Stimulation (Sensory Deprivation)	Nocturnal rites (→ Mysteries), cave devotions, veiling of sacred images, sacred material and apparatus (tabernacle, relic shrine [to an extent]), bounding and ritual seclusion (laity, women/men, uninitiated), masking	Silence/quiet: asceticism, mystical silence (Quakers' "Silent Services")	Isolation (monasticism, hermits), untouchables (→ Caste), touching restrictions (→ Taboo)	Immobility (as ascetical vow → sadhu), swaying, temporary weightlessness (samhadi-tank, floating in a salt lake, lying therapy (incubation in ancient cult of Asclepius)	Purification of body and clothing before cultic actions, odor control in the case of the Osho ashram	→ Fasting, ascetical and mystical abstinence from nutrition, "fed by light"	Ascetical self-inuring (e.g. of Indian → Sadhus) against heat and winter cold	Anesthesia, insensitivity to pain in → trance (walking through fire, self-wounding)
Cultic Reinforcement (Sensory Extreme)	Monumentalizing, colossalizing (pyramids, over life-size statue of Zeus by Phidias in Olympia), candles, staging by brightness and texture, bearing of torches, light-procession at Lourdes, meditative visualization techniques, quest for visions, epiphany	Use of musical instruments: organ, drums, phonetic symbols for beginning/end/climax of rituals, bells, castanets, cannon shots at Ramadan	Orgy, festive → masses (of persons), sprinkling or washing with fluid material (→ water, → baptism, → blood, mud)	Experiences of dizziness; flight ritual of the Totonaki in → Central America, rotary movement of the dancing dervishes	Inhalation of aromatic essences and/or hallucinogens such as intoxicants and means of trance (oracle of Pythia in Delphi, consumption of cannabis at the rite of chillum, → intoxication)	Satiation at feasts of the saints and the temples, (→ Daoism; Caste)	Indian sweat lodges, cold-asceticism through nakedness (→ Sadhu)	Self-scourging/flagellantism (Shia Ashura ritual in → Iran), tests of courage at rites of initiation tradition of theology and philosophy (of religion) that equates piety with faith and the knowledge accompanying it, and limits cognition to the development of information (as also do parts of today's systems and approaches with regard to information), in this case prevails over sensory approaches to things and concepts. However, must not this 'inner option,' in the age of a 'flood of images' in the media, and of an overflowing sensory hedonism, operate as a beneficent abstinence? Perhaps a Buddhist (or Zen Buddhist) legacy—mindfulness—offers a path between pleasure and satisfaction, and the new storm of images: observing, perceiving, 'noticing'? Is this not the (not only religious) work with the senses that we have to do today?
Sign System (Codes)	Color symbolism, gesturing, arts of the image, tattooing, hairstyle, clothing	Speech, music	Intimacy	→ Dance; Martial Arts; Olympic Games; Yoga	"Aromatizing clocks" in Shintô temples, → purity, aroma therapy	→ Vegetarianism, diet		→ Mysticism, → Possession, Practices of → Penance

Table modified, and supplemented with data bearing on religion after: Plattig, Karl-Heinz, Spürnasen und Feinschmecker. Die chemischen Sinne des Menschen, Heidelberg 1995, Table 1: "The Human Being's Eight Principal Sensory Modalities," pp. 4-5; Gibson, James J., Die Sinne und der Prozess der Wahrnemung, Bern 1973 (Engl. [1]1966), Table 1: "The Systems of Perception," p. 75.

1. D'Orta, Marcello (ed.), "Gott hat uns alle gratis erschaffen". Neue Schulaufsätze neapolitanischer Kinder (Ital., Dio ci ha creato gratis: il vangelo secondo i bambini di Arzano, 1992), Zurich 1993, 108f.
2. Baxandall 1972.
3. According to Burkert, Walter, Homo Necans: The Anthropology of Ancient Greek Sacrificial Ritual and Myth, Berkeley 1983 (cit. German edition, Berlin 1972, 10-14).
4. Heinz, Andreas, ch. 27: "Schweigen—Stille," in: Handbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft, Teil 3: Gestalt des Gottesdienstes, [2]1990, 240-248.
5. Thus the far-reaching thesis of Bernd Roeck, "Wahrnehmungsgeschichtliche Aspekte des Hexenwahns—ein Versuch," in: Historisches Jahrbuch 112 (1992), 72-103.
6. Duerr, Hans Peter, Sedna oder die Liebe zum Leben, Frankfurt/M. 1984, 46-58.
7. Augustine, Confessions, book X, 35, 54-57.
8. Neumann, Wolfgang, Die Berber. Vielfalt und Einheit einer traditionellen nord-afrikanschen Kultur, Cologne 1983, 178-189.

Literature

Biophysiology, Cognition Theory, Psychology of Perception: Goldstein, E. Bruce, Sensation and Perception, Pacific Grove/London [6]2002; Gombrich, Ernst, The Image and the Eye: Further Studies in the Psychology of Pictorial Representation, Oxford 1982; Pinel, John P. J., Biopsychology, Boston/London [5]2003; Roth, Gerhard, Das Gehirn und seine Wirklichkeit. Kognitive Neurobiologie und ihre philosophischen Konsequenzen, Frankfurt/M. [5]1996.

Religious Aesthetics: Cancik, Hubert, "Religionsästhetik," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe, vol. 1 (1988), 121-156.

Senses / Sensory apparatus: Gibson, James J., The Senses Considered as Perceptual Systems, Boston 1966; Jütte, Robert, Geschichte der Sinne. Von der Antike bis zum Cyberspace, Munich 2000.—Seeing: Eck, Diana L., Darśan: Seeing the Divine Image in India, New York [3]1998; Gage, John, Colour and Culture: Practice and Meaning from Antiquity to Abstraction, London 1993; Idem, Colour and Meaning: Art, Science, and Symbolism, London 1999; Mallebrein, Cornelia, Darshan. Blickkontakte mit indischen Göttern: die ländliche und tribale Tradition, Berlin 1998.—Hearing: Corbin, Alain, Village Bells: Sound and Meaning in the 19th-Century French Countryside, New York 1998; Schafer, Murray, The Soundscape: Our Sonic Environment and the Tuning of the World, Rochester [2]1994 ([1]1977).—Smelling/Taste: Corbin, Alain, The Foul and the Fragrant: Odor and the French Social Imagination, Leamington Spa 1986 (Fr. [1]1982); Détienne, Marcel, The Gardens of Adonis: Spices in Greek Mythology, Hassocks 1977 (Fr. [1]1972).

Art: Baxandall, Michael, Painting and Experience in Fifteenth Century Italy, Oxford 1972.

Dimensions of Perception: Cancik, Hubert, "Größe und Kolossalität als religiöse und ästhetische Kategorien," in: Visible Religion 7 (1990), 51-68.

→ Feelings/Emotions, Landscape, Light/Enlightenment, Masses, Materiality, Music, Orientation, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Vision/Auditory Experience

Hubert Mohr

Pietism

Determination of the Concept

1. 'Pietism' (from Lat. pietas, 'devotion') is an umbrella concept for intra-church devotional and renewal movements in → Protestantism. It especially denotes a movement of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in Germany and certain neighboring countries. Its aim was a religious interiorization of the → Reformation achievements, and their translation into practical living ('tätiges Christsein' [Ger., 'active being-a-Christian'], praxis pietatis [Lat., 'practice of piety'). Connected to this was a criticism of prevailing ecclesial relationships, and a 'hope of better times.' Social concentrations were at Halle and Würtemberg, in West Germany, Netherlands Reformed pietism, and—to the extent that it was ascribed to Pietism, the Herrnhuter Brüdergemeinde (Ger., 'Herrnhut Community of Brethren,' 'Moravian Brethren') of Nikolaus Ludwig Graf von Zinzendorf (1700–1760). Besides these, there is 'Radical Pietism' (or better, 'Spiritualism'), which crystallized around charismatic individuals (e.g., Johann Wilhelm Petersen, 1649–1727, and his spouse Johanna Eleonora, 1644–1724, Johann Georg Gichtel, 1638–1710, Eva von Buttlar, 1670–1721). Due to its attempt to separate from the official church and its distinct traditions of theology and piety, Spiritualism essentially distinguishes itself from church Pietism. While the Pietism of Halle was subsequently altogether absorbed into Lutheranism and disappeared as an independent tradition, there are lines of continuity, especially in Württemberg Pietism, that extend to the present. As for the Moravian Brethren, this group spread all over the world as a particular church.

Pietism was a new style of piety, characterized by intensive, continuous Bible reading, a special collection of music for singing (special songbooks, composers such as N. L. von Zinzendorf and G. A. Freylinghausen), an intensive promotion of meditation, and new forms of religious gatherings (from 'conventicle' and 'Love Meal' to 'Sunday school'). A new kind of application of piety was characteristic: to social activity, on the one hand, and to the individual person on the other ('battle of penitence,' constant self-check of one's life of faith by keeping a diary, and similar activities). The Protestant inclination to missionary activity arises from this source as well.

Pietist traditions survived in the awakening movement (from c. 1780), in the community movement (from c. 1880), and in further modernized neo-pietistic developments of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Along with these immediate effects, neither are the mediate ones to be underestimated—effects both on recent Protestantism as a whole, and on determinate traits of modern cultural history, literature, and philosophy (e.g. Goethe's "Bekenntnisse einer schönen Seele" [Ger., "Confessions of a Beautiful Soul"], Johann Heinrich Jung-Stilling, 1740–1817). Modern individual culture, associations, and social action were marked by Pietism as well. Widespread cultural phenomena of today, such as the keeping of a diary, friendships by letter, or general interest in the history of one's own life (autobiography; → biography), have their historical roots in this devotional movement of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Historical Description

2. Pietism's point of departure and demarcations are disputed in scholarship. One source of inspiration, however, was a very popular piece of edifying literature by theologian Johann Arndt (1555–1621). His Vier Bücher vom Wahren Christentum (Ger., "Four Books of True Christianity"), appearing between 1605 and 1610, were later held in an esteem barely surpassed by that of the Bible itself, and, as with the latter, passages were read from it daily. Arndt takes up certain objections raised by the radical wing of the Reformation, which alleged catastrophic results of the doctrine of justification when it came to devotion and morality: even though the state of grace is bestowed only by God himself, this does not mean that human beings may sit idly by. Rather, they need to strive by every means for the sanctification of their lives, and concern themselves with the reestablishment of the image of God (Gen 1:26). In this fashion, Arndt attempted to instill recognition of God in the soul (books 1–3) and in nature (book 4).

P. J. Spener

As a 'movement,' Pietism can be considered sociologically with help from the works of Philipp Jakob Spener (1635–1705). In 1670, in Frankfurt/Main, Spener founded a Collegium Pietatis (Lat., "Association of Devotion/Piety"), a pious conversation group or circle for Bible study and mutual edification, which met in his study. After this exemplar, such 'colleges' or 'conventicles' sprang up in many places—small communities of pious Christians, within the Protestant church communities, and frequently beyond their local boundaries. The conventicles soon had to deal with the reproach of 'separation' from the church. Intra-church resistance formed within 'orthodoxy,' whose center for the area of Lutheranism was the Wittenberg Theological Faculty. It saw Catholicizing tendencies in the ideal of 'active Christianity,' and at the same time feared chiliastic fanaticisms, with their undermining effect on Church and government (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm). After an antecedent proximity to radical spiritualism, Spener and the leading thinkers of Pietism shifted cautiously away from the anti-ecclesial tendencies of the latter, and accentuated the practical and active aspects of their plans for reform. This was concretized in Spener's Pia Desideria, oder herzliches Verlangen nach gottgefälliger Besserung der Wahren evangelischen Kirche (Lat./Ger., "Devout Desires, Or a Heartfelt Longing for a Betterment of the True Evangelical Church Pleasing to God"; 1675). The work describes the decline of the Church of the time, as well as means and ends for its improvement by way of a reform of theological studies and parish life. Connected with this was a 'hope of better times'—an expectation of the end time, radicalized vis-à-vis the Lutheran tradition.

Francke's Pietism at Halle

Based in Berlin, in 1692 Spener secured the installation of August Hermann Francke, first as pastor, then as professor as well, in the new university. Francke the visionary made use of his organizational talents to realize many of Spener's plans, in the 'Orphanage' that, from 1695 onward, also became a kind of 'forge of the elite' for Pietist theologians and teachers, in collaboration with the Halle theological faculty. In the 'Orphanage's' articulated scholastic system, children of the middle class and the nobility were soon trained as well. A system of scholarships for needy students became available and ensured both a connection to the university and an economical instructional and pedagogical staff. The Bible printery (founded 1710) and the production of medicines by the Orphanage dispensary achieved worldwide importance. The operation was conducted over an extensive network, reaching, across royal courts and middle-class associations, to Siberia, North America, South Africa, and India. Emissaries from Halle journeyed for years, seeking to establish trade relations. Personnel maintained by Halle likewise staffed the mission of the Danish King (begun in 1706), at his trading station of Tran-quebar, in Southern India. For their part, mission reports printed in Halle dynamized the further spread of Pietism in Europe. The Halle letter and diary culture, together with the native-language publications of the Halle Orphanage, strengthened European languages, for example in the Baltic.

Devotion and piety were strictly regulated in Halle Pietism. In the footsteps of the founder, an obligatory Schema of the Pathway of Faith was proposed, consisting of an initial struggle of repentance and of the defeat of one's lusts, the 'breakthrough' of the experience of rebirth, and finally, the sanctification of one's life. Progress in the life of faith was meticulously supervised. The reproach of hypocrisy soon brought discredit upon the initial thrusts. (Only) after Francke's death, it is true, did Halle Pietism attain to its greatest degree of effectiveness; but its original energy and exuberance rapidly faded. The institution of the Orphanage became independent, however, and is an exquisite treasure house of the history of the Middle German and European culture and history of the late seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries.

Further Developments

In its other regional centers, as well, Pietism had permanent effects. Especially worthy of note is Württemberg Pietism, which reached formulation from about 1720. It was originally drawn from the biblical theology of Johann Albrecht Bengel (1687–1752) on the one hand, and the philosophical and speculative direction of Friedrich Christoph Oetinger (1702–1782) on the other. Oetinger's pupil, Philipp Matthäus Hahn (1739–1790), as a founder and driving figure of Pietist communities, was one of the progenitors of further development, outstripped only by lay theologian and autodidact Johann Michael Hahn (1758–1819). In the year of the latter's death, under the leadership of Gottlieb Wilhelm Hoffmann (1771–1846), pious families founded the Korntal settlement, near Stuttgart. In countless locales, brotherhoods sprang up that, typically in a private framework at first, and later in community halls as well, came together for edifying meeting hours. Unlike the Korntalers, however, these remained members of the land church ('hour people'). These communities also stand in the shadow of the founding (1881) of the Gnadauer Verband (Ger., "Gnadau Association"), the center of the community movement.

Pietism in the Twentieth Century

3. Today's application of the expression 'Pietism' stands in the historical tradition described above. But it is difficult to delineate. As a theological and ecclesial counter-position, unlike historical Pietism, it is no longer orthodoxy, but reception of the Enlightenment, rationalism, and liberalism that stands in the foreground. Accordingly, Pietism presents itself first and foremost as a conservative movement taking the field against certain new elements of church and theology. Such elements include, for instance, historical criticism in biblical research, the mythological interpretation of biblical content, and the softening of traditional theological moral conceptions (e.g., abortion counseling under church auspices, blessing of homosexual unions), or the development of pluralistic religious conceptions that sever the attainment of salvation from an exclusive bond to Christian faith, and, frequently, undermining the missionary concept. Elements of the awakening and community movement, and related American developments, are integrated here, such as tent missions and similar large events, held for the purpose of evangelization (e.g., Campus für Christus [Ger., "Campus for Christ"]).

Unlike the elements of the Free Church and Evangelical spectrum, today's Pietisms regard themselves as intra-church movements, as a rule; however, a possible departure from the land churches repeatedly becomes a subject for debate. On many individual points, Pietist positions overlap with Evangelical ones. Thus, the Kein anderes Evangelium (Ger., "No Other Gospel"; cf. Gal 1:6) movement, founded at the end of the 1960s, decries historical biblical criticism, and especially the sociopolitical accentuation of Bible interpretation in → liberation theology, feminist theology, and other new theological developments. Despite no little overlapping of personnel, Pietist and evangelical movements alike take a clear distance from the second conservative devotional movement in contemporary Christianity, that of the → charismatic movement, which is divided into an intra- and extra-ecclesial wing.

Literature

Atwood, Craig D., Community of the Cross: Moravian Piety in Colonial Bethlehem, University Park 2004; Brecht, Martin et al. (eds.), Geschichte des Pietismus, 4 vols., Göttingen 1993ff.; Brown, Dale W., Understanding Pietism, Grand Rapids 1978; Stoeffler, F. Ernest, The Rise of Evangelical Pietism, Leiden 1971; Wallmann, Johannes, Der Pietismus, Göttingen 1990.

→ Charismatic Movement, Protestantism, Reformation

Christoph Bochinger

Pilgrimage

1. In almost all religions, pilgrimages are time-honored migrations to outlying sacred places. This phenomenon of religious mobility is attested among peoples of ancient times, as well as for India, Ceylon, China, and Japan. Judaism, Islam, and Christianity also have their traditions of pilgrimages, as do many tribal religions.

This devotional journeying is underlain by the belief that the local presence of a deity, a hero, or a saint in this specific place makes transcendence in immanence especially effective and available to experience, and thereby especially efficacious for one's own concerns. Thus, from the standpoint of cultural history, pilgrimage can be described as "symbolical movement of conditioned bodies through semantically fixed geography."[1] The dimension of physical implementation by way of directed relocation[2] thereby assigns the phenomenon to the area of ritual performance with bodily involvement—'corporal piety' (Lat., devotio carnalis).

2. From the critical perspective of forms of a devotio spiritualis that would be ordered to interiority, this style of piety seems suspect. Structurally, against the pilgrimage as one of the very favorite, if not the very favorite, forms of the practice of piety, stand three argumentations on the part of the writing religions' professional theology.[3] The first aims at the spatial location implied: pneumatic or pantheistic conceptions of the ubiquity of the deity must come into structural conflict with conceptualizations of locally bound operational power, as well as with the communication of this operational power through a touching of the saint/hero/god. The second argumentation is directed against the quest for salvation at such far-flung destinations. From an ascetical or monastic point of view, the mobilitas of the pilgrimage can be replaced by less endangering, but analogously effective, disciplinary exercises of the body in stabilitas loci, such as flagellation or fasting. The third argument is directed against the dangers for the body of these pathways to faraway goals. Along with vagrancy, and 'curiosity' (a vice, from a certain religious point of view), pilgrimage implies sexual transgression (in Lat., luxuria). In the lengthy tradition of the Christian criticism of pilgrimage, then, there repeatedly appears Jerome's letter to Paulinus, topically: "Not to have seen Jerusalem, but to have lived a good life in Jerusalem, is praiseworthy."[4] And Thomas à Kempis: "The frequent pilgrim rarely becomes good."[5]

3. In Christian cultural space, the motives of the pilgrimage can be distinguished as piety (Lat., devotio), punishment (punitio), and commission (delegatio, when a pilgrimage is undertaken by a mercenary pilgrim, in the name of someone else). Conceptions of the imitation of the saints (via perfectionis—Lat., 'path of perfection') as an act of the following and discipleship of Christ (imitatio Christi) are connected, in the area of the pilgrimage of piety, with the invocatio of the saints as intercessores. Here the impetration of their help in need is executed at the place of their quasi-magical presence. Punitive pilgrimages include the great ones, such as the one to → Santiago de Compostela as a penance for a serious crime, and the small ones for lesser transgressions. Responsibility for the punitive pilgrimage, again, can be shifted, in return for payment. Belief in miracles, the accumulation of relics, veneration of images, and the sale of indulgences therefore supply the main motifs of the Protestant criticism of pilgrimage. At bottom, however, the pilgrimage is the symbolical and real translation of theological knowledge and religious mentalities: the temporally and locally bounded

"In the spring, there was a pilgrimage. From one place to the next. On dusty streets, and in the clear air of this beautiful time of year that is now in its whole strength. One surrendered to meditation, until arrival in the next village, in order to thank the Madonna or to supplicate her. In the middle of the night, they set out: the old, the young, dogs, cripples, horses, children. Everyone had a candle and a rosary, to recite their singsong prayers the whole way. This was all a very old custom. Our parents have done it in this way, our grandparents, the grandparents of our grandparents." (Tommaso Di Ciaula, Das Bittere und das Süsse, trans. W. Raith, Berlin 1982 [Ital. original 1981]).

Mexico City on December 12. As every year, the streets teem with people celebrating the Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe. The pilgrims have arrived in the city by bus, bicycle, or on foot. They fill the square around the monumental Basilica of the Pilgrimage on the Hill of Tepeyac, place of the Apparition said to have taken place during the early years of the Spanish colonization, and stream into the church to pray before the image. This young man, too, has finally reached the metropolis and kneels for a moment of rest and meditation. His pilgrim's pack, a container for water, and a portable lamp bear witness to a journey by night and on foot. The image that he brings of the Virgin of Guadalupe publicly marks him as a pilgrim, and guarantees protection along the way. The Virgin's image in the picture is surrounded by a border of flowers, a reminder of the legend of the creation of the picture. In supernatural fashion, it is recounted, her picture appeared on the agave-cord screen of Indian visionary Juan Diego, amidst a cascade of roses, which he had picked here at Mary's behest. On the left, besides, is the Mexican flag, showing the close connection between the veneration of Our Lady of Guadalupe and Mexican nationalism. As the outstanding figure of Mexican folk-Catholicism, she is today regarded especially as the guardian of the 'simple folks,' and is called upon for assistance in illness, as in all needs little and great. Further, the Virgencita ('Little Virgin') is guardian and protector of the capital, the country, and Latin America. (Kirsten Holzapfel) peregrinatio ad loca sancta (Lat., 'pilgrimage to the holy places') stands metonymically for the human being's lifelong vita peregrina ('pilgrim life'). After all, he and she are "as an alien in the land," the land of earth: homo viator ('the human being [as] itinerant').

4. Religious mobility is therefore developed by way of a cultural sacralization and application in steady performance, and in this way is bounded off from profane mobility, which in many ways takes place on one and the same 'route'—in the adjacency of a mixture of functions: merchant, beggar, medieval wandering scholar, spy, tourist—on the same cobblestones, side by side with the 'pious pilgrim.' When the geography of the sacred places is only semantically fixed, by way of hagiography, and precipitates in a network of routes, then migration for reason of poverty, trade routes, secularized curiosity, education in travel, and so on, can all flow into this 'container' as adoption of sacred mobility from below. The normative determinations of the style in which a correct pilgrimage is made, therefore, together with the extensive literature on abuse, define (1) a symbolical motion to sacred places, and (2) the conditioning of bodies. Both in the history of words, then, as well as in that of function, various historical successes and failures are to be observed in the differentiation of 'traveler' versus 'pilgrim,' when—above and beyond pilgrim's attire, pilgrim 'notes' or characteristics, pilgrim law, pilgrimage leader, pilgrim churches and hospices—the umbrella meanings are gradually constituted, such as pilgrim space, pilgrim route, and pilgrim body.

Thus, only after the middle of the eleventh century was peregrinus used no longer only for 'foreigner' or 'traveler,' but also for 'pilgrim.' As early as the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the distinction once more eroded, when the Rituale Romanum revised the benediction formula from that of the peregrinus to that of the viator ('traveler'), and when the early modern territorial states, in the wake of new controls on mobility, expressed prohibitions of certain attire, therewith labeling all pilgrims 'travelers.' The symbolical inventory of the 'correct pilgrimage' therefore contains extensive → rites of passage from the profane body to the pilgrim body: departure from the home communitas, the blessing of pilgrims, the drawing up of a will, the donning of the pilgrim's attire, rites of incorporation into the new, temporary communitas, group training with demonstrative and liturgical programs, collective prayer and song, an asceticism of nourishment by way of the rationing of food in the hospices, sexual asceticism, an asceticism of comfort in the labores peregrinationis, devotion instead of sightseeing and curiosity, 'marching' instead of 'hiking.'

On the other side, outlandish punishments, time limits on stays in the hospices, dating of certificates of group, mobility control of the entry areas of pilgrimage streets by way of a corridor, etc., were indicators that documented a constant concern to protect sacred mobility from diffusion in profane mobility. The corresponding obligation of the practitioners to love of neighbor, the routine intention of extracting the pilgrims from the money economy and inserting them into an alms-supported 'gift' economy, make it clear that the motto pauper et peregrinus (Lat., 'poor and pilgrim') can institutionalize massive religious interclass mobility, and has succeeded in leaving its mark down to our very day.

1. Hassauer 1993, 59; programmatically, here and following, pp. 57-139; cf. also Hassauer 1987.
2. "Prière debout, prière marchée" (Fr., "Prayer standing, prayer walking"), Dupront 1973.
3. Kötting 1950.
4. Non Hierosolymam vidisse, sed Hierosolymis bene vixisse laudandum est (cited again in ecclesiastical law: Decretum Gratiani [Lat., "Decree of Gratian"], caus. XII, q. 11, c. 71)
5. De Imitatione Christi, 1, 23: Qui multum peregrinantur, raro sanctificantur.

Literature

Bade, Klaus, Kontinent in Bewegung. Europa und die Migration im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, Munich 2000; Badone, Ellen/Roseman, Sharon R. (eds.), Intersecting Journeys: The Anthropology of Pilgrimage and Tourism, Urbana 2004; Bouldrey, Brian (ed.), Traveling Souls: Contemporary Pilgrimage Stories, San Francisco 1999; Coleman, Simon/Eade, John (eds.), Reframing Pilgrimage: Cultures in Motion, London 2004; Davidson, Linda Kay/Gitlitz, David M., Pilgrimage: From the Ganges to Graceland: An Encyclopedia, 2 vols., Santa Barbara 2002; Dupront, Alphonse, "Pèlerinages et lieux sacrés," in: Mélanges en l'honneur de Fernand Braudel, vol. II, 1973, 189-206; Finucane, Ronald C., Miracles and Pilgrims: Popular Beliefs in Medieval England, Toronto 1977; Hassauer, Friederike, "Volkssprachliche Reiseliteratur: Faszination des Reisens und räumlicher ordo," in: Gumbrecht, Hans Ulrich et al. (eds.), Grundriß der romanischen Literaturen des Mittelalters, vol. 11/1, Heidelberg 1987, 259-283; Eadem, Santiago – Schrift. Körper. Raum. Reise, Munich 1993; Jackson, Bernard, Places of Pilgrimage, London 1989; Kötting, Bernhard, Peregrinatio religiosa. Wallfahrten in der Antike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche, Münster 1950; Labande, Edmond-René, Spiritualité et vie littéraire de l'Occident, X^e–XIV^e siècle, London 1974; Idem, "Pauper et peregrinus. Les problèmes du pèlerin chrétien d'après quelques travaux récents," in: Kriss-Rettenbeck, Lenz/Möhler, Gerda (eds.), Wallfahrt kennt keine Grenzen (catalogue), Munich 1984, 23-32; McKay, Alex (ed.), Pilgrimage in Tibet, Leiden/Richmond 1998; Statler, Oliver, Japanese Pilgrimage, New York 1983; Sumption, Jonathan, The Age of Pilgrimage: The Medieval Journey to God, Mahwah 2003; Swatos, Jr., William H./Tomasi, Luigi (eds.), From Medieval Pilgrimage to Religious Tourism: The Social and Cultural Economics of Piety, Westport 2002; Turner, Victor/Turner, Edith, Image and Pilgrimage in Christian Culture: Anthropological Perspectives, New York 1978; Webb, Diana, Medieval European Pilgrimage, c. 700–c. 1500, Basingstoke 2002; Wolfe, Michael (ed.), One Thousand Roads to Mecca: Ten Centuries of Travelers Writing about the Muslim Pilgrimage, New York 1997.

→ Mecca, Orientation, Procession, Road/Path/Journey, Santiago de Compostela, Tourism

Friederike Hassauer

Place, Sacred

Sacred places are holy places remarkable for their special disposition, or for a → memory connected to a particular place, where religious rites are performed. Scholarly dispute concerning their actual function notwithstanding, the oldest places of worship can be dated back to the Old Stone Age (→ Cave). The stone settings of the megalith cultures that began in Europe at the end of the New Stone Age (from 3000–2000 BCE), and to a certain extent lasted to the middle of the Bronze Age (1500 BCE), are likewise to be interpreted as sacred places, although their exact meaning is uncertain (→ Pre- and Early History). From the eras that followed, places of sacrifice are multiply attested. In many religions, permanent architecture serves for the practice of cult, such as temple, mosques, or churches (→ Architecture [Sacred]). Frequently, older sacred places are taken over by recent religions and reinterpreted. In today's non-institutionalized, churchless religion (e.g., in the context of → New Age), new rites are once more practiced at old sacred places (→ Celts; Druids), or presumed old sacred places, although the rites and their interpretation, despite frequently claimed continuity of cult, originate almost exclusively in today's spirituality.

→ Architecture (Sacred), Celts, Druids, Power, Pre- and Early History, Teutons

Jürgen Wolf

Platonism

Concept

1. The world of thought, the maxims and teachings, the myths, and the concepts of the Greek philosopher Plato and his school are among the most influential traditions of European thought. 'Platonism' rested not only on an astonishing ancient continuity of doctrine—the Platonic Academy lasted a good nine hundred years, until 529 CE—it also influenced, just as did → Aristotelianism, the philosophical formation of theory until well into modern times. From the viewpoint of religious history, Platonism was effective in a twofold manner. Over the course of time, in late antiquity and in the Renaissance, it was transformed into an esoteric theology and → intellectual religion, and has been appealed to by religious movements down to the present (→ Esotericism). Of equal importance with this 'religious Platonism' is the influence exercised by the Platonic store of thought on the religious theologies of late- and post-ancient religions, especially on those that had directly received the ancient Greek philosophy by way of Hellenism, and thus on the Christian and Islamic cultural area. In addition, in modernity, thinkers of Asian religions, such as Sri Aurobindo, have adopted Plato.

Point of Departure: Plato

2. Three works of the philosopher Plato (d. c. 347 BCE), who came from the Athenian aristocracy and was a pupil of the famous Socrates, are central for his reception in the area of religion: the Symposium (in Gk., sympósion, 'banquet'), the outline of the state in the Politeia (and the Theatetus), and the cosmological and utopian speculations of the Timaeus.

(1) The Symposium is a dialogue on the essence of Eros, which leads to the narrowed concept of "Platonic love" by way of its reception in the Renaissance.

(2) The Republic deals with the question of the ideal state, which culminates in the totalitarian vision of a 'guardian state,' and is adopted in later utopian states (→ Atlantis; Utopia). Important for its religious reception, besides the Platonic teaching on the soul, is the doctrine of Ideas, illustrated in the Allegory of the Cave:[1] the things of the world are only copies or images of eternal, immaterial 'ideas' (in Gk., idéai or eídê), which present the essentially real. Human beings perceive only the copies—the images, as if they sat in a cave, with their backs to the exit—i.e. the shadows of things, projected on the wall of the cave by light from outside. Only by philosophical striving (érôs, love, in the broadest sense) can the immaterial exemplars of things be perceived, step-by-step, up the series of rungs of reality.

(3) The dialogue Timaeus contains a cosmogony that was received by nearly all representatives of religious Platonism. The thought that a demiurge (Gk. for 'sculptor,' 'artisan') has created the world as an—imperfect—image of the sphere of the Ideas is ancient and influential. The Gnostics, especially, saw in it the instance of utter wickedness, master of evil matter (→ Gnosticism). As 'mediator' between the incorporeal world of the Ideas and visible things, the Demiurge will have created the 'world soul' in particular. By way of the Neoplatonists, and, above all, through the Gnosis, the cosmogony of the Timaeus became a solid component of Christian and Islamic Platonism, especially in the case of 'heretical' currents of these religions.

Middle- and Neoplatonism

3. In late antiquity, under the influence of gnosis and of Christian and Jewish theology, as well as by way of an appeal to the early Greek Orphic and mystery theology, Platonism became a syncretistic new system of belief, and stronger than before. Philosophers Plotinus (205–270) and Porphyry (c. 234–305) introduced meditative techniques, such as 'concentration ecstasy,' in order to unite with the supreme principle of their philosophical theory; thereby they stand at the inauguration of European → mysticism (→ Gnosticism; Hermetism/Hermeticism). With Porphyry, asceticism played an important role. Within the Syrian school under Iamblichus (c. 250–330) magic and practices like 'god-constraints' (theurgíai) found entry. Iamblichus also developed a sophisticated pantheon.

The first and most important representative of 'Neoplatonism,' Plotinus, taught a hierarchy of being, from the immaterial 'utterly one' (in Gk., to hen), to the 'spirit' (nous), to souls, and further steps down to the world of the bodily, the material. The lower steps and principles of being had come into existence through an 'effluence' or 'emanation' (in Lat., emanatio) or 'precipitation' (in Gk., hypóstasis; the image is that of a saturated release) from each higher level—without loss of substance, however. This thought was taken up by Christian gnosis and is a key component of Islamic gnosis and modern receptions of gnosticism.

The Christian Church Fathers, as well, represented strongly Platonic conceptualizations: → Augustine, for example, who read Plato with the eyes of the Neoplatonists, applied the Platonic doctrine of the Ideas for his descriptions of the attributes of God, and placed God as the Summum Bonum (Lat., 'Supreme Good'), likewise parallel to the idea of the Good that Plato had placed in the highest position. Nevertheless, Augustine remained faithful to the Christian conception of a personal God.

Middle Ages and Renaissance

3. In Augustine's tradition, the Christian Middle Ages are marked by the Platonic concept of transcendence. Thus, Platonic elements are found, especially in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, with Anselm of Canterbury, Bonaventure, Thomas Aquinas, and → Meister Eckhart (medieval Platonism). In the confrontation with Islam, Aristotle's logic, beginning in the twelfth century, was developed into a methodology, in order to systematize this originally Platonic theology (→ Aristotelianism).

The rediscovery of Plato and the Neoplatonists, however, finally occurs only in the → Renaissance. By 1463, Florentine bishop Marsilio Ficino (1433–1499) translated into Latin the entire work of Plato as then known. His commentary on the Symposium sketches an ethics of (friendly) attraction and coins the concept of 'Platonic love.' Ficino's Theologia Platonica sketches a teaching on the soul in terms of Christian Platonism and takes up Platonic motifs such as the direction of the affects by the rational faculty; Christian notions (immortality of the soul) enrich the same motifs. At the newly founded (1459) Platonic Academy in Florence (which was, however, not a full-blown 'Academy'), Plato was celebrated and venerated like a Christian saint. Nicholas of Cusa (1401–1464) took up especially the thoughts on the philosophy of nature of the Timaeus, as well as that of the Neoplatonists; both elements were further developed by Giordano Bruno (1548–1600), by whose example the conflict between scholastic theology of an Aristotelian stamp and the mainly Platonically-oriented Renaissance philosophy is also evinced. Renaissance art likewise took up Platonism creatively.

Islamic Platonism

4. After Aristotle, who is called in Arabic simply al-Faylasūf ('the Philosopher'), Plato is the most important philosophical authority of the non-Arab tradition. To be sure, Islamic Platonism, as well, at first relies on mostly Hellenistic paraphrases of and commentaries on Plato, as well as on numerous non-canonical writings (apocrypha) that are no longer extant today in the Greek original. In the cultural centers of the Near East, beginning with the time of the Abbasids, schools of translators and philosophers formed, as whose best known representatives can be reckoned, for example translator al-Kindī (d. c. 870), and later, philosopher al-Farābī (d. 950). Al-Farābī can be counted the first important Islamic Platonist, who undertook the attempt to reconcile Platonism and Aristotelianism. Neoplatonic intellectual material penetrated Islamic philosophy especially through its reception of Aristotle (the Neoplatonic commentaries on Aristotle, for instance those of Porphyry, played an important role here). A well-known representative for this is Ibn Sīnā (Avicenna, d. 1037); but Plato himself—received mainly through the glasses of Neoplatonism—became significant for numerous schools of philosophy, for example that of the Ihwan as-Safa ("Brothers of Integrity") in the Baghdad of the tenth century, and for the Islamic gnosis (Suhrawardi).

The religion of the Druses, which developed at the end of the tenth century out of a Shia heresy, and whose followers live predominantly in Lebanon, England, and the United States, transports strongly Neoplatonic gnostic thought: here the Neoplatonic hierarchy of being has its parallels with the organizational levels in the hierarchy of religious authority (including God). The famous Ismailite grouping known as the Assassins, arising in the eleventh century (the leader of a succeeding organization is the Aga Khan) was strongly inspired by Neoplatonic and gnostic elements. As in the Christian reception, by representatives of the occult sciences promptly adopted Plato (→ Hermetism/Hermeticism). In → mysticism, as well, Platonism finds entry through the Neoplatonic chain of tradition, for example with Spanish mystic Ibn al-'Arabī (1165–1240). The question of the insān al-kāmil (Ar., 'perfect human being') engaged other Muslim 'humanists' beginning in the tenth century.

Modernity: Criticism of Religion

5. In the modern age, (Evangelical) Christian theology once more adopts explicitly Platonic motifs. The 'Cambridge Platonism' of the seventeenth century, to which, among others, Henry More (1614–1687) and Ralph Cudworth (1617–1688) belong, originally regarded itself as a counter-movement to the materialism of Thomas Hobbes and to the dogmatism of Puritanical Calvinism. With Shaftesbury, it takes on characteristics of an art religion or aestheticism—as it already had done in the Renaissance—and its effects are still felt in A. N. Whitehead (1861–1947). Common to all of these Christian forms of Platonism, however, is the fact that Plato is understood less as a philosopher than as a proto-Christian, whose doctrine of the Ideas, together with the notion of the Good in the highest position, anticipates Christian monotheism. Friedrich → Nietzsche has this theological 'Christianization' of Plato in mind when he calls Christianity, in the framework of his criticism of religion, "Platonism for the people":[2] the actual philosophical thoughts of Plato have entirely eluded Christian theologians in their eagerness to find a pre-Christian monotheism, and the doctrine the Ideas is 'vulgarly' understood as a teaching on transcendence.

Platonism in the Twentieth Century

6. In the twentieth century, Platonism is indeed received unusually broadly; but the margins become blurred. In the nineteenth century, Plato's reception on the part of Søren Kierkegaard went behind Plato to Socrates, who was interpreted dualistically, so that the monists around Ernst Haeckel and Wilhelm Ostwald received Neoplatonic notions. Strongly influenced by monistic Neoplatonism as well is Rudolf Steiner's (1861–1925) Anthroposophy (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). Steiner's point of departure is that human beings of today are alienated from themselves, because they no longer perceive themselves holistically (→ Wholeness/Holism).[3] The human being has not only a physical, but also an ethereal and astral body, which latter exists beyond birth and death, and through an understanding of which the human being can become one with the cosmos. A Neoplatonically inspired step from the physical (material) through the ethereal (of fine matter) to the astral (immaterial) → body, that of the 'Idea,' and from there to unification with the one universe is striking. The Platonic influence becomes clearest in Steiner's doctrine of the 'eurhythmy': the human being responds to the rhythm of the blood, becoming an instrument, creating an outward copy of the 'original image' (of an Idea, then) through the 'expressive gesture,' and thereby bringing to expression the relationship of the human being to the world. Steiner understands art, with a reference to Goethe, as a kind of knowledge. This concept is unthinkable without the Platonic doctrine of the Ideas and the Allegory of the Cave, but it composes the 'Ideas' ('original images') once more in a oneness of the cosmos, the latter being available to experience in 'supra-sensory knowledge' of the true self, which is a part of this oneness. The concept accordingly takes its place among the monistic designs inspired by Neoplatonism.

1. Plato, Politeia, book 4, init. (514a-518b).
2. Nietzsche, Friedrich, Jenseits von Gut und Böse: Vorrede, 1885.
3. Steiner, Rudolf, Die Philosophie, Kosmologie und Religion in der Anthroposophie, Dornach 1980.

Literature

Alexandrakis, Aphrodite (ed.), Neoplatonism and Western Aesthetics, Albany 2002; Allen, Michael J. B., Synoptic Art: Marsilio Ficino on the History of Platonic Interpretation, Florence 1998; Allen, Michael J. B./Rees, Valery (eds.), Marsilio Ficino: His Theology, His Philosophy, His Legacy, Leiden 2002; Beierwaltes, Werner, Denken des Einen. Studien zur neuplatonischen Philosophie und ihrer Wirkung, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Berchman, Robert M., From Philo to Origen: Middle Platonism in Transition, Chico 1984; Dillon, John, The Middle Platonists: A Study of Platonism, 80 B.C. to A.D. 220, London 1977; Idem, The Golden Chain: Studies in the Development of Platonism and Christianity, Aldershot 1990; Idem, The Great Tradition: Further Studies in the Development of Platonism and Early Christianity, Aldershot 1997; Idem, The Heirs of Plato: A Study of the Old Academy (347–274 BC), Oxford 2003; Feibleman, James K., Religious Platonism: The Influence of Religion on Plato and the Influence of Plato on Religion, London 1959; Findlay, John N., Plato and Platonism: An Introduction, New York 1978; Goodman, Lenn E. (ed.), Neoplatonism and Jewish Thought, Albany 1992; Gregorios, Paulos Mar (ed.), Neoplatonism and Indian Philosophy, Albany 2002; Hankins, James, Plato in the Italian Renaissance, 2 vols., Leiden 1990; Idem, Humanism and Platonism in the Italian Renaissance, 2 vols., Rome 2003–2004; Harris, R. Baine (ed.), Neoplatonism and Contemporary Thought, Albany 2002; Kobusch, Theo/Mojsisch, Burkhard (eds.), Platon in der abendländischen Geistesgeschichte. Neue Forschungen zum Platonismus, Darmstadt 1997; Morewedge, Parviz (ed.), Neoplatonism and Islamic Thought, Albany 1992; Rappe, Sara, Reading Neoplatonism: Non-Discursive Thinking in the Texts of Plotinus, Proclus, and Damascius, Cambridge 2000; Rogers, Graham A. J. et al. (eds.), The Cambridge Platonists in Philosophical Context: Politics, Metaphysics, and Religion, Dordrecht 1997; Schlette, Heinz Robert, Weltseele. Geschichte und Hermeneutik, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Walker, D. P., The Ancient Theology: Studies in Christian Platonism from the Fifteenth to the Eighteenth Century, Ithaca 1972.

→ Antiquity, Aristotelianism, Atlantis, Augustine, Esotericism, Gnosticism, Heresy, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Islam, Kabbalah, Late Antiquity, Mysticism, Renaissance, Utopia

Agnes Imhof

Pluralism

Relativism or Conformism

1. Immanuel Kant, following Christian Wolff, offers the first definition of 'pluralism' worthy of discussion: by contrast with the 'egoist,' the 'citizen of the world' tests his judgments and his practical goals against the judgments and goals of other persons. Kant is thus a 'pluralist.' But he cannot show what protects these pluralists or this pluralism from becoming either a reservoir of chronic hesitators, waverers, and relativists, or else developing into a collective conformism through an increasing joining together into each other's judgments and goals. The pluralistic cultures and societies of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, on the other hand, have developed complex structures, which offer a solution for these problems. Thus, they adopt various historical, cultural, and societal developments (Schwöbel), which differentiate, in themselves and mutually, their respective guises of knowledge, norms, forms of communication, and institutions, but no longer order them in a simple hierarchy. Various multi-hierarchical coinages are developed—from ecclesial life, theological (Lehmann, Mehlhausen, Tracy, Welker) and religious life (Hick, Knitter, Ogden, Rouner), from the moral life (Kekes, Rescher) and that of the 'worldview' (Herms, James), from the political and legal life (Galtung, Hollerbach, Preuss), from the scientific life (Diemer, Hampe, Spinner)—and finally called 'pluralistic.'

Community and Communities

2. Pluralism consists of a complex, but clear, form of social, cultural, and religious coexistence. True, pluralism is still repeatedly confused with a certain vague 'multiplicity,' a 'diversity,' a 'plurality,' or a 'pluralization,' to which persons may ultimately react only with diffuse enthusiasm, or diffuse fears and defensive attitudes. Just as misleading as the confusion of pluralism with sheer plurality is the identification of pluralism with individualism. Although pluralism certainly supports individualism, it is nevertheless a configuration of community forms. In → North America, where the multiplicity of cultures and religions is taken for granted, in the 1970s the level of recognition and acknowledgment was reached in which—still somewhat oversimplifying—a 'community of communities' was spoken of. To put it more exactly, pluralism necessitates a point of departure in a multiplicity of cultural, social, religious, or other groupings, each with its own history, its own norms and evidences, but likewise with a capability of developing, in various degrees, common goals, common value concepts, and so on. Relative communalities and relative differences among institutional and normative forms are indispensable in pluralism.

At the same time, pluralism necessitates an inquiry into mentalities and forms that not only mediate among these organizational forms, communities, orderings, institutions, and illustrations, but also maintain and reinforce their difference and individuality. Not simply the taming of selfishness (Jüngel), not simply integration and unification, but the maintenance of differences, the mediation and simultaneous cultivation of difference of forms—this is what composes pluralism. In order to create and to maintain the complicated 'power cycles' of pluralism (Habermas), two different forms of 'variety' and their interplay are necessary, as becomes clearly recognizable on the level of societies:

Civil Society and Differentiation of Systems

a) Sociologists call one form of variety 'associations.' The overall connection of associations—to the extent that they affect the other 'variety'—is also designated today, in sociology and the cultural sciences, 'civil society' (Gramsci, Habermas). Here it is a matter of alliances of persons for determinate ends, with determinate goals, with determinate ethics, with determinate value conceptions. These associations extend from spontaneous citizens' initiatives to parties and well-organized interest alliances. These associations come into existence, alter, and go out of existence with the interests, the ethics, the value conceptions, and the goals of their members (→ Charitable Organizations).

Institutions of the 'Part-System'

b) The other 'variety' is more stable. It consists of institutions and systematic forms that gain their stability on the societal level by reason of the fact that they perceive indispensable basic functions for the whole of society. Politics, the economy, education, the legal system, the religious system are forms that were also called "differentiated part-systems of society." Many sociologists have recognized, instead, a small role for the associations vis-à-vis the part-systems (such as Luhmann against Habermas). It is characteristic of pluralistic societies and cultures that this plurality of part-systems cannot be ordered according to a simple hierarchy. For educators, education may be most important; for politicians, politics; for theologians, religion; for jurists, law; and so on. But one cannot be replaced by another or permanently preferred to another. Rather, as soon as a particular part-system becomes all too dominant, pluralistic societies react with uneasiness and counter-directions.

Dynamics of Systematic Forms

For the pluralistic culture, it is indispensable that the difference among the part-systems, the difference among the associations, and the differentiation of these two forms, be maintained, cultivated, and constantly renewed. Societal pluralism limits human power in its interference in societal reality and its shape and form. At the same time, it boosts power within the bounds of the systems, inasmuch as the systems shield themselves from considerations and interferences with other indispensable tasks in the maintenance of the common life, by promoting specializations and professionalizations (→ Specialists [religious]). Simultaneously, system-differentiation stimulates the development of associations that aim partly at maintenance and stabilization, partly on the destabilization and alteration of the systematic forms: parties seek to promote or correct prevailing policies; citizens' initiatives work on the legal system or on social mechanisms and pressures; parents' groups and academic associations acquire preservative or critical influence on the educational system. While associations of civil societies can render the boundaries between systems problematic, they must be intent on their solidification. The tensions bound up with them are often felt painfully.

Dangers of Pluralism

3. The high importance of a complicated pluralism, the highly developed, but also endangered form of coexistence in freedom that it offers, is recognizable precisely vis-à-vis its actual or looming destruction. An especially striking annihilation of an emerging pluralistic communality was experienced in Germany at the end of the 1920s and beginning of the 1930s. It began with populist movements that drowned out or absorbed the differences in the associations of civil society. But if the differences in civil society are leveled out through comprehensive populist movements, the systematic differences (in politics, law, religion, education, and so on) are in danger of being themselves 'brought into line.' With irresistible force, such a movement soon monopolizes most societal systems of function across the board. Mass media and politics are the first to succumb, since they themselves, in pluralism, are absolutely dependent on echo and resonance. Through politics and the mass media, the influence of the great populist movement becomes authentic and genuine power. The 'getting into line' (Gleichschaltung, as Fascism expressly formulated it) of the economy and the educational system is then only a question of time. Nor does even the legal system or religion manage to keep immune from this development. Unfortunately, the history of Germany in the twentieth century teaches this lesson twice.

The inner composition of pluralism is not only in danger of being rolled up into balls by populism, through a relentless dictatorship of the majority, or by other totalitarian developments. It can also be unhinged and wrecked by an epidemic of selfishness and egotism, or paled and obliterated in the grey of conformism. Hannah Arendt has described the danger of a mass society destroying the powers and vitality of social groups, and thus their potentials for freedom (→ Masses). Her point of departure is that, in a society of masses and the mass → media, the public political area will be slowly eroded and effaced (but see also Berger, Rescher). An interplay of administration, method, and self-entrenchment then replaces the living shaping of common life by citizens—free, and politically and culturally mature.

In a broader perspective, Jürgen Habermas sees an endangerment to the strength of the associations of civil society and thereby to pluralism. He uses the name 'system-paternalism' for the danger that the societal part-systems would absorb, intimidate, paralyze, and incapacitate the associations. He warns against releasing the function-systems from their instrumental role, and offering 'societal discourses' on 'administration' as a coalescence of function-systems and free associations ('supervision state'), or even merely to wish to do so. In multiple fashions, the strength of pluralism in terms of civil society is weakened, not so much by intimidation and direct impediments, as by monopolization and compression through the function systems. At our present turn of the century, the mighty connection of market, technology, and electronic mass media threatens to destroy the strength of civil society. The media force some themes and repress others; they engender illusions of public communication and persons' participation. In so doing, they interfere massively in public space. Doubtless they stimulate plurality, and forms of individualism. But they threaten pluralism as a demanding and sophisticated form of human coexistence. It remains to be seen whether and how pluralism may be able to tame the 'system-paternalism' of the media.

Literature

Arendt, Hanna, The Human Condition, Garden City 1959; Berger, Peter/Luckmann, Thomas, Modernität, Pluralismus und Sinnkrise, Gütersloh 1995; Gramsci, Antonio, Prison Letters, London 1996; Habermas, Jürgen, Die neue Unübersichtlichkeit, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Idem, The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society, Cambridge 1989; Idem, Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy, Cambridge 1996; Hick, John, Problems of Religious Pluralism, London 1985; Hick, John/Knitter, Paul (eds.), The Myth of Christian Uniqueness: Toward a Pluralistic Theology of Religion, Maryknoll 1987; James, William, A Pluralistic Universe, New York 1909; Kant, Immanuel, Reflexion zur Metaphysik 5398 (Akademie-Ausgabe 18, 171); Idem, Reflexion zur Anthropologie 903 (Akademie-Ausgabe 15, 395); Kekes, John, The Morality of Pluralism, Princeton 1993; Knitter, Paul, "Dialogue and Liberation: Foundations for a Pluralist Theology of Religions," in: Drew Gateway 58 (1988), 1-48; Lonergan, Bernard, Doctrinal Pluralism, Milwaukee 1971; Luhmann, Niklas, Ökologische Kommunikation. Kann die moderne Gesellschaft sich auf ökologische Gefährdungen einstellen?, Opladen 1986; Mehlhausen, Joachim (ed.), Pluralismus und Identität, Gütersloh 1995; Ogden, Schubert, "Problems in the Case for a Pluralistic Theology of Religion," in: Journal of Religion 68 (1988), 493-507; Rescher, Nicholas, Pluralism: Against the Demand for Consensus, Oxford 1993; Rouner, Leroy, Religious Pluralism, Notre Dame 1984; Tracy, David, Blessed Rage for Order: The New Pluralism in Theology, New York 1975; Idem, The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism, New York 1981; Idem, Plurality and Ambiguity, San Francisco 1987; Welker, Michael, Kirche im Pluralismus, Gütersloh [2]2000.

→ Conflict/Violence, Constitution, Democracy, European History of Religion, Group (Religious), Modernity/Modern Age, North America, Polytheism, Science, Secularization

Michael Welker

Polemics

Polemics and Apologetics

1. There is a rhetorical 'attack strategy' for quarreling: polemics (Gk., polemiké téchne), identified by irrelevantly aggressive, but overpoweringly argumentational, discourse. Its intent is the annihilation of the opponent's position, or even of his or her person. Thus, its address is to an audience that offers evaluation, but that can be fictitious, as well. The corresponding counterpart is apologetics (from Gk., apologetikós, '[discursively] defending'), as a technique of reacting to polemics defensively and in an attempt at justification. Together, both forms issue in a fluctuation in many ways, in which attacker and defender are no longer distinguishable.

Formation of Identity by Way of Situations of Apologetics and Polemics

2. Polemics is not limited to the religious area, but does take a key position there. Accordingly, the spectrum of themes and occasions is a broad one. For example, ritual differences, such as the seemingly secondary question of what clothing monks should wear, led, in the twelfth century, to very virulent controversies between black and white Benedictines. But the Christian edifice of dogma as well—and especially the necessity of a closed canon of teachings—has arisen from apologetical-polemical situations. The need for an attempt at justification vis-à-vis state and society, confrontation with Christian 'deviators,' and aggressive closing off from foreign religions—similarly through external defense and internal stabilization—has contributed to the formation of Christian groups' identities.

Polemics and Propaganda

The medieval confrontations between Pope and Emperor are among the climaxes of polemics in history: they led to reciprocal reproaches that have endured to our very day: Pope Gregory XI or Emperor Frederick II was the → Antichrist. According to a thesis of C. Erdmann, the first state propaganda arose in reaction to papal assaults, and this precisely in the year 1076, as Henry IV, in a skillfully stylized polemical writing, countered Gregory VII's threat of excommunication.

3. Religious polemics has survived in the linguistic usage of → science and the press down to our own day. Stigmatizing expressions like → superstition, → heathen, → heresy, anti-pope, → magic, and → animism are used to discredit various religions by appealing to negative 'heterostereotypes' (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes).

Literature

Cancik, Hubert, "Apologetik/Polemik," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 29-37; Hettema, T. L./van der Kooij, A. (eds.), Religious Polemics in Context, Assen 2004.

→ Anti-Semitism, Conflict/Violence, Group (Religious), Heresy, Pluralism, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Theology

Achim Hack

Political Religion

The concept 'political religion' (in Fr., religion politique; religion séculière, Fr., 'secular religion') is used to denote totalitarian systems of the twentieth century, such as → National Socialism, Stalinism, and Maoism (→ Mao [Cult of]), under the viewpoint of a union of church and state, a condition so pregnant with consequences. It was political scientist and philosopher Eric Voegelin who offered the first systematic treatment of the theme, against the background of a strengthening National Socialism in 1938, with his essay, Die politischen Religionen (Ger., "The Political Religions"). In political religion, he saw a process typical of the modern age: the relocation of transcendent Christian salvation into world and history (→ Secularization). The separation of the secular and spiritual areas, harking back ultimately to → Augustine, with the help of a Christian anthropology, had rendered it possible to relate the two disparate quantities, Voegelin held. Thomas Hobbes, he said, had surrendered this relationship-in-distinction, to the advantage of an identity of the worldly governmental area and the Church, and consequently described the pattern of totalitarian systems. A few years before Voegelin's publication, the relationship of religion and state, discussed ever and again since antiquity, had become the object of a renewed confrontation, carried on mainly between state juristic scholar Carl Schmitt and theologian Erik Peterson. Peterson, on theological grounds, rejected the political theology that Schmitt had drafted as a legitimization of state sovereignty. Schmitt's concept of political theology is to be distinguished from J. B. Metz's 'new political theology'—appearing from the end of the 1960s—which had been influenced by Latin American → liberation theology, and at whose midpoint, in the sense of a social criticism institutionalized in the form of the Church, stands the Christian proclamation. Only since the 1970s has the (by now clearly perceived) religious aspect of the totalitarian systems shifted to the foreground even of research in totalitarianism. With a point of departure in parallels between political speech and presentation, on the one side, and religious speech or religious cult on the other, totalitarian regimes have now been conceptualized, in the approach taken under this theory, as 'inner-worldly religions.' For the purpose of a legitimization of their government, these totalitarian regimes, in the form of 'inner-worldly religions,' relate to absolute values, and propagate religious-seeming Weltanschauungen. (Religious speech and cult are interesting and productive for analysis on the example of the Nuremberg Reich's Party Day.)

The point of departure for this typological model of political religions, by Juan Linz, is the situation of a friendly separation of church and state, here adopted as desirable. At one end of the open circular bow are the political religions, earmarked, through monopolization of religion by the state, as a binding system of belief for the totality of a state's citizens (state religion). At the other end appears the → theocracy—a religion that has become political, in whose ideal type religious superiors are also the political leaders (→ Iran). The near connection of the two ends indicates that their differentiation as extremes is only an analytical one, and is not automatically maintained in an application to a concrete historical case. (After Linz, Juan, "Politik und Religion," in: Maier 1996)

Literature

Berghoff, Peter, Der Tod des politischen Kollektivs. Politische Religion und das Sterben und Töten für Volk, Nation und Rasse, Berlin 1997; Cristi, Marcela, From Civil to Political Religion: The Intersection of Culture, Religion and Politics, Waterloo 2001; Faber, Richard (ed.), Politische Religion—religiöse Politik, Würzburg 1997; Lübbe, Hermann (ed.), Heilserwartung und Terror. Politische Religionen des 20. Jahrhunderts, Düsseldorf 1995; Maier, Hans (ed.), "Totalitarismus" und "politische Religion". Konzepte des Diktaturvergleichs, Paderborn 1996; Siebert, Rudolf J., The Critical Theory of Religion, the Frankfurt School: From Universal Pragmatic to Political Theology, Berlin etc. 1985; Taubes, Jacob (ed.), Religionstheorie und politische Theologie, 3 vols., Munich 1984; Voegelin, Eric, Die politischen Religionen, Vienna 1938 (Engl. trans. in Idem, Modernity without Restraint, ed. by Manfred Henningsen, Columbia 2000).

→ Civil Religion, Democracy, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Mao (Cult of), National Socialism, Secularization

Georg Hartmann

Polytheism

Modern Discovery of Polytheism

1. In a letter to Jacobi of January 6, 1813,[1] Goethe states that as poet and artist he is a polytheist, as a natural scientist he is a pantheist, and as a moral person he is a Christian. With this sovereign religious self-classification, Goethe has allocated a relative, and at the same time positive, evaluation to the theologically negatively composed concept of "polytheism." And there is more: to maintain that one can be at once a monotheist and a polytheist, and both of these so emphatically, marks a new phase in → European history of religion. A few years earlier, in the "system program [Systemprogramm] of German idealism," the demand had been made for a "monotheism of reason and the heart, [but] a polytheism of imagination and art."[2] Thus, the artist's polytheism of the → Renaissance had been transformed into a 'new religion.' The new evaluation of polytheism was directed against the Christian tradition, in which polytheism represented either a → paganism still in need of mission, or a → heresy meriting condemnation. A religion of many gods, idolatry, and service to nature are the polemical concepts under which the non-monotheistic religions are gathered and soteriologically excluded. "The essence of polytheism, or of the veneration of a plurality of divine powers instead of the one true God, rests on the nature-imprisonment of humanity's religious sense and behavior, which are degenerate on account of sin," was still theologically defined at the beginning of the twentieth century.[3] With the transition from the eighteenth to the nineteenth century, granted, within the radius of the Pre-Enlightenment and → Romanticism, positions outside theology had already been represented that sought to take polytheism seriously as a historical phenomenon. Nor was this done only in a framework of developmental theories of religion (→ Evolutionism), in which polytheism constituted a necessary stepping-stone to → monotheism (D. Hume); it was also the mounting of an attempt to determine the autonomy, and intrinsic value, of the polytheism of foreign religions. A development of the fundamental phenomenon of 'polytheism' in terms of religious studies came about, despite all, only very late: the colonial framework of the new → academic study of religion, the debate over a theory of 'primordial monotheism,' nature theology, and dynamism had at first temporarily shifted the view of polytheism as the 'normal case' of theistic religions. Only with the ordering of polytheistic patterns into the dynamic of complex cultures could the program be developed of investigating a 'morphology' and the 'structural peculiarities' of polytheism that did not flow at once into the flat theological alternatives of polytheism and monotheism.

(Ir-)Reconcilability of Monotheism and Polytheism?

2. Against the background of this scientific history, the question arises anew, for religious history, of irreconcilability between monotheism and polytheism. After the anticipation constituted by Akhenaton's (Amenophis IV) monotheism in the Egypt of the fourteenth century BCE, only the Israelite monotheism of the seventh and sixth centuries BCE could permanently hold out against a polytheistic environment. With a point of departure from this special case and its subsequent manifestations in Christianity and Islam theological investigation has reconstituted polytheism and monotheism as fundamental alternatives, and as reciprocally exclusive. Besides this professionalization of religion in the schema of → theology, however, the other religious traditions have opened up to various 'synthetic forms of monotheism and polytheism' and have integrated a 'relative monotheism' (Schelling), a 'henotheism' (F. M. Müller), a 'monolatry' (J. Wellhausen), or 'pluriform monotheism' (van Baaren) into a polytheistic cultic practice, without particular problems. Even in a framework of earlier theoretical considerations, as for example with pre-Socratic Xenophanes, 'one-God incantations'[4] can be heard in a polytheistic frame of reference without logical conflicts. For the preponderant part of Mediterranean religious history, and for most other areas of the earth in terms of religious history, 'concurrent monotheisms' are recognizable in a polytheistic context. Governmental interests, processes of professionalization, or contests of worship generate such monotheistic 'outcroppings' of a primary polytheism, without, indeed, at first shaking the overall system.

Polytheism on the Defensive

3. After the victory of Christianity in the fourth and fifth centuries, relations are radically different for Mediterranean religious history. Polytheism now becomes a religious form, and religious tradition, that seeks to maintain itself, in apologetics and revitalization (→ Renaissance), on diverse levels, against a dominating monotheistic state. A basic pattern of the anti-Christian polemic and 'pagan' apologetics relates to the latent polytheism of early Christianity (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). Its conceptions of angels, as well as its incipient speculation on the Trinity, showed, it was alleged, that Christianity stood closer to polytheism than Christians wished to admit, and, conversely, that the polemicists had monotheistic traditions at their disposal.

Julian the Apostate

The first great attempt at a restoration against Christianity was that of Roman Emperor Flavius Claudius Julianus "Apostata," who reigned 355/361–363, and sought to reintroduce the Hellenistic gods, in a quasi-Neoplatonic framework, as gods of the state. Against the background of his 'enhanced polytheism,' with its Iamblichan orientation, the one-god belief of Christianity is now 'atheism' (Gk., atheótês, 'god-less'). Julian's early death in 363 put a quick end to this attempt at a restoration of polytheism. His successors (Jovian and Valentinian) annulled Julian's religious edicts once for all.

Gemistos Pletho

With the draft of a 'Hellenic theology' at the hands of Gemistos Pletho (c. 1355–1452), in the fifteenth century, on the eve of the Florentine → Renaissance, a new, earnest attempt was launched to restore a Greek polytheism. Pletho drafted a Neoplatonic polytheism as the basis of a reasonable religion and a reasonable state. He planned a polytheistic worship, composed hymns in honor of the gods, and constructed a new calendar. In the turmoil and confusion of the collapsing Byzantine Empire, Pletho's sketch of a philosophical polytheism nearly disappeared, practically without consequences. The only traces are in its effect on Marsilio Ficino, and his conception of an 'ancient theology' (prisca theologia), a tradition of revelation that would connect the pre-Christian and the Christian beyond the boundaries of the religious types (→ Esotericism).

Polytheism and Pluralism

4. Against the background of the history of science and philosophy, on the one hand, and → European history of religion on the other, the questions are posed anew of the historical locus of polytheism and its repressed potentials. As a rule, the relationship between 'insular monotheisms' in a polytheistic environment—and, in reverse, of 'insular polytheisms'—touches the current question of religious → pluralism and the abilities of cultures to tolerate such pluralism. With a view to the outer frameworks of polytheism, the following distinctions can be made: (a) a pluralism of (various) 'one's own gods' in a given area; (b) a pluralism of one's own and of foreign gods; and finally, (c) a pluralism of different dependencies from the one or the many gods. The monotheistic religions have made 'attainment of salvation' and 'redemption' dependent exclusively on the one God, while polytheistic religions represent a 'soteriological pluralism,' or, perhaps, know no soteriology at all.[5] Just so, polytheistic systems usually lack the concepts and institutes of → conversion and → mission.

Polytheistic Connections among the Gods

5. Seen from systematic, historical viewpoints, a 'division of labor' among the gods has developed in the worlds of the polytheistic gods, parallel to the establishment of complex cultures: rule, justice, fertility, military victory, and health can be guaranteed or reproduced by various, fully personalized gods (→ God/Gods/The Sacred). These gods are not thereby limited to their 'functions' but are thought of as autonomous persons, who can enter into relation with one another. The relationships among the gods, in love or enmity, competition and dominance, cooperation or antagonism, offer a complex interpretative and orientative model of 'world,' handed down in myths. Polytheistic gods are always thought of as parts of the world, and thereby 'in the world.' Thus, the myths reported of them offer fundamental models of the rise and condition of the cosmos (cosmologies), of human beings and the gods themselves (anthropologies and theologies). Here, pagan drafts of the modern age are entailed, which oppose the 'this-sidedness' or 'immanence' of the many gods, preferably located in → nature, to the 'far-sidedness' or 'transcendence' of the one God. It belongs to the openness of polytheistic religious schemata that, as a rule, the human being is not dependent on a single god for the totality of her or his life course. Within certain limits, a choice among the gods is to be observed: several gods are reverenced and a different priesthood invoked in the case of each. The immediate connection between pluralism and complexity, which offers a regionalized pantheon, reflects the opportunities of a traditional polytheism of answering new necessities by way of the adoption of new gods. By contrast, processes of professionalization and singularization are a basic alternative, which the monotheisms have triggered: new problems can here be solved only on a meta-level, in the medium of 'theology.' Polytheisms that must assert themselves against a monotheism institutionally supported by 'theology' thereby possess a different quality from that of the primary polytheistic religions: they are not simple revitalizations, but necessarily 'new polytheisms' that set an ordered multiplicity of gods over against a reflecting 'theology.'

'Renaissance' of Polytheism

6. With the religious pluralism that gradually reentered the scene in the Renaissance, and the criticism of religion directed against monotheism in the French → Enlightenment, a 'rediscovery of polytheism' (M. Landmann) begins in European history of religion that was no longer restricted to the field of philosophical speculation. 'Modernity of polytheism' and 'laud of polytheism' were featured in fields of religious discussion that were no longer 'only academic,' but that served new religious orientation. In the German-language area, it was especially Odo Marquard who, beginning in the 1970s, had gathered arguments for a modern 'polymythics' into a plea for an 'enlightened polytheism.' The beginning of the 'modern world' was then defined by the 'end of monotheism,' and 'monomythos,' with its restriction to one identity, was dealt a renunciation. "The margin of freedom for the non-identities, which is missing in monomythy, grants, on the contrary, the polymythic multiplicity of histories. The latter is division of power: it separates the power of history into many histories; and precisely here, [. . .] the human being receives prospects of the freedom of each one to have his and her individual multiplicity."[6] The re-evaluation of the traditional schemata is part of a process, beginning in the philosophical framework, which works in succession into religious space and reflects a 'compensatory interest' in polytheism. Beginning with → Nietzsche, polytheism becomes a medium of criticism of culture and Christianity. "Well-nigh two millennia, and not a single new god!"[7] Accordingly, the "greatest utility of polytheism" is "the wonderful power to create gods" (Nietzsche). Or there is Greek polytheism, at which "those who believe otherwise take scandal," not at an opposition to monotheism, but upwardly revaluated as "perhaps its most spiritually pregnant form" (W. Otto).[8] What wonder, if, in this "work on polytheism," the attempt is seen by "those who believe otherwise" to recover the one attempt (of late antiquity) at a restoration. "With the apologia, in religious history, for paganism, and the philosophical praise of polytheism, a mythic disposition of the soul is not only indicated, but produced. But in truth, recourses to myth post Christum are in truth only repetitions of Julian's apostasy" (J. Taubes).[9]

'New Polytheism'

7. Somewhat simultaneously with the more philosophically oriented German discussion, in → North America, since the 1970s, the attempt has been mounted to make the 'new polytheism' the medium of a new religious orientation. America is in the phase in which even the new religious movements (→ New Religions), including the appearance of a spiritual → women's movement and a religious counter-culture, are taken into recognition. These are interpreted either as an expression of → pluralism in a modern America or as the medium of a subjectivization and individualization of religion. In this context, the concept of "polysymbolical religiosity" (W. Shepherd), appears, which advances a framework for the ensuing discussion: here, monotheistic as well as polytheistic options could be ranged.[10] David L. Miller's The Rebirth of Polytheism: Rebirth of the Gods and Goddesses (1974) provided the point of departure for the American discussion on the suitability of a new polytheism in Western modernity. Miller presents the thesis, in his repeatedly reprinted book, that only in a new form of polytheism can the multiplicity and 'multiformity' of current religious orientations be grasped and maintained—without, at the same time, being preempted either monistically or monotheistically. Rebirth of the Gods and Goddesses, he says, announces a new religious awareness in America that, besides being religious, would reach into the area of social values, individual self-determination, and philosophical knowledge. The variability of the patterns of interpretation is confirmed and held together by the polytheistic myths of the 'gods and goddess,' who, as 'root paradigm,' or 'organizing metaphor,' should serve, holds Miller, in a programmatically systematic environment. In this discussion, polytheism becomes a schema of presentation and legitimization of symbolical systems that can be individualized: "The gods are there, not to be believed or trusted, but to be used. [. . .] Man makes himself by making his own gods, and that is poetry" (L. D. Kliever).[11] Now, in this way, → psychoanalysis, individual psychology, alchemy, and → astrology can be bounded off from the area of religion in the modern world—in the framework of a new polytheism.

'The Greening of Polytheism'

Another direction in America introduces into the new polytheism the 'proximity to nature' of the gods of antiquity (→ Nature), into the new polytheism, and makes this 'green' polytheism the model for an ecological view of the world (→ Environmentalism; Nature Piety) that has always been repressed. The 'new polytheism' of European and American religious history is a "post Christum polytheism": it stands in competition with the unbroken polytheistic traditions of South and East Asia, such as → Hinduism, → Buddhism, and Shintô. These traditions testify to the measure in which the flexibility of polytheism can suit the latter for the accompaniment of processes of modernization and industrialization.

1. Exchange of letters between Goethe and F. H. Jacobi, ed. Max Jacobi, Leipzig 1846, 261.
2. Bubner, Rüdiger (ed.), Das älteste Systemprogramm. Studien zur Frühgeschichte des deutschen Idealismus, Bonn 1973.

3. Zockler, O., "Polytheismus," in: Realencyclopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Leipzig 1904, 539.
4. "Ein einziger Gott, unter Göttern und Menschen am größten . . .," fr. 23 D.-K.
5. Brelich, Angelo, "Politeismo e soteriologia," in: Brandon, S. T. F. (ed.), The Saviour God, Manchester 1963, 46.
6. Marquard, Odo, "Lob des Polytheismus," in: Idem, Abschied vom Prinzipiellen, Stuttgart 1981, 91-116, p. 46 (for the Engl. text see Marquard 1989).
7. Nietzsche, Friederich, Der Antichrist 19, in: Werke, ed. Karl Schlechte, vol. 2, Darmstadt 1960, 1178.
8. Otto, Walter F., Theophania: Der Geist der altgriechischen Religion, Hamburg 1956, 89.
9. Taubes 1983, 464.
10. Shepherd, William S., "Religion and Culture—The Counterculture: A New Religiosity," in: McNamara, R. H. (ed.), Religion American Style, New York 1974, 348-358.
11. Kliever 1979, 183.

Literature

Ahn, Gregor, "'Monotheismus' – 'Polytheismus'. Grenzen und Möglichkeiten einer Klassifikation von Gottesvorstellungen," in: Dietrich, M./Loretz, O. (eds.), Mesopotamica—Ugaritica—Biblica. Festschrift Kurt Bergedorf, Neukirchen 1993, 1-24; Assmann, Jan, "Zur Spannung zwischen Poly- und Monotheismus im Alten Ägypten," in: Bibel und Kirche 49 (1994), 78-82; Athanassiadi, Polymnia/Frede, Michael (eds.), Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity, New York 1999; Davies, Glenys (ed.), Polytheistic Systems, Edinburgh 1989; Fine, Steven (ed.), Jews, Christians, and Polytheists in the Ancient Synagogue: Cultural Interaction during the Greco-Roman Period, London/New York 1999; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Struktur der Öffentlichkeit und Bekenntnis in polytheistischen Religionen," in: Kippenberg, Hans G./Stroumsa, Guy G. (eds.), Secrecy and Concealment: Studies in the History of Mediterranean and Near Eastern Religions, Leiden 1995, 17-35; Idem, "Polytheismus. Akzente, Perspektiven und Optionen der Forschung," in: Zeitschrift für Religionswissenschaft 5 (1997), 59-77; Idem, "Polytheismen der Neuzeit," in: Köhler, Bärbel (ed.), Religion und Wahrheit, Festschrift Gernot Wießner, Bonn 1998, 45-59; Hargrove, Barbara, "The Rise of a New Polytheism," in: Encounter 39 (1978), 339-352; Kirsch, Jonathan, God against the Gods: The History of the War between Monotheism and Polytheism, New York 2004; Kliever, Lonnie D., "Polysymbolism and Modern Religiosity," in: The Journal of Religion 59/2 (1979), 169ff.; Marquard, Odo, Farewell to Matters of Principle: Philosophical Studies, New York 1989; North, Gary, Political Polytheisms: The Myth of Pluralism, Tyler 1989; Schmidt, Francis (ed.), The Unconceivable Polytheism: Studies in Religious Historiography, Chur 1987; Taubes, Jacob, "Zur Konjunktur des Polytheismus," in: Bohrer, Karl-Heinz (ed.), Mythos und Moderne, Frankfurt/M. 1983, 457-470; Smith, Mark S., The Origins of Biblical Monotheism: Israel's Polytheistic Backgound and the Ugaritic Texts, London 2001; van Baaren, Th. P., "Pluriform Monotheism," in: Nederlands theologisch tijdschrift 20 (1965/66), 321-327; Waardenburg, Jacques, "Un débat coranique contre les polythéistes," in: Bolle, Kees W. et al. (eds.), Ex Orbe Religionum V 2 (1972), 143-154; Wiedemann, Thomas, "Polytheism, Monotheisms, and Religious Co-Existence: Paganism and Christianity in the Roman Empire," in: Hamnett, Ian (ed.), Religious Pluralism and Unbelief: Studies Critical and Comparative, London 1990, 64-78; Woodhouse, C. M., George Gemistos Plethon: The Last of the Hellenes, Oxford 1986.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Antiquity, Criticism of Religion, Esotericism, God/Gods/The Sacred, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Monotheism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Pluralism

Burkhard Gladigow

Popular Culture

1. Religion is not limited to special times and spaces. Religious elements, or corresponding strategies of interpretation, are implicit in many areas of popular culture, and outside of traditional institutions. If one takes one's point of departure from an inclusive, functional concept of religion, then → religion is everything the social order legitimizes and integrates (T. Luckmann). Thus, like art or science, religion is a matter of a symbolical meaning-world created by the human being that transcends → everyday life. From this perspective, even the equivalent meaning-systems of traditional religion (and approaches to their emergence) can be investigated in daily life. Popular culture ought therefore to be understood as the sum of cultural practices and 'performances' of the daily life of social groups (W. Kenneth Little). Today's popular culture in Western societies has to a large extent originated in the legacy of the pre-industrial 'folk culture,' maintained by farm and labor societies, and of the proletarian working culture of the → industrial societies. Beginning in the early twentieth century, with the new mass media → film, radio, → television, and recordings (today, CD, DVD, MP3-digitalizing), a media-transmitted 'pop culture' developed, spread by a commercial entertainment industry, extending globally after the Second World War, and bonding with the new youth culture. Sports, (pop) music, and Hollywood-dominated film production, along with the media of communication of a new free time and 'leisure society' are placed on the market, partly tied to established religion, partly reemphasizing certain sensory elements equivalent to those of religion. Demonstrative examples can be found in the pop culture of 1968 to 1978, from the first presentation of the musical "Hair" to the eschatological visions in the cinema of the 1990s, and the relevant 'cultural performances.'

Eschaton and Redemption in the Science Fiction Film

2. The science fiction film "Terminator 2," by James Cameron (United States, 1991), demonstrates the currency of the eschatological expectation, and conceptions of redemption, in film.[1] In the plot, the year 2029 sees intelligent machines wage a combat for supremacy over humanity, which has been decimated by an atomic war. Reminiscent of the infanticide of Bethlehem, John Connor (with the same initials as "Jesus Christ"), potential savior of the race, is to be killed as a child, by an assassin machine sent back to the year 1997 by the machine rulers. A "Terminator 2" (Arnold Schwarzenegger) seeks to prevent this, as he protects mother and child—a modern Holy Family—and completes the family as a substitute father. Now the figure of "Terminator 2" is transformed from a machine programmed to kill to a human-like being with moral and emotional potentials. Conversion (reversal of motivation from killing to protection) and sacrificial death (self-annihilation after the accomplishment of its tasks, lest its technological inner life continue to be able to produce harm) earmark "Terminator 2" as new myth, and shift it into proximity with the gnostic idea of the 'redeemed redeemer' (→ Gnosticism, → New Myths/New Mythologies; Wagner's "Percival").

The symbolical content of "Terminator 2" suggests various religious sources and themes: the Messianic expectation of a Redeemer in gnosis and Christianity, the threat to the coming of the Messiah by way of infanticide, the central meaning of a 'Holy Family.' Add the value dualism of good and evil, the polar temporal positions of a new Adam and a new Time—

"Judgment Day" was the original title of the film. With these mythological references, "Terminator 2" can be ranged among recent films such as "Independence Day" (United States, 1996, Roland Emmerich) and "The Seventh Sign" (United States, 1998, Carl Schultz), which present the equivalent of → millenarianism, and whose production was multiplied at the end of the twentieth century.

Comparison of Religious and Daily Secular Systems of Meaning

3. Comparisons of religious and everyday secular systems of meaning extend from Hegel's classification of reading the morning paper as "realistic morning blessing" to Benedict's declaration, "Cinema theaters became the sacred places of a new religion."[2] The latter conceives → television as an emerging system of meaning, and ascribes to it functions that go beyond information and entertainment. Its socializing effect as a system of meaning, its role as a substitute for interpersonal communication, and its ritualized insertion and engagement reinforced the secularization of ecclesial monopolies over meaning. As an example, Benedict adduces the flagship of German television news (ARD-Tagesschau) as a ritual equivalent of evening prayer, an all-evening 'consciousness raising,' as a function of the mass media, equivalent to religion.[3]

Secularization and Privatization

Development in recent decades is marked by the secularization and privatization of religion (→ New Age; Private Religion). Erosion of systems of religious symbols, as well as union of the most disparate religious sources in syncretisms, indicate the individual as the last instance of the organization of the religious. This change is accompanied by the creation of new social forms of religion, all visible in a multiplicity of therapeutic, life reforming, sports-produced (→ Olympic Games), and spiritual movements. On this basis, T. Luckmann, following Karl Mannheim, further developed the market model, and included a differentiation of religious supply.

An exception to this development is presented in ecclesial rites of the life cycle. They are often designated as voluntary points of contact with traditional religion, in which mostly material motives and prestige consciousness, as well as the need for festive surroundings, play a role (→ Life Cycle; Prestige). They therefore acquire an order in the lists of dominant value-concepts, which Heiner Barz worked out with youth in Germany. Among the highest values in the basis of subjective systems of relevance, the following were indicated: autonomy, self-realization, mobility, sexuality, family concerns. On the other hand, in youth who take a distance from the church, religion—as with Marx—is a code word for backwardness and hetero-determination. Overall, it seems to be a matter of a process oscillating between secularization and traditionalization and resulting in no absolute loss of values.

Popular Culture as Conveyor of Meaning

Popular culture offers a broad spectrum of conveyors of meaning. In times when, in many persons' perception, the Nobel Prize replaces canonization, and pilgrimages to the Conseil Européen pour la Recherche Nucléaire (Fr., "European Council for Nuclear Research") in Geneva, or to a soccer game, are preferred to traveling to Lourdes. Where science rather than religion produces the new cosmologies of the West, and community is in the sense of belonging to the fan-community of the sports leagues rather than in Sunday divine service, the problem arises of alternatives and correspondences to religious elements in popular culture. Focused on popular culture, elements equivalent to religion are to be found at such different levels as advertising, rock music, cinema, tourism, sports, and the Internet.

Youth Cultures

4. At the end of the 1960s, Far-Eastern wisdom teachings were popular in the youth (sub-) cultures. The quest for a salubrious, pacific world found concentrated expression in the musical "Hair" (original production, April 4, 1968), in which the vision of a dawning 'Age of Aquarius' (→ New Age) showed the spiritual potential of the youth cultures. The search for meaning in Far Eastern teachings, in drug visions, in ideas of love and peace, marked a wide departure from traditional piety, and found new forms of expression in the 'cultural performances' of pop culture and its constituting of non-festal communities ('ad hoc audiences').

Rock and Pop Music

a) An arresting number of references to religion are found in the area of rock and pop music. Important rock'n'roll musicians were socialized in religion: for example, Elvis Presley in the Assemblies of God, a Pentecostal movement. To this day, Presley's property in Graceland (Memphis, Tennessee) and his grave are objectives of pilgrimages, as well as projection screens for visions and resurrection beliefs in the minds of fans (→ Relics [Veneration of]). By contrast, a storm of indignation arose when the Beatles let it be publicly known that they regarded themselves as "more popular than Jesus."[4] Some pop stars are accorded a quasi-religious reverence, to which multi-media presentations and self-stylizations contribute; we may think of Michael Jackson's "Dangerous Tour" (1992–1993), and Madonna's video clip "Like a Prayer." Religious and 'quasi-religious' content like love and sexuality (e.g., in Prince's album "Lovesexy") likewise indicate the presence of religious traditions, as do the borrowings of hard rock Heavy Metal from Satanism and Occultism, among groups like Black Sabbath, Slayer, Judas Priest, Venom, or Iron Maiden, and protagonists of Black or Death Metal and youth subcultures (→ Satanism). In the religious and pseudo-religious content with which rock music is invested, Schwarze sees a refutation of Walter Benjamin's prediction of a banalizing of artwork through the loss of a cultic furl around it.[5]

Virtual Spaces: Tourism and Internet

b) Religious and quasi-religious conceptualizations are also found in two kinds of virtual space: in the mythic geography of tourism, and on the Internet. Travelers of the most diverse origin (shamans, anthropologists, tourists, pilgrims) are steered by a mythic geography. The respective perception of other spaces is socially and culturally impressed.

In → tourism, the Christian notion of paradise is dominant. Regeneration from work (cf. the word 'recreation'—a 'new creation' of power for living) seems possible through reunion with the untouched origin of the → Garden of Eden. The symbolical representation of these mythical places in advertising shows no automobiles or other artifacts of technologized societies. Instead, untouched nature, along with a seeming pre-industrial world of life in the 'noble wild'—the result of the projection of Western wishes and dreams in the face of ecological scenarios of the eschaton in media and sciences. The realistic shaping of places such as Disney World, or locations for club vacations, take their orientation partly in the installation and aesthetics at places of pilgrimage, and temple installations in European antiquity.

Recent fantasies of redemption and omnipotence can be signaled in the virtual frameworks of the Internet. Persons 'create' worlds for themselves through the global, and yet decentralized, network of computers. The resulting space, it is true, is devoid of matter and bodies; yet it does possess a specific reality. It is shaped by way of the (inter-) actions of the persons engaged in the virtual travel, and is socially structured. The opportunity to develop new identities, in the utopia, the 'no place' (in Gk., ou tópos), of 'cyberspace,' promotes the network prophets' notions of redemption. Redemption by way of communications technology—the gnostic wish for redemption of the spirit from the prison of the body—or flight from real encounter with the other, motivates an implosion into virtual spaces that are akin to the mythic places of tourism, and lauded in eschatological language.

Popular Culture as 'Substitute Religion'?

Lacking, as it does, a demonstrable organizational form, or any institutionalization, popular culture is not to be appraised as a 'substitute religion.' The growing need for alternative conferral of meaning, for the individual and for everyday loans from traditional systems of belief (bestowal of name, house blessing, religious → kitsch), however, indicate an interesting field of tension between the market for a conferral of meaning, on the one hand, and traditional systems of belief on the other. Quasi-religious elements, and their media of presentation, retain their significance and importance as a counterpoint to traditional religion.

1. Gottwald, Eckart, "Die widerständige Sehnsucht nach dem Mythos. Erlösermythen in der täglichen Unterhaltung," in: Der Evangelische Erzieher 44 (1992), 585-599; Röll 1998, 161-170.
2. Benedict, Hans-Jürgen, "Fernsehen als Sinnsystem?," in: Fischer, W./Marhold, W. (eds.), Religionssoziologie als Wissenssoziologie, Stuttgart 1978, 117-137, p. 124.
3. Ibid., 122; Albrecht 1993, 98ff.
4. Schwarze, Bernd, Die Religion der Rock- und Popmusik, Stuttgart 1997, 15.
5. Ibid., 27; Benjamin 1980.

Literature

Albrecht, Horst, Religion der Massenmedien, Stuttgart 1993; Barz, Heiner, "The Pursuit of Happiness," in: Praktische Theologie 29,2 (1994), 106-116; Benjamin, Walter, "Das Kunstwerk im Zeitalter seiner technischen Reproduzierbarkeit (1936)," in: Brauneck, Manfred (ed.), Film und Fernsehen. Materialien zur Theorie, Soziologie und Analyse der audio-visuellen Massenmedien, Bamberg 1980, 81-102; Chidester, David, Authentic Fakes: Religion and American Popular Culture, Berkeley 2005; Dean, William, The American Spiritual Culture: And the Invention of Jazz, Football, and the Movies, New York 2003; Ebertz, Michael N./Schultheis, Franz (eds.), Volksfrömmigkeit in Europa. Beiträge zur Soziologie popularer Religiosität aus 14 Ländern, Munich 1986; Fechtner, Kristian, Populäre Kultur und Religion, Gütersloh 2003; Forbes, Bruce David/Mahan, Jeffrey H. (eds.), Religion and Popular Culture in America, Berkeley 2000; Jewett, Robert/Lawrence, John Shelton, Captain America and the Crusade against Evil: The Dilemma of Zealous Nationalism, Grand Rapids 2003; Little, Kenneth W., "Popular Culture," in: Levinson, David/Ember, Melvin (eds.), Encyclopedia of Cultural Anthropology 3 (1996), 984-988; Luckmann, Thomas, The Invisible Religion: The Problem of Religion in Modern Society, New York 1967; Mazur, Eric Michael/McCarthy, Kate (eds.), God in the Details: American Religion in Popular Culture, New York 2001; Morgan, David, Protestants and Pictures: Religion, Visual Culture, and the Age of American Mass Production, New York 1999; Röll, Franz Josef, Mythen und Symbole in populären Medien, Frankfurt/M. 1998; Stout, Daniel A./Buddenbaum, Judith M. (eds.), Religion and Popular Culture: Studies on the Interaction of Worldviews, Ames 2001.

→ Advertising, Everyday Life, Film, Garden/Paradise, Idol, Kitsch, Masses, Meaning/Signification, Media, Olympic Games, Pilgrimage, Relics (Veneration of), Sports, Televangelism, Television, Tourism, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Wolfgang Klepper

Possession

1. Possession umbers as one of the exceptional, hypnosis-like (hypnoid) psychic states. Like shamanic 'ecstasy,' it is a special case of → trance. At the close of the nineteenth century, possession still played a considerable role in Europe. Its phenomena were designated as hysteria, from which Freud's → psychoanalysis took its point of departure. The conception of possession exists in nearly all human cultures. It means that a spirit being takes possession of a human being, and exercises its command over that person. A distinction is made between 'spontaneous possession,' which supervenes without the will of the subject, and 'deliberate possession,' which is introduced by special techniques and cultural institutions. Involuntary possession is customarily ascribed to the area of → psychopathology, as opposed to normal psychology. With possession, it is a matter of the culture-connected interpretation of an extraordinary state of consciousness. Just as with a medical diagnosis, the therapeutic procedure follows from the kind of interpretation to which the phenomenon is subjected. The behavior manifested by the subject of a possession is not usually ascribed to a precisely identified spirit. But ancestors, gods, demons, and the devil are indeed made responsible for it.

Who Becomes Possessed?

2. On this point, it must be remarked that possession is usually a phenomenon among the women of repressive societies. It would seem that, owing to their marginal position in such societies, women are constrained to have their needs met in a different way from the means available to men. A woman is offered an opportunity of some kind by possession, which is expressed through forms of illness such as sudden paralysis, loss of speech, or blindness. In this way, she can escape an unbearable situation, and engage in behaviors that otherwise would be disallowed in her cultural context. Illness is a very eloquent symbol. It not only attracts attention—something has to be done—but also calls for a diagnosis. It must not be overlooked, here, that possession is usually connected with privation. Women and other oppressed groups, who suffer under the general norms of society, such as slaves, homosexual persons, and transvestites ordinarily have no opportunity to resist the oppression, or to defend themselves against society. There remains to them only flight into illness, for which, then, on the side of society, spirits are made responsible that cannot be precisely called to account. That possession is particularly a female strategy is seen in the fact that the proportion of women among members of possession cults is over ninety percent.

Possession and Healing

3. The example of the Gnawas in Morocco: In cases of spontaneous possession, the victim is usually unable correctly to 'sort out her symptoms.' After numerous unsuccessful visits to physicians and healers, she eventually gathers that her disease is to be attributed to the influence of spirits, and that she must seek out someone who is a specialist in commerce with invisible beings.

A follower of Afro-Cuban Santería becomes a medium of the god Shango. Assisted by the cult leader, he has allowed the god take possession of him, clothing himself in the god's color (red), and assuming his attribute, the double axe. Shango is one of the Orisha, deities of Yoruba (Nigeria), who have come to the Caribbean region. The picture shows the moment at which the dancer is 'seized' by the being of the god. His eyes stare into the void: he is transported in trance. The ritual goes on for days, accompanied by singing and drums. Each Orisha has a personal musical rhythm, which accompanies the possession. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

These specialists may be different in different cultures, being designated as soothsayers, clairvoyants, or spiritual healers. If the patient follows the soothsayer's advice, she has her symptoms briefly portrayed, and then falls into a light trance, in which she invokes her protecting spirit. From the latter she learns what spirit is responsible for the possession, and what demands it makes in order that the victim obtain release. Besides gifts for the soothsayer, there is usually a demand to arrange for an exorcism.

The Drama of the Trance

The exorcism takes place in the form of a drama, with a trance. It opens with the sacrifice of an animal, whose flesh serves as festive fare. The nearly always male musicians represent the spirits in the 'play,' as well as drumming rhythms that summon the spirits. They see the proof of their presence in the participants' trance, whose comportment awakens the impression that some strange and foreign being has taken possession of them. Once the rhythm, and thus the voice, of that spirit has sounded which the seeress has identified as the cause of the possession, she functions as its medium. She places her body at its disposal as its loudspeaker, and conveys indications that are necessary for the healing of the possessed person. Once the possessed has fulfilled these demands, this spirit now stands helpfully at her disposal, as her protective spirit. To put it another way: here is the acceptance of suffering that, according to the modern view, represents the basic prerequisite for healing. After this scene, the musicians alter their rhythm, the prophetess sinks into a light unconsciousness, and the trance drama is at an end.

Demonic Possession

4. Not every spirit, however, can be transformed into a protective one. Just as familiar is demonic possession, attributed to the influence of evil spirits, especially to that of the devil. Since he is not to be transformed into a protective spirit, he must therefore be expelled—a practice that the Catholic Church performs to this day. Precise directions for → exorcism are to be found in the Rituale Romanum.

From Possessed to Medium

5. With the proper talent, the possessed themselves can become prophetesses. The most important criterion is the ability to speak while in a trance. Once she has learned this, she is regarded by the other participants as a medium of the spirits, and a new prophetess is born.

6. But possession also serves to give a meaning to unintelligible or catastrophic events that fall on the entire community. Traumatic group experiences can thus be developed. This is how, for example, the African population saw itself, once it had been contorted by the innovations of the European colonizers. They reacted with trance dramas, in which not only the colonial lords, but even their locomotives, were staged as spirits.

Literature

Behrend, Heike/Luig, Ute, Spirit Possession: Modernity and Power in Africa, Oxford etc. 1999; Caciola, Nancy, Discerning Spirits: Divine and Demonic Possession in the Middle Ages, Ithaca 2003; Ferber, Sarah, Demonic Possession and Exorcism in Early Modern France, London 2004; Garrett, Clarke, Spirit Possession and Popular Religion: From the Camisards to the Shakers, Baltimore 1987; Goldish, Matt (ed.), Spirit Possession in Judaism: Cases and Contexts from the Middle Ages to the Present, Detroit 2003; Keller, Mary, The Hammer and the Flute: Women, Power, and Spirit Possession, Baltimore 2002; Kramer, Fritz W., The Red Fez: Art and Spirit Possession in Africa, London 1993

(German [1]1987); Lewis, Ioan M., Ecstatic Religion: A Study of Shamanism and Spirit Possession, Harmondsworth 1971; Sargant, William, Battle for the Mind: A Physiology of Conversion and Brain-Washing, Melbourne 1957; Stoller, Paul, Fusion of the Worlds: An Ethnography of Possession among the Songhay of Niger, Chicago 1989.

→ Channeling, Demon/Demonology, Ecstasy, Exorcism, Oracle, Shamanism, Spiritism, Trance

Frank Maurice Welte

Postmodernity

Postmodern Positions

1. Since the 1960s, various diagnoses of the current condition of society, culture, and knowledge have been propounded and dealt with under the heading 'postmodernity.' First, at the end of the 1960s, the return to traditional narrative forms within American literature after James Joyce was designated as 'postmodern.' Charles Jencks introduced the concept into architectural theory in the 1980s, and connected with it the concept of 'double coding' in architectural construction. The 'form speech' of the architectural construction in question was said to overcome functionalistic and universalistic concepts of the 'international style,' and at the same time address various strata of the population through the revival of ornamentation. French philosopher Jean-François Lyotard inaugurated philosophical confrontation with the phenomenon of postmodernity, with his report on the state of knowledge or learning in Western societies at the beginning of the 1980s. For Lyotard, postmodernity is a condition in which the legitimization of knowledge and the just society can no longer be achieved through the instrumentality of 'great narratives' (dialectic of spirit, hermeneutics of meaning, emancipation of the subject), but rather must now be done only with reference to incommensurable 'language games' (Ludwig Wittgenstein), which, on the societal level, can take on the form of temporary projects.

Common to the various approaches is a critical distance from respectively distinct concepts of → modernity. Thus, a wide spectrum of 'postmodern' instances of self-awareness spreads abroad. At one extreme is a critique of modern → rationalism (which, with its technological 'superiority complex,' is said to have conjured up an ecological crisis too, and therefore to be in need of complementation in the form of a postmodern era of nature mysticism). In the range of the spectrum, one finds post-modernity as a plurality-friendly opportunity, and opening up to modernity itself. Modernity, from the simple viewpoint of unitary thinking (appraised in a totalitarian sense)—one history, one reason—now becomes subject to critical revision. At the other end of the spectrum is the postmodern arbitrariety so frequently disparaged in the feature pages, but holding itself out as corresponding to a new era become 'too big to grasp.'

Technological and Societal Transformation

2. Beginning in the 1960s, and pregnant with consequences for the distribution of religious learning and knowledge, in parallel with these transformations in terms of the history of ideas, specific changes stand out in the technological and societal area. Sociological theoreticians (e.g., Daniel Bell) point to the strong growth of information- and data-processing, in whose wake, we are told, societal work is transferred to the tertiary sector, and therewith a new post-industrial services- and information-society appears. Further: at least in lands of high technological development, the advancing interconnection of computer media places new forms of communication, and of generation of information, within reach of large parts of the population. As the result of a worldwide interconnection of economies, processes of globalization have strengthened, as the media theory of American media scientist Marshall McLuhan establishes. And so, the theory concludes, we witness the formation of a 'global village.'

Religion under Postmodern Circumstances

3. Belying earlier theories, for instance those dependent on the thesis of → secularization, religion has not disappeared in the wake of the Enlightenment and emancipation. For the time after the Second World War, however, a growing privatization and subjectivization of the content of religious knowledge (→ Private Religion), as well as a clear change in the social form of religious organization, can be observed in Western societies. A pluralization of supply accompanies increasing market-orientation on the part of these organizations. Alongside traditional church institutions, the scene becomes host to a multiplicity of small businesses, which deal, we may say, in meaning. The interested parties can be described less as members of a community than as consumers, since for them it is frequently not a question of any long-term formal membership. A person interested in religion can repeatedly make a new selection from the supply palette of the religious 'supermarket,' a selection bound neither to exclusivity nor to freedom from contradiction. Thus, a selection from among the offerings of the new religious scenario takes place only on a short-term basis (celebratory masses, lectures, adult education courses). This new kind of social organization of religion can be described approximately in the concept of the 'invisible religion' of sociologist of religion Thomas Luckmann. Here, religion has its point of departure in the subjective appraisal of certain experiences of transcendence in everyday life, but religion can indeed be connected with institutions not primarily religious. Church institutions are no longer the exclusive conveyors of religious knowledge. Often, non-religious institutions enter the scene, such as the electronic → media as propagators of religious knowledge or patterns of interpretation. This change also involves a broadly effected transposition of the content of this knowledge. The → reception of extra-European or ancient European religions or mythologies (e.g. → Paganism/Neopaganism, cult of the Earth Mother, witches), modern occultism, and → New Age shape the panorama of the new religious scenario. Even primarily secular or political fields can become expressions of new religion-controlled themes, such as ecology in connection with notions of nature mysticism, or → sports. On the theological side, various positions on the challenge of postmodern thought are on a wavelength between the rediscovery of the sensuous dimension of religion, and negative theology: There is the sensuous dimension of the Holy, in the tradition of F. Schleiermacher and R. Otto (as H. Timm regards it), on the one hand, and concern with negative theology—the attempt to preserve the unavailability of God to presentation—on the other. One criticism called for the perspective of a political theology that will not be satisfied with the cementing of unjust social structures in the name of the 'end of history,' such as with K. Füssel and D. Sölle following J. B. Metz, whose positions may be regarded as overlapping with the critique of postmodern thought by J. Habermas (Die Moderne—ein unvollendetes Projekt; → Liberation Theology).

Reactions of Religious Philosophy

4. In the area of philosophy of religion and culture, considerations are emerging from the crisis of the modern inner-worldly → utopias (P. Koslowski). Through the critique of scientism, functionalism, and utopianism, now the thought of finitude must be emphasized, in which human beings know themselves to exist in a dependency on an Absolute that is not subject to manipulation. They must once more learn messianic hopes, but not starting with the possibility of a realization of this hope through human or divine instances. The sketches refer to our ancient and medieval legacy, without, however, attempting to belie the modern moment of subjectivity.

The Reverse Side: Fundamentalism

5. Not only beginning with the postwar era, but frequently at the focus of current media interest, stand pluralism and individualistic aestheticization of the approach to religion, as opposed by fundamentalist movements, vis-à-vis their respectively contrary aims (→ Fundamentalism). Against the postmodern differentiation of lifestyle and religion, Islamism, as well as various Christian movements (for example, the Moral Majority in the United States) issue demands for community orthopraxis, that is, for as comprehensible as possible a regulation of both private and public behavior, through commandments and prescripts issuing from each religion respectively. Whether they can hold out against advancing individualization of the conferral of meaning, of conceptualizations of belief, and of religious commitments, in the 'multi-option' society, however, is questionable.

Literature

Sources: Docherty, Thomas (ed.), Postmodernism: A Reader, New York 1993; Drolet, Michael (ed.), The Postmodernism Reader: Foundational Texts, London 2004; Lyotard, Jean-François, Toward the Postmodern, New Jersey 1993.

Secondary Literature: Barker, Francis et al. (eds.), Postmodernism and the Re-Reading of Modernity, Manchester 1992; Berger, Peter L., The Heretical Imperative: Contemporary Possibilities of Religious Affirmation, Garden City 1979; Habermas, Jürgen, Die Moderne – ein unvollendetes Projekt. Philosophisch-politische Aufsätze, Frankfurt/M. 1981; Idem, Religion and Rationality: Essays on Reason, God, and Modernity, Cambridge 2002; Koslowski, Peter et al. (eds.), Moderne oder Postmoderne? Zur Signatur des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters, Weinheim 1986; Latour, Bruno, We Have Never Been Modern, New York 1993; Luckmann, Thomas, The Invisible Religion: The Problem of Religion in Modern Society, New York 1967; Timm, Hermann, Das ästhetische Jahrzehnt. Zur Postmodernisierung der Religion, Gütersloh 1990; Turner, Bryan S., Theories of Modernity and Postmodernity, London 1990; Welsch, Wolfgang, Unsere postmoderne Moderne, Weinheim [3]1991.

→ Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Media, Modernity/Modern Age, New Age, Occultism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Popular Culture, Pluralism, Secularization, Utopia

Georg Hartmann

Poverty

1. Poverty is an economic condition of lack that, on an ongoing basis, endangers the satisfaction of fundamental needs in the areas of food and shelter, indeed survival itself. Oppositely, the principle of a voluntary restriction of material possessions and private consumption is a kind of 'symbolic poverty,' variously appraised by the religions. Few systems of belief condemn material well-being; rather, they usually encourage its distribution and/or material renunciation, positing these as a counter-achievement in view of a privileged lot in the world to come. This feature is especially true of religions that develop in a social environment where, by way of commerce, market expansion, and centralized governmental structures, important social inequalities have arisen. In nearly all religions, a lower evaluation of personal material ownership results from a concern to balance out this social one-sidedness, and to ensure the cohesion of the community.

Ifa Religion

2. As an example, let us consider the case of the Ifa religion, of the Yoruba Kingdom of Oyo, in Nigeria. As European trade-relations intensified in the West Africa of the sixteenth century, and opportunities for economic success swiftly burgeoned, the Ifa religion hosted the ascent of trickster god Esu, lord of markets and witches. However, potentially dangerous Esu delivers over his wife Cowrie ('money,' from kauri-mussels) to the god Ifa, patron of the oracle and social order. This voluntary subordination of Esu to Ifa symbolizes the former's transfer of his personally acquired wealth to the community. The Ifa religion is not averse from the acquisition of wealth and money, then, but admonishes individuals to redistribute them to the group. The status of persons in the afterlife, and their immortality, are made dependent upon their capacity in the present life to acquire as many friends, followers, and noble titles, as possible, through a redistribution of material goods.

Judaism

As with the Ifa religion, Judaism's evaluation of poverty and wealth follows the goal of an avoidance of extreme social inequalities, and an assurance of the cohesion of the community. In principle, the Hebrew Bible is generally open to an affluence in material goods, and regards a situation of material need rather as a misfortune (or temporary test); but in the Prophets, and in the post-exilic psalms, there are tendencies to a reversal of this evaluation. God stands as defender of the poor. Material redistribution and acts of assistance to the poor are regarded as a matter of duty, and as a positive influence on one's soteriological destiny in the beyond.

Spiritual Wealth and Material Renunciation

A dualistic standard vis-à-vis poverty and wealth marked Christianity from the outset. For this religion, spiritual riches, and an assurance of salvation were possible only at the price of material renunciation and asceticism. As a reference for the Christian attitude toward wealth we have especially the episode of the rich young man (Mark 10:17-22; Matt 19:16-22; Luke 18:18-23). Here, wealth in earthly goods and transcendental salvation are mutually exclusive. This view established itself in the primitive Christian community, and later in the Christian orders, and found a renaissance in the thirteenth century with → Francis of Assisi. Francis professed poverty in the sense of a 'life without ownership,' and as an ideal for the individual as for the community. Voluntary poverty is still an ideal in the Catholic Church today—all too often only an ideal. With the Reformers, the ideal of poverty was rejected, especially owing to its connection with a vow. Nevertheless, even in the Evangelical Church, groups continually arose that professed it, such as the Moravian Brotherhoods of Graf Zinzendorf in the eighteenth century.

Most of today's important religions link an advocacy or tolerance of material well-being among the laity with the requirement of observance of moral principles, but also acknowledge the ideal of poverty as a means for the attainment of salvation. An opportunity to connect both is offered by the Hindu concept of various phases of life (→ Life Cycle). While a striving for material well-being is regarded as altogether appropriate for middle age, one prepares oneself for the beyond in the final phase of life by a lifestyle rather averse from the world and ascetical, and/or a life of service to the poor. Buddhism obliges the laity to the observance of moral principles in economic exchange (prohibition of trade in slaves or arms), and requires the attainment of deserts for the beyond by generous contributions to the poor and to monasteries. For monks and nuns, on the other hand, the ideal of poverty prevails: these renounce earthly possessions extensively, and live on the alms of the population.

Evaluation of Ownership in Hinduism and Buddhism

Islam

Nor does Islam reject trade, or other activities for the increase of affluence, but it does limit the accumulation of individual wealth, through rules such as the prohibition of interest-taking, and the obligation to give alms (zakat). A distribution of material goods to the poor can positively influence a destiny in the beyond in terms of salvation. At the same time, Islam too, especially Islamic mysticism, acknowledges an idealization of poverty as a means to the attainment of spiritual salvation and divine grace.

Protestantism

3. In the past, certain religions have manifested tendencies to vacate norms limiting the accumulation of material possessions. For example, the Hindu text Arthasastra, composed between the third century BCE and the third century CE, permitted the taking of interest. But such tendencies only won out with the advent of Protestantism. By contrast with most religions, the latter showed tolerance with regard to the taking of interest, and detached the individual's divine election and grace from his and her 'good works.' Thereby it dissolved the connection between prestige and salvific destiny of the individual, and no longer required the individual's renunciation of unlimited material acquisition. Protestantism, then, approved the accumulation of personal material wealth more than did any other system of belief. This feature is doubtless a reason for the frequently observed connection between Protestantism as the principal religion and a successful capitalist enterprise.

Global Market Economy

4. Religious ideas vis-à-vis poverty and wealth exert a powerful influence, even in the age of a global market economy. There are countries in which the capitalist norm of unlimited personal striving for ownership, and private consumption, is found to be in contradiction with the basic religious convictions of broad parts of the population; here, private enterprise and market economy can be justified, even today, only in a framework of practices of distribution growing out of basic religious convictions. Thus, the rise of Islamic fundamentalism in countries like → Iran can be interpreted as a reaction to the growth of social inequality stemming from reckless modernization. Accordingly, modern enterprise in Islamic countries is legitimized more and more in the framework of Islamic institutions that limit the accumulation of profit. In Nigeria, the key African religious norm of 'redistribution' is imposed on large firms in terms of social responsibility vis-à-vis local communities. In Sri Lanka, the widespread Buddhist ethic of merit has led to a specific pattern of responsibility in which entrepreneurial capital is redistributed to monasteries and communal development projects. In the Federal Republic of Germany, with the configuration of the system of the social market economy (Federal Social Aid Law, 1961), principles of solidarity and subsidiarity, stemming from Catholic social teaching, were normative.

Literature

Belasco, Bernado I.: The Entrepreneur as Culture Hero: Preadaptations in Nigerian Economic Development, New York 1980; Harpham, Geoffrey Galt, The Ascetic Imperative in Culture and Criticism, Chicago 1987.

→ Asceticism, Capitalism, Economy, Money, Prestige

Erika Dettmar

Power

Conceptualizations of Cosmic Power and Energy

1. Instead of entertaining conceptualizations of personal gods, today's independent religiosity (particularly in the → New Age religion) thinks of a religious ground in terms of cosmic power, or of a monistically understood cosmic energy, in which creation and creator are not distinguished, and the world is underlain by only one principle. As a rule, the cosmos enters into relation with the human being 'as within, so without.' Therefore the energies of the earth can influence human character. Appeal is often made to Polynesian conceptions of mana—whose origin is not in nature religion, however, but in sources that include the conceptions of classic Theosophy, as represented at the end of the nineteenth century by Helena Blavatsky (1831–1891; → Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society), and transmitted to our time by the New Age movement. Accordingly, this Theosophical understanding is frequently bound up, today as well, with prana (breath), the Hindu idea, and ki (air, steam, breath, ether, energy, power), the Chinese. Many books of instruction and courses are available today, for instance in esoteric seminars, in how to deal with cosmic energy. Its control is said to guarantee physical and spiritual health. For this purpose, one means that may be used is the Indian chakra teaching. Chakras—centers in the human body connected to a particular cosmic force—are understood to divide the human body into various energy centers, thus making many different therapeutic applications available. Some of these are Hatha Yoga, Pranayama breath-control, and therapy based on reflex zones in the feet.

Mana and Dynamism

2. In 1877, according to Oxford religious historian F. Max Müller, missionary R. H. Codrington reported that the Melanesian expression mana was a designation for the infinite. Mana, declared the missionary, is the name for a certain supernatural force, one demonstrated in physical strength and special capabilities. Codrington's observation became the basis for the theory in religious studies of dynamism (from Gk., dýnamis, 'power'). That theory described the conception of mana as belief in a supernatural, impersonal power lying at the foundation of religion, and common to all original religions. The higher idea of belief in God had finally developed through a personification of these conceptualizations of power. At the beginning of the twentieth century, anthropologists transferred the dynamistic theory of mana to the religious conceptions of North American Indians, and even theologian and religious scholar Gerardus van der Leeuw (1890–1950) based his Phänomenologie der Religion (Ger., "Phenomenology of Religion"; 1930) on the concept of a primordial experience of a special supernatural power. Anthropologist Friedrich Rudolf Lehmann, on the other hand, wrote as early as 1922 that mana always appeared in historical concretion, among Melanesian and Polynesian peoples: it was always applied, as a verb or an adjective, to a person, an object, an animal, or a divinity, and with the meaning of 'being successful,' 'being capable.' Furthermore, held Lehmann, this conceptualization is firmly connected to the Malayan space of Oceania, the region of the Austronesian languages, and is by no means transferable to all analphabet peoples generally. Today the dynamistic theory retains scarcely any importance in religious studies.

Power Places

3. In contemporary religiosity, along with the ideas of a cosmic power, the existence of special power → places is also conceptualized. Here there is a great tendency to select prehistoric places of worship, on grounds of a special power supposed to be dwelling within them, and to rediscover the effects of these places for application in our own time, in cult or therapy. Places considered as especially power-charged include the megalithic monuments of Stonehenge, in England, the Externsteine near Detmold (Germany), or the Cathedral of Chartres. Common to all of these places, special earth magnetism is supposed, or underground courses of water, or certain radioactivity, to which persons of earlier times have been more sensitive.

Geomancy

This newly discovered 'ancient knowledge' is designated geomancy (from Gk., 'earth divination'). The geomantic criteria for sacred places are grounded on various attempts to mount a scientific explanation. The true phenomenon, however, is supposed to be of a spiritual nature, to become visible by way of corresponding physical phenomena. The two areas, physical and spiritual, are connected by a super-fine matter. This energy too is quasi-identified with the Melanesian mana, the Indian prana, the Chinese ki, and, finally, od or ether, and Wilhelm Reich's (1879–1957) Orgone, which last is said to correspond to the 'ether' (the physical cosmos of light waves) in Einstein's theory of relativity.

Reference to Science

4. In all of these cases, an attempt is made to describe spiritual phenomena by way of scientific concepts. A bridge is provided by the physical concept of 'energy.' But in modern science, the concept of energy denotes the ability to do work, and can present itself as mechanical energy, heat energy, or electrical (→ Electricity) and magnetic energy. In order to derive one form of energy from another, there are always strict scientific rules of calculation. On the other hand, the idea of energy in modern religiosity is imprecise. Energy serves here as a linguistic metaphor, for the purpose of building bridges from today's natural science and psychology to spirituality. The 'reason' that abides in and governs the universe—that universe within which the astonished individual experiences herself as an inner part—becomes the cosmic consciousness with which the universe and its powers become serviceable to the experiential world of the individual. In the new religiosity, the mana of the nature peoples, and the 'corresponding' Asian concepts, do not so much serve as concrete historical models, but rather are projections of popularized energy concepts of modern physics and transpersonal psychology. The system of the → psyche is thereby held to correspond, as an eco-cosmic cognizance and spirituality, with cosmic consciousness, the reason of the universe. Here, then, is a religiosity whose point of departure is in conceptions of natural science and of psychology, but whose engagement, in its metaphors and myths, is with historical religiosity.

Literature

Antes, Peter/Pahnke, Donate (eds.), Die Religion von Oberschichten, Marburg 1989; Capra, Fritjof, The Tao of Physics: An Exploration of the Parallels between Modern Physics and Eastern Mysticism, Berkeley 1975; Kakuska, Rainer (ed.), Andere Wirklichkeiten, Munich 1984; Wolf, Jürgen, Neopaganismus und Stammesreligionen, Münster 1997.

→ Electricity, Esotericism, Natural Science, New Age, Place (Sacred), Psyche

Jürgen Wolf

Prayer / Curse

Definition

1. Prayer is one of the typically religious forms of communication. With prayer, a person turns to the gods—aloud or in a whisper, wordlessly or in thought, as an individual or in a group, for oneself or for others. The purpose is not (or at least not primarily) so that the god will make an appearance (epiphany); rather in conformity with the emphatically asymmetrical relationship between gods and human beings, prayer is usually formulated as a request, so that it frequently includes the promise—in the form of a vow—of a return gift in case the request should be granted. However, prayer can be directed to the addressees out of, or as, gratitude—in this case the gift often consists of the prayer itself, and it can serve as penitence and atonement. A further common motive for praying (and at the same time its content) is the cry of pain in the experience of suffering. Frequently, special preparations for prayer are executed, first and foremost purification (a person bathes, dons special clothing, subordinates certain activities, abstains from nourishment) and meditation (one 'enters oneself,' recollects oneself, confesses).

Form and Function of Prayer

The basic form of prayer emerges from its function. Quite often, it is structured as follows: (a) The invocation, or appeal (epiclesis), is the supplication to be heard and enumeration/citation of the functions of the god invoked. Thus, this part of the prayer usually consists of a form of the verb 'listen,' or 'hear,' and the naming of the name and surname of the god addressed—as well as a reminder of help previously bestowed, which can base the new request. (b) Presentation of the wish, the request may follow, and (in a given case) statement of the identity of the one beseeching. And (c) the pronouncement of a vow concludes the prayer. In the individual case, to be sure, this structure is variable, and the spontaneous ejaculation in particular can take essentially different structural forms. The wording can also be precisely established; and since, according to folk ideas, the effectiveness of prayers is enhanced when the supplicant carries their wording in written form, similarly to that of an amulet, the tradition of prayer has shown a very early tendency to fixation in writing. However, along with formulae of prayer, and stereotyped prayers, frequently, perhaps even in the majority of cases (for example, in ancient Greece), prayers are spontaneously worded, with, perhaps, the inclusion of consecrated turns of expression. Just as with form and content, the point in time and the place at which prayer is offered can be prescribed. As a rule, prayers are components of rituals, and are, for their part, nearly always accompanied by ritual actions (libation, lighting of incense, offering of baked good and fruits, music). Therefore prayers are temporally and spatially located, for one, by the ritual → calendar, and for another, by the specific construction of a given ritual. Further, the identity of the divinity to whom the prayer is addressed, and the request addressed, can also determine time and place. To gods whose ascription is to the early morning hours, prayer is made at that time; powers of darkness are conjured by night; a request for a rich harvest is offered at the time of the sowing. If the god is addressed through a sacred image, the latter usually determines the place of the prayer. As a rule, the direction faced during the prayer is also of importance, for example that of the dwelling of the deity to whom the prayer is addressed. Ordinarily, the prayer is accompanied by appropriate gestures. These 'repeat' and perfect the received form of the greeting and the expression of reverence—its 'standard' social and political accompaniment. The original posture in prayer for the Indo-European region can be determined to be that of uplifted arms, with palms turned upward, toward the sky, or turned toward the sacred image. Likewise typical is the standing posture of the person praying: prostrations such as the → proskynesis are separate developments in individual cultures. In ancient times, prayers were offered aloud: only 'listening' could a deity 'hear a prayer.' This practice has been given up in Christianity, except for only a few rites, as, for example, the lustratio, the ritual of cleansing the hands before, and sitting after, prayer.

A woman from Bali prays for a deceased family member. In her hands she holds an offering of trimmed palm leaves and fern. Some weeks after a death in the family, the relatives gather for the purification ceremony (here, in a small temple precinct near Sanur), to pray for the cleansing of the soul of the departed. (Benita von Behr)

Attitude of Prayer

Since prayer is ultimately related to → communication between human being and non-human entities, there is scarcely a religion without prayer: only the degree of its importance may differ. In → Islam, prayer (ṣalāt) is one of the 'pillars' of the faith, the 'uniting bond of Muslims.' Prayer is the most unitary and most precisely regulated of Islamic rituals of faith. The numerous Qur'anic prescriptions for prayer, however, needed ultimate

Mechanization of prayer: In Elista, in Russia, Buddhist women start prayer wheels. The practice of reciting appellatory formulae (→ Mantra), like the renowned “Om mani padme hum” (formula of Boddhisattva Avalokiteshvara), in order to gain religious merit, is very widespread in Central Asia, especially in the Tantric tradition (→ Tantra). With a rotating cylinder on which the appeal is written, this procedure can be multiplied and accelerated. (Hubert Mohr) ritual establishment through religious law (fiqh). This regulation could occasion the development of regional and school-specific peculiarities, over and above the prescriptions of praying five times a day, as well as of the specific sequence of standing, bowing (rak'a), and prostrating oneself toward Mecca. These peculiarities, such as the accompanying regulations for hand washing required for ritual purity at prayer, or the position of hands and fingers, betray a Muslim's geographical origin and specific religious membership.

Prayer is an essential element of religious praxis. The faithful begin each day with a prayer, end it in the evening with another, pray at every meal, and pray at the beginning of every undertaking in order to ensure its success. And whenever they find themselves in a difficult, perhaps even seemingly hopeless situation, believers take refuge in prayer. And even when, for one reason or another, the god addressed fails to grant the request, the prayer brings about alleviation: its mere verbalization helps remove the burden of fear or need. Faith in the power of prayer is so great, that prayer is ascribed not only the positive effect of problem and conflict solving, but harmful effects, as well.

Negative Prayer: The Curse

2. The bewitching prayer of the curse is, as it were, the negative counterpart of impetration: just as the latter may be a prayer for the benefit of another, the curse conjures up the insalubrious, the unwholesome, upon the other, either as a future threat, or, indeed, as present catastrophe. Often it is assumed that, once the curse is pronounced, the desired result is produced almost ‘automatically,’ so that, as a rule, the curse cannot be rescinded. Infertility of human being, animal, and earth, misfortune, disease, or death are the consequences. Indeed, whenever it occurs, the insalubrious tends to be considered as resting on a curse. The pronouncement of the curse words is ordinarily accompanied by gestures, for instance by the striking of the earth with both hands. It is not necessary, however, that the curse word be spoken: certain behavior, most of all the violation of the sacred, is not immediately punished by God or the gods; however these do arouse divine wrath (ira deorum, Lat., "wrath of the gods"): the one thus punished is cursed, and is then a danger to the community, from which she or he must now be banned.

3. A special kind of curse—in the form of a conditional self-cursing—is the oath, which guarantees the absolute binding force of a declaration (for example, the contractual word). This is the strongest means known to premodern societies to place a person under an obligation, a function that it has retained to our own day, even in Western culture. A distinction must be made between the 'promissory' oath and the 'confirmatory' ('assertory') oath. The former presents an explanation of the will for the future, the latter reinforces an act or perception belonging to the past. The pronouncement of an oath involves the 'oath formula' and the 'oath rite.' The 'oath formula' is a 'swearing' that reinforces the truth of a pronouncement—swearing that something 'is the truth'—and at the same time the naming of the unwholesome phenomena to ensure in case of a breach. Oftentimes the oath calls upon extra-human witnesses (". . . so help me God"), which makes a lie, or a breach, a sacrilege. The oath rite arrays the formula of the oath in a determinate outer form that enhances the obliging character of the word. Thus, raising the right hand, for example, touching various objects (for instance, the Bible), and/or pouring out water and other fluids, are actions that may accompany the enunciation of the words of the oath. Here, the object touched can be the 'pledge' that is deposited, to secure the effectiveness of the oath: one's own body, that of another person, that of an animal, weapons and other battle-gear, and much more.

Literature

Aubriot-Sévin, Danièle, Prière et conceptions religieuses en Grèce ancienne, Paris 1992; Faraone, Christopher A., Ancient Greek Love Magic, Cambridge 1999; Gager, John G. (ed.), Curse Tablets and Binding Spells from the Ancient World, New York 1999; Heiler, Friedrich, Das Gebet. Eine religionsgeschichtliche und religionspsychologische Untersuchung, Munich [2]1920; Heinemann, Joseph, Prayer in the Talmud: Forms and Patterns, Berlin 1977; Plescia, Joseph, The Oath and Perjury in Ancient Greece, Tallahassee 1970; van der Horst, Pieter W., "Silent Prayer in Antiquity," in: Idem, Hellenism—Judaism—Christianity: Essays on Their Interaction, Kampen 1994, 252-277; Versnel, Hendrik S., Faith, Hope and Worship: Aspects of Religious Mentality in the Ancient World, Leiden 1981.

→ Amulet, Communication, Language, Magic, Orientation, Ritual, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Thomas Oberlies

Pre- and Early History

1. The subject or object of pre- and early history is the entire section of the history of humanity that is accessible only through unwritten, material remnants of human activity. However, the presentation is usually limited to the period from the Old Stone (Paleolithic) Age to the end of the New Stone (Neolithic) Age in Europe. The time-span, then, would be from the moment of evidence of first human artifacts (stone tools), some two-and-one-half to three million years ago, to the sedentary movement in the 'Neolithic Revolution' (c. 10,000–7,000 BCE). The absence of written testimonials presents the greatest problem for the investigation of religious conceptualizations in this time. Structures of belief, mythological concepts, or ritual practices, are therefore not directly accessible through personal declarations on the part of the media or agents of religion. Their existence and descriptions must be concluded from objects or signs, decorations and painting, or behavior with the dead, in a scientifically reconstructed social context.

The Paleolithic Age

2. Ever since the early twentieth century, research on the Paleolithic Age centered its interest on the Southern French and Northern Spanish picture → caves: Altamira (paintings c. 12,000 BCE, discovered 1879), Lascaux (paintings c. 14,000 BCE, discovered 1940), Chauvet Grotto (paintings c. 28,000 BCE, discovered 1994). Since the recognition of their great age, they have been seen as the key expression of the religious thought of the human being of the ice age (homo sapiens sapiens) in Europe. Interpretations of the picture caves in earlier centuries were strongly dependent on the prevailing Zeitgeist, and on notions of human spiritual and cultural development. The paintings there were looked upon as random scrawls of humanity's 'childhood,' or as an expression of 'hunting magic.'

There were besides, in archaeological finds, numerous ornaments for the body, small works of art, and graves, to which latter a more extensive meaning must be attributed. Here, a special behavior with the dead is demonstrable as early as the time of the Neanderthals (e.g., at Spy in Belgium, or at La Ferrassie, in the French Department of Dordogne, both c. 60,000 BCE). A social, reflective engagement with life and death is therefore no exceptionable earmark of the modern person.

There is certainly no doubt that the public, ritual life of the Paleolithic Age was dominated by a fixation on the great beasts of the ice age—bears, mammoths, bison, stags, wild horses, for example (→ Animal). However, art cannot be compressed into a unitary schema. It was probably used in connection with rituals of initiation, and with 'shamanic' conceptualizations, as well as with experiences of trance and hallucination ('grotesque'/'surreal' manifestations, or those of → composite beings). Thus, the religious world of the Paleolithic was just as rich and complex as we know it to be later, with historical and contemporary hunters and gatherers.

Neolithic Revolution

3. With the end of the ice age, some 10,000 years ago, it was not only environmental conditions that underwent a change. All over the world, at the same time, occurred societal and economic revolutions traditionally designated under the heading of the Neolithic Revolution. Permanent settlements with large dwellings appear, crop farming and animal husbandry are introduced, there are objects and constructions of an unambiguously religious and ritual character. Simultaneously, we find uniform, ritualized styles of burial. These relics manifest altered attitudes toward natural landscape, places of settlement, and death.

In the earliest settlements in the Near East and in Southern Europe (Çatal Huyuk, c. 7,000–6,500 BCE; Jericho, c. 8,000 BCE), quite a large number of clay figures were found, often representing women, and having exaggerated sex characteristics. Frequently, a connection was postulated here with the

'Venus figures' of the later Old Stone Age, and a fertility cult was construed (→ Matriarchate/Patriarchate). Genuine instances of continuity, however, are scarcely to be supposed. More probably, it is a matter of figures of ancestors, representing the continued presence of the dead in these sedentary communities. To this observation corresponds the frequent burial of the dead in individual graves within the settlements, or in their immediate vicinity.

At the same time, even in the earliest phases of Neolithic settlement in Central Europe ('linear-bond ceramic culture,' c. 6,000–4,500 BCE), one finds 'earthworks,' even places closed in with ditches and walls, without the remains of construction, presumably serving for community rituals. Sacrificial offerings deposited in excavated places, or intentionally destroyed ceramics, show that these constructions by no means served purely profane ends.

Megalithic Cultures

4. With these installations, finally, the groundwork was created for the monumental megalithic constructions of later phases of the Neolithic in Western Europe (c. 4,800–2,800 BCE). Especially striking are the 'henge' monuments (e.g., Stonehenge) in the British Isles, as well as the great number of linear or circular arrangements of stones that appear throughout the Northwest European region. These constructions seem to represent complex imaginary worlds, that demonstrate strong connections to hunting and gathering traditions—worlds in which human activities, conditions of landscape, and astronomical relations (e.g., summer or winter solstice; → Orientation, → Druids) were bound up altogether directly. These purely cultic constructions were accompanied by large megalithic graves (prehistoric graves, dolmens). Their existence shows a transformation from the tradition of the single burial to that of the collective, and thus testifies to basic alterations in the structure of society. An analysis of the human remains in these graves shows that often direct burials did not take place here, but the dead were first submitted to various rituals such as the removal of their flesh, or their dismembering ('secondary burials'). The social changes involved not only societal organization, but also ideas about human beings and their bodies, the relation between current and mythological time, and their relation to the inhabited natural landscape.

Discovery of Prehistory

5. Archeological research has not only influenced our understanding of past societies, and the worlds of their conceptualizations. They have also had profound effects on Western modernity's image of history and the human being. Since the general establishment of an academic archaeology in the nineteenth century, and the demonstration of the mighty spaces of time over which human history has transpired, there have been conflicts with the most varied religious interest groups. Together with the simultaneous development of the → theory of evolution (→ Darwinism; Evolutionism), for biblically or scripture-oriented Christians the discovery of prehistory very often seemed to have moved the human being far from a divine plan of creation, and to make her and him the product of material processes—ecological processes, and those of natural history. In the present, widespread disillusionment with the principles of the modern age leads once more to a rejection of a scientific understanding of the human being's development and history. For example, today, in certain American states (such as Kansas), the Christian creation myth must be taught in schools as a developmental model (creationism) of equal status with the theory of evolution, and the collapse of the biblical historical image may possibly be less than complete and irreversible.

Political Ideologization and Modern Reception

6. On the other hand, not only irritation, but also an uncommon power of attraction and fascination attach to prehistoric places, objects, and monuments that, to some extent, sturdily engage the historical fantasy even today. One cause for this is certainly their ambiguity, owing to the missing scriptural testimonials, through which a multiplicity of interpretations becomes possible. Their structure, offering open possibilities of interpretation, as well as powerful effect, permits prehistory easily to become a projection screen for various and frequently contradictory ideologies. National Socialism, for instance, not only created a powerful Teutonic myth (→ Teutons) but also conducted broad and large-scale excavations of prehistoric settlements, in order to prove the National Socialist constructs of history and culture. After the Second World War, Eastern European and Soviet archaeology was connected, for decades, to the cultural concepts of historical materialism and its explanations of historical processes. Examples of this kind show how totalitarian state-systems not only are anxious to inscribe themselves in the experiential world in material form, but also, for their ends, to reinterpret the remnants of the past. At present, prehistory is increasingly becoming the field of a series of romanticizing projections of concepts of distance from modernity and civilization. Of special importance here are the megalithic monuments of the Neolithic era, so eagerly cited by Neo-Celtic groups (→ Druids; Celts) and neo-shamans alike. Common to both is not only their idea of a utopian past, a past with monuments of this kind, but also their own spiritual explanations of the world, posited as a substitute and alternative to the Western, scientific image of the world. Finally, an important role is played here, once more, by feminist ideas and concepts—these having further-reaching implications, however, not primarily relating to the European Megalithic Age.

Literature

Bahn, Paul G., The Cambridge Illustrated History of Prehistoric Art, Cambridge 1998; Bahn, Paul G./Vertut, Jean, Images of the Ice Age, London 1988 (many illustrations); Champion, Timothy et al., Prehistoric Europe, London 1984; Clottes, Jean/Lewis-Williams, David, The Shamans of Prehistory: Trance and Magic in the Painted Caves, New York 1998; Cunliffe, Barry (ed.), The Oxford Illustrated Prehistory of Europe, Oxford 1994; Feder, Kenneth L., The Past in Perspective: An Introduction to Human Prehistory, Mountain View 1996; Francfort, Henri-Paul/Hamayon, Roberte N. (eds.), The Concept of Shamanism: Uses and Abuses, Budapest 2001; Hutton, Ronald, The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles: Their Nature and Legacy, Malden etc. 1991; Ivakhiv, Adrian J., Claiming Sacred Ground: Pilgrims and Politics at Glastonbury and Sedona, Bloomington 2001; Peregrine, Peter N./Ember, Melvin (eds.), Encyclopedia of Prehistory, 9 vols., New York etc. 2001–2002; Prince, Ruth/Riches, David, The New Age in Glastonbury: The Construction of Religious Movements, New York 2001; Whittle, Alasdair, Europe in the Neolithic: The Creation of New Worlds, Cambridge 1996.

→ Cave, Celts, Druids, European History of Religion, History, New Age, Place (Sacred), Paganism/Neopaganism, Shamanism, Teutons

Martin Porr

Predestination

The theological concept of predestination means divine 'pre-determination' to a permanent status with respect to salvation. Predestination primarily concerns the lot of the human being in the hereafter. As a concept, it is not mentioned in the Hebrew Bible but in the New Testament, in Rom 8:28-30 and Eph 1:1-14. Some theologians assume that these passages deal with an offer of salvation open to all persons. Separation into elect and damned follows only in the Last Judgment. While eternal salvation awaits the redeemed, sinners are condemned to eternal damnation.

In terms of the history of theology, predestination is an answer to the question of whence → evil comes into the world. Predestination tries to clarify the relation between divine predetermination and human freedom, between divine election and human fault, between salvation and damnation. In the doctrine founded by him, the Reformer Calvin (1509–1564) takes his own point of departure from the concept that, at the very birth of each Christian, it is established whether he or she will be elected or rejected by God at the end of her or his life. Accordingly, Calvin concludes to the 'state of grace' of a person by way of that person's indefatigable work in his or her calling. Accordingly, the success of the → work is accounted a sign of election.

Apart from Christianity, predestination is found especially in Islam. Although the Qur'an offers no unambiguous pronouncements in this respect, the doctrine of predestination has prevailed in Islamic orthodoxy (→ Fatalism). The idea of karma, in Indian conceptions, does not fit under predestination. Resting on the premise of a causal relation between the deeds of one's previous life and one's reincarnation, karma emphasizes persons' own responsibility for their destiny.

Literature

Basinger, David/Basinger, Randall (eds.), Predestination and Free Will: Four Views of Divine Sovereignty and Human Freedom, Downers Grove 1986; Kraus, Georg, Vorherbestimmung: Traditionelle Prädestinationslehre im Licht gegenwärtiger Theologie, Freiburg 1977; Watt, William Montgomery, Free Will and Predestination in Early Islam, London 1948.

→ Ethics/Morals, Evil, Fatalism, Will (Free)

Ingeborg Siggelkow

Prejudices / Stereotypes

What is a Prejudice?

1. Prejudices, defined as stable and consistent negative attitudes toward another group, and stereotype, a complex of convictions concerning the personal characteristics of a group of persons, are intimately interrelated. All theories of prejudice hold that an attitude toward a group is connected with the perception of its attributes, whether they are seen as positive or negative. It is true that there is disagreement on the direction of the causality:

the attitude of someone toward a group can be determined by the characteristics that she or he ascribes to the persons of the group; or conversely, the stereotypes can change if the overall attitude changes. In the milieu of a Christian anti-Semitism, the Jews' continuation in their religion is perceived negatively, as 'stubbornness'; on the other hand, when the attempt at conversion is given up, the same circumstances seem positive, as 'attachment to tradition' and 'perseverance in the faith.' Along with the cognitive dimension of the stereotype, two further dimensions of prejudice are distinguished: one emotional (antipathy), and the other conative, the dimension affecting behavior (discrimination). It is true that prejudices are individual attitudes, affects, and manners of behavior. At the same time, however, they are social facts: an individual inherits and expresses them vis-à-vis other groups, because he or she belongs to a group, and is acting on the strength of that membership.

The definition of prejudice as a negative judgment on all or the majority of the members of a group escapes the assumption suggested in the etymology that a prejudice is a hasty judgment based on faulty information (Lat., praeiudicium, either a 'preliminary' or a 'precipitant decision,' a 'normative example'). It is observable, however, that prejudices continue to prevail even with more exact knowledge of the objects of the prejudice, and that these prejudices cannot usually be changed merely by the acquisition of additional information. Furthermore, this definition would leave open the question of whether and how prejudices are distinct from mere false judgments. This objection also bears on definitions that understand prejudices as the result of a false thought process—principally as too strong a generalization of single experiences, in the sense of: "All Scientologists are . . ." or "The Buddhists. . . ." Generalizations are unavoidable in nearly all processes of judgment, whenever statements are to reach beyond an individual case. Here, as well, there are no differences, or at most only 'gradual' ones, between prejudices and 'normal' judgments. In other definitions, the moment of rigidity is introduced as an attribute of prejudice: prejudices are judgments not revised even in the presence of information to the very contrary. Thus, prejudices are 'dogmatic judgments.' Even here, however, problems arise. By no means all inflexible positions—for instance in church dogma—are regarded as vehicles of prejudice. On the other hand, for contemporaries there is often the problem of indetermination: it is especially groups engaged in conflict with one another that see reality each in its own way. Prejudices are closely connected with group conflicts, and there is rarely a third, 'objective,' party to resolve disagreement over the truth content of judgments.

Social Undesirability

Thus, when neither simple error, nor a lack of information, nor overgeneralization, nor intransigence suffices to distinguish prejudices from other judgments, then what criterion of distinction is to be used? Actually, the point of departure even of an investigation into prejudice is always the prejudicial character of certain judgments, without any verification at all of their reality content, or their conformity to the facts. It has struck some scholars that the concept of prejudice appears essentially determined by its normative, moral content. Prejudices differ from other judgments not on the basis of any specific inner qualities, therefore, nor by virtue of a defective process of origin, but solely in terms of their social undesirability. Thus, prejudices seem to be simple social judgments that offend against specifically human values, against the norms of rationality, of justice (equality), and of humane sentiment. In raising the demand for rationality, prejudice appears as a defect in a 'reality check,' for example by way of faulty processing of information, or ignorance of certain connections, or overgeneralization. In terms of justice, prejudice appears as an unequal treatment of persons. If it is peaceful coexistence that is in question, then it is intolerance and rejection of the other as a fellow human being and individual. On grounds of its normative content, the concept of prejudice is not absolute, then, but must always be defined in relation to an existent system of values, namely as a deviation from the standards of knowledge and morality of a society. The existence of prejudices, therefore, is historical, and variable for each social group (religious communities, ethnic groups). What today counts for prejudice in public opinion (witches, Jewish murder of Christ) may have once belonged to the normal store of knowledge of churches and the public.

Insight into Prejudices . . .

2. Recognition of prejudices, therefore, depends upon one's capacity to make a critical review and verification of one's own judgments and evaluations. Part of this is the measure of self-reflection that perceives the opinions of others and their views of the world.

. . . in European History of Religion

(a) → European history of religion can thus be read as an—often painful—process of reaching self-recognition, and appreciating a pluralism of opinion. It was the age of the great voyages of discovery that forced European civilization to accept this new worldview, as the Eurocentric world image was shaken, along with the seeming obviousness of its customs and convictions. With the confessional split, dating back to the Reformation, seemingly secure truths of faith became doubtful, and finally, the → Enlightenment regarded itself as a program of bringing light into the darkness of prejudice and 'ignorance.' The Catholic Middle Ages became a symbol of intellectual 'darkness' ('obscurantism') and prejudice, and the demand for (religious) tolerance was intimately bound up with insistence on a prejudice-free attitude of mind (→ Freedom of Religion). Thus, criticism on the part of the representatives of the Enlightenment was directed against a dogmatic claim to true judgments on the part of the religions. The latter were reproached with relying for their maintenance on deception, ignorance, and credulousness (d'Holbach, 1761): now they must justify themselves before the court of → reason. The Enlightenment thereby formulated one of the key questions to be dealt with in the matter of prejudice: that of "human interest in knowledge" (J. Habermas), of the manipulation of judgments in the service of determinate interests—prejudices, then, are 'interested lies.' Both of the other core questions, as well, come out of the Enlightenment: that of the relationship between reality and judgment, and the question of whether prejudices are actually the result of an inadequate effort of the powers of intellectual faculties.

. . . and in Research into Prejudices

(b) Scientific research into prejudice begins in the 1920s, with the establishment of the new disciplines of sociology and psychology. Here, three strands of theory can be roughly distinguished:

(1) Psychodynamic approaches, or those on the part of theory of personality, among which → psychoanalysis is to be named in the first place, that reduce the formation of prejudices and stereotypes to psychic conflicts, an authoritarian upbringing, or other deficiencies in the forming of the personality. These theories have recognized the central psychic mechanisms of → projection and displacement of aggression, by whose means foreign groups are made scapegoats for one's own inner and outer conflicts.

(2) Group sociological and socio-psychological theories that see the conditions for the emergence of prejudices in group conflicts or situations of competition, in which one's own group (and thereby one's own person) is compared and seen as superior, and the out-group is devaluated.

(3) Theories of the psychology of cognition, in which the processes of perception and of information processing are investigated for their function in the formation of stereotypes and prejudices.[1]

Religious Prejudices

3. If prejudices and stereotypes are produced and shaped in connection with competition and conflicts among groups, and then in turn maintain these conflicts as traditional views, then it is to be expected that the relationship among the various religions and religious communities will likewise be marked by prejudices and stereotyped perceptions.

Religious Competition and Conflicts

a) This scenario will hold especially for situations in which the relations of influence of the religions—their area of validity, legal position, → prestige, or economic support—shift, to the disadvantage of these religions. The rise of another religion is perceived as a threat to one's own position, and leads to a negative view of the competitor, and an identification with one's own belief system. Both developments, the perception of an external threat, and a powerful religious mobilization on the part of one's own religion, for example in the Crusades, or in the wars of religion, work to the advantage both of an extremely negative view of the other religious groups in question, and to the application of violence, whether for conversion or annihilation.

Other religions—or, to a certain extent, only particular currents in them—are suspected of mounting a kind of crusade, or → holy war, to establish their own predominance. A current fear of → fundamentalism in Western European countries imputes expansionist tendencies to Islam, or to a particular fundamentalist current. Here it becomes clear how powerfully historically transmitted ideas of a 'Turkish danger' keep on working, and can connect with today's associations of Islam with → terrorism or intolerance, for instance in the persecution of author Salman Rushdie (→ Fatwa; Khomeini). Currently a grasp for political power, and even world dominance, is imputed to the Church of → Scientology.

Anti-Judaism

Best researched are the prejudices directed against Judaism in Christian anti-Semitism. In spite of their catastrophic effects, including the → Shoah itself, these prejudices are only slowly being dismantled. After all, after 1945 anti-Semitism was no longer a → collective representation emerging from a concrete historical experience of cohabitation with Jews.

Islam's prejudices against Judaism are also marked by the relation of succession—which, on the one side, protected the Jews (as well as the Christians) as precursors of Islam, but on the other side opposed them, and ascribed them a subordinate, protected place (dhimmi status). → Muhammad branded the Jews as enemies of Islam. They were designated an unworthy people, with a rebellious, malevolent character, who had corrupted and benighted Sacred Scripture (Suras 3:63; 5:85). To this day, however, the Islamic stereotype of the Jews is not so much that of a powerful enemy, as that of a disdained inferior group (→ Minorities). Accordingly, acts of violence seldom occur; instead, measures of discrimination characterize the arrangement.

The close connection between self-image and foreign or enemy image is readily recognizable in the case of the völkisch and Germanic groups of believers in their rejection of Christianity. Against their own background of an emphasis on the stark individual, and the atoning deed, Christianity's universalistic doctrine of grace and salvation seems to these groups, in the terms of Friedrich → Nietzsche, a "religion of slaves and compassion." We find a like contrasting effect in some currents of contemporary feminist theology, when it complains, in its quest for the "concealed Matriarchate in the Old Testament,"[2] that God's original male-female oneness was destroyed by the Jewish Father God. Here the ancient 'deicide' motif emerges once more in a transformed mode. This God of Judaism is designated a jealous and vengeful tribal God, to whom a Jesus bearing a feminine connotation is then opposed—a picture utterly attached to the negative anti-Jewish stereotypes maintained in Christianity, which latter, with polemical intent, had distinguished the 'God of vengeance' of the Hebrew Bible from the New Testament 'God of love.'

Myths of Secrecy and Conspiracy

b) The exclusion of 'unbelievers' is favorable for the development of prejudices, and of partly fantastic conceptualizations of the religious practice of other cults. → Secrecy offers numerous tacks for allegations and fears. Well known is the ancient idea that, in the Temple in Jerusalem, the Jews adored an ass or its head; today, the practice of many sects, as for example the case of → Scientology, is subject to creeping rumors and myths of conspiracy, as we know them historically when it comes to → Freemasons and Jews. In the Middle Ages, and early modern times, allegations of (literary) conspiracy were raised usually against anti-Christian heretical and magical activities.

The 'Inner Front': Deviationists and Heretics

c) It is precisely dogmatic religions, however, religions producing an orthodoxy, that have to battle not only religious competition from without, but the 'deviators' within. Dogmatics erects zones of division, to separate out deviating concepts and practices that are fought as → heresies. Heretics are accused of error, and their teachings are disqualified as 'daydreams.' Here as well, wild prejudices often creep in concerning the rituals of these heretical groups. They desecrate the Cross of Christ, reject the Mass, commit collective sexual perversions, practice witchcraft, and so forth. With the excluded groups, this stigmatization then leads in the opposite direction, so that they themselves see orthodoxy as error, and hold it to be the 'false Church' (ecclesia malignantium, Lat., 'church of the malevolent'). The competing religious groups then see themselves reciprocally imprisoned in prejudice and error. Thus, for their own part, the Cathari called themselves the "Church of God," while the Catholics were heretics.[3]

Exoticism

d) Stereotyped conceptions need not always emerge from conflict. Particularly toward culturally and geographically remote religions, with which there is no direct competition, the undertone of prejudices and stereotypes is not so much one of hostility, but rather one of amused surprise. Usually, very little is known about these religions, so that only certain practices, mostly 'curious' practices, are seized upon as features and circulated as stereotypes. One wonders at the sacred cows of the Hindus, and contrasts them with

India's hunger (→ Animal II), the veiling of Muslim women (→ Veil), the prohibition against eating the meat of certain animals (→ Eating/Nourishment), the → circumcision of Jews, or the Good Friday processions in Andalusia (→ Mediterranean Region). Since stereotypes are mostly formed along inter-group differences, and in comparison with one's own group, religious practices that seem extreme are the ones used preferentially, pars pro toto (Lat., 'a part for the whole') for those of the religion across the board. The latter can then easily appear as being of a completely different kind—'irrational' or 'exotic.' Such stereotyping, as long as it is used as a series of 'cognitive short formulae' for the simplification of perception, and is unapproachable by interaction, is dissolved or differentiated by more precise information. On the contrary, prejudices, owing to their emotional charge, their connection with interests, and their function of unburdening the psyches of individuals or groups, are only with difficulty dispelled by purely factual information.

Secular versus Religious Systems of Values

e) Stereotyping can take on expressly hostile, militant traits, however, when the foreign religious practice comes in conflict with one's own cultural norms. Thus, in the matter of animal protection, a long, still persistent battle is waged against kosher butchery. Similarly, the role of woman, often, for example in Islam, is criticized as 'medieval' on the basis of universalistic norms of equality. Muslim girls' scarves can then, as recently in France, lead to a conflict of norms between a laicist state and religious custom. But this conflict can also apply to one's own religion or church, such as when, in questions of sexual morality or → celibacy, the official position, over the course of time, is branded as exaggerated adogmatism. Here secular and ecclesial value systems come into conflict. This dilemma can lead to a loss of esteem for church tradition across the board, as something 'old-fashioned,' and the abandonment of the Church. Conversely, for instance in the case of völkisch German belief, particularistic norms can lead to a criticism of the universalism of Christianity: Christianity is said to have ignored 'natural racial boundaries,' and, by failing to consider racial and ethnic differences, to have forced the Germans to accept a religion of 'alien blood.' By way of the latter example, it becomes clear that, often, religious prejudices do not exist in isolation, but are used as tools for racist and national political interests; so that, as for example in the conflicts in → Northern Ireland, → Bosnia, or Kashmir, they deepen divisions, and launch a great potential for destruction.

Media, Forms, and Places of Prejudices

4. Religious competition and conflict strongly suggest that members of the other religion would wish to cause harm to one's own religion. The supposition that the latter would profane and harm sacred scriptures and other things sacred is already present in the prejudice of the 'profanation of the Host,' but is still very widespread today. The rumor that a Hindu officer in Srinagar (Kashmir) had used pages of the Qur'an as toilet paper unleashed a week-long rebellion among the Muslims. Other narratives of prejudice have reported that Jews urinated in the Mass wine. The injury need not always be against sacred objects, of course. A Muslim family near Bombay was convinced that their milkman, a Hindu, had watered down their milk.

Group Legends

The concept of 'narratives' should indicate that prejudices are not shaped ad hoc, but become group legends (→ Social Myths and Fantasy Images). The latter collect and transmit 'realities' in such a way that every member of the religious group knows them and many hold them as true. Religious narratives supply prototypes (in Christianity, for instance, the image of Judas, the Betrayer, later applied to the Jews in the Dreyfus Affair, or in the First World War). They are handed on and learned through sermons and examples in the churches, and popular graphics in the printed media. Legends of the saints, and devotions emerging from them (e.g., the anti-Jewish cults sparked by rumors of a 'sacrifice' of ritual murder) likewise form an important medium for the spread of prejudices against another religion.

Experts

This transmission is reinforced when religious groups have their own confessional schools, and when 'ideologues' and self-styled religious experts help solidify the prejudices through their 'expertise,' such as Catholic clergyman and professor of theology August Rohling (1839–1931), who held himself out as a Talmudic expert, attributed to the → Talmud an appeal for the murder and robbery of Christians, and the subjugation of Christianity. Especially when the sacred texts are composed in another language and script, they offer a favorable projection screen for stereotypes and prejudices.

Propaganda

With the expansion of technological opportunities for the spread of reports and propaganda (from printing, radio, and television to the Internet), naturally the spread of stereotyped ideas and prejudices is facilitated—as well as, to be sure, the opportunities for combating them. In dictatorships and totalitarian states, where alternative opinions are suppressed, there exists the danger, of course, that, by way of their massive influence on the public, hostile images will be generated and even believed.

1. See Duckitt 1992.
2. Weiler, Gerda. Ich verwerfe im Lande die Kriege. Das verborgene Matriarchat im Alten Testament, Munich [2]1986.
3. Fichtenau, Heinrich, Ketzer und Professoren. Häresie und Vernunftglaube im Hochmittelalter, Munich 1992, 86.

Literature

Bergmann, Werner (ed.), Error without Trial: Psychological Research on Antisemitism, Berlin/New York 1988; Davis, Frederick, The Jew and Deicide: An Archetype, University Press of America 2003; Duckitt, John, the Psychology of Prejudice, New York 1992; Gerber, Jan S., "Anti-Semitism and the Muslim World," in: Berger, David (ed.), History and Hate: The Dimensions of Anti-Semitism, Philadelphia etc. 1986, 73-94; Habermas, Jürgen, Knowledge and Human Interest, Cambridge 1987; Schmidtchen, Gerhard, Zwischen Kirche und Gesellschaft. Forschungsbericht über die Umfragen der Gemeinsamen Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, Freiburg 1973; Zanna, M. P./Olsen, J. M. (eds.), Psychology of Prejudice: The Ontario Symposium, vol. 7, Hillsdale 1993; Ziege, Eva-Maria, "Die 'Mörder der Göttinnen,'" in: Schoeps, Julius H./Schlör, Joachim (eds.), Antisemitismus. Vorurteile und Mythen, Munich 1995, 180-195.

→ Anti-Semitism, Collective Representations, Conflict/Violence, Gender Stereotypes, Group (Religious), Heresy, Secrecy, Stigmata/Stigmatics, Values, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Werner Bergmann

Prestige

1. What is generally understood by 'prestige' is an evaluation by which individuals or groups assign one another a rank in the social world. Thus, prestige stands in close connection with the concepts of honor and recognition, which likewise bear on the aspect of social evaluation, although the accents they place are not altogether the same. The concept was introduced into scientific discussion in the early twentieth century, when Ludwig Leopold (1916) undertook to outline the psychological dimensions, and Max → Weber (1922) the sociological.

What is Prestige, and How Does It Function? Theories in the Social Sciences

Prestige as 'Symbolical Capital' (Pierre Bourdieu)

2. a) In recent discussion in the social sciences, it is above all the reciprocal connection among differences in prestige and fortune, differences in education and influence, that have been emphasized.[1] Thus, just as one's schooling and income can enhance one's prestige, so also is the degree of one's social evaluation translatable into fortune, education, and influence. The last, the useful aspect of prestige, has been systematically registered by French sociologist Pierre Bourdieu, in terms of his concept of prestige as 'symbolical capital': like other sorts of capital, prestige can be inherited, accumulated, and reinvested. Fortune and income ('economic capital'), connections and influence ('social capital'), as well as education ('cultural capital') find their visible expression in the symbolical capital of social esteem. Granted, this translation process is complicated. Sheer money, or an academic title, do not automatically precipitate out in symbolical capital. These need expression in sign, and a process of social recognition, in order for symbolical capital to become effective actually as capital. In other words: from social position, which can be calculated objectively, no corresponding prestige automatically follows. Thus, for example, a profession like that of realtor or credit lender can bring with it an extremely high income, but extremely low prestige, while, for example, the profession of a nurse or pastor, whose income will be relatively small, will enjoy an altogether high esteem.

Prestige as a Power Factor, and Result of a Lifestyle (Max Weber)

b) Max Weber has explained 'prestige,' which he regards as equivalent to the concept of 'social honor,' as societies' key cultural quantity.[2] The social order, then, is the result of the distribution of prestige. Social inequality is therefore defined not only by 'class position,' by the possession of economic capital, but also, and normatively, on the 'position of one's standing,' and on inequalities in the distribution of symbolical capital. Prestige, then, is immediately joined to power: the higher the measure of my appraisal, the more power I can develop in my particular social context.

Prestige as a perceptible quantity, according to Weber, comes into being as a function of the patterns of one's lifestyle—social contacts, marriage alliances, activities, church affiliation, and profession—in fact, anything covered by the concept of lifestyle. Recent empirical investigations list, for example, housing, clothing, reading material, sports clubs, favorite bars and restaurants, shops, and vacation places, as well as the 'neighborhood' in which one's dwelling is located. Here it becomes clear that prestige as a component of one's 'standing' is settled principally in the societal area of consumerism, while one's 'class' relates to the area of production.

Prestige through Demonstrative Consumption (Thorstein Veblen)

c) This aspect was a special topic of research by Weber's contemporary, economist Thorstein Veblen (1857-1929). Veblen distinguishes, in his modular analysis of the American upper class, two kinds of constitution of prestige in signs: conspicuous idleness and conspicuous consumption. The former appears in as great a distance as possible from all manner of productive work, whose place is taken by 'unproductive' activities, such as practicing art and music, or learning dead languages. Conspicuous consumption, on the other hand, appears in the use and waste of the most expensive goods possible: "Waste brings prestige."[3] Even servants, wives, friends, and guests, can exercise this consumption, thus winning an even more exalted distinction. It would certainly be worthwhile to investigate, from this viewpoint, the economy of prestige exercised by the papacy and Vatican City State.

Prestige as Criterion of Success in Life (Heinz Kluth)

d) Heinz Kluth's (1957) theory of prestige places another accent on the matter. Kluth's point of departure is that a person acquires prestige in proportion to the importance of that person's contributions of important assets to the group, or even to the entire society. The assets in question associate him or her with acknowledged quantities of value and aim in social life. For the individual, prestige is thereby a thermometer of the success of his or her social existence. This point of view evinces a clear parallel to the Calvinistic determination of one's certitude of salvation in terms of the sign of comfort and wealth. The only difference is that, in the case of Calvinism, economic capital is taken as the standard of existential success, while with Kluth it is symbolical capital that performs this function.

Prestige and Religion

3. The connection of prestige with religion, as well as with confession, is still in great need of systematic investigation. Here it is to be observed that, especially in pre-modern societal formations, the exercise of clerical office is bound up with a high quantum of symbolical capital. In the ancient high cultures, as well as in the hierarchical ladder of the Middle Ages (and of early modern times), the position of → priest or church leader was expressly reckoned as conferring prestige. Indeed, even well into the time of the industrial civilization of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, priests were among the local 'right honorable,' whose symbolical capital was especially linked with social capital, that is, with 'connections' and political influence. Remnants of these structures are found even today in strongly confessional milieus, as well as in the countryside. Prestige signs such as expensive or special → clothing (purple material, special cuts, and head-coverings, such as miters) serve the inner differentiation among the religious hierarchy, somewhat as, in businesses, different car models match certain managerial levels.

Secondly, the question arises of the extent, apart from clerical status, to which mere membership in a confession and practice of religion is bound up with certain prestige values. This question is especially relevant in those social constellations in which confessional majorities and minorities are in confrontation. For example, as is well known, the low legal and political status of Jews in many societies of world history generated, and was generated by, their dearth of prestige and recognition. The members of many other minorities have to battle similar problems, if not always so extreme. Even in a country like the United States, where freedom of religious practice was guaranteed very early in its constitutional order, and where → civil religion supplied a symbolical medium of integration (and was able to bind all confessions into the national community), religious differences, over centuries, have registered in differences in prestige. Thus, until a few decades ago, it was always clear that, in a society of WASPs ('White Anglo-Saxon Protestants'), Catholics and Jews or Afro-Americans not only had less economic and political influence, but were also ranged further down the scale of prestige. This explains why there had been no Catholic President of the United States before John F. Kennedy (1961–1963), even though Catholics had constituted an important (preponderantly Irish- and Italian-American) minority in the United States since the nineteenth century.

Prestige and Morality

4. In his work, Ehre, Prestige und Gewissen (Ger., "Honor, Prestige, and Conscience," 1966), Christian moral theologian Wilhelm Korff has attempted to determine the possible functionality of prestige in the area of morality, from a normative perspective. In honor and prestige, Korff sees means of assigning persons their respective social place in the structure of society. For Korff, then, persons confer this form of recognition upon one another for morally good behavior. One who behaves in an especially moral way gains especially high prestige. Therefore, holds Korff, this person's honor and prestige operate as a means of motivation for virtuous behavior according to the values and norms of the society or religious community in which he or she lives, and thus promotes a behavior that will then benefit the social texture. This thought can also be applied functionalistically. When a religious group or an entire society manages to establish certain moral values as obligatory, it has acquired an efficient means of direction that can dispense with outer pressure in favor of inner direction by way of the → conscience of the individual actors (principle of interiorization).[4]

A Code of Honor

To establish validity for this model of morality even outside confessional ethics is the endeavor of numerous 'codes of honor' (in parties, business enterprises, professional associations, science). Such a code is intended to establish a manner of collective self-obligation that would transcend existing legal determinations, and go beyond the individual conscience. No juridical punishments threaten those who withdraw from this obligation, or who behave in contravention of its determinations, it is true; but these run the risk of losing the social capital of prestige, and therewith social recognition, in the related community and relationships in which they live.

1. Bolte, Karl Martin/Hradil, Stefan, Soziale Ungleichheit in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, Opladen [6]1988, 190ff.
2. Weber 1976, 530ff.
3. Veblen, Thorstein, Theorie der feinen Leute. Eine ökonomische Untersuchung der Institutionen, Frankfurt/M. 1986, 103 (Engl. original: The Theory of the Leisure Class: An Economic Study of Institutions, New York 1899).
4. Cf. Coleman 1990.

Literature

Bourdieu, Pierre, Leçon sur la leçon, Paris 1982; Coleman, James S., Foundations of Social Theory, Cambridge 1990; Kluth, Heinz, Sozialprestige und sozialer Status, Stuttgart 1957; Korff, Wilhelm, Ehre, Prestige, Gewissen, Cologne 1966; Veblen, Thorstein, The Theory of the Leisure Class: An Economic Study of Institutions, New York 1899; Verter, Bradford, "Spiritual Capital: Theorizing Religion with Bourdieu against Bourdieu," in: Sociological Theory 21,2 (2003), 150-174; Vogt, Ludgera, Zur Logik der Ehre in der Gegenwartsgesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Weber, Max, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft.

Grundriß der verstehenden Soziologie, Tübingen [5]1976 ([1]1922) (Engl.: Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, New York 1968); WEGENER, Bernd, Kritik des Prestiges, Opladen 1988.

→ Capitalism, Economy, Ethics/Morals, Group, Society, Values

Ludgera Vogt

Priest / Priestess

1. Priests and priestesses (from Gk., presbýteros, 'older person,' 'elder of the community') are religious → specialists who work as cultic functionaries within a religious community. (They arethus distinguished from theologians, who, as specialists in teaching and dogma, are entrusted with, for example, the exposition of Scripture, and the means of propagation of that teaching and dogma.) The priest's task, in the broad sense, is the execution of → rituals, sacrificial acts, or entire liturgies. Priests are office-holders—that is, they practice their function not spontaneously, but by virtue of their institutionalized position within the society. They are thus distinguished from religious founders, shamans, or prophets, who work by virtue of the abilities ascribed to them, their → charisma. Above and beyond this, the following can be numbered among the sacerdotal (i.e. priestly) duties: address of the divine being in prayer or hymn, the function of → oracle, the imparting of blessings, as well as teaching, the 'cure' (from Lat. curare, 'care') of souls, the support of the needy (→ Charitable organizations), and sometimes even → mission.

General Characteristics

2. a) In spite of all distinctions among specific religions, places, and eras, on the basis of the following attributes, priests are distinguished from the other members of their community.

- They possess priestly authority, frequently conferred on them in a ceremonial act. However, a special formation lies at its foundation, as well: candidates for the priesthood are either determined by right of inheritance (Brahmans in India, Zoroastrianism), or are recruited from among the young members of the community (Christianity), or are elected (ancient Roman religion).
- They have a special social rank, which can actually coincide with the highest civil office (Sumerian-Babylonian priest-kings, the Roman Emperor as Pontifex Maximus—Lat., 'supreme bridge-builder,' i.e., highest medium between heaven and earth), and has his honor officially attested to, receives privileges, but is frequently also subjected to official restrictions (celibacy, nutritional prohibitions).

Other attributes:

- Permanent or temporary insignia in → clothing, haircut, or bodily adornment, especially during the performance of sacred acts.
- A particular task, which may be expressed in a hierarchical priesthood.
- The creation and transmission of, and commentary on, a religious system.
- The instruction of the young.
- Performance of administrative and jurisdictional duties.
- Support at the hands of members of the community.

b) A priesthood is usually formed in the framework of a social differentiation and specialization, especially if sacred acts claim so much time that the practitioner can no longer perform other activities. Many religions have an ambivalent relationship to the priesthood. Muslim communities, for example, do entirely without this office: respected private persons, or the Imam, a chosen dignitary, perform festive rituals, religious instruction, and leadership of the community. In ancient Jewish religion, up to the regency of Saul (c. 1024–1004 BCE), sacred acts were not reserved to priests alone: the head of a family was also permitted to offer sacrifices. The eldest male made legal decisions. In the time of the Kings (c. 1000–597 BCE), a priestly caste was gradually formed from the members of particular tribes. After the destruction of the Temple (70 CE), the priests were replaced by theologians: rabbis, who at first preached, and only later (but not necessarily) led divine service. In Buddhism or Lamaism, the priesthood developed from the community of monks, who acted as preachers and spiritual guides.

The economic maintenance of the priestly rank is always the task of the community. Thus, in Christianity, from the Middle Ages onward, it was the benefice that determined the support of the clergy: land and fortune, as well as ongoing income, such as the contribution of a tenth ('tithe') of all of the agricultural products and income of the community members. In Germany, the transition from a natural to a fiscal economy, and, finally, secularization, led to the introduction of the church tax, which today supports, among other things, pastors' salaries.

Christianity

3. The Christian priesthood formed after the death of the Apostles, and is significant for the transition from a charismatic to an institutionalized religion, which was to be solidified by the introduction of offices. Bishops, priests, and deacons replaced the apostles, prophets, and teachers, who, in the first century, had founded the Christian communities on their journeys, and then served and directed these, until a local priesthood ('clergy') appeared. The latter was necessary for the establishment of a permanent community life at each place—not least of all for the purpose of weakening the influence of the wandering charismatics. (The word 'clergy' is derived from the Greek kléros, 'share,' 'distributed land,' or 'inheritance,' as the priestly office was thought of as having been conferred by God.) This measure resulted from confrontation with the numerous Gnostic communities (→ Gnosticism).

The First Letter of Clement, Bishop of Rome, which was addressed to the Corinthians (c. 90–100 CE), documents a new departure in Christianity, the introduction of the distinction between clergy and laity. With Constantine's recognition and patronage of Christianity, from 313 CE, the Christian priesthood developed, in the sense of a social class with special privileges. The introduction of sacraments (→ Lord's Supper/Eucharist) and rites of passage (such as baptism, burial), that reflect human beings' everyday life and physical existence, and incorporate them into the religious system, had already lent the priestly office its justification, together with an economic basis. This development, which was all but completed in the fourth century, is still maintained in the Roman Catholic Church today. A departure was posited with the Reformed Churches. Martin Luther held that every Christian received a right to proclaim the gospel and confer the sacraments through baptism (universal priesthood), and yet maintained that, for the preservation of order, only an official representative of the Church ought to be authorized to make a public proclamation. Today's Evangelical Free Churches, on the other hand, propagate the 'priestly community,' which revokes any distinction between clergy and laity, and places all (male) members of the community in the immediate succession of the Apostles.

Priestesses

4. Women are very rarely to be encountered in priestly functions in the history of religion. One of the few ancient instances is that of the Vestals, in Rome. They were not directly responsible for sacrificial acts, it is true, but were responsible, for example, for the preparation of the salted groats without which no sacrifice could be performed. Ordinarily, priestesses were bound only to one deity, which demanded a 'chastity sacrifice,' which could be expressed not only in virginity, but also in sacred → prostitution. Menstruation and pregnancy, however, frequently carried taboos, which altogether excluded women from public sacred actions. Thus, in Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, and Hinduism, basically no women had priestly functions conferred upon them.

In recent times, the question of the admittance of women to sacred functions and offices has been more seriously discussed. In the Roman Catholic Church, pressure for the admittance of women to the priesthood has met with no success thus far, in the liberal currents of Judaism the first women rabbis are already at work, and the Anglican, as well as the allied Old Catholic Church, have ordained women for some years now.

Literature

Chadwick, Henry, History and Thought of the Early Church, London 1982; Cody, Aelred, A History of Old Testament Priesthood, Rome 1969; Eakins, Pamela, Priestess: Woman as Sacred Celebrant, York Beach 1996; Kaplan, Flora Edouwaye S. (ed.), Queens, Queen Mothers, Priestesses, and Power: Case Studies in African Gender, New York 1997; Oxtoby, Willard G. et al., "Priesthood," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 11 (1987), 528-550; Schöllgen, Gregor, Die Anfänge der Professionalisierung des Klerus und das kirchliche Amt in der syrischen Didaskalie, Aschendorff 1998; Zollitsch, Robert, Amt und Funktion des Priesters, Freiburg 1974.

→ Apostle, Church, Group, Hierarchy, Papacy, Specialists (Religious)

Karin Schneider

Private Religion

'Private'

1. The word 'private' derives from the Latin privatus, and means 'belonging to,' or 'concerning a particular person or group; not common or general.' In the course of the eighteenth century—through connections with 'private property,' and 'private person'— the word developed into a counter-concept, first, to 'state' (adj.), and then, to 'public,' or 'public civil,' so that it gained the sense of 'divided from [other] citizens,' a state-free sphere.

Private Religion

2. The Christian churches, in their self-concept, fulfill a 'public charge.' Indeed, they may even do so in a way that comes to expression in, for instance, the law of a state church. Thus, the concept of 'private religion' represents a manner of the practice of religion that withdraws from 'public-ness,' in the sense of the nature of a public or state thing, as well as from religious and other institutions—indeed stands in opposition to them. Analogously with 'private language,' we can understand by 'private religion' those religious conceptualizations, practices, and experiences, which individuals, without, or even against, the influence of religious institutions, develop more or less independently, or from elements lying at hand—'tinkering' (in Fr., bricoler) with them until they have come into being, as French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss has put it. A historically well-attested example is the case of a miller in Friaul in Italy, who had invented his own doctrine of the origin of the world, conceptualizing the cosmos as a cheese, from which the angels and heavenly bodies had emerged after the fashion of maggots.[1] The work of a good many 'brooders and enthusiasts' evinces these kinds of private religious traits, wherein the transitions to delusion are somewhat fleeting (→ Psychopathology). Secondly, the phrase may indicate religious practices and ideas that are practiced individually, or are not communicated. The concept of private religion, however, presupposes an understanding of what 'privacy' means in the particular cultural milieu in which the word and concept occur.

Privatization of Religion

3. The phenomenon of the privatization of religion has been more strongly emphasized since the beginning of the 1960s, above all else in the discussion maintained in psychology of religion. It is especially among American authors that this phenomenon finds mention. It should be pointed out that with this concept, religion is increasingly limited to the interests of the individual, and thereby forfeits its public relevance and meaning for culture. Following Stephen Hart, we may distinguish six different aspects of privatization:

- Religion without a church, as for example with participation in religious communication over the mass media (e.g., → Televangelism);
- Religious communities as voluntary associations, in which individual interests are followed (e.g., the promotion of one's career, or access to kindergarten enrollment for one's children);
- Individual theological responsibility of the individual faithful;
- Religious subjectivism—the tendency to regard religion as something subjective in principle;
- Separation of religious and subjective concerns, where religion is looked upon as something inward that ought to play a role neither in politics nor in other institutions;
- The religious market—the circumstance that religions offer different functional contributions used by the individual as a consumer.

4. Within the discussion maintained in the social sciences, however, various aspects of the concept of privatization are brought out. Strictly speaking, there are three variants of the theory of privatization:

Religion as a Private Matter: Privatization as a Function of Pluralization and Civil Religion (Parsons/Bellah)

a) For Talcott Parsons and Robert Bellah, the public function shifts to cultural forms, as, for example, American → civil religion or → Marxism. Here, then, privatization relates only to traditional religious systems. Thus, Parsons considers the privatization of traditional, institutionalized religion as a consequence of the pluralization of religion, and the necessity for it to incorporate all members of society into this plurality. On these grounds, no single traditional religion can become publicly obligatory, and religion becomes a private matter.

Privatization as a Consequence of Alienation from Social Structures (Berger/ Luckmann)

b) Instead, Peter Berger and Thomas Luckmann locate religion today only in the private sphere, which they distinguish from the public. In other words, religion has become 'invisible.' The private sphere, and therefore one's individual life, is also imbedded in various institutions, to which—besides religion—the family and the 'secondary institutions' belong, as, for example, therapeutic, counseling, or institutions for social assistance. Now the point of departure adopted by Berger and Luckmann is that the growing institutional differentiation and rationalization of modern societies lead to an isolation of the individual from prevailing social structures, therefore also from the traditional religious communities. In this new structural environment, institutional religion can no longer perform its task of conveying meaning. In the course of a process of privatization, the task of the construction and maintenance of comprehensive meaning-systems, such as a → religion or an → ideology, is therefore transferred to the individual, and to a series of voluntary, secondary institutions.

'Privatization of the Decision' for Religion Niklas Luhmann

Finally, for Niklas Luhmann, the essential structural trait of societal 'subsystems' consists in the distinction between professional and complementary roles. These roles are of decisive importance for the relationship between the individual and society. In earlier societal types, it was membership in special status-groups like those of artisans, the nobility, or the middle class, that determined the individual's access to wealth, power, or knowledge—and, to a great extent, to profession, as well. But this connection is undone in modern, functionally differentiated societies. A person is still defined by her or his functional role—as physician, politician, or priest. And yet, in addition to these roles, each person also has complementary ones—as patient, voter, consumer, or believer—that make possible access to the achievements of the corresponding, functionally differentiated, societal systems: the political system, the economic system, or even religion. The private, according to Luhmann, is represented by, so to speak, the combination of these various complementary roles. I do 'participate' in functional systems by way of my complementary roles; but these roles are just as powerfully imprinted with nonfunctional traits of my person—my lifestyle, my personality, my preferences. In turn, these traits form the basis of my decision to participate in religion, and of my membership in a religious organization. Luhmann therefore speaks of a 'privatization of the decision' for religion.

Criticism of the Concept of Privatization

5. By way of criticism, it is observed that the concept of privatization originates in a Western, ethnocentric category, that must be 'rethought,' especially in the light of globalization.[2] Thus, at the end of the 1980s, Robert Robertson observed clear counter-tendencies to privatization: on the one hand, religion's growing public role, which he designates as 'politicization' (→ Political Religions; Civil Religion); and on the other, an ever more powerful intervention on the part of political institutions in such individual religious matters as until now have been regarded as 'private' (as, for instance, in the American discourse on questions concerning abortion). For this phenomenon, Robertson applies the term 'religionization.' To be sure, these developments can be regarded as reactions to privatization, which, especially in Western society, is supported by the persistent tendency to individualization, and seems to have established itself, alongside institutionalized religion, as an enduring phenomenon.

1. Ginzburg, Carlo, The Cheese and the Worms: The Cosmos of a Sixteenth-Century Miller, Baltimore 1980.
2. Beyer 1994, 70ff.

Literature

Bellah, Robert N., "Religious Evolution," in: Idem, Beyond Belief: Essays on Religion in a Post-Traditional World, New York 1970; Berger, Peter L., The Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory, New York 1967; Beyer, Peter, Religion and Globalisation, London 1994; Gabriel, Karl (ed.), Religiöse Individualisierung oder Säkularisierung. Biographie und Gruppe als Bezugspunkte moderner Religiosität, Gütersloh 1996; Hart, Stephen, "Privatization in American Religion and Society," in: Sociological Analysis 47,4 (1987), 319-334; Luckmann, Thomas, The Invisible Religion: The Problem of Religion in Modern Society, London 1967; Luhmann, Niklas, Die Funktion der Religion, Frankfurt/M. 1977; Parsons, Talcott, "Religion in Modern Pluralistic Society," in: Review of Religious Research 7 (1966), 125-146; Idem, "Religion in Post-Industrial America: The Problem of Secularization," in: Social Research 41 (1974), 193-225; Robertson, Robert, "Globalization, Politics, and Religion," in: Beckford, J. A./Luckmann, Th. (eds.), The Changing Face of Religion, London 1989, 10-23.

→ Biography/Autobiography, Intellectual Religion, Meaning/Signification, Modernity/Modern Age, New Age, Postmodernity, Religion, Secularization, Society

Hubert Knoblauch

Procession

Religious Procession and Public Act

1. The religious procession (from Lat., processio, 'procession,' 'walk in order to demonstrate a request' or to demonstrate 'gratitude') today stands in the field of tension between an act of expression on the part of believers, conveyed by religion, and a secularized → 'publicity' or public act whose primary appeal is to popular tradition or → tourism.

Processions are liturgical and corporative kinds of cult, which 'walk' an established topography (a stretch of a road or street, a locality, or a sacred → 'landscape') in a sacred and ritually aesthetic manner. It is common to all of these processions, besides the requirements just stated, that they offer an opportunity for individual groups, quarters of a city, and cities, to present themselves, as long as their project, in their understanding, is for the glory of God(s). The objects and elements of religious worship (statues, altars, instruments used in worship, such as incense or the like), liturgical or local formal dress (the brotherhoods' robes, other costumes) sacred images, religious texts and songs, all transmit the religious experience of the faithful.

The gathering, or mass, of the faithful is inseparable from the public: its purpose is to demonstrate their message before the (passive) onlookers on the street or other route. This demonstration often occurs in the form of a drama, as in Catholic Good Friday processions, when, besides images, photographs are presented in decorated cars or floats, or when the story of the Passion is presented by actors (→ Drama [Sacred]). The ritually established march leads from its starting point, usually a church or cathedral, and has just as specific an endpoint: a sacred mountain, a chapel, or the original point of departure. The religious 'motion' creates a sacred counter-space to the profane everyday world and gathers the celebrants into a temporary holy community (→ Ritual).

The motivations for a procession can vary, and need not be mutually exclusive. Often, processions join local identity and prestige, touristic aims, and the self-presentation of the religious community. Religio-political meaning attaches to, for instance, the processions of Protestants and Catholics in → Northern Ireland, which serve to reinforce the claim to a territory (a street or a city quarter), or to solidify the condition of political dominance there. Processions are also mirrors of the cultural problems in a society. Thus, the revival, on April 10, 1998, of the Good Friday procession (that had been banned in 1803), occurred through the initiative of the Catholic Foreign Mission in Munich in the interest of engagement on behalf of minorities. Under the symbol of a black, Rwandan Jesus, the procession was to call attention to deficiencies in the integration of black residents. But the human wish for help, as one sees it in petition for blessing and for protection from danger, is also expressed in the annual processions that traverse the flagstones in 'impetration.' Another motive for processions is concern for the traditions of a religious culture.

While religious processions like those on Good Friday and Palm Sunday, and the impetratory and thanksgiving (for the harvest) processions, are officially listed in the festal calendar, bridal and funeral processions comply with life's course instead, and thus, with the cyclic festivals of the → life cycle. → Carnival processions and public demonstrations on important societal memorial days roughly follow the 'religious' calendar, but are based primarily on socio-political motives.

Contexts

2. In their respective sorts and configurations, processions yield to their special context. Thus, in Greek antiquity, the procession was primarily affixed to the cult of feasts of the deities and of the state. In the polis, it was reckoned an affair of the people and of the state. For one, the cultic procession served in the framework of feasts of the deities, and for another, it demonstrated state power. Procession itself acquires the elements of a beginning and end point of the 'sacred way' (→ Road/Path/Journey), which sorts out space, hierarchically, according to the importance of the cultic 'stations,' and adapts music and sacred dress accordingly. The relation between human being and God is thus represented in theatrical play (mimesis, Gk., 'imitation') and lavish symbolical outlay (in 'pomp,' from Lat., pompa, 'parade'). In Roman antiquity, the procession underwent a profanization and was no longer limited to the area of the cultic. Then it was the burial procession of a mighty man, the opening of the Games, and the Emperor's triumphal march. Early Christianity was scandalized by theatrical pomp; it adopted, however, the phenomenon of the procession. After all, the latter was well adapted for the 'translation,' the transfer, of the → relics of the martyrs, and for a publicly effective demonstration of ecclesial wealth. Since the Reformation, Corpus Christi processions have been the 'show' event of the holy bread, the Eucharist, and have aimed at an emphasis of the division between Catholics and Protestants. In modern times, they are understood, in addition, as a bulwark against secular society and atheism.

Currency of Processions

3. In Southern Europe, Austria, and Latin America, processions are part of the ordinary religious life of the faithful. For Central Europe, however, it must be maintained that—aside from touristic productions—processions underlie a countercurrent. In the first place, they continue to be determined by the application and solemnities of liturgy, which may be attributed both to critical questioning (as that of the need for processions in a secular society), as well as to the multiplication of a will to ecumenical cooperation. In the second place, processions in the city and country are being 'revitalized' for the purpose of reinforcing traditional community formation, against a societal lifestyle of haste and indifference, in which the boundaries among individual groups threaten to blur.

Literature

Boissevain, Jeremy (ed.), Revitalizing European Rituals, London 1992; Bryan, Dominic, Orange Parades: The Politics of Ritual, Tradition and Control, London 2000; Felbecker, Sabine, Die Prozession. Historische und systematische Untersuchungen zu einer liturgischen Ausdruckshandlung, Altenberge 1995.

→ Masses, Mediterranean Region, Pilgrimage, Place (Sacred), Publicity, Road/Path/Journey

Annemarie Gronover

Profession of Faith

The profession or confession of faith is the readily recalled, binding collection and affirmation of a religion's central content of faith, and announces exclusive membership in this community in distinction from other religious groups. It is known in all writing or founded religions, but not in the religions of illiterate people, whose religious and social structures are so tightly woven that it is not necessary explicitly to proclaim them; rather, membership follows by birth. A first form of the Christian profession of faith was the rule of faith that, in the second century—along with the establishment of the canon of the New Testament writings—was one of the essential weapons against → heresy. That is, beginning in the third century, conformity of the profession with the manifold formulae of the acts of → baptism can be shown. Now, with the development of → liturgy, from the fifth century onward, the profession of faith or confession finally entered the divine service. This Apostolicum, or "Apostles' Creed," has always been the basic Christian profession of faith.

Especially in the baptismal ritual, but also in Confirmation, the profession is evinced as a means of initiation of the new community member. The Islamic profession of faith, as well, demonstrates the function of the rite of initiation: the public enunciation of the Sahada effectuates membership in Islam's religious community. By contrast with the canon of scripture, the Christian profession is living, and can be reshaped in reaction to external relations, such as has been the case, for example, with the "Theological Declaration of Barmen," in implementation of a directive of the Confessional Synod (1934), in the confrontation with → National Socialism. The profession of the Batak Church (1951), on Sumatra, a 'young church,' documents its formation in confrontation with persons who believe differently.

→ Baptism, Confession, Group, Heresy, Identity, Initiation, Liturgy/Dramaturgy

Karin Schneider

Progress

Progress and History

1. The successes of the natural and cultural sciences in European modernity engendered technological innovation. This led in turn to an 'acceleration' of culture, of its means of conveyance, and of production and communication. Rapid public transport, one's own Internet connection, or the last-minute ticket to the Maledives, provide occasion for the conceptualization that the human being is in a constant state of progress. Progress becomes not only a basic concept for an appraisal of history, but, beyond this, a basic characteristic of (modern) humanity—an anthropological quantity. This idea means that humanity is seen in a historical process, which is constantly developing for the better, and in which the human being is approaching her and his ideal. This faith in progress is found especially in important philosophical writings of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The spirit of the most important writings was prepared by progress-oriented compositions such as Gotthold Ephraim Lessing's Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (Ger., "Education of the Human Race"; 1780), Immanuel Kant's Ideen zu einer allgemeinen Geschichte in weltbürgerlicher Absicht (Ger., "Ideas of a Universal History in the Perspective of a Citizen of the World"; 1784), and Johann Gottfried Herder's Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (Ger., "Ideas for the Philosophy of the History of Humanity"; 1784–1791). Then followed F. W. J. Schelling and G. W. F. Hegel (Schelling's System des transzendentalen Idealismus—Ger., "System of Transcendental Idealism"; 1880; and Hegel's Phänomenologie des Geistes—Ger., "Phenomenology of Mind"; 1807). Thus were created sketches of a new concept of history, making history the image of the appearance of a reason that understands itself, or of a developing and 'unfolding' Mind. In this fashion, the pioneers' preparatory work was deepened, with a concept of progress not only as of an anthropological importance, but also as of a metaphysical one: the concept of progress becomes an ethical category (as a synonym for that which is good and just), and finally, a political demand (contradicting restoration and reaction). Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels took this last step in the nineteenth century, with their theory of dialectical and historical materialism. Here, a faith and confidence in progress is connected with eschatological conceptualizations (→ Marxism). The nineteenth century's concept of progress was then incorporated into further conceptions, and ideologized. Subsequently, a schema of progress that was to be the norm for the whole twentieth century had declared not only the cultural, but even the religious, progress of the human being to have traced, and to be tracing, a course 'from Mythos to Logos' (Wilhelm Nestle), or from → magic to → science (James George Frazer). Here the schema is found not only in psychology, but also in anthropology, religious studies, and in classical studies. The fundamental supposition, influenced by colonialist and Darwinist stereotypes, consists in belief in a mythic, history-less age, which is replaced by the age of logical reason. Here again, progress is equated with a higher development (→ Evolutionism).

The Bio-Psychological Concept of Progress

Along with this cultural and societal meaning and importance of progress, there is yet another—a bio-psychological one. Jean Baptiste de Lamarck (1744–1829) and Charles Darwin (1809–1882) furnished decisive impulses for the concept. The two presented different grounds for their theory of the development of 'races' and 'kinds' ('evolution'). Progress in the history of nature comes according to the law of selection. The same thought became normative for the cultural perspective (Darwinism; → Theory of Evolution).

Critique of Progress and Cultural Pessimism

2. With the moralization, politicization, and biologization of progress, its critique was rendered more acute. The sharpest opponent of progress appeared at the end of the nineteenth century: Friedrich → Nietzsche. Nietzsche's criticism of progress as a moral and political quantity is all the more fundamental, as he had no concept of development himself—wherefore the human being was presented as a (failed) transitional form from animal to super-person. Progress, Nietzsche held, was achieved by the substitution of rationality for instinctive behaviors. It was deceptive, since it was gained at the cost of security and certitude in life. With increasing progress, therefore, and through that alone, culture plunged to its ruin.

Nietzsche's position aroused a broad movement of pessimistic cultural positions. Today, these are gathered under the rubric of 'philosophy of life,' and, with all of their differentiation, their common denominator is a manner of view hostile to progress. Georg Simmel, Ludwig Klages, and Oswald Spengler are notable contributors. Their critique of, or even enmity toward, culture is characterized by a certain proximity to positions from which National Socialism emerged. This has brought upon them the imputation of hostility to democracy. The fact that enmity toward progress does not immediately betoken hostility to democracy is shown by the efforts of → existentialism, which does not automatically take a negative position vis-à-vis the effects of technological development (Martin Heidegger, Karl Jaspers). The same is to be said of the contributions of the 'critical theory' of Adorno and Horkheimer. The common property of these often very different positions is that they criticize the concept of progress in the face of the social and cultural problems of 'advanced' → industrial societies. Here one sees the ambivalence of 'progress,' an ambivalence that permeates cultural and political discussion even today. As culturally superior value, but reduced to in technology and economics, in modern industrial countries progress comes into conflict with conservative values whose orientation is to tradition, or at least to the status quo. Natural catastrophes, as well, or heavy technological defeats like the sinking of the Titanic, led to a transient impatience with belief in progress, but did not essentially impair it.

The Concept of Progress and the Religions

3. The concept of progress, as it appears in Western modernity, stands in a manifold, taut, often tension-filled relation of interchange with traditional religions. While Judaeo-Christian religion has drawn quite near to the conception of progress, and indeed, partly claims it as its own contribution, the Western notion of progress frequently leads to conflict with religious notions in non-Western religions. Thus, in regions of Islamic culture, progress (Ar., taqaddum) is a concept in which the restoration of an ideal Islamic antiquity comes into conflict with compelled adaptations to conditions of modern life. As an agenda in cultural or economic policy, it is therefore only possible to represent it in secular programs. However, is technological, or again political and social, 'innovation' (bid'a), arising from the pressure of Western innovation and 'globalization,' reconcilable with the needs of the public weal? Here, the area of progress is the object of sturdy controversy in contemporary Islamic ethics.

For Christianity: in his Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (German 1904), Max → Weber posits a connection between Protestantism and economic progress. According to Weber, the Protestant idea of salvation, with Luther and Calvin, has prepared the spiritual background for the capitalistic economic system.

4. As recent discussion in cultural studies has demonstrated, many conceptualizations of progress rest on myths of progress, not least of all on a Eurocentric exaggeration of the value of European culture. A historical, psychological (in the area of development), or biological notion of progress ought, therefore, to be disconnected from an ideology of higher development. Since there is no external standard of comparison, it cannot be seen, from progress itself, where it is leading: to the better, or to the worse.

Literature

Bernstein, John Andrew, Progress and the Quest for Meaning: A Philosophical and Historical Inquiry, Rutherford/London 1993; Bowler, Peter J., The Invention of Progress: The Victorians and the Past, Oxford 1989; Drost, Wolfgang/Winter, Carl (eds.), Fortschrittsglaube und Dekadenzbewußtsein im Europa des 19. Jahrhunderts, Heidelberg 1986; Gastil, Raymond Duncan, Progress: Critical Thinking about Historical Change, Westport 1993; Gray, John, Heresies: Against Progress and Other Illusions, London 2004; Marx, Leo/Mazlish, Bruce (eds.), Progress: Fact or Illusion?, Ann Arbor 1996; Melzer, Arthur M et al. (eds.), History and the Idea of Progress, Ithaca 1995; Reif, Peter, Entwicklung und Fortschritt. Geschichte als Begründungsproblem, Stuttgart 1984; Spadafora, David, The Idea of Progress in Eighteenth-Century Britain, New Haven 1990; Tassone, Giuseppe, A Study on the Idea of Progress in Nietzsche, Heidegger and Critical Theory, Lewiston 2002.

→ Enlightenment, Evolutionism, History, Origin, Theory of Evolution

Stephan Grätzel

Projection

Psychology

1. In technological projection, a picture or image is cast onto the wall. Psychic projection, on the other hand, shifts inner images, or sensations/reactions, to the outside, such as affects and impulses, wishes, or certain conceptualizations. Projection can serve to ward off fear and to retain an acceptable self-image. In an unconscious process, other persons, or a group or society, are 'projectively' ascribed a feeling or → prejudice actually emerging from one's own self. Now only the other is exploitative, jealous, fundamentalistic, etc. Projective allocations always play a role in one's attitude toward strange or foreign people. Unless these allocations, these projections, are corrected in a way that does justice to reality, they can lead to prejudices. In a person with a disturbed experience of reality, even insane bigotry may result.

Feuerbach's Criticism of Religion

2. In Ludwig Feuerbach's (1802–1872) → criticism of religion, the occurrence of projection is regarded as the psychic explanation of the rise of religions. Feuerbach studied theology, and, with Hegel, philosophy. First, he came out (anonymously, of course) against immortality, which shut him off from an academic career. Later, he argued purely anthropologically and materialistically. For him, Hegel's Absoluter Geist ("Absolute Mind") is nothing other than nature. Like Schleiermacher, he sees the basis of religion in an 'utter dependency.' For Feuerbach, this is dependency on nature. According to him—who sought to be understood as an 'anti-theist'—religion exchanges subject and object, by holding God as the creating subject, and the human being as God's creature (object). But religion, Feuerbach says, has also arisen from the human being's 'wishful conceptualizations': "What he himself is not, but wishes to be, he imagines as being in his gods."[1] God represents the 'essence of the human being'; to God are attributed human predicates in the highest degree, God is faultless and perfect. The human being must realize this 'projection' in order to love the human being directly—this is the communis opinio of the entire reception of Feuerbach. An activity amidst reality, and not only in fantasy, thus becomes possible. Theology is to become anthropology, and dogmatics is to become humanity. This reorientation is the "turning point in world history." In the tradition of the → Enlightenment, Feuerbach conceived that, by taming and subduing nature, through formation, education, and culture, and thereby excluding its crudities and blind coincidences, the human being could attain a happy and free existence. Marx, receiving Feuerbach, sees the root of religious self-alienation—which comes from projection—in the exploitation of persons in a class society, and proclaims the way to persons' happiness through an alteration of economic relations. Through the creation of a classless society, religion as well—which Marx terms an illusion and an "opium for the people"—becomes superfluous.

Sigmund Freud

b) Sigmund → Freud's (1856–1939) critique of religion takes up the Enlightenment and connects it with Feuerbach's anthropological materialism. Although the Enlightenment had deprived the powers of nature of their personified traits, there remained the helplessness of human beings and the quest for the gods. Religious doctrines he saw as collective 'compulsion neuroses,' and illusion one and all. But, since they are neither demonstrable nor refutable, they do not constitute error. Freud replaced the projection of an abstract 'essence of man' with that of the father. In his The Future of an Illusion (German 1927), Freud developed the psychology of religion on an Oedipal level: at the center stands the longing for the father and obedience to the superego. In his 'scientific myth,' Totem and Taboo (German 1927), Freud argues that the religious God is shifted into a chain of projective analogies that, in the last instance, are all to be referred to the event around the mythic father of the 'primitive horde.' The reactions of the primitive horde to their 'patricide' are all elements of the founding of a culture: in the understanding of the Freudian theory of culture, they lead both to an individual superego (→ Conscience), and to society's superego, and thus to ethics and morals.

3. Projective images of ideas in → myths and religions mirror both individual and collective experiences, along with the societal/social relations of the respective culture. Still, academic analyses are also determined by projections of the individual and social premises at hand. Thus, in Freud we find the patriarchal thinking of his time, as well as the confrontation with the Father God of his own Jewish socialization. The one-sidedness and the dangers bound up with projective thinking have been recognized in many religions, and quite early too: "You shall not make yourself a carved image or any likeness of anything" (Exod. 20:4).

1. Feuerbach, Ludwig, "Vorwort zur Gesamtausgabe seiner Werke," in: Störig, Hans Joachim, Kleine Weltgeschichte der Philosophie, Stuttgart 1990.

Literature

Apprey, Maurice/Stein, Howard F., Intersubjectivity, Projective Identification and Otherness, Pittsburgh 1993; Harvey, Van Austin, Feuerbach and the Interpretation of Religion, Cambridge 1995; Sierksma, Fokke, Projection and Religion: An Anthropological and Psychological Study of the Phenomena of Projection in the Various Religions, Ann Arbor 1990 (Dutch original [1]1956).

→ Collective Representations, Criticism of Religion, Enlightenment, Freud, Prejudices/ Stereotypes, Psychoanalysis, Psychopathology

Brigitte Görnitz

Prometheus

The Ancient Prometheus Myth

1. Prometheus (Gk., 'the pre-considering') is a cultural hero of Greek mythology. There he belongs to the descendancy of the Titans, offspring of the cosmogonic deities 'Sky' (Ouranos) and 'Earth' (Gaia; → Cosmology/ Cosmogony). Prometheus is the son of the Titan Iapetos, and the father of Deucalion. His brothers are Atlas and Epimetheus (the 'post-considering'). Zeus's cunning adversary, Prometheus introduced human beings to → sacrifice, stole fire for them from the sky, and thereby founded the 'techniques' of culture (from Gk., téchne, 'craft,' 'science,' 'art,' 'ruse'). His approach is therefore characterized by Hesiod (eighth century BCE), and in a work ascribed to Aeschylus, as 'sly' (properly, 'crookedly planning,' in Gk., ankylométes), and just as 'indefinite' (or 'dazzling but dubious'—in Gk., poikílos). Later traditions ascribe to Prometheus the creation of the human being from clay. As his just desserts for the theft of fire, Zeus has Prometheus chained in the Caucasus, where an eagle daily tortures him by picking out his liver, which grows back overnight. Zeus punishes human beings for the possession of fire with a deceptive return gift: he sends the seductive Pandora (Gk., 'the one endowed by all [of the gods]'; or 'the one endowing all'), from whose accompanying container all of the evils of the world escape; hence the proverbial 'Pandora's box.'

The deeds of Prometheus mark the human being's ambivalent transition from the state of nature to the state of culture. These works are those that chain religious and secular life alike, rendering them problematic (sacrifice and use of fire), and the deeds that convey the primal myth of the development of culture, as well as that of a communication with the gods produced in sacrifice. Neither human being nor god, Prometheus acts as an outsider, to whom either domain is available. He pierces sacred boundaries (law, ceremony, tradition), and makes them permeable to innovation (→ Marginality/Liminality). Since Prometheus transforms cosmic and terrestrial relations, he is seen as holy founder of culture or unholy founder of chaos, as maker or destroyer of prevailing norms, depending on the observer's perspective. Presumably, Prometheus goes back to Sumerian → Trickster stories, which recount the illegitimate arrival of fire from heaven.

Studying under the Sign of Prometheus. Hermann Volz (1847–1922) created the greater-than-life-size group of figures (1903) of red sandstone for the main gate of University Library in Heidelberg. Zeus's eagle, symbol of power, looks with attentive eye at Prometheus. As patron of education and science, and at the same time as a graphic warning of the consequences of a rebellion of knowledge and science against the power of the state, fettered Prometheus unmistakably indicates the boundaries of (scientific or intellectual) freedom. The creation of the human being, the theft of the fire, and the punishment of Prometheus were favorite representational motifs for national constructions in the German Wilhelmine period. Presentations of Prometheus appeared, among other places, at the National Gallery in Berlin (1879), the New University of Würzburg (1898), and the University of Freiburg (1910–1912).

Reception in Modernity and the Present

2. The reception of Prometheus after antiquity emphasizes with the theft of fire: the founding of culture, and the creation of the human being; and with the fashioning of the human being of clay: the process of humanization conceived as a process of molding and modeling. Prometheus goes from planning to playful desire for the new, and thus cannot be 'fixed'; but rather he changes, moves among his values, and produces a multiplicity of interpretations and forms of cultural adaptation, even to today. His reception has endured, unbroken, to the very present, which makes him the most important reference figure for Western intellectual reflection and cultural history (outside the Judaeo-Christian tradition).

Renaissance and Enlightenment

Creation of human beings and theft of fire have been developing since the late Middle Ages into a narrative code for the process of civilization. Boccaccio (1313–1375) subsequently fashioned Prometheus, the homo simplex (Lat., 'single human being'), the simple, 'naïve' human being, to the shape of a homo duplex ('double human being'), 'doubled humanly,' true, but, owing to his intellectual and bodily abilities, 'ambivalent' toward morals and human custom. The → Renaissance tended toward an image of Prometheus that brought out the split creative potential in the human being. Between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries, Prometheus is often seen as containing an emblem of the artist and the scholar-scientist, who emulates the creator who molds (in Lat., creator plasticus). If the human being goes too far, and pries too deep into regions of arcane knowledge, she or he violates knowledge prohibitions (C. Ginzburg), and a Promethean punishment looms: body and soul will both be 'devoured.' As a positive image of intellectual curiosity, one that makes the secrets of an almighty god transparent, Prometheus is found, on the contrary, near Giordano Bruno and Francis Bacon. Comparisons with Lucifer (Lat., 'Light-bringer') and Christ emerge with Thomas Hobbes, in John Milton's influential epic Paradise Lost (1667), and with Pedro Calderon, who dedicated a festive play to Prometheus in 1679.

Prometheus as Genius and Hero of the Industrial Age

A new high point in the history of the reception of Prometheus took shape with the age of the middle-class revolution, and the inception of industrialization. For enlightened Europe, from 1770 to 1830 the figure and form of Prometheus became an idée fixe (Fr., 'fixed idea'), and a key symbol of any → progress. Prometheus was seen as the sacrificed founder of sacrifice, sometimes even a religious founder and redeemer of humanity. In his deeds lies the political power of the symbol, now mightier still. An outright revolutionary significance is seen in the easily remembered doubled image of the bearer of the fire and the (patient) shackled one. Interpretation in philosophy of religion and research into myth (e.g., with d'Holbach, Herder, the Schlegel brothers, Creuzer, Hegel), as well as the molding of material in music and poetry (with Beethoven, Wieland, Goethe, Bürger, Lord Byron, the Shelleys, Leopardi), afford a timely inscription in Prometheus as a figure of reflection upon what it means to be human, and in his myth as the "mythologue of human existence" (K. Kerényi). He is a primary figure of identification for the cult of the → genius in the Sturm und Drang, to whom J. W. von Goethe gives himself in his ode "Prometheus" (1773–1774). Further, the figure of Prometheus sacralizes, by its iconic presence, the process of industrialization. The doctrine of → electricity that became normative in 1740—particularly for theologians and philologists—selected Prometheus as its patron. More than ever, Prometheus acquires human traits. He serves the (anti-deistic) defense of human creativity and genuine autonomy, against any of the inhibiting powers of silence, an autonomy that, in 'Titans' attire,'[1] creates an ambivalent social and technological universe. Just the other way around, Prometheus continues to be freighted with the cultural and technological emancipation of the human being as presumptuousness. To the ideal of the homo faber (Lat., 'human being as artisan') is annexed the dreadful image of the 'unfettered Prometheus.' Early enough, in her novel Frankenstein, or The Modern Prometheus (1818), Mary Shelley criticizes the ideal that everything can technologically be generated, an ideal that underlies the notion of a 'maker,' be that a god or human being. Whether an allegory on an 'absent creator god' (in Lat., deus absconditus), or a literary manifesto of criticism of technology, Prometheus's transformatory and norm-shattering activity in the form of Frankenstein the genius reveals weaknesses in the picture of the responsible, good, creator of Christian salvific thought. The figure of Prometheus, with its ambiguity of potential shapes and forms, at that time adjures the precarious equilibrium in which a world of human beings has lived since the dawn of the industrial age, so often so full of misgivings; we refer to a world ruled by the techniques of religious and secular production and destruction alike.

Prometheus in Modernity

In the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Prometheus is frequently only an ideology-fraught quotation in the area of formation and education. As a part of the national iconic inventory, then, he assists in the sacralization of central locations of humanistic claims to education and scholarship (see illus.).

On the other hand, the 'Prometheus unbound' of the middle-class revolution becomes instrumental in the propaganda, state art, and cultural politics of totalitarian regimes. As emblem of a proletariat delivered by Prometheus from immaturity, a 'heroically optimistic,' quasi-messianic proclamation is wrung from the iconography of the Titan, in Nazi art (e.g., with A. Breker, 1936–1937, and J. Thorak, 1943) as in the Soviet and later the East German art. Culturally pessimistic aspects are mostly ignored. On the other hand, as early as 1872, in his The Birth of Tragedy, Friedrich → Nietzsche had attempted to do justice, in his interpretation of Prometheus, to both viewpoints, in which, later, Ernst Bloch followed him (e.g., in Atheism in Christianity, German 1968). In modern painting and sculpture (Max Beckmann, 1942; Oskar Kokoschka, 1950; Henry Moore, 1949–1951), and in poetry and drama (Nikos Kazantzis, 1941–1943; Heiner Müller, 1969; Ted Hughes, 1973), Prometheus is the point of departure for reflections in the areas of cultural religious criticism. The late work Prometeo of Italian composer Luigi Nono transmits a pessimistic tenor in its very subtitle, "Tragedy of Listening." In its reflection on twentieth-century Europe, with its wars and social upheavals, and against the background of an unemployed milieu in central England, the first film rendition of the material, "Prometheus" (Great Britain, 1998–1999), by English poet and director Tony Harrison, identifies the profound human stratum of suffering and exploitation from the perspective of the enslaved Titan on the rock. For Harrison, society, and especially the individual, are caught in a 'Promethean situation,' without perspective.

Prometheus as a Projection Figure

3. The unstable figure of Prometheus is unavailable to simple explanation. But beginning in its archaic sources, then in its appearance in ancient literature, up until today, it has retained its relevance to the relationship of the human being and culture. It represents a 'projection figure' of the human being's religious and secular thinking, a thinking transformed along with that being, and a thinking in which the fundamental questions of the emergence of culture, of the conception of progress, and of historical philosophy find graphic expression. The confrontation with Prometheus delivers richer information about the spirit of a given time—and the relation of prevailing images of creation and culture precisely to their point of relation, the human being—than it does on the 'indefinite' (and 'dazzling but dubious'), ultimately unfathomable, essence of the Titan.

1. Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, Dichtung und Wahrheit, Munich edition, vol. 15, 681.

Literature

Sources: Storch, Wolfgang/Damerau, Burghard (eds.), Mythos Prometheus: Texte von Hesiod bis René Char, Leipzig 1995 (anthology with all important texts from antiquity through the twentieth century).

Secondary Literature: Blumenberg, Hans, Work on Myth, Cambridge 1985 (German [1]1979); Gadamer, Hans-Georg, "Prometheus und die Tragödie der Kultur," in: Kleine Schriften II, Tübingen [2]1979 ([1]1967); Ginzburg, Carlo, "High and Low: The Theme of Forbidden Knowledge in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," in: Past and Present: A Journal of Scientific History 73 (1976); Kerényi, Karl, Prometheus: Archetypal Image of Human Existence, New York 1963 (German [1]1959); Newman, William R., Promethean Ambitions: Alchemy and the Quest to Perfect Nature, Chicago/London 2004; Pankow, Edgar/Peters, Günter (eds.), Prometheus: Mythos der Kultur, Munich 1999; Richard, Timothy, Prometheus and Faust: The Promethean Revolt in Drama from Classical Antiquity to Goethe, Westport 1995; Trousson, Raymond, Le thème de Prométhée dans la literature européenne, Geneva [2]1976 ([1]1964).

→ Cosmology/Cosmogony, Esotericism, Genetic Engineering, Genius, Hero/Heroism, Marginality/Liminality, Myth/Mythology, Origin, Progress, Sacrifice, Trickster

Michael Weis

Prophecy / Divination

Systematic Determination of the Concept

1. The terms 'divination' and 'fortune telling' are general designations for various forms of religious vision, and usually bear on the future. Both the degree of institutionalization and the goal of respective practices, however, can vary widely. In many cases, the prophecy is performed by religious → specialists, who, in earlier ages, and even today in some extra-European cultures, were or are integrated into religious institutions, such as → oracles or prophetical offices (→ Prophet). The purposes vary, as well. It is not always a matter of a pure prognosis of the future; instead, information also can be gathered concerning the past or simply 'hidden' layers of reality.

Although today we see a strong differentiation and a decrease of institutionalization of prophecy and divination, the following basic postulates can be generalized on a systematic level:

- Every prophecy hypothesizes that, besides the reality available to the senses, there is a hidden reality, whether a spiritual world, 'the Holy,' or the 'world of the gods.'
- This world, at first hidden, is enmeshed with visible reality in many ways. The most influential model of this specification in Western history is the esoteric conception of the idea of correspondence ("As above, so below") (→ Esotericism; Macrocosm; Hermetism/Hermeticism), which has governed, among other things, prophetical techniques from antiquity until today. On this basis, an inspection of one level of reality (planets, tarot cards, → dreams) authorizes conclusions on any other level.
- This idea presupposes, further, that reality can be understood in its capacity of signification. Everything can be an indication of something else; thus, in terms of the 'practice of concordance,' a search will follow regular patterns. A distinction may be drawn between signs that are actively introduced, and those that occur spontaneously (Lat., omina, 'omens'; monstra, 'signs,' cf. 'demonstrate') and are interpreted correspondingly. As a rule, those that occur spontaneously evince the character of a → revelation, whether the sign is seen as the message of a transcendent power (including persons, for instance ancestors) or divinities, or whether a human being is granted a spontaneous glimpse into hidden reality.

- Nearly all prophetical traditions evince a tendency to a ritualization of the prophetical event, both in the public domain and in the private.

Ancient Religions

2. In European history of religion, the practice of divination during antiquity demonstrated the highest degree of institutionalization. It went without saying that the gods declare their will through appropriate signs, and that it is the task of human beings to take these signs in earnest. These principles led to a whole series of religious specializations, which Cicero, in his important work, De Divinatione (Lat., On Divination; 44 BCE), lists as follows: that of the haruspex (a soothsayer in ancient Rome who professed to foretell the future by examining the entrails, especially the liver, of sacrificial animals); augury (interpretation of the flight of birds); the drawing of lots; and → astrology; finally, the 'natural' methods of interpretation of dreams and → ecstasy. The interpretation of omens was ubiquitous in the ancient world, both in a religious context as in a political one (oracles, sibyls). In Israel, the drawing of lots was known (in Heb., goral), although Jews and Christians likewise used techniques of prophecy, interpretation of signs, astrology, interpretation of dreams, and necromancy (conjuring and interrogation of the dead).

Extra-European Cultures

3. In almost all cultures, "the human being's interpretational structure" (W. Hogrebe) has taken care to produce ritualized means of access to that which is hidden. Especially those religions whose focus is on the universal presence of spiritual beings in nature, or on the afterlife of the dead in the community (→ Ancestors), have preserved an extensive repertory of means for the exercise of divination. Along with countless oracular techniques, the → trance, or phenomena of → possession, as in → shamanism, must be listed here. Recently, these techniques of 'indigenous cultures' have increasingly been received by Western religious systems, particularly in the so-called → New Age.

The Most Common Techniques of Divination Today

4. In Western industrial societies, the twentieth century saw an enormous growth, and a rising public perception, of the phenomena of prophecy and divination. The second half of the nineteenth century—mainly in connection with the phenomenon of mediumism and Mesmerism (→ Spiritism; Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society)—had shown an interest in prophecy. Subsequently, today there is a huge spectrum of divinatory techniques available in the West. These bypassed the 'classic' (in reality, however, very disparate) tradition of card-reading—as it was cultivated in the tradition of the → Sinti and Roma, and became known to a wider audience through the "Cards of Mme. Lenormand." Along with → astrology, prominent among the central disciplines of contemporary divination are tarot-card reading, the Chinese I-Ching, and the North European runes.

Tarot

The word 'tarot,' derived from the Old French, denotes a card game, played with 22 high cards ('Trumps'), the 'Greater Arcana,' and 56 secondary cards, the 'Lesser Arcana.' The first mentions of the game go back to the fourteenth century. The cards are ordered in four suits—staves, pentacles (coins), chalices, and swords—corresponding respectively to the elements fire, earth, water, and air. Today over two hundred different 'tarot decks'—graphic transpositions of the game—are available. For divination, cards are intuitively drawn and interpreted, according to different traditions. This 'spontaneous information' is today the most important function of tarot playing. Earlier, the magical ritual possibilities of the cards were intensely observed (thus, many cards could serve in magical ceremonies, as guardians of the directions of the sky, for instance) (→ Magic; Occultism).

I-Ching

The ancient Chinese oracle I-Ching, the "Book of Changes," one of the canonical books of → Confucianism, is applied today in the West, principally in a manner similar to the use of tarot cards. In this case, it is 'trigrams'—signs arranged in eight groups of three, of broken and unbroken lines—mediated by the casting of chopsticks (originally, yarrow stalks or stems), or—in a simplified procedure—coins. The production of the sixty-four hexagrams, with the 'images' (brief texts) accompanying them, is probably to be dated in the Chou era (1000–700 BCE).

Runes

The rune signs, found especially throughout much of Northern Europe, were popular in the early Middle Ages, although their roots may have been in Roman times, and their predecessors perhaps even earlier. This system involves an alphabetical series, the futhark, possibly derived from Greek script, and whose extension varies with various traditions. Runes are 'letters,' formed by the casting of chips, or are engraved on stones or pebbles. From the combination of individual signs, complex combinations of runes result, which open up a multiplicity of possible interpretations.

Dreams

The interpretation of → dreams, practiced from ancient times, still enjoys great popularity, as is evident from the mountain of literature, popular or scientific in style, that exists on the subject. In addition, other techniques of divination are current today, such as the 'bird oracle,' the 'Celtic tree oracle,' and the 'angel game.' Prophecy in the wider sense also includes → channeling. In addition, it is worth noting the current adaptation, beginning in the 1970s, of traditions designated indigenous, such as systems of Native American origin.

Vision of the Present and Self-Knowledge

5. An inspection of today's Western situation shows that the motive of the interrogation of an oracle is, as a rule, less the hope of persons seeking counsel for an exact vision of the future, than the need to elucidate individual problems, with the help of 'hidden dimensions of reality.' Thus, the motive is the wish to have a view of the present, with such view centered on and around one's own person. The quest for self-knowledge plays a considerable role, then, and many of the prophetical techniques cited above explicitly serve the dramatic and intuitive way of → private religion to one's 'own center.' Here a considerable transformation is to be seen, by comparison with earlier eras. A collectively binding function of the oracle in view of religious policy is found only rudimentarily today in → Lamaism.

Literature

Berchman, Robert M. (ed.), Mediators of the Divine: Horizons of Prophecy, Divination, Dreams and Theurgy in Mediterranean Antiquity, Atlanta 1998; Blumenberg, Hans, Der Prozeß der theoretischen Neugierde, Frankfurt/M. [4]1988; Bouché-Leclercq, Auguste, Histoire de la divination dans l'antiquité, 4 vols., Paris 1879–1882; Burnett, Charles, Magic and Divination in the Middle Ages: Texts and Techniques in the Islamic and Christian Worlds, Aldershot 1996; Decker, Ronald/Dummett, Michael, A History of the Occult Tarot, 1870–1970, London 2002; Grabbe, Lester L., Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages: A Socio-Historical Study of Religious Specialists in Ancient Israel, Valley Forge 1995; Hogrebe, Wolfram, Metaphysik und Mantik. Die Deutungsstruktur des Menschen, Frankfurt/M. 1992; Jeffers, Ann, Magic and Divination in Ancient Palestine and Syria, Leiden 1996; Loewe, Michael/Blacker, Carmen (eds.), Divination and Oracles, London 1981; Looijenga, Tineke, Texts and Contexts of the Oldest Runic Inscriptions, Leiden 2003; Moltke, Erik, Runes and Their Origin: Denmark and Elsewhere, Copenhagen 1985; Peek, Philip M. (ed.), African Divination Systems: Ways of Knowing, Bloomington 1991; Pemberton III, John (ed.), Insight and Artistry in African Divination, Washington 2000; Savage-Smith, Emilie (ed.), Magic and Divination in Early Islam, Aldershot 2004; Smith, Richard J., Fortune-Tellers and Philosophers: Divination in Traditional Chinese Society, Boulder 1991; Wood, Michael, The Road to Delphi: The Life and Afterlife of Oracles, London 2004.

→ Astrology, Communication, Dream, New Age, Occultism, Oracle, Possession, Prophet, Shamanism, Specialists (Religious), Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Trance, Vision/Auditory Experience

Kocku von Stuckrad

Prophet

Concept

1. Etymologically, the term 'prophet,' with its basic meaning of 'proclaimer,' 'speaker'—in the sense of the agent of a public declaration—is derived from the Greek prophétes. The Greek concept is divided functionally: (1) The prophetess or prophet receives a communication which is unintelligible to the ordinary person, (2) and which is explained by official interpreters, as in the Delphic speech oracle of the Pythia. In Plato (Timaeus), as in the Bible (1 Sam 9:9), there is still an explicit distinction between 'seer' and 'prophet.' Seers here receive the message by inspiration or mechanically, through → visions and auditions, often with the assistance of a medium; these messages are then expounded through the intermediary role of the prophets. Later, an undifferentiated designation of the Egyptian priest as prophet served as the Greek translation of the specialist that the Hebrew Bible calls nabi, with its meanings of 'called' or 'summoned,' 'man of God,' and even 'seer.' The transformations and extension of the Greek prophétes, as well as the application of Greek terms to the concepts of the Hebrew Bible determined the lopsided picture of the prophet as 'predicter' of the future, rather than as communicator of messages from God.

Types of Prophet

2. Research in religion deals with prophetism in connection with 'enthusiastically' inspired persons or groups (→ Enthusiasm), with attention to their techniques and their role in society. Prophets are religious → specialists. They make up a type of charismatic figure having special religious experiences (Max Weber). Their emergence in various functions is attested since

Since the 1920s and still vigorous today, a broad, popular movement of 'prophetic churches' has developed in Central Africa. The founders, regarded by their churches as prophets, were usually influenced by Baptist and charismatic Christian missionaries from the United States, and were persecuted by the colonial powers as initiators of a socio-cultural, religious resistance movement against European mission churches and colonial powers. This small church, in a fishing village in the Eastern lake region of Congo (formerly Zaire), belongs to the Église de Jesus-Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu (EJCSK); lit., "Church of Jesus Christ on earth by Prophet Simon Kimbangu." Founded in 1921 by Congolese prophet Simon Kimbangu, this is one of the three publicly recognized churches of the country, and is said to be the largest Protestant church founded in Africa. The persecution and arrest of Kimbangu and his followers by the Belgian colonial administration was followed, in 1959, shortly before Congolese independence, by government recognition of the church. (Benita von Behr and F. Müller)

the earliest forms of religious community building. In many cases, women, as well, play a special role.

The following types of prophet can be distinguished:

- Ecstatics and ecstatic groups, by way of calculated practices and techniques such as music, dance, fasting, and intoxicants, enter into a rapture, by which they intend to have access to such higher powers, gods, or ancestors, whose counsel or instruction is important for the interests of a group or of an individual. Thus, their anticipation is not spontaneous and unintentional, but one of a technically invoked, or 'induced' divination or mantic state (→ Trance; Prophecy/Divination).
- Court and cult prophets belong to the group of professional prophets and form a social status of their own. Through their direct and powerful influence as royal counselors, or their ongoing positions in the service of the temple, they were vehicles of religious function and authority. Their mantic technique was learned through education; often, the office remained in the family by legacy.
- Professional prophets, on the other hand, represent an altogether different group. At the beginning stands an experience of God or the gods, accompanied by corporeal sensations and affect-laden dispositions. They are ordinarily inspired, spontaneously and usually against their will, by a divine authority, and charged with proclaiming revealed words and intentions of God to human beings. They understand themselves as God's direct mouthpiece or 'mouth.'

Visionaries versus Functionaries

The Hebrew → Bible, as a source of prophecy, instructs and advises the types cited. Especially effective are the prophets assumed into the canon by the biblical editors, and directly called to their task by God, such as Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel, who stand in sharp distinction from ecstatic and professional prophets. Their enlistment by YHWH, which brooks no contradiction, compels them to announce God's word, to the past, the present, and the future, as their personal task. With their demands for social justice, they directly enter into the politics and history of the people of Israel and give instructions for political decisions, as for ethical actions and religious practice. As 'prophets of reform,' these 'summoned' prophets stand as critics of society or of the regime, often in direct competition with institutional prophets or cult functionaries such as priests or the ruling elites. The founder of Islam, as well, → Muhammad, understood himself as a prophet, and his new teaching threatened the lucrative commerce of the pre-Islamic pilgrimage system in Mecca.

New Prophets?

As early as the New Testament (Matt 7:15ff.), as well as in the Acts of the Apostles and the Letters of the Apostle Paul, we meet repeated warnings against 'false prophets.' Paul legitimated the gifts of prophecy (1 Cor 14), it is true; but on the other hand, there were objections to itinerant, circulating prophets, which ultimately led to the rejection of prophecy even in early Christianity. Thus, all prophetical religions of revelation tend to accept, in their founding personality, the most recent herald of truth. God's revelation ends with the "Seal of the Prophets," as → Muhammad is called. Problems arise when the respective traditions produce new charismatic personalities having prophetical claims, as in the case of → Baha'i, which orthodox directions in Islam reject as heretical. Thus, new prophetism becomes part of the history of heresy.

Current religious groups and movements also like to rely on the person of a leader having a personal connection to a deity or transcendent reality, whose truths they announce, and, with them, the future. A more familiar example may be that of the leader of the 'order' Fiat Lux ("Let there be light"), Uriella (Erika Bertschinger), who calls herself "God's mouthpiece" (see illus. at → Water). As recently as the beginning of 1999, she once more proclaimed to her followers, and to all who wished to know, 'in full trance,' the end of the world—a communication that she had received in one of her divine revelations. It is precisely the 'prophets of the end time' who, at the turn of the millennium, once more have their peak moment.

Literature

Boyer, Paul, When Time Shall Be No More: Prophecy Belief in Modern American Culture, Cambridge 1992; Bremmer, Jan N., "Prophets, Seers, and Politics in Greece, Israel and Early Modern Europe," in: Numen 40 (1993), 150-183; Brenneman, James E., Canons in Conflict: Negotiating Texts in True and False Prophecy, New York 1997; Clements, Ronald E., Old Testament Prophecy: From Oracles to Canon, Louisville 1996; Ebach, Jürgen, "Prophetismus," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 4 (1998), 347-359; Gitay, Yehoshua (ed.), Prophecy and Prophets: The Diversity of Contemporary Issues in Scholarship, Atlanta 1997; Hayes, Katherine M., The Earth Mourns: Prophetic Metaphor and Oral Aesthetic, Atlanta 2002; Nasralla, Laura Salah, "An Ecstasy of Folly": Prophecy and Authority in Early Christianity, Cambridge 2003; Nissinen, Martti, Prophets and Prophecy in the Ancient Near East, Leiden 2003; Overholt, Thomas William, Channels of Prophecy: The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Activity, Minneapolis 1989; Reeves, Marjory, The Prophetic Sense of History in Medieval and Renaissance Europe, Aldershot 1999; Renard, John, All the King's Falcons: Rumi on Prophets and Revelation, Albany 1994; Rofé, Alexander, Introduction to the Prophetic Literature, Sheffield 1997.

→ Bible, Group, Prophecy/Divination, Specialists (Religious)

Hendrik Bechmann

Proselytes

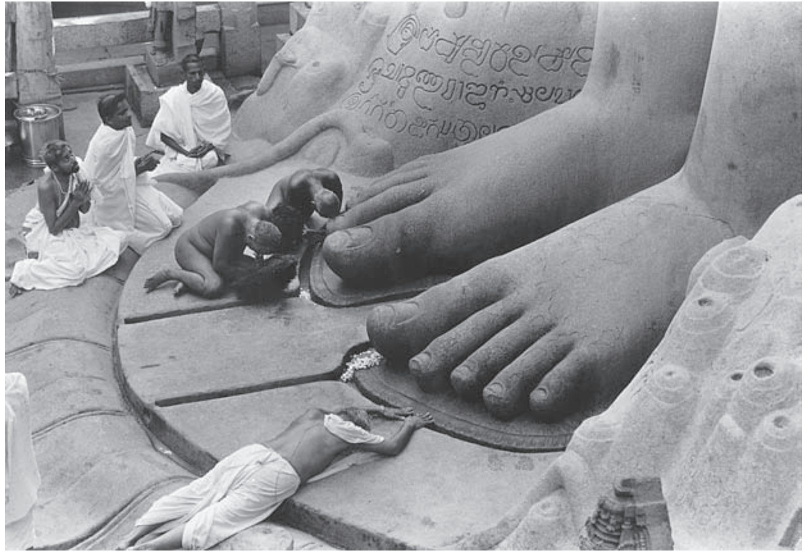
'Proselyte' (Gk., prosélytos, 'one added') originally denotes a convert to Judaism. Prerequisite for the → conversion is a confession (profession) of the Torah without reservation. The conversion takes place before a Bet Din (Jewish law court) and three witnesses. Besides → circumcision and the baptismal bath, it was necessary to make a money offering. (Before the destruction of the Temple 70 BCE, a sacrifice was offered there.) The proselyte adopts a Hebrew name.

Seen from a religious point of view, the convert to Judaism is recognized as a Jew, but certain restrictions hold: proselytes may marry no priest or rabbi, and may hold no public offices; heirs are only the children conceived after the conversion. A further problem is the fact that mixed marriages are not permitted. Theoretically, a distinction is made between genuine and false proselytes, in terms of their sincerity; in practice all are recognized as proselytes, as their true motives cannot be known.

Very early, Christianity proscribed proselytism. For the circumcision of non-Jews, late Roman imperial law provided confiscation of fortune, execution for slaves, and banishment for free men. At least since the thirteenth century, capital punishment was imposed on apostates (→ Apostasy) and proselytes. Christian churches today have their stance toward proselytes registered with the World Council of Churches (1950, 1956, 1970), and sanction believers' choice, on grounds of faith and conscience.

Today, the situation vis-à-vis proselytes has become somewhat problematic. Pursuant to a 1970 law, the partners, children, and grandchildren of mixed marriages are recognized as Jews. While in Israel only the children are recognized as Jews, those in agreement and concurrence with official religious determinations have become Jews. The civil courts recognize Non-Orthodox proselytes, while on the other hand, their conversion is not recognized by the Orthodox rabbinate, which determines personal status.

Literature



Cohen, Shaye J. D., The Beginnings of Jewishness: Boundaries, Varieties, Uncertainties, Berkeley 1999; Feldman, Louis H., Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World: Attitudes and Interactions from Alexander to Justinian, Princeton 1993; Goodman, Martin D., Mission and Conversion: Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire, Oxford 1994; Rosenbloom, Joseph R., Conversion to Judaism: From the Biblical Period to the Present, Cincinnati 1978.

→ Conversion, Group, Judaism, Mission

Babett Remus

Proskynesis

Proskynesis is a gesture of humility, composed of a gesture of 'self-minimizing' and kissing. Both elements occur along a broad palette of variation. On the one hand, there is a bowing of the head, of the upper body, a lowering of the

Pious Jains have climbed the hundreds of steps of Vindhyagiri Hill at South Indian Sravana Belgola; now they prostrate themselves at the feet of the monumental cultic image of Bahubali. The latter enjoys special veneration with the Digambara Jains. Said to have been born a royal prince, Bahubali (Gommata), could have become a great secular ruler, but he renounced this in favor of his brother, and at last attained liberation. The statue shows him as a nude ascetic in an erect attitude of meditation on a pedestal shaped like a lotus blossom. His form is one of youthful beauty, majestic and reverend, with the smile of a world-conqueror on his lips. Outwardly, in the proskynesis before the monumental cultic image, the inclination to make the honored one great and oneself small is more than evident. Before a human being, bowing and touching the feet can be seen as a sign of a respect manifested by 'respect pollution.' In the case at hand, the proskynesis also contains an element of exaltation: here the worshipers become world-forsakers themselves, and for them, Gommata is not only a vis-à-vis, but also an exemplar. (Kirsten Holzapfel) thighs and knees, and a self-prostration, in which the forehead and upper or entire body may touch the ground. At the same time, there is kissing of the feet, knees, hands, breast, cheeks, mouth, the hem of a garment, or the earth before the feet. In literary and graphic presentation, the expression of the gestures becomes even clearer: the person making the bow grovels in the dust and is represented as smaller than would correspond to that person's actual body size.

In human ethology, reference has been made to 'gestures of humility' in the animal kingdom that have a pacifying function and that may not only impede the aggression of a physically superior adversary, but may even evoke its special concern. The Greek concept of proskyneîn denotes the dog's 'crouching' before its owner; the Latin adoratio comes from the area of the sacred and connotes all of the elements of proskynesis. The proskynesis offered a ruler is first and foremost homage of greeting, but may also be intended as pleading entreaty or an act of gratitude. In and of itself, therefore, proskynesis has no religious content. Nevertheless, the rite is often performed in the religious area. Proskynesis can be executed before statues of gods, icons, or crosses. Here again is the acknowledgment of an asymmetrical relationship between a human being and a god, the recognition of a 'hierarchical differential,' such as is customary between royalty and commoners. Consequently, one's relation to gods and their representations is interpreted by analogy with societal relationships ('sociomorphically'). This act also holds, as it happens, for human representatives. Thus, medieval emperors regularly offered the popes proskynesis in acknowledgment of the status of the latter as representatives of Saint Peter.

Literature

Bremmer, Jan N. (ed.), A Cultural History of Gesture, Ithaca 1992; Eibl-Eibesfeldt, Irenäus, Liebe und Haß. Zur Naturgeschichte elementarer Verhaltensweisen, Munich 1971; Kendon, Adam, Gesture: Visible Action as Utterance, Cambridge 2004; Schmitt, Jean-Claude, La raison des gestes dans l'occident medieval, Paris 1990; Spatharakis, Joannis, "The Proskynesis in Byzantine Art," in: Bulletin antieke beschaving 49 (1974), 190-205; van Straten, Folkert T., "Did the Greeks Kneel before Their Gods?," in: Bulletin antieke beschaving 49 (1974), 159-189.

→ Government/Rule/Politics/State, Group, Hierarchy, Monarchy/Royalty, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Achim Hack

Prostitution

1. In prostitution, → body and → sexuality become merchandise. Like religion, prostitution is the expression of psychosocial needs on the part of societies and the individuals living in them. An intimation of this is, among other things, the myth of the world's 'oldest profession.' From the Christian perspective, it does not seem likely that the 'high spiritual' will be bound up with the 'low bodily'—especially in the area of human sexuality. Today there are contrary tendencies, however, that, with an appeal to East Asian or esoteric teachings (Hindu Tantrism / Kama Sutra, → Osho Movement), would 'spiritualize' and render fit for good society 'free' sexuality or promiscuity and, finally, prostitution.

Sacred or Cultic Prostitution

2. a) In the ancient cultures of the Mediterranean area (Mesopotamia, Phoenicia, ancient Israel, Greece), presumably into Christian times, the institution of 'sacred' prostitution was maintained. In the 'holy wedding' (hierogamy), for the duration of the high ritual, in order to symbolize the mysterious—and at the same time beneficial and blessed—cyclical rebirth of cosmic life, a temple priestess was 'married' with a high representative of society (high priest, king). An example would be the 'sacred marriage' of the cult of Inanna.

Herodotus (1,199) describes the temple prostitutes (the 'holy slaves') of Babylon, who would sacrifice their virginity to the fertility goddess (such as Ishtar, Astarte, and others) by selling their bodies to foreigners. Certain passages in the Hebrew Bible (Deut 23, 18-19, Hos 4:13-14) indicate that like usages were also widespread in ancient Israel. Also in Greece, especially for the temple cult of Aphrodite in Corinth, there presumably existed hieródouloi, 'sacred servants' or slaves of both sexes.

Criticism

b) The existence of sacred prostitution in the Mediterranean area is disputed, as the sources are mainly secondary, as well as less than completely reliable. In particular, hierogamy practiced there should almost certainly not be called prostitution. It may be that the cultic prostitution of Mediterranean cultures already overlapped with commercial interests. This combination would weaken its use as an example of a 'free,' alternative form of prostitution, as with an explanatory reference to a 'propitious' female sexuality. Such an interpretation would very likely only abet the danger that the act of prostitution would, as it were, be 'religiously excessive' and that (men's) fantasy of the constant sexual availability of woman would then be fixed in historiography.

After Roman times, and only with the expansion of Christianity and Islam in the Mediterranean region, cultic prostitution disappeared. It has continued to exist in modern times only in India, where (e.g., in Bombay), meanwhile, it manifests strong commercial traits.

Christianity

3. a) Early Christianity was influenced in its position toward sexuality and corporality by the 'anti-somatic' ideas of Greek (Platonic) philosophy, and by the ascetical ideal of the age of Roman imperialism. From this mistrust of human sexuality, later exegetes developed a → dualism of 'lustful' flesh and 'the pure in spirit,' the latter running the risk of being contaminated by the former. To the advantage of a protection of the purity of matrimony as a Christian institution willed by God, Christian theologians of the Middle Ages, from Augustine to Thomas Aquinas, manifested a certain ambivalent tendency: they condemned prostitution, but they 'admitted' it, in the spirit of Paul, as a 'necessary evil' (such as in the medieval prostibulum publicum), and this is still a popular view of prostitutes or prostitution today. Pope Innocent III excused any Christian from the guilt of sin if he married a prostitute. Gregory IX recognized the Order of Magdalene of the "Repentant Sinners" (fem.), who can be considered the prototype at once of the 'repentant sinner' and of the 'friend of Christ.'

With the Reformation, human responsibility before God shifted increasingly to the individual; repentance began to be demanded of prostitutes (rather than of their clients) in still sharper terms. The closing of the bordellos, like the criminalizing of prostitutes, effected a temporary diminution in their enterprise. The Industrial Revolution led to social misery in the cities and the collapse of long-established patterns of community life: with these changes came a new germination of prostitution, now in (emotional) dependency on procurers. One sought either to suppress prostitution altogether, or else, for the common good of (Christian) society, to 'functionalize' it in the sense of a control of the 'necessary evil' by regulation (health control, restriction to certain neighborhoods, etc.). Finally, in the same direction, there was a tendency to more extensive demands for the recognition of prostitution as a profession.

A socially engaged Christianity promotes the legal protection of prostitutes, as well as the abolition of official control over prostitution ('abolitionism'). Otherwise, it supports the prevention of prostitution and pastoral care of prostitutes, as well as the battle against exploitation by third parties.

Islam

b) The Qur'an forbids compelled prostitution (sura 24, 33), and all of Islam prohibits extramarital sexual intercourse, rejecting and opposing prostitution. It is true that, without prudery, the Qur'an approves monogamy (unambiguously preferring it to polygamy). At the same time, woman is banned from public life. The 'un-Qur'anic' Christian notion of woman's 'original sinfulness' was promptly adopted in Islam. In a patriarchal society such as the Islamic one, a strict separation of woman's world from man's can be favorable to prostitution. Thus, professional prostitution is altogether familiar in Islam, for its heyday under the Caliphate of Baghdad, as well as today in the milieu of the guest workers and immigrants from Turkey or from the Maghreb (where the proportion of Muslim women in street prostitution in Paris is in the area of thirty percent). There is also prostitution in the North African countries, in which the prostitution of boys (sex tourism) is to be observed, as well. The 'temporary marriage' (mut'a), in which parties enter a sexual union, in exchange for a 'bridal payment,' for a pre-determined length of time, is in practice often tantamount to prostitution, and is not recognized by theologians outside Shiite Islam.

Buddhism

c) The Buddha himself had a tranquil relationship with prostitutes. He spent time in their homes casually, accepted contributions from them, and entered into discussion with them, this even concerning the requirements for salvation.

In ascetical and monastic Buddhism (Theravada), sexual desire is accounted precisely the prime example of that painful captivity in and by the world that impairs a person's chances for salvation (attainment of → nirvana). For the laity, who are not striving for perfection and enlightenment, sexual abstinence is not an obligation, although moderation is counseled. Prostitution is of no formal interest in Buddhism. It is neither particularly approved, nor is it rejected, but it is accepted as a property of painful existence. The attitude of the earnest Buddhist consists rather in compassion for those involved in it; he or she is not actively concerned for its abolition. In Buddhist countries such as Thailand, then, a religious basis for an active effort to improve the situation of prostitutes is limited.

Literature

Bullough, Vern/Bullough, Bonnie, Prostitution: An Illustrated Social History, New York 1978; Davis, Nanette J. (ed.), Prostitution: An International Handbook on Trends, Problems, and Policies, Westport 1993; Joardar, Biswanath, Prostitution in Historical and Modern Perspectives, New Delhi 1984; Lapinkivi, Pirjo, The Sumerian Sacred Marriage in the Lights of Comparative Evidence, Helsinki 2004; MacGinn, Thomas A. J., The Economy of Prostitution in the Roman World: A Study of Social History and the Brothel, Ann Arbor 2004; Outshoorn, Joyce V. (ed.), The Politics of Prostitution: Women's Movements, Democratic States and the Globalisation of Sex Commerce, Cambridge 2004; Ringdal, Nils Johan, Love for Sale: A World History of Prostitution, New York 2004; Rossiaud, Jacques, Medieval Prostitution, New York 1988.

→ Body, Economy, Gender Stereotypes, Homosexuality, Nudity, Sexuality, Tantra

Christian Lange

The official sexual morality of the Catholic Church still has a difficult time seeing more in prostitution than merely a 'necessary evil' (Paul). As a result of impoverishment and sexual tourism, however, it has become a great social problem in countries of the 'Third World.' Catholic orders concern themselves with this problem, as is shown in a picture from the Dominican Republic: a Catholic nun in friendly conversation with young prostitutes. This Caribbean island has developed into a center of sexual tourism in recent years. With more than twenty-five percent of the population unemployed, according to surveys, some 40,000 women work as prostitutes, an occupation usually leading to social misery. Catholic orders try to alleviate this suffering with training courses for a life after the time of this engagement, and with pastoral care. (O. Grasmück)

Protest

1. Social protest is a form of activity through which persons seek, collectively, perceptibly, and usually in confrontation, to change social or societal conditions or to preserve them from change. It is usually concerned about rights claimed by the protesters, to whom these seem to have been violated, for themselves or for third parties. Its vehicles are minorities or groups far from the centers of decision-making. Religions, as is well enough known, can not only legitimize the status quo, they can also reinforce social protest movements: by preparing and legitimizing divergent analytical patterns for the interpretation of situations and the orientation of behavior; by rendering these patterns plausible, and practical for life, and making them binding, thus motivating persons to protest; by molding and framing repertory and action, and with them the form of the protest; or by making available material, organizational, and personal resources, offering those protesting a protection and a moral weight.

2. a) The potential for protest that religions enjoy has become visible through, among other things, → liberation theology. In the Philippines, for example, slum dwellers carry a cross through the city, in a kind of procession, to protest their expulsion. Nuns initiate demonstrations against human rights violations, and by way of wall paintings or masks, identify the Passion of Christ with the people's present suffering (see illus.). The protesters take up traditional symbols, like the cross or crown of thorns, appropriating these through their presentation, and thereby strengthen their collective identity as the 'Church of the poor.' For the Philippines, this is nothing new:

During Holy Week 1998, slum dwellers in Manila hold a demonstration against the destruction of their settlements. By virtue of the point in time, through the demonstrators' name for the action ("Calvary of the Urban Poor"), and by the crosses borne by the Christ figures, this protest can be understood as a reenactment of the Passion story, in which the sufferings of Christ and their own deprivations can be understood as one and the same. The oversize masks worn by the actors, bearing the face of the Victim, reinforce still further the identity between their mythic and their social sacrificial roles. Last, but not least, the introduction of this identification will have a transformative effect, as it lends nameless slum dwellers a new dignity.

in the nineteenth century, it was precisely these symbols that the Spanish missionaries brought for the celebration of loyalty; and then passion plays were subjected to an indigenous reading that made speech and images available to agrarian protest. As in many colonial and critical situations, these movements were determined by the expectation of an imminent new society (→ Colonialism; Millenarianism/Chiliasm). Later movements lost this character, it is true, or else transformed it into an expectation of the Communist revolution. But the legitimacy of a reference to religious symbols remained evident, as shown in the mass protests against the Marcos regime (the Rosary Revolution, 1986), and even in the middle-class protests of the extreme religious right against the 'godless Communists.'

Peasants' War and Radical Reformation

b) The reference to religious symbols in acts of protest is typical of premodern societies, in which religion is not limited to a social area, but is an all-pervasive quantity. This was the case in Europe, as well: in the Peasants' War of 1524–1525, the agricultural class laid claim to the Gospel as the basis of its demands, and—against the intentions of normative theologians like Luther—understood its movement as part of the → Reformation. This form of social religious movement then found its most radical and, once more, its chiliastic expression, around Thomas Müntzer and in the Baptist reign at Münster (1534–1535).

c) It was in altogether different circumstances that a connection materialized between religion and protest in the German Democratic Republic. In a society in which no opposition was foreseen, the Church became the only institution not integrated into the official societal structure. In order to maintain room for free play, it accepted these conditions, but was able to make use of its position by (both as an institution and through individual representatives) continually relating to, for instance, questions of peace, and at the same time harboring Christian protest groups, together with elements of the political opposition.

Western Europe and the United States

d) In Western Europe and the United States, protest was more powerfully articulated by non-religious agents, especially by new social movements, such as the → peace movement, or the ecological movement. But even they evince an implicit religious dimension, for example, in the form of universal or apocalyptic images of the world, moral rigorism, or an accentuated consciousness of mission, or else as motivation of individually engaged persons. But there are also groups in these surroundings that explicitly designate themselves as Christian, or Jewish, or even as pagan, and seek to dissolve the relegation of religion to the private sphere. Repertories of action, and symbols like celebrations of the Lord's Supper in occupied territory, or church → asylum, can emerge from traditional religion here as well. While political and ecclesial opponents suppose an instrumentalization of religion, activists understand their engagement as an expression of faith. This self-image is obvious to religious protesters under conditions of the modern age.

Afro-American Protest Movements

Groups carry social protest forward, this is true; but, in many cases, charismatic personalities (→ Charisma) also play a key role. So it was with the Afro-American protest movements of the 1960s: Baptist Pastor Martin Luther King, Jr., led the civil rights movement in the spirit of a radical nonviolence, while Malcolm X, as spokesperson of the pseudo-Islamic Nation of Islam, mobilized a separatist movement ready for combat, later founding Confrontation between demonstrators of the Außerparlamentarische Opposition ("Extraparliamentarian Opposition"; APO) and the police, at the Easter March held on the Kurfürstendamm in West Berlin, April 14, 1968: Alongside red flags, the protesters carry crosses with them, which they raise against the blasts of water from the police hoses. By going out into the street, the demonstrators snatch the key symbol of Christianity from the hands of (from their viewpoint) bourgeois Christianity and its power of definition. In the tradition of heretical movements, the Christian religion, with its sign of salvation, is interpreted as a (social-) a Sunni Islamic movement. After King and Malcolm X were both murdered, they became martyrs, and today have become symbolic figures of their movement and ideals all over the United States and beyond.

A further aspect comes to light in protest movements in the United States, which invoked nonviolent activity not only to achieve concrete political change, but also for the construction of egalitarian communities, prefigurations of the society of their strivings (→ Utopia). This moment of a utopian counter-culture, which acts as a protest sheerly by way of its existence, and whose light is shed on society, is found in many protest groups. To be sure, religion can also be connected with conservative protest groups, as one sees with organized opponents of abortion: these make use of explicitly religious patterns of interpretation, while their forms of protest, at least in the United States, are extremely militant (→ Fundamentalism).

3. Religion is not per se a power of protest. But it can become that, because it can take a fundamental distance from societal circumstances. It posits an instance that can relativize the world's arrangements (those of a culture of the majority, or of state control), and make the consequences of ethics a question of conscience. It opens up an eschatological future, whose anticipated dawning can lead to a breach with secular circumstances. Further, it renders possible and stimulates, in its ritual spaces, the testing of new social relationships out beyond prevailing norms and → values. From this standpoint, the mobilization of a protest against a condition perceived as unjust can be regarded as one of the functions of religion.

revolutionary movement, and thus, by its own symbolic means, it challenges the ordering and regulating power of a state that appeals to Christian values in society and politics—a genuine Pauline skándalon (Gal 5:11; cf. Rom 9:33). The appeal to the → Cross is reinforced by the gesture, so rich in association, of holding it on high. This display has the effect, more than anything else, of a provocation, which lends it all the more power and force.

Literature

Baer, Hans A./Singer, Merrill, African-American Religion in the Twentieth Century: Varieties of Protest and Accommodation, Knoxville 1992; Ching, Julia, Probing China's Soul: Religion, Politics, and Protest in the People's Republic, San Francisco 1990; Coutin, Susan Bibler, The Culture of Protest: Religious Activism and the U.S. Sanctuary Movement, Boulder 1993; Epstein, Barbara, Political Protest and Cultural Revolution: Nonviolent Direct Action in the 1970s and 1980s, Berkeley 1991; Ileto, Reynaldo Clemeña, Pasyon and Revolution: Popular Movements in the Philippines, 1840–1910, Manila 1979; Pollack, Detlef/Rink, Dieter (eds.), Zwischen Verweigerung und Opposition. Politischer Protest in der DDR 1970–1989, Frankfurt/New York 1997; Smith, Christian (ed.), Disruptive Religion: The Force of Faith in Social-Movement Activism, New York 1996; van Dülmen, Richard, Reformation als Revolution. Soziale Bewegungen und religiöser Radikalismus in der deutschen Reformation, Munich 1977.

→ Colonialism, Conflict/Violence, Fundamentalism, Gandhi, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Liberation Theology, Minorities, Peace, Reformation, Revolution (French), Society, Utopia

Adrian Portmann

Protestantism

Concept

1. The adjective 'Protestant' refers to those Christian directions that have basically taken form in the sixteenth-century → Reformation. Their appearance marks the second turning point in the (European) history of Christianity, after the separation of the Greek East and the Latin West (→ Catholicism). The occasion of the Reformation was the understanding of repentance. Monk and theologian Martin → Luther stepped into the foreground in 1517 with his criticism of indulgences, and from 1520 on with a complex diagnosis of the crisis in the Church. Through his writings and his life, Luther became the catalyst of the crisis and the figure of integration for friends and opponents.

The term 'Protestantism' goes back to the Protestation von Speyer (Ger., 'Protest of Speyer') of 1529. Here, the Evangelical Reichsstände protested against the threatened decision to revoke newly won Christian religious self-determination. The origin of the word 'Protestant' points to the inseparability of religious, political, and cultural traits where Protestantism is concerned. Further, the pathos of the concept of Protestantism is linked to the 'exclusivity particles' that characterize the determination of the salvific event (only by divine grace, Christ, faith, scripture).

Elementary Perspectives

2. Understood as the essence and expression of a Christian form of belief, Protestantism embraces several elementary perspectives. Vis-à-vis any demonstrative hierarchization of the elements of the Christian life, it stresses the 'invisibility' of the true Church. This involves a rejection of the conception of sacrament, as well as a juridical understanding of the faith of the papal Roman Church: in both cases, the latter's attitude and procedure is unbiblical, or 'unevangelical,' concerning the divine address to the world. The Bible stands as supreme canon for the examination of disputed questions in opposition to the Roman tradition. But especially Reform theology ties its criteria of truth to the → conscience of the individual instructor—unlike, for example, a consensus theory of truth. It conceives dissent as an expression of the living Spirit. This conception occasions an organizationally decentralized manner and form of life.

Crisis of Recasting

3. Theological and general history distinguish Reformation, Confessional, and Neo-Protestant eras. In terms of cultural history, it must be emphasized that the function of Protestantism is contested, especially for the ideas of freedom arising in the new eras (i.e., also for a construction of the independence of cultural and social life phenomena vis-à-vis religion). In the twentieth century, the dispute becomes manifest in the conflict between modernity in terms of cultural theology and neo-orthodox criticism the modern age. Modern Protestantism's Umformungskrise (Ger., 'recasting crisis') (Hirsch) continues.

Theologically, the crisis can be interpreted as the necessary expression of a permanent Reformation. But viewed externally, the case is more difficult: the very parameters of the recasting are disputed. On this point, some questions arise that affect the recasting today: How can one deal with the Bible at once in terms of historical criticism and in terms of theological symbolism? What effect must an evangelical use of freedom have on the molding of society and culture? What is the mutual relationship between the churches' self-concept and their relation to the world? What positions should be developed by evangelical theology toward, and in, inter-religious discussion and accord?

Further Perspectives

4. Complementing and correcting perspectives on these questions result from research into (a) society and (b) mentality.

a) Protestantism, with its elementary outlooks charged with theoretical premises, is the religious conception of an elite. True, each complex religious world of expressions has its elite. In Protestantism, however, this circumstance contradicts spiritual egalitarianism ('priesthood of all the faithful'), and becomes perceived as a contradiction. In this connection, it is observable how closely Protestantism is joined to the modern middle class and its ideas of freedom.

Current assimilation of the situation can distinguish the following social variants of Protestant casting or shaping: the lower-middle-class variant (→ fundamentalism with free-church and infiltration model), the middle-class conservative variant (endowment-church model with a symbolic elite), and the middle-class liberal variant (legalistic endowment-church model with functional elite).

b) Meanwhile, the history of mentalities brings altogether different traits to light: the condensation of a libertarian and civil rights attitude in Protestant milieus; the eminent rise of a culture of music and language; the promotion of criticism in terms of historical philology and aesthetic theory. The history of mentalities permits not only the declamatory accentuation of such traits, but also their understanding of 'duplication' in regional, epochal, and individual coinage. It helps in finding a clearer view of Protestant phenomena both inwardly and outwardly, to which the disputed 'secularates' of religious ideas are to be ascribed. In these terms, Protestantism is no longer memorable only for the launching of an economic ethics (→ Weber), but deserves a more dense description.

Milton's Paradise Lost offers an example of the mentality of Protestantism, in terms of a political theology on the threshold of modernity. There, a modern awareness of freedom, in the mouth of the fallen Archangel (Satan), is condensed into a 'secularistically devilish' bon mot: "Better to reign in hell, than serve in heav'n."[1] Here the core problem of modern Protestantism is expressed: how is Protestantism to answer for modernity's 'Promethean' understanding of freedom, without either altogether dissolving in culture, or withering, instead, in a corner of the anti-modernist shadow?

Future and Present

5. On the future of the Protestant recasting: At bottom, interior sources of the 'Protestant recasting' might well be found a good deal more easily in the patterns of Protestant life in terms of cultural history, than in an identity posited in dogmatic reduction. For inter-religious communication, the question could point in the direction of formally 'Protestant' traits in the important topics of the discussion of religious cultures: for example, pathos of freedom versus hierarchies; (self-) critique of sacramental identity of religion; hermeneutically analyzed religious linguistic culture. This could clarify 'home-made deficits' in the area of Protestantism's religious symbolism.

Crucial to Protestantism is the question whether soteriological exclusivism and social isolationism is rendering the Protestantism of the future a counterculture of elite fundamentalism—or whether Protestantism will succeed in being inserted into the order of a living, comprehensive religious culture, as a form of expression of the Christian religion in free exchange, so as to become an egalitarian leaven in the world culture of the third millennium. The "springtime of speech" (Timm) that is now budding in Protestantism, with its aesthetic discourse upon the world in which we live, could be presaging a successful reshaping, and re-formation.

1. Milton, John, Paradise Lost, London 1989, vol. 1, 263.

Literature

Durnbaugh, Donald F., The Believers' Church: The History and Character of Radical Protestantism, New York 1968; Hirsch, Emanuel, Geschichte der neuern Evangelischen Theologie im Zusammenhang mit den allgemeinen Bewegungen des europäischen Denkens, Gütersloh ³1964; Mandrou, Robert et al., Histoire des protestants en France, Toulouse 1977; Martin, David, Tongues of Fire: The Explosion of Protestantism in Latin America, Oxford 1990; Marty, Martin E., Righteous Empire: The Protestant Experience in America, New York 1970; Noll, Mark A., The Work We Have to Do: A History of Protestants in America, Oxford 2002; Scott, William A., Historical Protestantism: An Historical Introduction to Protestant Theology, Englewood Cliffs 1971; Scott, William A. (ed.), Sources of Protestant Theology, New York 1971; Tillich, Paul, The Protestant Era, Chicago 1948; Timm, Hermann, Sprachenfrühling. Perspektiven evangelisch-protestantischer Religionskultur, Stuttgart 1996; von Scheliha, Arnulf /Schröder, Markus (eds.), Das protestantische Prinzip. Historische und systematische Studien zum Protestantismusbegriff, Stuttgart 1998.

→ Catholicism, Christianity, Freedom of Religion, Fundamentalism, Luther, Reformation, Secularization

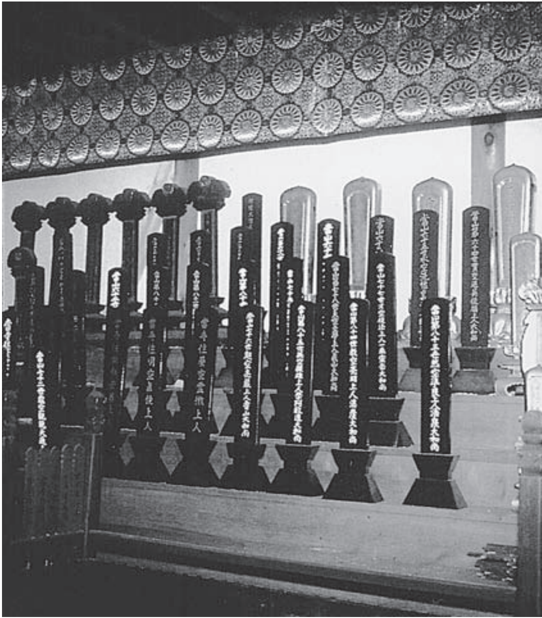
Christian W. Senkel



Psyche

Concept of 'Soul'

1. The designation psyché (Gk., 'breath' 'life breath'; cf. Lat. anima) is first found in the opening lines of the Iliad. According to Homer (eighth century BCE), the psyche appears only after a person's death: thus, psyché denotes the soul of someone who has died, not that of a living being. The life processes of the body are managed by the thymós (in Lat., animus), the principle of the vitality of the body and at the same time of its consciousness. In antiquity, the psyché is personified as a winged female being; in Apuleius's Metamorphoses (c. 170 CE), she is the beloved of Amor. The English word 'soul' is of unclear derivation. It is akin to the word 'sea,' whence souls were supposed to originate, and whither they were to return. Today, in European languages, 'psyche' denotes the totality of the conscious and unconscious—especially emotional—events, but mainly a person's spiritual and intellectual (cognitive) functions, located in the brain: processing of information through → perception and storage, by way of → memory and recall, → dream, → fantasy, motivation, and behavior. From a perspective of religious history, conceptions of 'spirit' or → soul stand for a (metaphysical) spiritual life-principle that distinguishes living beings from inorganic matter. In religions, therefore, the psyche—in various configurations—can be thought of as the immortal transitional element between the material and the spiritual, the earthly and the divine. From its concept as well as from its content, something unspecific, transitory, and unstable is inherent in the psyche. This aspect makes it seem describable only in pictures, metaphors, allegories, symbols, and so on. While 'psyche' is one of the key words of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, and is found in numerous complex words as the syllable 'psych-,' this presence scarcely renders the concept more apprehensible scientifically. As early as 1866, precisely the discipline of psychology was characterized as 'psychology without a soul' (F. A. Lange), on the basis of the nineteenth-century decision in favor of an empirical, experimental, and thereby measurable practice. Indeed, it is not only psychology that divides the soul into consciousness, unconscious, ego, self, person, and identity. Due to this development, the psyche has lost its importance as central principle of individual self-organization; and what is more, its historicity and 'culturality' have met with the same fate. Human beings are subject to changes that can be grasped in terms of (religious) history. In corresponding fashion, those changes are yet to be differentiated culturally. A (religious) history of the soul that would attend to humanity's cultural multiplicity is still pending.

The Brain as 'Organ of the Soul'

2. The question, "Do we have a soul?" is no longer posed to religious experts; it is now the neuro-scientists who are asked the question, inasmuch as the soul has long since been localized in the brain rather than in the bodily organs. Meanwhile, encephalology has won the function of judge when it comes to the question of the soul, however intensive may have been its debate in religious discourse up until now. In the research that has so speedily developed since 1860, the brain as 'organ of the soul' has come to be seen as determined symbolically in many ways, and, in keeping with the Zeitgeist of the nineteenth century, has been divided into higher and lower, civilized and primitive, regions. Comparisons of the brain with the newest technological accomplishments of information transmittal and processing—the

The Japanese language uses various words for 'soul'—tama, tamashii, reikon, goryô, nakitama—also for 'spirit,' the soul of someone departed, an ancestral soul, and the immortal soul as opposed to the mortal body. All are applied synonymously and are not clearly distinguished from one another in content. Neither in modern nor in ancient Japan is there an unequivocally definable concept of the soul. In the religious ideas of early times, tama designated impersonal spiritual forces present in all living beings, as well as in lifeless objects and phenomena of nature. They had regularly to be renewed, through rituals of adjuration (tamafuri). The loss of tama effected death, although what happened with tama afterward remained shrouded in mystery. Religious influences from the Chinese mainland, such as shamanistic concepts and ancestor reverence altered the tama concept. Beginning in the ninth century, the spirits of vengeance gained a special position—the souls of those who had died violently or in childbirth. They brought human beings sickness, resentment, and natural catastrophes, and could be mollified only by sacrifice. Today, in the Buddhist home altar, a memorial tablet is kept of someone departed, as the seat of the dead person's soul. Memorial tablets can also be preserved together, however, in a temple, as in the illustration here, where the tablets appear in a Buddhist Zenrinji temple. The ancestral souls watch over the destinies of their descendants and periodically return home to their relatives—once a year, in the summertime, at the Bon Festival. (S. Beyreuther) current example is the paradigm of the computer—are as common as they are beside the point. An early climax in the investigation of the brain must have been the localization of 'morality neurons' in the pre-frontal cortex (cerebral lobe); these were supposed to have regulated the perceptibility of normative systems, and thereby to be required for the capacity for moral behavior (Damasio 1999). The human brain contains between one hundred billion and one trillion nerve cells (neurons), and weighs some 1300–1500 grams. A striking feature of today's human being is the great increase in the volume of the outer layer of the brain (cortex). The neo-cortex is generally regarded as the seat of the 'higher' cerebral functions, such as consciousness, → perception, thinking, and conceptualization; however, such functions are simultaneously exercised by many centers, lying throughout the brain. The central nervous system of each individual is isolated from its environment, inasmuch as the neurons of the brain are insensitive to environmental stimulation. Therefore the sensory cells must translate all that transpires in the environment into the 'language of the brain.' The neuro-biological consequence is that reality is a construct of the brain! According to this epistemological constructivism, 'reality' is completely inaccessible. But not only the question of cognition, but also that of the spirit–matter or soul–body relationship, is a compelling result of brain research. Since consciousness is tied to the integrity and activity of cortical fields, brain and spirit are obviously closely connected. The establishment of a "strict parallel between mental and neuronal" (G. Roth) has led to altogether contradictory interpretations. While for many scholars consciousness is nothing but an epiphenomenon of neuronal processes, encephalologist John Eccles (1903–1997) holds that, in order to realize itself, the spirit utilizes the brain processes that seem to it to be appropriate. But Nobel laureate Eccles goes even further: the uniqueness of the individual soul compels the conclusion of a supernatural reality.[1] To the contrary, it is maintained in panpsychism that matter possesses 'protopsychic' qualities, which, through the complex material structures and functions, become spirit automatically 'by itself.' Modern conclusions of encephalology, as well, still stand in the tradition of the Western body-soul dualism, whose (religious) history begins in Greek antiquity. Without knowledge of this conceptual history of the psyche, modern conceptualizations of the soul cannot be understood.

3. With Homer, human particularities are still ordered to the organs, and the (shadow) soul is understood as a bodiless 'copy' (eídolon) of the deceased. But since around the sixth century BCE, the psyche has been conceptualized as an 'interior correlate' of the body (sóma). In spite of foundational differences between body and soul, the two are bound up with each other. To the psyche as a component of life, Heraclitus (c. 550–480 BCE) appropriates a spatial depth-dimension, whose bounds he declares to be indiscoverable. The idea of the soul as the person's interior space, together with that of one soul as the whole of a person that continues to exist even after death, was to become programmatic for the European tradition. Plato (c. 428–347 BCE) gave the soul the function of an intermediary. On the one hand, the psyché belongs to the transitory world; but at the same time it belongs to the eternal world of the Ideas, which is knowable only by virtue of the two-way connection provided by the soul (→ Platonism). According to Plato, the cosmos needs the soul for its own perfection, which, as 'world soul,' is to be found both within and without the world. In this structure, the macrocosm, the world, corresponds to the microcosm, the human being. It is not only in Plato that, in view of its connection to the divine, the soul is considered to be sullied and stained in the body—indeed, seen as the body's prisoner. To be sure, even in its earthly life the immortal soul can be delivered from the body by way of certain techniques of purification (kátharsis and áskesis).

Plato

Aristotle

This liberation of the soul during one's lifetime is also the aim of the mystery cults (→ Mysteries). Aristotle (384–322 BCE) contradicted such a 'prison theory,' and stressed the 'entelechy' as the inner 'formation power' of an organic living being. For him, in the microcosmic human being, the vegetative and the animal soul are joined, together with the 'divine element of reason,' and are necessarily assigned to the corporeal organism for their development. Consequently, for Aristotle the soul is not eternal. With this alternative, two fundamentally distinct Western traditions of thought address the soul, and both have continued to be present, in multitudinous reception.

Gnosis and Christianity

As distinguished from earlier Hellenic thought, Gnosticism and Christianity tend to degrade the body vis-à-vis the soul (→ Gnosticism; Hermetism/Hermeticism). In Gnosticism, the genuine human person is formed by the inner-directedness of the soul toward the divine light. In Christianity, according to → Augustine (354–430), only the soul can ascend to God, to unite itself with him. It is not to its own body, but to God that the soul points. The divine image (in Lat., imago Dei) characterizes the human spirit as the highest of the levels of soul. In the Middle Ages, as in antiquity, the soul is conceptualized rather in bodily form, but remains more important than the body itself. Having been created by God, the soul trundles toward death, except it return to God, thwarting damnation, in illumined purity, and received by angels.

The Individualization of the Soul

One of the most decisive changes of early modernity was the individualization of the soul, which occurred under the decisive influence of the → Renaissance—and the investigations of the → Inquisition, which, compelling its victims, probed the pressure of outer demonic powers on a person's interior. The way was paved for this development through the 'discovery of the individual' in the twelfth century. The medieval process of individualization was also fostered by the introduction of individual → confession (1215), as well as, for example, by Thomas Aquinas (1225/26–1274), according to whose teaching a spiritual soul as formal principle is created by God for each body. The Christian 'cure of souls' or pastoral care, which was intensified by all confessions after the Reformation, as well as an ultra-rigorous formation of conscience, effected the forms of individual self-control and self-discipline that still prevail today. → Conscience is now understood as a garment of the soul, founded in the body and fostered through a pedagogy of pain. Descartes (1596–1650) took the giant step from the individualization to the subjectivization of the soul. Vis-à-vis the body, he posited a center of the psyche. Intuitively, the soul possesses a knowledge concerning itself (Cogito ergo sum—Lat., "I think, therefore I am"). According to Descartes, the thinking soul and the body influence each other, mutually and causally, through the 'pineal gland' (epiphysis cerebri) in the brain. Out of the medieval divine rays emerges subjective reason as the warrant of social happiness.

Romanticism

In the further course of things, by way of rationalistic and empiricist directions—although constantly accompanied by an underground of contrary hermetic and Neoplatonic currents—there arises the 'de-substantializing' of the soul. In → Romanticism, then, the psyche once again becomes a key concept—especially in relation to the irrational—in which the connections among sleep, → dream, rationality, and unconscious are central. Carl Gustav Carus (Psyche. Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der Seele—Ger., "Psyche: On the History of the Development of the Soul"; 1846) claims to find the key to consciousness in the unconscious life of the soul.

Empiricism

In the course of the nineteenth century, successful processes of division are accomplished. The natural sciences detach from the humanities; toward the end of the century, newly founded 'psychology' splits into a pure psychology of consciousness and a depth psychology of the unconscious (→ Psychoanalysis). The soul no longer seems the transitional principle between matter and spirit, the terrestrial and the divine, and has also served its term as imperishable substance. Empiricism makes it the totality of psychic functions, which are adopted by psychology as sensation, perception, conceptualization, thinking, feeling, and willing. The soul loses its transcendence and is now ordered to the immanence of the body. Around 1900, there also occurs the founding of an empirical psychology of religion (William James, Edwin D. Starbuck), marked to our day by a powerful division within psychological investigation, as well as frequent oscillation between reductionism and apologetics in relation to its object.

Positions in Religious Studies: Animism and Dynamism

4. The increasingly dominant position of the natural and experimental sciences in Europe since the nineteenth century manifests the 'dissolution of the soul.' True, the attendant thrust to modernization was experienced not only as deliverance, but also as alienation. A newly recognized relevance and right to exist on the part of the 'religious,' forced early → academic study of religion to inquire into the other, officially ignored side of society, and thereby as well, once more into conceptualizations of the soul. Religion's fundamental problem implicated the question of the soul. The 'de-substantialized' soul launched a quest for the conceptions of the soul—the 'stuff of the soul'—throughout the world. In correspondence with → evolutionism, the question of the soul was to be explained through a determination of the origin of religion. Faithful to this direction of thought, E. B. Tylor (1832–1917) had already construed → animism as the first stage of humanity's religious development. In the phenomenology of religion (→ Eliade), which was likewise imprisoned in the evolutionistic schema, the concept of the soul once more received a key position. In his Phänomenologie der Religion (Ger., "Phenomenology of Religion"; 1933), G. van der Leeuw settled upon the experience of power (dynamism) as the foundational essence of religion. For him, the concept of power was a vox media (Lat., 'middle voice') between (sacred) substance and the Divine. According to this principle, soul always meant a mighty quality, bound to a vehicle or a substance ('stuff of the soul'). Of course, the integration of divergent concepts of the soul in animism and dynamism could succeed only through a negation of the respective context of religious culture and history.

Problems of the Western Concept of the Soul in Religious History

5. Indeed, there is a problem in the application of the modern concept of the psyche, as well as of the corresponding body-soul dualism, to other religions of past and present. As numerous examples show, equivalents to the Western concept of soul, in their conception and history, often take some other, even an opposite, direction, and therefore ought not to be automatically translated 'soul.'

Ancient Egypt

a) In Egypt, for example, 'conceptualizations of the soul' stand in an altogether different relationship to a human being's individual body, as well as to the 'super-individual' divine world; and it is in their own way that they bind together the worlds of here and beyond. In the Egyptian view, each individual consists of (1) body, (2) ba—'personhood,' (3) ka—'power of life and generation,' (4) name, and (5) shadow, all of which, after dismemberment by death (myth of Osiris), act together once more in the beyond. After death, a person is given the further option of joining ba and ka, and thereby becoming an akh, an imperishable being of light. It is especially ba, ka, and akh that are inappropriately translated 'soul.' It is not the brain, but, as Aristotle thought too, the heart that is the seat of perception, consciousness, and the recall of memory. The ba corresponds somewhat to the human personhood, which, after death, is free to undertake motion, but which, even then, still has material needs. As ba, deities, likewise, can manifest themselves in this world in physical shape and form. In order to continue existing in the beyond, the mummified body of the deceased must join the ba every night (→ Mummification). The human ba is represented as a bird with the head and arms of the deceased. The ka comprises the power of life and generation, in deities and human beings alike. With a person's birth, the ka begins its existence—as her or his double, as it were. After death, the ka, which can become incarnate in the burial statue, continues to be supplied with nourishment; its absorption of the life force of the sacrificial meals is immediate. The ka is shown with two uplifted arms. Finally, name and shadow function as an individual 'soul vehicle,' here and in the beyond.

The Fòn of Benin

b) With the Fòn (Benin), as in many other cultures, the 'soul' constitutes a connective medium between human being and the → ancestors, but is also present in the → breath, as breath of life, and in the shadow. The spirit of the ancestors (jòtó) is bound up with a person's destiny. In its heavenly portion, it is honored with regularity as a divinity. Accordingly, it receives sacrifices. Each human being's personal destiny (sé) is dealt with before birth by the highest being, Máwú, but after the birth is immediately forgotten. Sé manifests itself in the head. In the sé, as psycho-physical component of the human being, a piece of Máwú is fixed. A person's completely realized sé represents her or his personal Vodún ('guardian spirit'). Breath, shadow, and ancestral spirit leave the body after death. The dead are now free of all earthly laws. With the Fòn, as in Egypt, there is a bond between the dead, and birds as 'souls of the dead.' The amount of ancestral souls in heaven is limited in principle; nevertheless, an ancestor can be partially reborn in a child of his or her clan.

Transmigration and Reincarnation

c) The application of the Western concept of the soul to the transmigration of souls, especially to the Asian conceptions of → reincarnation, does not seem unproblematic. The idea of the transmigration of souls (in Gk., metempsychosis), Christian dogmatics notwithstanding, has been present in Europe since Greek antiquity. Besides the simple conception of the → rebirth of an ancestor in a child, the spectrum of the transmigration of souls in religious history reaches all the way to the endless (in principle) reincarnations of → Hinduism, Jainism, and → Buddhism. In the center of the complex of conceptualizations of all three religions stands the cycle of births (samsāra) that has no beginning, in which Karma effects the constantly repeating reincarnations. In Hinduism, a kind of 'individual soul' (ātman) can be determined as the vehicle of rebirth, the element that attains 'release' or 'liberation' (moksha) from the cycle of rebirths through ultimate unification with Brahman. The → Buddha, meanwhile, in the 'no self' doctrine (anatta), fundamentally rejects the idea of a soul, and not only as principle of reincarnation. By way of Helena P. Blavatsky's nineteenth-century Theosophy (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society), the Anthroposophy of Rudolf Steiner, and the reception of Buddhism and the esoteric movement of the twentieth century, the concepts of reincarnation ultimately belong to the European tradition as well. In the → New Age environment, the conception of transmigration is even used therapeutically. Thus, in 'reincarnation therapy,' psychic healing of traumas is sought through hypnosis, in the recall of earlier existences—the (conscious) 'return.'

Psychology versus Religion

6. It is true that the 'I' is but one of the possible realizations of cognition in the brain. But, by way of the dominant primacy of the psychiatric medical complex and psychology, the Western concept of the psyche is normative worldwide in the matter of the frontiers of normality, (psychic) disease, insanity, and health. At the same time, this promotes to universal validity a specific notion of reality. But precisely the religious phenomena of → trance, → ecstasy, and → possession demonstrate the limits of the Western scientific system of classification, as for example, the World Health Organization's "International Classification of Psychic Disorders" (ICD-10). To be sure, the power of definition of Western science has always been so great that, in a complicated give-and-take, (a) religious currents try to find 'scientific proof' for their data, (b) all kinds of exceptional psychic conditions in the religious context are 'explained' with the help of psychological methods and models, (c) religions make use of scientific psychological techniques and integrate them into their respective salvific systems, and (d) psychological techniques and methods are 'exposed' as actually religious.

'Scientific Proof' of Spirits and Souls of the Dead: Spiritism and Near-Death Experiences

With precursors like Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), and especially at the hands of Andrew Jackson Davis (1826–1910), in the nineteenth century the → spiritism movement appeared, seeking scientific demonstrations of the existence of a spirit world. Contrariwise, the phenomena of spiritism are scientifically investigated from a critical point of view by → parapsychology. The common foundation of the spiritistic directions is the conceptualization that the material body of which the human being disposes contains an immaterial, indestructible spirit, which, in turn, is manifested in a 'soul body.' The principal practice of spiritism consists of interrogating the spirits of the departed, and meanwhile has degenerated into the Hollywood film cliché. In parallel, since the 1970s, 'empirical' near-death experiences transmit the same message: that the departed are still alive in the beyond, and that those still living today will be received in friendship after death.

Scientific Explanatory Models: From Possession to Personality Disturbance

b) The phenomenon of → possession, in which a spirit or god takes control over an individual, and usually found in a ritually induced condition of → trance, poses questions as to how the event in question can be explained in terms of, for example, brain physiology and of psychology, and as to what occurs in the trance with the actual personality who is then absent. An explanatory model applied since the 1950s has been the well-known disease concept known as 'multiple personality disorder,' which entered normative classification systems only in 1980, and against resistance (ICD 10: F 44.81). The determinative indication here consists in the presence of two or more personalities in one individual—where, however, only one personality is present at one time, and none of the personalities knows of the other(s). In a ritual context, possession is often experienced as a healing one; but this is not the case with demonic possession, which is supposed to end in the 'therapeutic' act of → exorcism. Less spectacular are the physiological and psychological (perceptual) investigations in various forms of → meditation. Especially, electroencephalographic (EEG) measurements of the processes transpiring in meditating subjects produced positive results with respect to stress relief and concentration. These experimental results were at once taken advantage of by the religious movement known as Transcendental Meditation (TM), and used as propaganda in support of their teaching.

Ritual Psycho-Techniques: Scientology

c) The disputed religion of the Church of → Scientology, founded by science-fiction author L. Ron Hubbard (1911–1986), has been marked from the beginning by the application of different psycho-techniques, and enters into all but direct competition with psychotherapy. The primer of Scientology itself, Hubbard's Dianetics (1950), as the 'modern science of mental health,' teaches liberation from 'engrams,' which rather correspond to traumas, in order to become 'clear.' 'Clearing' is a cathartic technique (→ Catharsis) that, through application of the 'e-meter'—a variation of the lie detector—in 'auditing,' a composite form of therapeutic session and ritual of confession, reportedly produces the optimal human being, a person without neuroses, psychoses, compulsions, and so on. Only then can the 'Thetan,' the 'spirit soul' of Scientology, go into action. Without the twentieth-century developments of psychology and neurology, and the utilization of corresponding technological apparatus, Scientology is simply unthinkable. The introduction of 'mind machines,' which are supposed positively to influence the activities of the brain, continues this development.

Psychotherapy as Confession

If psychotherapy itself is to be understood universally as secularized 'cure of souls' or pastoral care, then the therapeutic session can be thought of as a secularized form of Christian → confession. In confession and therapy, as institutional forms of narration that render the soul available and accessible, a selection is made from the vast current of human experiences and actions, and a schematized → biography is generated. The latter becomes the medium of → meaning. Just as, in a religious context, biography acquires interest against the horizon of salvation, so also, in depth psychology, it becomes an aspect of concern for healing, which, in turn—especially in C. G. Jung's analytical psychology—is freighted with religious features. But parallels exist not only between psychotherapy and Christian pastoral care, but also between → Zen Buddhism and → psychoanalysis. Since the 1960s, in certain currents, psychotherapy and religion have developed an ever more intimate relationship. Transpersonal Psychology (Stanislav Grof, Ken Wilber) strives directly for a 're-enchantment of the world' and integrates elements of Zen Buddhism, → Daoism, → Yoga, and → Sufism.

7. American philosopher and psychologist William James (1842–1910), in his classic The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), addressed the fundamental and religious question of the knowledge of (psychic) realities, in a fashion that remains basic today. James reworked the psychological currents of his time and programmatically forestalled themes of a psychology of religion only then beginning. For James, the varieties of religious experience corresponded to the most varied conditions of consciousness. But, even after one hundred years of religious psychology, research into the 'worlds of consciousness' is only just under way.

1. Eccles, John C., How the Self Controls Its Brain, Berlin 1994.

Literature

Brain Research, Psychology, and Psychology of Religion: Argyle, Michael, Psychology and Religion: An Introduction, London 2000; Baumgarten, Albert I. et al. (eds.), Self, Soul and Body in Religious Experience, Leiden 1998; Belzen, Jacob A. (ed.), Aspects in Contexts: Studies in the History of Psychology of Religion, Amsterdam 2000; Damasio, Antonio, The Feeling of What Happens: Body and Emotion in the Making of Consciousness, Orlando 1999; Derksen, Jan, Personality Disorders—Clinical and Social Perspectives: Assessment and Treatment Based on DSM IV and ICD 10, Chichester 1995; Goodman, Felicitas D., Ecstasy, Ritual and Alternate Reality: Religion in a Pluralistic World, Bloomington 1988; Gorman, Margaret (ed.), Psychology and Religion: A Reader, New York 1985; Jackson, Stanley W., Care of the Psyche: A History of Psychological Healing, New Haven 1999; James, William, Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature, New York 1902; Johnson, Mark H., Developmental Cognitive Neuroscience: An Introduction, Malden [2]2005; Nelson, Charles A./Luciana, Monica (eds.), Handbook of Developmental Cognitive Neuroscience, Cambridge 2001; Roth, Gerhard, Das Gehirn und seine Wirklichkeit. Kognitive Neurobiologie und ihre philosophischen Konsequenzen, Frankfurt/M. [3]1999.

The European Tradition: Jüttemann, Gerd et al. (eds.), Die Seele. Ihre Geschichte im Abendland, Weinheim 1991; Kippenberg, Hans G., Discovering Religious History in the Modern Age, Princeton 2002; Patočka, Jan, Plato and Europe, Stanford 2002; Pender, Elizabeth E., Images of Persons Unseen: Plato's Metaphors for the Gods and the Soul, Sankt Augustin 2000; Rist, John M., Man, Soul and Body: Essays in Ancient Thought from Plato to Dionysius, Aldershot 1996; Robinson, T. M., Plato's Psychology, Toronto ²1995; Rousseau, George S. (ed.), The Languages of Psyche: Mind and Body in Enlightenment Thought, Berkeley 1990; Wagner, Ellen (ed.), Essays on Plato's Psychology, Lanham 2001; Wright, John P./Potter, Paul (eds.), Psyche and Soma: Physicians and Metaphysicians on the Mind-Body Problem from Antiquity to Enlightenment, Oxford 2000; Zander, Helmut, Geschichte der Seelenwanderung in Europa. Alternative Religiöse Traditionen von der Antike bis heute, Darmstadt 1999.

Traditions outside Europe: Bascom, William, "Yoruba Concepts of the Soul," in: Wallace, Anthony F. C. (ed.), Men and Cultures, Philadelphia 1956, 401-410; Hornung, Erik, Idea into Image: Essays on Ancient Egyptian Thought, New York 1992; Hultkrantz, Åke, Soul and Native Americans, Woodstock 1997; Magid, Barry, Ordinary Mind: Exploring the Common Ground of Zen and Psychotherapy, Boston 2002; Wilder, William D. (ed.), Journeys of the Soul: Anthropological Studies of Death, Burial, and Reburial Practices in Borneo, Phillips 2003; Young-Eisendrath, Polly/Muramoto, Shoji (eds.), Awakening and Insight: Zen Buddhism and Psychotherapy, Hove 2002.

→ Ancestors, Animism, Ecstasy, Freud, Illness/Health, Insanity, Meditation, Memory, Parapsychology, Perception, Platonism, Possession, Psychoanalysis, Psychopathology, Reincarnation, Shamanism, Soul, Spiritism, Trance, Vision/Auditory Experience

Edmund Hermsen

Psychoanalysis

1. The word 'psychoanalysis' was first used in 1896, by the founder of the science, Viennese neurologist Sigmund → Freud. His new procedures constituted methods of treatment for neurotic illnesses, whose cause Freud sought to ground in the history of the psychological development of the individual and of civilization. The psychodynamic associations that Freud then discovered, partly through clinical observation, partly through introspection during his self-analysis of 1895–1902, and partly by speculation, finally crystallized in a scientific doctrinal edifice that rests on four basic pillars. These pillars, constituting the unconditional presupposition and minimal definition of psychoanalysis, were "the adoption of unconscious mental occurrences, the recognition of the doctrine of resistance and repression, and the assessment of sexuality and the Oedipus complex."[1]

Discovery of the Unconscious and the 'Secular Cure of Souls'

2. Around 1900, psychoanalysis permanently convulsed the Western image of the human being, expanding it around the earlier development of the depth dimensions of the unconscious. The 'unconscious' was now an independent psychic instance, following the 'primary processes' (Lust, Ger., 'pleasure principle'), but extensively withdrawn from rational consciousness and the latter's 'secondary processes' (reality principle). In his demonstration that the ego "is not even master in its own house,"[2] but obeys the drives of the human being's sexual and aggressive nature, Freud himself saw the third outrage to be perpetrated on humanity's narcissism, after the Copernican and the Darwinist (→ Darwinism). To ground this depth dimension, Freud—like Karl Marx (→ Marxism) and Friedrich → Nietzsche—made use of a hermeneutics of suspicion and doubt[3] concerning → dreams, memories, and individual mistakes (forgetting, 'slips' in writing and speaking, and so on). But cultural achievements, as well, such as religion, morality, and art are only manifest symptoms of repressions, rationalizations, and sublimations of latent unconscious drive bases concealed behind them. They yield to the Freudian psychoanalysis under three meta-psychological viewpoints especially: dynamically as drive conflicts, economically as energy regulation of drive toleration, and topically as a combination of the 'soul apparatus' (unconscious, preconscious, and conscious; or, otherwise ordered, ego, id, and superego). Therapeutically, in the dynamics of transference and counter-transference between analyst and analysand, Freud sought to render unconscious neurotic conflicts conscious—through "remembering, repeating, and working through"[4]—and to solve them, at first by way of hypnosis and suggestion, and then through free association in conversation. For the technique of psychoanalytic treatment, and in order to distinguish it from pastoral work in the sense of the 'care of souls' maintained in the church, Freud coined the formula 'secular care of souls.' "We analysts take as our goal an analysis of the patient that will be as complete and deep as possible; we do not seek to unburden him by way of reception into the Catholic, Protestant, or Socialist communities. [. . .] What we thus practice is care of souls in the best sense."[5] The concept of the unconscious permitted Freud to explain faith in God, and religion, as a kind of father complex, and to do so in terms of developmental history. This conception was combated as a devastating assault on the Christian family, most vehemently by Father Wilhelm Schmidt, a student of anthropology of religion and a confidant of the Pope. On the contrary, an ecclesial follower of Freud among the clergy, Zurich pastor Oskar Pfister, felt psychoanalysis to be a challenge: "A powerful spiritual adversary of religion is certainly of more use than a thousand ineffectual followers," Pfister wrote to Freud on October 21, 1927. Among theologians, it was Paul Tillich who followed Freudian psychoanalysis the furthest. He saw a conjunction with → existentialism in it, and interpreted its discovery of the unconscious as a part of the resistance to rationalism, which, in Tillich's eyes, stood in the way of faith.

Freud versus Jung: A Controversy in Psychology of Religion

3. Numerous divisions soon threatened the psychoanalytical movement. The constitutive role that the question of religious psychology had for the split in the early history of its institutionalization is especially evident in the quarrel between its founding father, Sigmund Freud, and Carl Gustav Jung (1875–1961). Son of a Reformed minister, born in Kesswil in Switzerland, Jung joined the psychoanalytical movement in 1905, as Zurich Instructor (Privatdozent) in Psychiatry. Freud soon regarded him as his 'crown prince,' hoping that Jung would inaugurate both the professional ennoblement of psychoanalysis, and its religious openness to Christianity. Freud and Jung indeed attempted to ground the human soul at different developmental depths in terms of its history. While Freud sought access to the psyche in the life history of the individual, to conclude from this, metapsychologically, to the prehistory of civilization, Jung concluded to personhood, or personality, the other way around—through its collective 'geology'—the 'faults' whose Christian strata he wished to level. Thus he would lay open the primitive, basic—at once unconscious and 'supra-personal'—religious strata of the soul, the archetypes. In these basic layers Jung saw "an as yet untouched treasure, a youthfulness, a fortune in something unspoiled." Here was "a promise of rebirth," from which Jung was sure he could extract a compensatory power, but where, through consciousness, "the desiccation, the inflexible rigidity, of a unilateral direction" threatened. Jung himself clarified the differences by way of the example of a dream of an older, female patient, whose soul had fallen into a crisis of faith on account of the First World War: "As she was singing [Christian hymns], she saw a bull before the window, drolly leaping this way and that, and suddenly breaking a leg in one of its jumps." Where Freud would interpret the bull as the symbol of a repressed sexual conflict, Jung saw the vision as the sacrifice of a bull,— "easily the foremost sacred symbol of Mithraism, an ancient mystery religion, of Persian influence, in whose mystery the patient had returned to contact with her unconscious, without herself being capable of understanding or explaining it."[6] The question whether religion depends on the libido, or the libido depends on religion, led to an alienation between the two psychoanalysts. Through Jung's defection, Freud saw his "construction of the totem meal"— the culture-founding act performed in remorse for the prehistoric murder of the primordial father—attested in practice. "From all sides, the 'brethren' fall upon me, and at their head, of course, the founders of the religions," he wrote to Sándor Ferenczi, on December 23, 1912. Indeed, as a consequence of his distinction between an 'Aryan,' more primordial, and more salutary unconsciousness, from a 'Jewish,' more neurotic one, Jung was not to shut himself off from the National Socialist ideology (→ National Socialism). In fact, as President of the International Society for Medical Psychotherapy, newly founded (1934), Jung would become the foremost exponent of the German psychoanalysts' policy of political and ideological conformism. Contrariwise, psychoanalysts with a scientific orientation, who—against Freud's explicit will—interpreted his doctrine as a political tool of the historical materialistic dialectic, strove for active resistance: Wilhelm Reich, who analyzed the bases of Fascist religious psychology, was forcibly excluded from the International Psychoanalytical Union in 1934; Otto Fenichel, who sought for years, within this institution, to hold together a small core of fellow analysts who were in mutual solidarity, through circular letters distributed worldwide. Fenichel's works, and, even more so, those of Reich, enlightened the Frankfurt school around Theodor W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer, who used psychoanalysis for, among other things, their analysis of Fascism, National Socialism, and → anti-Semitism.

The Psychoanalytical Schools and the Question of Religion

4. All of the elements out of which the architecture of the Freudian theoretical structure and the construction of Freud's therapeutic techniques were composed, have, in many ways, been further developed since then, reassembled, complemented, or given up in favor of new elements. Besides the classic drive and structure theory, there are ego psychology (Anna Freud), object-relation theories (which can be related to Melanie Klein), the psychology of the individual (Alfred Adler), Jung's 'depth psychology,' structuralistic psychoanalysis (stamped by modern linguistics and anthropology—Jacques Lacan), the psychology of the self (Heinz Kohut), social-sciences psychoanalysis (Alfred Lorenzer), and interpersonal psychoanalysis. But psychoanalysis has turned well away from psychology of religion, thematically, since the time of Freud and Jung. As for psychology of religion itself, it became, on the contrary, the object of investigation of sociology of religion. Here, especially in the case of analytical psychology, a sharp debate has arisen on the extent to which Carl Gustav Jung's cultic status can be sociologically explained as bureaucratization of his personal → charisma, with which the depth psychologist emerged from his faith-crisis after the First World War; as well as on the extent to which Jung practiced this cult.[7] As early as 1973, French sociologist Robert Castel, following Max

→ Weber, has described the institutionalization of the psychoanalytic body of practitioners and writers by analogy with sociology of religion, as a transition from sect to church, and by analogy with industrial social history, as a transition from a trade-like organization of a corporative type to an organization of a semi-industrial type. This analysis has been seconded especially in the various divisions of the school around Jacques Lacan, in France, as well as in the 'religious struggle,' in England, between Anna Freud's disciples and those of Melanie Klein.

Psychoanalysis in the Religious History of the Twentieth Century

5. By way of the growing popularity of its interpretations in the twentieth century, psychoanalysis has not only transmitted ancient myths, first of all the myth of Oedipus with respect to the → Oedipus complex, but has also created → new myths. Here, revolutionary outsiders, such as Wilhelm Reich or Otto Gross, exercised a particular power of fascination. Gross had come to Munich in 1901 as assistant to psychiatrist Emil Kraepelin, where he familiarized the Swabian Czech with his exuberant interpretation of the Freudian theory of sexuality in the sense of social revolution, and as a doctrine of free love. On Monte Verità, above → Ascona, he sought to lead his disciples to liberation from all neuroses conditioned by civilization. The same promise of the numinous also explains the great influence of C. G. Jung's analytical psychology on → New Age belief. It was through its popularization in the arts, however, first and foremost in surrealism and film, that psychoanalysis was secured in the general consciousness. The work of Salvador Dalí is a prime example: together with Luis Buñuel, he realized the film "Un chien andalou" (Fr., "An Andalusian Dog"; 1928), completely devoted to the Freudian poetics of the interpretation of dreams, and "L'Age d'or" (Fr., "The Golden Age"; 1930)—as well as the dream in Alfred Hitchcock's "Spellbound" (1945), which itself presents an interpretation of psychoanalysis, with a strong religious hue, as a power of healing through the grace of love. As a ritualized pattern of perception of others and self, psychoanalysis is satirically shattered especially in Woody Allen's numerous films.

1. Freud 1940–1952/68; 1987, 13:223.
2. Freud 1982, 1:284.
3. Cf. Ricoeur 1965, 45-49,
4. Freud 1982, supp. vol., 205-15.
5. Freud 1982, supp. vol., 346f.
6. Jung 1918, 22; 27; 34.
7. Cf. Noll 1994 and Shamdasani 1998.

Literature

Sources: For the collective works of Freud see article "Freud, Sigmund".—Jung, Carl Gustav, Gesammelte Werke, Olten 1958ff.; Idem, Erinnerungen, Träume, Gedanken, ed. A. Jaffé, Zurich 1962; Idem, "Über das Unbewußte (1918)," in: Idem, Zivilisation im Übergang, ed. Jung-Merker, Lilly/Rüf, Elisabeth, Olten 1974, 15-42; Idem, The Collected Works of C. G. Jung, ed. Read, Herbert et al., New York 1953–1979.—Reich, Wilhelm, Die Massenpsychologie des Faschismus (1933), Cologne [2]1972 (Engl.: The Mass Psychology of Fascism, London 1972).

Secondary Literature: Benvenuto, Bice/Kennedy, Roger, The Works of Jacques Lacan: An Introduction, New York 1986; Borch-Jacobsen, Mikkel, Lacan: The Absolute Master, Stanford 1991; Fine, Reuben, A History of Psychoanalysis, New York 1979; Gay, Peter, A Godless Jew: Freud, Atheism, and the Making of Psychoanalysis, New Haven/London

1987; Hinshelwood, Robert D., A Dictionary of Kleinian Thought, London 1991; Laplanche, Jean/Pontalis, Jean Bertrand, The Language of Psycho-Analysis, London 1988; Mertens, Wolfgang (ed.), Schlüsselbegriffe der Psychoanalyse, Stuttgart 1993; Noll, Richard, The Jung Cult: Origins of a Charismatic Movement, Princeton 1994; Shamdassani, Sonu, Cult Fictions: C. G. Jung and the Foundings of Analytical Psychology, London/New York 1998; Roudinesco, Elisabeth, Why Psychoanalysis?, New York 2001; Roudinesco, Elisabeth/Plon, Michel, Dictionnaire de la psychanalyse, Paris 1997; Stevens, Anthony, Jung: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford 2001; Zaretsky, Eli, Secrets of the Soul: A Social and Cultural History of Psychoanalysis, New York 2004.

→ Freud, Psyche, Psychopathology, Soul

Martin Stingelin

Psychopathology

1. Thirteen-year-old Sabrina came from a family where her father, as well as her aunt and grandfather, were active members of a radical Christian community. Her mother had left this religious group. A few weeks before coming down with the disease, Sabrina attracted attention in school by her nervousness, her inward unrest, and her fear. After visiting a youth-counseling center, she stabilized, and her work in school quickly improved. After a few more weeks, however, she once more manifested behavioral disturbances in school. Her grandfather then came to talk with her, spoke with her at length about religious topics, and gave her an audiocassette of religious material. Immediately after this conversation, the psychosis came on, with confabulations and hallucinations: Sabrina claimed x-ray vision, then collected trash, which she had to do, she claimed, because the trash came from heaven. She went on constantly about good and evil, bright and dark, God and the Devil. Now her father tried to 'get through' to his daughter, in a three-hour conversation—without success. Sabrina filled the bathtub with hot water, soaped herself standing by the tub, and started to climb in. She was taken to the hospital. Her anamnesis claimed that her father played the guitar in a band when he was off work. Shortly before the onset of the psychosis, Sabrina had constantly looked out of the window, listening to guitar music and dancing to it.

After her mother practically cut off relations with her father in the area of religion, Sabrina—still connected with her father in faith—was plunged into an Oedipal conflict. Actually, on the basis of her development, she ought to have identified with her mother; what happened, however, was the extended, several hours' conversation with her grandfather, who—as a kind of 'super-father'—represented an extremely moralizing and restrictive notion of upbringing. Sabrina felt more and more 'religiously guilty,' and, regarding herself as rubbish, she decompensated into the psychosis (Klosinski 1990).

Aspects of Religious Experience in Terms of the Psychology and Psychopathology of Development

2. As this example illustrates, piety, religious belief, and religious activity can, in certain circumstances, take on diseased characteristics: psychic illnesses can be caused by religion, or determined in their content by religion. The basis for this phenomenon lies in the fact that, from the age of childhood to that of adult, religious development is part of psychosocial development. Developing faith is founded in a primitive trust—that is, in the very first

In today's Western societies, persons psychically deviating from the norm can take on no other roles than those of patients in or out of the hospital. According to the kind and gravity of the disturbance, they go to psychologists and psychiatrists, or are therapeutically cared for in psychiatric clinics. In non-Western cultures, however, they have role assignments that are imbedded in an interpretative context represented in magical ritual or mythology. In West Africa, for example, there are two role formations for psychic deviations: those of the 'bewitched,' and those of the 'possessed.' The former attest to their condition by going about naked, and are regarded as harmless. The latter, who are feared as aggressive, are variously recognizable: in this case, by the multiple layers of bicycle spokes and other pieces of metal that have been hung about his body. It is believed in West African voodoo that iron 'protects' the evil demons, prevents them from leaving the body, and destroys the human substance (G. Chesi)—a mytho-pathological 'downward spiral' in the course of which the possessed person sinks ever further into the ban of his role. Now he can no longer divest himself of the pieces of iron through the influence of his spirits (often their number actually increases), and thus prevents any exorcising 'rescue attempts,' thereby reinforcing his own position as an outsider and a person self-stigmatized. (Hubert Mohr) nurturing relationship between child and principal nurturer. Religion is one of the transitional phenomena in the potential space between mother and child.[1]

A successful religious development depends on the extent to which it is possible for children, and maturing young persons, to adopt or develop a satisfactory notion of God and integrate it into their personality, to control their fears, and to bring their sexuality into harmony with their religion. If this does not succeed, the danger arises that these developmentally conditioned questions may become pathogenic problem areas for the believer's psyche.

Notions of God

a) Notions of God develop against the background of the child's notion of his or her principal nurturer, that is, along the course of interaction with a mother or father experienced as almighty. When the needed interplay between permission and prohibition gets out of balance, and the forbidding, punishing, and threatening aspect outweighs the other, a 'super-father' or 'devouring mother' can develop.

In every image of God, Sigmund → Freud saw a super-powerful, interiorized image of the father. By way of the aggressive fixation of a psychic infantilism, and inclusion into a mass delusion (→ Insanity), religion, Freud held, succeeded in sparing many persons an individual neurosis—because, in the collective neurosis of religion, infantile feelings of helplessness on the part of individuals is set into an illusionary collective web of meanings. This religious concept of development is reductionistic: Freud has effaced the meaning of the mother. Klauber (1976), as a psychoanalyst, reintroduced the meaning and importance of the mother, as it were, in his formulation: "Religious faith emerges from the fantasies the child creates in order to justify the trust that the mother will not cease to protect and direct him, and—from the child's standpoint—will be here for all time." (→ Security).

Fear Control

b) In terms of aspects of developmental psychology, religion also serves to control the uncontrollable. The religious notion of an almighty God can occasion the fear-reduction of the developing individual: the more the child can perceive situations of helplessness reflectively, the more the idea of an omnipotent God can block these feelings of helplessness. Tales of the devil and evil spirits, then, will necessarily reinforce these fears, if the reconciling and supportive aspect of an idea of God comes up short (→ Fear/Dread).

c) Too strict an upbringing, one hostile to love, which especially emerges in the question of sexuality from the basic principle of 'tabooing'—thus, from simultaneous silence, prohibition, and threat—can occasion the development of a neurotic relationship to sexuality (Bartholomäus 1994).

3. In terms of religious pathology, two pictures of illness can be primarily distinguished:

- Reactive psychic illnesses ('decompensations'), arising on the basis of family influences that have been rigoristic in the area of religion, lead primarily to fear neuroses, depressive illness, and compulsion neuroses;
- Conceptions of religious matters in terms of the mythical and mystical, on the other hand, can slip into psychotic delusions.

Neuroses

Persons with compulsion neuroses develop a strict, rigid, inflexible superego. Thus, in a strict religious upbringing, God, as the highest instance, appears as the embodiment of an instance pervaded with a 'choking' conscience. The same holds true for persons subjected to a particularly strict religiosity, and who, on the basis of a corresponding upbringing, seek to be especially pious. When these persons fail to satisfy their self-legislated goals, experienced as religious demands, and fall short of a 'god-given,' or even 'saintly,' conduct, it may happen that they feel guilty, and become depressed.[2] Through compulsive-neurotic decompensations, persons perform compulsive rituals, and entertain compulsive thoughts, in order to ward off harm and disaster nevertheless on account of 'sinful' failings. Here too, tendencies to self-punishment are impossible to overlook. Developments in terms of fear neuroses, depressive decompensation, and compulsive neurotic deviancies in the wake of too strict and rigid a religious upbringing are well known—the attested aftereffects of an unhealthy socialization conditioned by religion. This image of the disease is described in the literature as 'ecclesiogenic neurosis.'

Borderline Syndromes and Psychoses

In psychotic conditions, in the profile of a fleeting or chronic delusionary system, patients may have the experience of believing themselves to be a prophet, for example, or Jesus or Mary. Again, with the disease picture of a multiple personality disorder, it can occur that patients perceive the existence of two or more distinct personalities within their own persons; and one of these personalities can be a religious figure (angel, apostle, etc.). With many of these psychopathological wonders that manifest themselves in religion, it is a matter of narcissistic grandiosities, such as the conviction of being or becoming God.

Similar phenomena are presented as well with hysterical personality disturbances.

Psychopathological Borderline Conditions of Religious Experience

4. Mystics of all times, in meditation, in the experience of satori, or with Sufi dancing, have experienced short-term and reversible border traversal, linked to experiences of fusion, union, and gladness. But in psychosis it is a matter of a longer-term dissolution of the frontiers of the ego and the self, without the opportunity of extricating oneself from this condition. It must be assumed that numerous individuals with 'divine visions' are examples of medically explicable cerebro-organic or psychic illnesses in the form of epileptic auras or hallucinations. Or it may be a matter of the capacity to perceive 'inner images,' as they occur in → meditation and other circumstances of immersed consciousness (e.g. in 'repose hypnosis' (→ Trance). It would be mistaken, however, always to designate religious experience as pathological. Depth experiences, or experiences of exalted feeling, of out-of-the-ordinary or extraordinary, or transcendental things, belong to the normal inventory of mental experience, whether in the form of night or day experiences, or those occasioned by experiences that evoke mental imagery—'letting images arise out of the unconscious.' Phenomena such as daytime dreams (one dreams, and at the same time knows that one is dreaming), in which the dreamed dream goes further, and one considers it as if from without, as an observer, or glossolalia (speaking in tongues in charismatic Pentecostal movements), represent dissociations of consciousness—which can figure as psychopathological phenomena, it is true, but which can be intentionally evoked by the individual. With → conversions to new religious movements, such extraordinary experiences play an altogether decisive role, as they are connected with the group as enlightenment experiences, or revelations, and are appraised positively as an achievement.

Historical Dimension of Religious Psychopathology

5. A look into history shows that, in the thirteenth century, nearly half of the female saints demonstrate behavioral patterns accompanied by an anorexic desire (with the symptoms of anorexia nervosa; Bell 1985). There then arose a new ideal of female piety, closely connected with renunciation of nourishment. The anorexic females experience a twin morality in woman's role, finding themselves between 'sinful Eve' and 'pure Mary.' There came to be nuns who claimed to survive without eating, and when they were detected in their attacks of gulping food, they were regarded as possessed by the devil or by demons, and burned alive as → witches. From a psychiatric standpoint, → demons (the → Devil, etc.) are 'partial ego fractions,' appearing through processes of the splitting of psychic processes and content (phenomena of dissociation). These then manifest a strong tendency to autonomy and personification, and relate, as separated, split-off ego-portions, to what they experience as if they, themselves, were demons, and independent, substantial unities. For centuries, epileptic patients, as well, were looked upon as possessed by demons, and exorcisms were employed with them—finally as late as 1976, in the sensational case of Anneliese Michel of Frankish Klingenberg.

Pathogenic Potential of Small Religious Groups Led by a Master or Guru

6. The more charismatic the personality of the leader of a religious group, and the more convinced and definite the 'willingness to subjection' of the converts, the greater and more defined a commitment can form as submission to the master. This submission can even lead to a self-surrender that abdicates the will, as the self-immolation of the members of the Hare Krishna movement shows, or the tragedies in Guayana in 1978 (more than 900 members of the People's Temple poisoned themselves), or, in Switzerland in 1994, where forty-eight members of the Solar Temple died by murder and suicide. A recent example is the anticipated flight with an expected UFO, on January 8, 1998, on Tenerife, planned by the followers of 'self-appointed goddess' Heide Fittkau-Garthe. When offers of relationship, or meaning, on the part of the small religious group or its leaders agree complementarily with potential converts' sensationalistic personalities, personal traits, or pathological personality traits, then a kind of 'lock-and-key phenomenon' occurs: the convert seemingly looks for exactly what suits him or her in the scene of the sect or psycho-cult, be it in the form of compensation for undesirable insufficiencies in the personality, or in the form of a protest—either of which leads him or her precisely to this group.

Religion, in the form of a misuse of power (spiritual abuse) on the part of strictly moralizing religious groups, can lead to the development of guilt-consciousness, fear, and a desire for atonement and subjugation. On the other hand, new religious groups and sects must not be hastily and polemically 'psychiatrized.' Approach to, and integration in, a small religious group may also evoke the feeling of acceptance, and lead to a stabilization, and positive development, of the personality.

1. Winnicott, Donald Woods, Vom Spiel zur Kreativität, Stuttgart 1973, 15 (Engl. original: Playing and Reality, London 1971).
2. Hole, G., in: Klosinski 1994, 209-222.

Literature

Bartholomäus, W., "Formungen und Verformungen der sexuellen Entwicklung durch religiöse Erziehung," in: Klosinski 1994, 137-150; Bell, R. M., Holy Anorexia, Chicago 1985; Coltheart, Max/Davies, Martin (eds.), Pathologies of Belief, Oxford 2000; Dinzelbacher, Peter, Heilige oder Hexen? Schicksale auffälliger Frauen in Mittelalter und Frühneuzeit, Zurich 1995; Fowler, J. W., Stages of Faith: the Psychology of Human Development and the Quest for Meaning, San Francisco 1981; Grzymala-Moszczynska, Halina/Beit-Hallahmi, Benjamin (eds.), Religion, Psychopathology and Coping, Amsterdam 1996; Klauber, J., "Über die psychischen Wurzeln der Religion," in: Psyche 30,2 (1976), 146-159; Klosinski, Gunther, "Ekklesiogene Neurosen und Psychosen im Jugendalter," in: Acta Paedopsychiatrica 53 (1990), 71-77; Klosinski, Gunther (ed.), Religion als Chance oder Risiko. Entwicklungsfördernde und entwicklungshemmende Aspekte religiöser Erziehung, Bern 1994.

→ Crisis, Devil, Fear/Dread, Insanity, Intoxication/Drugs/Hallocinogens, Possession, Psyche, Psychoanalysis, Socialization/Upbringing

Gunther Klosinski

Puberty

1. Scarcely any other time in the maturation of one's body and soul is as important personally and socially as puberty—from the Latin pubertas, 'sexual maturity,' '(wo)manliness'; from puber-, 'sexually mature,' '(wo)manly,' 'grown up,' 'adult.' Its onset is marked by the appearance of visible bodily changes, that stand in association with the ultimate formation of the sex organs. Now being capable of procreation, the 'adult' also experiences, with this corporeal development, personal sensitivity and social status in the group or society. It can be regarded as certain that this 'transition' has always been ritually celebrated in all cultures.

Psychosocial Correlations

2. The advancement of the formation of the sex organs to the point of the capacity to procreate represents—along with the general bodily growth—the most visible bodily changes with growing young persons. The first pubic hair and an enlargement of the breasts with girls, and with boys the enlargement of the penis and testicles, the beard, and the changing voice, not only render the alterations very personal events, but make them visible to others. They announce that a maturing person will soon belong to that circle of 'adults' that, through its capacity for reproduction, can contribute to the maintenance of its group. This particular meaning of puberty, accompanied by the capacity for procreation, likewise becomes clear inasmuch as a common definition establishes the beginning of puberty with menstruation in girls or the first ejaculation of semen in boys. In Western culture, these occurrences usually take place between the eleventh and sixteenth year with girls, and the twelfth and seventeenth with boys.

As pubertal persons see that they are called into question with regard to the 'childlikeness' that they have always been living, and that their accustomed role relations are essentially changed, they, for their part, call into question the surrounding world, with its social relationships, and its rule-governed bases. In their efforts to maintain the feeling of a 'self,' pubertal persons are additionally burdened with contradictory expectations on the part of their environment, that strengthen still more their feeling of disorientation and 'splitting.' These features make it clear that puberty, biologically launched by a rearrangement of the 'hormone economy,' and a multiplied secretion of sex hormones, is signaled by other things besides the development of an 'adult sexuality' directed to procreation (vis-à-vis a more frivolous and exploratory childhood sexuality). Rather, puberty is a complex mélange of distinct developmental processes, whose course is simultaneous, indeed, but never linear in the measure of its intensity, and along whose route not only is the body formed, but the ego structure of maturing persons is reorganized, and their roles in the community re-determined.

Ritual Incorporation of Puberty

3. Pubertal changes being so important for the individual personhood as well as for the community that supports it, doubtless there is not a culture that does not make visible in some manner, and seek to regulate, the transition from child to adult. The received ritual of → initiation offers assistance in the orientation of pubertal individuals, and assigns them their place in the community. In traditional ethnic cultures, rites of initiation include the initiation of children into the secrets of adults, to the end that here, along with sexual initiation, the candidate must endure → rites of passage, that prepare pubertal persons for a sacred, higher, 'initiated' step, by way of special assignments and tests (testing of courage). Indeed, all theistic religions mark the beginning of physical puberty with an 'elevation' of youth through initiation. Even in secularized (→ Secularization) cultures, even in emphatically atheistic (→ Atheism), indeed anti-religious circles, such as the non-denominational or freethinkers, all the way to the former 'socialist' states of Eastern Europe, the ritual transition from child to adult has often been celebrated with youth dedications (youth celebrations), and the youth have often been assigned their place between 'keepers of tradition' and 'vehicles of hope for renewal.' Even more lengthy school attendance, with its final examinations, can be regarded as a modern rite of initiation, with which, in preparation for the adult world, the consequences of puberty are intended to be channeled.

Religious Orientation in Puberty

4. Religious elements belong to the ordering, elucidating, and stabilizing factors of a society, and are thereby among the 'traditions handed down.' The general pubertal inclination to call into question, in the sense of a constructive reordering, what 'already exists,' must therefore also relate to the area of religion and faith.

More than in any other phase of life, pubertal youth are in search of answers, and the questions especially seize on the contradictions between claim and reality. Thus, in the concrete, when the values of a religious society are directly or indirectly communicated to most youth, they are compared with the practice perceptible in religion and society—how they come to expression in the actions or statements of dignitaries or elders, in order to scrutinize them for credibility. As this scrutiny frequently comes out on the negative side of the ledger, there may be a → crisis of orientation that can lead to the abandonment of the familiar religious community. In the subsequent approach to a new community, which seems better to correspond to the value orientation of the individual young person, essentially three forms of reaction can be distinguished, in terms of particular socialization:

(a) An open indifference to religious communities in general, since it is in these that the discrepancy between theory and practice comes most clear, and freedom of decision is restricted in some manner. Here the aversion from a definition of and commitment to content or organization stands in the foreground.

(b) An approach to a completely different type of religious practice that offers another, 'alternative,' religious Weltanschauung. Here the element of quest and responsible orientation is front and center. With respect to content, the quest corresponds to the need for the removal of existing boundaries and a 'holistic' view, and type of experience.

(c) Integration into even stricter framework conditions, with clear, binding rules and clarifications, as they are to be met in, for example, pietistic groups (→ Pietism), or in 'destructive' → cults. Here the young person finds the element of dependability, and support from without (by the group, a higher power, or the like) in the foreground.

All three possibilities (of which there are many variations) are grounded on the need for veracity, in word and deed, as the basis for an ethical orientation. Especially with integration into 'youth religions,' or into other phenomena that seem more extreme, such as 'youth → occultism,' an additional role is played by postures of protest, and the need for 'genuine' security (in contrast with that experienced in one's own family as hypocritical). In puberty, instability of soul, together with the tendency to call into question the old, is inevitable. This condition provokes the quest for new answers, leading to an opportunism that can make it easy to enter other dependencies in new religious groups. While these groups seemingly lend support and orientation, in the outcome they more likely destabilize.

Puberty is a time when youth, in its radical mindset, holds a merciless mirror up to the eyes of adults. Often, true, this is packaged as a challenge to the fray, or to adaptation. But much more, it contains an eager offer of conversation. If this is recognized by adults, and responded to in a manner that these young persons can take in earnest, the foundation materializes for a strong, inner scaffolding. Groups that are destructive, or that reduce freedom of decision, then lose some of their power of attraction. In this sense, puberty is a difficult time for all people involved. But it is also an important challenge, and an opportunity for adults to embrace a new orientation.

Literature

Blos, Peter, The Adolescent Passage: Developmental Issues, New York 1979; Gielen, Uwe P./Roopnarine, Jaipaul (eds.), Childhood and Adolescence: Cross-Cultural Perspectives and Applications, Westport 2004; Klosinski, Gunther (ed.), Pubertätsriten. Äquivalente und Defizite in unserer Gesellschaft, Bern 1991; Lincoln, Bruce, Emerging from the Chrysalis: Studies in Rituals of Women's Initiation, Cambridge 1981; Muuss, Rolf E., Theories of Adolescence, New York [4]1982.

→ Child, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Initiation, Ritual, Psychopathology, Sexuality, Socialization/Upbringing

Matthias Pilger-Strohl

Publicity

Publicity—'publicness,' as it were—consists of packages and condensations of individual and social attentiveness, social attention, generated through communication. Its purpose is to consolidate, through communication, the most attention possible. It is distinguished in its subjects, in its size, stability, and duration, as well as in the forms and obligation of the communication. Although a society always knows a multiplicity and variety of instances of publicity, the concept of a comprehensive publicity also forms, generated by the culturally dominating form of communication. In earlier times, this was primarily the oral communication of the marketplace, and then literary publicity. Today it is the mass-media publicity (even worldwide publicity) of the newspaper, radio, and television.

History of the Concept

1. While publicity is already at hand in ancient and pre-modern societies—as in the Agora in Athens, or the Forum Romanum, 'publicity' as a concept of its own appears only in the Enlightenment. In pre-modern linguistic usage, 'publicity' denotes the evident, the known, and the general, in the sense of the common best and the common useful. The designation 'public' refers to the altogether common, and 'private' denotes what concerns only the individual. Since the end of the seventeenth century, with the development of the power of the prince, 'public' also gradually gains the meaning of 'pertaining to the state.' Building on this, since mid-eighteenth century,

'publicity' denotes the political moral qualities of the middle-class claim to government in the post-absolutist state. Furthermore, connected with publicity in the sense of a universal social generality is the pretension to subject the areas of morality, religion, and aesthetics, as well as of the political, to the communitarian judgment of enlightened middle-class society. In the nineteenth century, a doubling of the concept, still influential in today's usage, stands out:

(a) In the sense of normative criticism, publicity becomes the embodiment of opportunities for the control of state institutions by an ambitious middle class. Concretely, this means public parliamentary procedures, the publicity of judicial procedures, and the publicity of the press. Thereby publicity becomes the criterion, as well as the presupposition, of political reason. It effects reasonableness and humanity—in a word, enlightenment—and ranks as evidence of the rationality of the formation of the political will, and of the processes of decision. In this current of tradition is rooted a normative concept of publicity, in the spirit of the Enlightenment, directed to the common political entity, as that concept was once more taken up, in recent times, and further developed, especially by social philosopher Jürgen Habermas.

(b) In more of a sociologically descriptive meaning, publicity is joined with the conceptualization of a sphere generated by communication—a social medium of the unfolding of public life. In this sense, publicity is not a guarantee that social life will be rational, but is the medium of the manifold forms of that social life.

Publicity and Communication

2. The notion of publicity here proposed, one conceived more in terms of communication theory, takes seriously the premise that the historical meaning of publicity stands in a dependent relationship to certain societal possibilities of communication and media of dissemination, as well as to forms of societal differentiation. If some particular publicity is a packaging of individual as well as social attention, then it is clear that the inclusion, proclaimed by the collective singular 'publicity,' of all persons, is a guiding fiction of societal communication, serving as a horizon.

Publicity understood in the sense of normative criticism finds its moment of truth in the fact that publicities whose generation is by communication are always spaces of moral communication, as well. It is in these spaces that morality is communicated, through the bestowal, or denial, of recognition. But, as is shown by examples that might be cited with an eye to totalitarian governments, and in particular to the time of → National Socialism, even 'publicity' can be perverted, and develop destrucive moral forms that are hostile to life. Thus, the existence of a publicity for itself alone is still no warranty of rationality and humanity, nor of a fair public management of, for example, religious minorities or marginal societal groups. In Western societies, newspapers, radio, and television, and in recent times, the Internet as well, leave their mark on public communication, so that it is possible to speak of a medial publicity, and medially organized markets of moral communication. However, the widespread misapprehension that mass media communication might today stamp only a single publicity, is a false perception. As the concept of 'counter-publicity' (O. Negt and A. Kluge) indicates, in the entire economy of social communication there are also directly competing publicities. The overthrow of the regime of the Shah in Iran in 1978–1979 by a Shia mass movement (especially in the bazaars), and the breakup of the communist government of the German Democratic Republic in 1989, which was decisively readied in Evangelical Church communities, are examples of how enduringly successful counter-publicities can be constructed out of the gradual unification of small, local publicities not growing from the mass media, but rooted in religious spaces and religious implementation.

Publicities of the Religions

3. a) Religious worship itself, with its communication among persons present, generates an elementary publicity: it collects the communication of persons gathered together in groups. These small-space publicities (parishes, sects, communes), when joined by media of dissemination (books, radio, television), form more comprehensive, indeed partially universal publicities—as symbolized in, for example, Christianity, with its notions of the universal Church and the Body of Christ (→ Collective Representations). Since religious communication in worship is implemented in the presence of, and through, religious reality or power, then the heavenly publicity, with its expectations and its view of human reality, is always included, at least for the religious person, in this publicity, as well. Religious publicities can specifically establish the bounds of communication, and restrict its accessibility. This function is the basis of keeping a religious secret, or protecting privileged knowledge, and secrecy is then demanded of the members of the 'inner publicity.' The exclusion of women from official religious communication in some communities indicates how gender-specific the publicity of the official religion is, and how forcefully women are relegated to the construction of alternative religious publicities.

b) Religious and cultic publicity emerging neither from material need, nor from political interest, nor from economic goals exerts a variety of pressures, even, in the case of Christianity, on a co-formation of sociopolitical and juridical reality on religious grounds. Here, publicity demands the societal and political responsibility of the Church (W. Huber). This communication, informed and motivated by religious norms and insights, is a participation in the communicative process of publicity, subject to normative criticism, whose complaint is itself in the form of a 'claim to publicity' (for example, in questions of → bioethics, or of the discussion of abortion). In the form of scientific → theology, Christianity opens itself to the discussion with public discursive rationality. As consciously 'public theology,' it participates in the public arguments over the shape and form of societal reality.

c) In the sense of sociological description, as well, religions (in the form of manifold communicative frameworks) mark publicity as a space of social life. As institutions of socialization, they participate in the construction of an ethos, and as regulators of the cultural rhythm, they shape the societal festal rhythm (→ Feasts and Celebrations; Calendar). Accompanying social life, they offer a communication of orientation at the transitions of the → life cycle, and in → crises, and, through their diaconal communication of love and hope, they develop shadow-sides of human life (→ Charitable Organizations).

On certain occasions, and by way of specific forms of communication (in Christianity on Sundays—but also at divine services for schools, in radio broadcasts, by processions, in church architecture, with crosses on belfries and on the wayside), religions 'come out publicly' in a special way. These publicly visible and extraordinary presentations of religion seek to interweave religious publicity with other cultural, political, local, or even media-supported publicities, and to mobilize attention in the comprehensive publicity of society.

d) Modern Western societies are marked by a multiplication of the varieties of publicities, and by a no longer religious, but mass-medial character of comprehensive societal publicity. On the basis of the comprehensive aspiration to publicity constantly rooted in religions' comprehensive understanding of reality, this de facto limitation of religious publicity leads to a partially bridged relation between religions and media. This relationship is shown in criticism of insufficient and inadequate presentation in reporting and entertainment, as well as in reflection on certain broadcasts. Both media and religion are in competition for a market of persons' limited attention and time. But it is precisely the concept of publicity in theory of → communication that evinces another fact: that a repressive ejection of religion from the center of gravity of the attention of comprehensive publicity in Western societies makes it possible for religion to continue to be so constantly intertwined with so many manners of publicity.

Literature

Casanova, José, Public Religions in the Modern World, Chicago 1994; Habermas, Jürgen, The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society, Cambridge 1989; Idem, Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy, Cambridge 1996; Handelman, Don, Models and Mirrors: Towards an Anthropology of Public Events, New York/Oxford [2]1998; Herbert, David, Religion and Civil Society: Rethinking Public Religion in the Contemporary World, Aldershot 2003; Hölscher, Lucian, Öffentlichkeit und Geheimnis: Eine begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zur Entstehung der Öffentlichkeit in der frühen Neuzeit, Stuttgart 1979; Negt, Oskar/Kluge, Alexander, Öffentlichkeit und Erfahrung. Zur Organisationsanalyse von bürgerlicher und proletarischer Öffentlichkeit, Frankfurt/M. 1972; Swatos, William H., Jr./Wellman, James K., Jr. (eds.), The Power of Religious Publics: Staking Claims in American Society, Westport 1999.

→ Advertising, Collective Representations, Communication, Media, Popular Culture, Television

Günter Thomas

Purification / Hygiene / Bodily Grooming

Attitude toward Corporality

1. Religious purification, hygiene, and bodily grooming are areas of importance in all religions, although that importance differs from religion to religion. All of the religions of the world have conceptions of defilement and purification or → purity. The spectrum extends from normal bodily cleansing before certain cultic actions, to the adornment of the body, to a general attitude toward corporeality. By way of example, → Zoroastrianism understands the body as the 'vehicle,' or horse, on which one rides to battle in the 'war' against evil. It must therefore be cared for, just as no one allows the horse upon which one is dependent to starve. Islam, as well, understands the body in a similar manner, as a gift of God. To be sure, the attitude toward the body can also be expressed negatively, in its rejection or neglect, as, for example, with Indian → Sadhus, or Christian ascetics.

An especially vivid ritual form of purification consists in the ejection of 'the similar by the similar' (in Lat., similia similibus)—or, as the saying goes, "the Devil by Beelzebub." Here, in San Andrés Itzapa, in Guatemala, before a statue of San Simón, an attempt is made to purify an alcoholic of his addiction by pouring the drug over his body in the form of a bottle of beer. (Just so, prostitutes inhale cigar smoke to cleanse themselves, and white candles are lit lest a child "be done to death by white-skinned doctors.") The place is well-chosen: Saint Simon, whose sacred statue wears a black mustache, suit and tie, and hat, enthroned above the persons concerned before an image of Our Lady of Guadalupe, resembles a respectable, strikingly 'Europeanized' notable, and is responsible for attention to many needs and human weaknesses. In addition, the Maximón devotion, at whose midpoint Saint Simon stands, forms a subversive counter-image, representing the religion of the Maya against the colonial Catholic religion. The Maya positively identify him with Judas, Jesus's betrayer—not 'develish' as is the Judas brought forward by the Spanish clergy to be burned in effigy in an auto de fe for the horrification of all heretics, but an expelled one and exile, with whom one can identify. (Hubert Mohr)

Purification Rituals and Bodily Grooming

Every cultic ceremony of purification is bound up with the concept of the restoration of a condition of purity that has been lost through certain acts (such as sexual intercourse), events of the life cycle (such as birth, or death), foodstuffs, or other bodily functions (e.g., menstruation). Serving as means of purification, depending on the context, are, especially, water (as in the Jewish ritual bath, 'Mikve'; → Water), fire, or smoke, but also earth or ashes, or the excrement of sacred animals. Ceremonies of purification become necessary on certain, often gender-specific, occasions, but can also be solidly established in daily religious life, like the daily ablutions in Islam for example. Not only external, but also internal purifications are known to

The ritual washing of the feet, before the beginning of prayer, in the outer court of a mosque in Karachi, in southern Pakistan. From two verses of the Qur'an, sura 4:43 and 5:6, Islam has developed a complicated system of ritual purifications, with detailed precepts. Devout Muslims follow these strictly. To this purpose, mosques are provided with running streams, usually in the inner court, to provide flowing water for the ablutions of a number of believers at once.

religious practice: salvific fasting, water cures, and 'nourishment by light' are supposed to purge the body, and relieve it of its poisons.

More powerfully than the aspect of cleansing, hygiene and bodily grooming are connected with attitudes toward the body and corporeality. Thus, the adornment of the body, especially the female body, becomes a problem for those religions that conceptualize corporeality as a part of human nature to be overcome.

2. In Islam, the aspect of purification, as well as hygiene and bodily grooming, play a great role. Purification rituals include the obligatory washings before prayer (see illus.). In all mosques, streams or washing installations are available. In these ritual washings, appeal is made to transmissions of the Prophet Muhammad, who is said to have declared: "Purification [in Ar., tahur] is the key to prayer," and "purity [tahara] is half of the faith."[1] The feet, the face, and the sexual parts are especially important to wash; if no water is available (e.g., on a journey), sand or earth is deemed an adequate substitute (Qur'an, suras 5, 6).

a) Islamic law recognizes two kinds or degrees of ritual impurity, necessitating, respectively, the minor (in Ar., wudu) or the major (gusl) ritual washing. Exact precepts for washing are given in the corresponding legal literature. While the Shiites take the Qur'anic precepts of prayer literally, and perform a cleansing before every prayer, Sunnites regard a single minor washing before morning prayer as sufficient for the remaining four prayers of the day, unless rendered null by ritual contamination. Sexual intercourse and menstruation are regarded as entailing major ritual impurity. Minor ritual impurity is acquired through, for example, relieving oneself, touching a person of the opposite sex, sleeping or loss of consciousness, or touching the sex organ. The major ritual washing involves total immersion in water, or a washing in which all parts of the body come in contact with water.

Hygiene and Bodily Grooming

b) Hygienic measures include the circumcision of boys, removal of bodily hair by adults (by women, armpits, pubic hair, legs, 'beard'), as well as the washing of the sexual parts after each visit to the toilet. A disputed case is presented by female circumcision, which is rejected by the majority of Islamic legal scholars or at least approached with doubt.

Cosmetic bodily grooming includes the use of kohl as eye-makeup by males, as practiced by young Muslims and in many Sufi circles. The removal of hair from the armpits, and the perfuming of the body, with an appeal to the tradition of the Prophet Muhammad, is likewise routine in these circles. Further, Islamic tradition regards women as ungroomed who fail to remove the hair from their armpits and legs. As a rule, this depilation is carried out with a wax-like paste of sugar boiled in lemon juice, which has been left to set until the sugar has completely dissolved. The paste is then allowed to cool, applied to the appropriate parts of the body, and spread in the opposite direction from that of the growth of hair, so that the hair remains stuck to it. Sharia law refers only to the hair on the head and the eyebrows of the male, and with the female sex, also the hair on the cheeks, chin, and upper lip. At greater length, and contradictorily, codes address beautification that simulates something not at hand, for example, wearing of wigs or heavy makeup. Elderly men comprise a special case, and experience more generous treatment: for participation in military campaigns, they are permitted to dye their hair and beards, "lest a host of graybeards need teach the enemy fear."[2]

Extra-Cultic Concepts of Purification

"Clearing" in the Church of Scientology

3. Along with these altogether concrete actions concerning the body, there are concepts of purification that, unlike ascetical forms, do not reject the body in principle, but aim rather at a 'holistic renewal' of the individual and of society. In the Church of → Scientology in America, a cleansing program called 'clearing' plays a major role. It is a combination of physical, mental, and spiritual purification. The point of departure, here, is that people today live in a world soaked in drugs and poisons, and that humanity has contaminated itself with consumption of drugs and the abuse of medicines. The purification program of the Church's founder, L. Ron Hubbard, is praised as the "most effective means of delivering oneself from biochemical devastation by drugs."[3]

Physical aspects of the 'purification rundown' are, first, a precisely determined combination of activity, fasting, vitamins, nutrition, and the sauna, that Hubbard explains in his Clear Body, Clear Mind: The Effective Purification Program (1990). This program is intended to dissolve harmful deposits in the body, setting them in motion and 'sweating them out.' Then vitamins and minerals, a specified amount of oil, and a corresponding diet are supposed to regenerate and rebuild the body. Here it is 'natural' nutrition that is front and center, without more explanation as to what is to be understood by the expression. This programmatic step, then, is decidedly addressed to the biochemical aspects of a bodily hygiene from within, and excludes coffee, sugar, 'junk food,' and even medicines like aspirin, as 'drugs,' or 'false means of nourishment.'

The mental and spiritual factors of the 'cleansing program' include actions, and 'auditing' processes, to accompany Scientology's 'drug rundown,' offered especially by 'Narconon' (from 'narcotics—none')—a Scientology institution originally founded in an Arizona State Prison—and its 'drug rehabilitation technology.' Trained auditors in churches and missions carry out the 'drug rundown'. A problem arising here is that the indubitably positive aspects of the biochemical purification of a drug-dependent body are accompanied by the transportation of Scientology's ideology into the actions and 'auditing' processes. In academic medicine, the 'drug rundown' is much disputed.

1. Watt/Welch 1980, 280.
2. Krawietz 1991, 249.
3. New Era Publication, Was ist Scientology? Copenhagen 1993, 192. See Church of Scientology International, What is Scientology? A Guidebook to the World's Fastest Growing Religion, Los Angeles 1993.

Literature

Krawietz, Birgit, Die Hurma. Schariatrechlicher Schutz vor Eingriffen in die körperliche Unversehrtheit nach arabischen Fatwas des 20. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1991; Preston, James J., "Purification," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 12 (1987), 91-100; Wallis, Roy, The Road to Total Freedom: A Sociological Analysis of Scientology, London 1976; Watt, W. Montgomory/Welch, Alford T., Der Islam I, Stuttgart 1980.

→ Body, Circumcision, Islam, Purity, Scientology, Tattoo, Water

Assia Maria Harwazinski

Purity

General

1. The didactic distinction between purity and impurity, and the symbols and rituals that realize it, belong to the basic conditions of every religion. Notions of purity articulate a symbolically ordered world of flourishing religious life. The longing for purity is intimately paired with the yearning for salvation. The conception of 'impure,' then, or 'unclean,' identifies everything that this symbolical cosmos threatens or calls into question. The condition of purity is either very fragile, or else denotes a future ideal condition worth the striving. The evaluation of 'impure' comprehends all of those crafts, activities, places, and elements that endanger or destroy this salutary, ordered condition. If purity symbolizes a life-promoting conceptualization of order, then impurity symbolizes the opposite of this order, → evil, the anomic as principle of destruction. The impure is defined as aggressive: it infects, seizes, sullies, stigmatizes—wherefore it must be preemptively excluded, or repressed and eliminated.

Concepts of Purity as Cosmos of Values

Concepts of purity regulate both cult, and the ethical or moral implementations of a religious community. They are a kind of fundamental normative pattern of religion, a paramount difference, in the presence of which the world can be divided and understood. Often, one religion's concepts of purity can provoke another group's polemics, since the cosmos of religious values appears here in representation. Christianity, for example, arose out of a Jewish reform movement, that invalidated the old precepts of cultic purity. However, other models of purity, ultimately representing new interpretations of Jewish precepts of purity, quickly appeared. Thus, Christianity's key symbol, the surrogate sacrifice on the → cross, can be understood only against the background of the Jewish conception of the cleansing power of the surrogate sacrifice.

Ritual Purity

Frequently, although not exclusively, teachings on purity and uncleanness are bound up with purification rituals and washing ceremonies (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming). In almost all religions, the primary medium of purification is → water. Its spheres of application, and levels of meaning, are multiple, ranging from washings, and bathing ceremonies, to blessed water and → baptism. Water also has a great meaning in the topography of sacred places. It is ascribed symbolical, or even magical, qualities; it is understood as water of salvation in a literal sense, and carried in small bottles and set on one's personal home altar. The holy Jordan is just as much a pilgrimage place as are the springs at Lourdes, or the Ganges in India. A cultic expression can also be attached to the color white in ritual attire, such as in the cult of the Parsi (→ Zoroastrianism), but also in the area of new religious movements, such as the Fiat Lux (Lat., "Let There Be Light") community.

Primary Medium: Water

The Body

2. On the most elementary level, notions of purity concern the human → body. Since antiquity, and not only in arcane gnostic styles of religion, the body, being matter, has generally remained under suspicion of uncleanness. The body was experienced as dangerous, as a threat against the religious spirit's elevation to transcendency. The human body was a reference to → pain, disease, and death, and literally embodied just what religion ought to address: precisely the body's finitude. For the chief movements of the great religious communities of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism, the human body is an ambivalent phenomenon. In the body, indeed, nearness to God, happiness, ecstasy, and → love can be experienced. It does not stand unambiguously in the catchment area of the impure. But at the same time it sponsors the greatest endangerment. The unclean therefore includes critical bodily events like → birth, → illness, and death (→ Death and Dying), as well as, affixed to these processes, bodily fluids and secretions such as excrement, pus, and blood. The persons from whose bodily orifices the 'unclean' flows, are stigmatized. This stigma affects behavior not only with the sick and dying, but also with women, who, in this perspective, through their menstrual cycle and their capacity to give birth, live ever on the edge of impurity.

Sexual 'Impurity'

In almost all religions, it is human → sexuality, more than anything else, that comes under the rubric of 'unclean,' or 'impure.' The verdict of impurity is radically pronounced, first of all, on deviant forms of sexual behavior, such as → homosexuality. Only more liberal traditions of interpretation, in the wake of modernity and social adaptation, have here managed more space for the interpretation of sexuality lived within a religious community. This space for interpretation has to fight a hard battle, and continues its existence as the last resort of rigorous concepts of cleanness. In the social debate over the immune system deficiency known as AIDS, in which discourse over body and sexuality all but coincides with itself, one observes the vitality of mythical notions of purity, and the social reality that they engender. The ascendancy of religious standards of purity, therefore, and a sexual practice ranging from controlled to rigid, and emerging from acceptance of these standards, have always found their most pregnant expression in models of continence. Along with the celibate life, chastity and 'virginity' play a great role here (→ Asceticism; Celibacy). Many of these religious conceptualizations have immigrated into middle-class societies and have attained continued existence as moral standards.

The social function of concepts of bodily purity is highly ambivalent, then. On the one hand, the ascription of impurity engenders a controlled, ritually accompanied behavior, in the context of life's critical situations. On the other hand, these ascriptions legitimize the exclusion and isolation of certain groups. One stigmatized as impure must be uprooted from the communion of saints, either for a phase, or forever. Such a person is not entitled or authorized to participate in worship, and, as 'dirtied,' must shun any approach to the Holy or its locations, or else must submit to rituals of purification. The distinction between clean and unclean therefore always serves the gender-specific legitimization of strata of religious leadership, which, as a rule, are male-dominated. A modern variant, in which the fundamental pattern of purity runs an underground course, is the debate over women in priestly offices, and the struggle over the role of women in the world religions.

Nutrition

3. A broader region of the realization of religious notions of purity lies in the area of nutrition. At its focus stands a symbol as important as it is explosive: → blood. On the one side, blood concentrates the element of the unclean; on the other, because it symbolizes life, it is conceded an extraordinary power of purification, which calls for special respect. The source of the nutritional prescriptions in virtually all religions therefore lies in the taboo against the spilling of blood. As a consequence of this taboo, the practice of religion includes the more or less strict observance of dietary laws, and of precepts that regulate the slaughter of animals, as with the bloody sacrifice of animals in Islam and Judaism. A compendium of this purity is available in the Book of Leviticus, in the Hebrew → Bible, which regulates all actions of life under the perspective of cleanness and impurity. From its further development arose the kosher (in Heb., kashrut) practice in nutrition. In modern times, a multiplicity of distinct cults of purity claiming to govern private religion developed into the modern nutritional culture. Here one finds zealous health-consciousness, and dietary delusions and eating disorders, bound up with salvific promises, and longings for salvation (→ Eating/Nourishment).

The Strange and Foreign

4. The semantics of purity play a great role in the organization of a community. The 'spoiling' of the social body can occur through the lack of a moral norm. The sanctions, meant as 'purification,' extend from ritual actions of compensation or balance, to punitive judicial sanctions. Here, the purpose of the 'clean/unclean' distinction is the reestablishment of an order. In corporative concepts of purity, the notion of the unclean is often joined to an idea of the strange and foreign, these being grasped as a menace to internal order. As a result of the paramount distinction between 'pure' and 'impure,' foreign influences lead to a risky mix, and only in the best case will they result in new associations. In mixed milieus, spheres long regarded as clearly and reliably divided become hazy and indistinct: whence an interpretation of social reality that takes its orientation in the distinction between 'clean' and 'unclean' conjures up ideas of a 'pure teaching' (cf. English 'Puritanism'), of 'clean speech,' or indeed of the 'purity of the common body.' While a rigorous purism in the field of the traditional great religions is strictly coupled with a concept of holiness whose internal and external aim is credibility and ethically responsible living—thus, a high personal pretension rather than an aggression—this offer of an interpretation was rewritten, in the area of → civil religion, as the delusion of a collective purity, 'racial purity,' 'acts of cleansing,' and a policy of apartheid (→ Race/Racism).

Purgatory—the Eschatological Place of Purification

It is especially apocalyptic eschatological conceptualizations whose source of life consists in visions of purity and operations of purification. In Catholicism, they lead to the doctrinally proclaimed adoption of a place of purification after death, purgatory (from Lat. purgare, 'cleanse,' 'burn'). Other religious myths of the future display the expressionistic image of an eschatological world conflagration, which consumes all that is unclean. This invocation of eschatological scenarios serves, on the one hand, to discipline the religious community, and on the other, to elevate that community over other groups. After all, ordinarily the elimination of the unclean is coupled with the happy survival of a pure, protected army of elect (→ End/Eschaton; Apocalypse).

Literature

Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Eadem, Thought Styles: Critical Essays on Good Taste, London 1996; Ehrenreich, Barbara, Blood Rites: Origins and History of the Passions of War, New York 1997; Eliade, Mircea, The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, New York 1959; Fonrobert, Charlotte Elisheva, Menstrual Purity: Rabbinic and Christian Reconstructions of Biblical Gender, Stanford 2000; Greenblatt, Stephen, Schmutzige Riten. Betrachtungen zwischen den Weltbildern, Frankfurt/M. 1995 (cf. Idem, "Filthy Rites," in: Daedalus 3 [1982], 1-16); Maccoby, Hyam, Ritual and Morality: The Ritual Purity System and Its Place in Judaism, Cambridge 1999; Parker, Robert, Miasma: Pollution and Purification in Early Greek Religion, Oxford 1983.

→ Asceticism, Blood, Body, Catharsis, Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming, Sexuality, Water

Petra Bahr

Qumran

History of the Find

1. In Jerusalem, in the late fall of the year 1947, and at the beginning of the following year, seven scrolls were brought to market that had been found in a cave by a boy who had been chasing his sheep. The region was that of the hill of Khirbet Qumran with its ruins, at the Northwestern end of the Dead Sea, twelve kilometers south of Jericho. Only from 1949 on were systematic excavations undertaken—from 1951 to 1956, at the hands of Roland de Vaux—in the region of the same hill ruins, where a small settlement appeared. Today fragments of some 800 manuscripts are known, from eleven caves. The adventurous history of the manuscript finds, and the order(s) in which the manuscripts originally appeared, leaves a great deal of room for speculation, since the texts had not been excavated in a controlled way, nor did their purchase follow the routes of established antique shops. When the most important manuscripts were published in the years 1950–1955, they attracted great attention amidst a larger public, as well.

Importance and Interpretation of the Finds; the Manuscripts

2. a) Up to one-third of the texts discovered contain biblical material, representing all of the biblical books except the Book of Esther. Apocryphal material, as well, otherwise transmitted mostly in a framework of the canon of the Eastern Churches, in their respective languages, is attested in Qumran, such as the Aramaic original of the Ethiopian Book of Enoch, and Hebrew fragments of the Book of Jubilees, the latter known before only in Ethiopian translation. Three of the songs preserved in the Syrian Church as Psalms 151-155 can be traced back to Qumran as well. Texts that, as testimonials of ancient Judaism, call into question the characterization, up until now, of the time as one of a spiritual and organizational 'low' in Judaism, are certainly among the most interesting for the history of thought. Thus, the scriptural commentaries that have been preserved (Targum and Midrash) testify to a form of commentary clearly departing, at an early point in time, from the form later known as 'Pharisaic.' Mystical texts have been preserved as well, often reckoned by scholars as akin to a Hekhalot mysticism otherwise known only since the early Middle Ages. Often in the foreground, for the ordering of the whole complex of Qumran, stand texts that were concerned with community organization, such as the community directive, or "Rule of the Community." But other textual genres, as well, are attested: hymns and blessings, horoscopes, oracles, magical documents, from fragments difficult to order to writing exercises.

Khirbet Qumran: An Installation of Essenes?

b) What is sensational in these finds is not limited to the biblical texts, to be sure. Writings were found besides that point to Jewish religious groups only marginally known, until then, from the presentation of Flavius Josephus. The place and character of the finds suggested seeking their origin in Khirbet Qumran, and an identification of the inhabitants of this location as 'Essenes' (probably related to Heb. Hasidim, the 'pious'), known from the presentation of Flavius Josephus. (Josephus identifies the Essenes as one of the four most important 'parties' of Palestinian Judaism around the middle of the first century CE, along with the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Zealots.) This conclusion was drawn, indeed, immediately after the appearance, in the 1950s, of the best-preserved scrolls. It has recently been more and more called into question, however, since the further publication of smaller fragments (see Maier's German translation), which brought to light an astonishing number of texts of the greatest variety. Are we dealing simply with a "collective concept for the most varied 'pious' reform movements in Judaism" (Klaus Berger)? Are the scrolls even from the library of the Jerusalem Temple? Research has not yet succeeded in establishing a compelling tie between the textual finds on the one hand and Khirbet Qumran, and/or the Essenes on the other, but the 'Essenic option' is still held up by most scholars today, arguing that Qumran represents an important sub-group of the larger Essenic movement. Others put stronger emphasis on the priestly background of the community, regarding the main settlement as a foundation of a group of priests (and their followers) who had turned away from the main Jerusalem temple cult.

The settlement at Khirbet Qumran existed between the second century BCE and its destruction by the Romans in 68 CE. According to the prevailing view, it was inhabited by a religious community, and included, in addition to commercial zones, spaces devoted to the common religious life and the study of the writings in question. Here a scriptorium, and a library with reading rooms, as well as the great hall of the collections, must be mentioned.

Older research has reconstituted the strictly regulated life of a Jewish community. Full membership was gained only after at least a three-year probation, which featured both a constant study of the Holy Scripture and a moral lifestyle. A piety based on the 'Torah'—understood as true and constantly revealed teaching—stood in the foreground of the community endeavor; the Qumran community saw itelf as the only legitimate representative of the People of Israel, and practiced a community of goods. Features of community life included baptismal baths, prayer services, and ritual meals. The notion of the end of the world and a last judgment, as well as the expectation of the coming of a messianic figure, were elements of the Palestinian Judaism of this time that were salient with the Essenes (→ Apocalypse). The burial installations authorize the conclusion that the Qumran community believed in a resurrection of the dead.

Qumran and Christianity

c) The great public interest accompanying the first decade after the revelations of the new finds, at the beginning of the 1950s, was also associated with the question of the extent to which the finds relativize the historical distinctiveness of the person of → Jesus. It is true that parallels are to be found with elements like Christian baptism, the → Lord's Supper, and the Messianic expectation. Still, attempts to establish direct personal links between the Qumran community and the primitive Christian community rest on very questionable premises (such as the assumption that the biblical Damascus, far from being the Syrian city of today, was Qumran). After the public debate around Qumran had quieted down, a bestseller, The Dead Sea Scrolls Deception, by Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh, appeared on the market in 1991. The book contains three theses that cannot stand up to scholarly examination, but that were the foundation for the title's enormous financial success. It was maintained that only twenty-five percent of the textual material had so far been published, that this delay was owing to Vatican machinations, and that the explosive potential of the Qumran texts, allegedly uncovered by the authors, was owing to their revelation that, in consort with Jewish groups, the primitive Christian community had risen up against the power of the Roman occupation. Jesus himself, the book maintained, had been a bellicose rebel, and not the redemptive figure, averse from the world and apolitical, presented in the New Testament. (The Jesus thesis was further enlarged upon by R. Eisenman and M. Wise, in their The Dead Sea Scrolls Uncovered [1992].) For an audience unfamiliar with the problems of a philological examination of the Hebrew and Aramaic papyrus texts, the authors' reconstructions, and the conclusions that they drew from these, seemed altogether plausible. Attempts at a historical reconstruction of religious figures such as that of Jesus of Nazareth, however, their integration into the contemporary world of their times, and their historical associations, have been part of the daily labors of church historians, theologians, and scholars of religion since the nineteenth century. In the public mind, these figures readily awaken the impression that we are faced with a scandal that goes to the roots of theological doctrines, and that their identity, qualities, actions, and historical associations can therefore be sensationistically exaggerated.[1] Still, a consequence of the controversy concerning this literary success was that there promptly appeared a complete and authorized publication of the original texts, as well as Spanish, English, and German translations of all texts and fragments that had so far been translatable.

Qumran as Projection and Symbol

3. The extent to which the traditional picture of the Essene community in Qumran, with its writings, can be maintained, cannot at present be decided, especially in view of the fact that scholarship has not succeeded in unambiguously ordering and interpreting the burial finds. Not only in sensationalistic journalism, apparently, but also in serious research, Qumran is an easy target for projections and wishful fantasies. All have found there what they wished to: the Dominicans a monastery (Roland de Vaux), an American a military fort (N. Golb), the German investigator a publishing house (H. Stegemann), the Jew a study center of the Sadducees (L. H. Schiffmann).[2]

For the State of Israel, the Qumran texts have a high symbolic meaning. They are the most ancient comprehensive material manifestation of biblical texts—as it were, excavated foundations of Judaism's 'portable homeland' (H. Heine). Their discovery occurred in close temporal proximity to the founding of the State of Israel. The "Shrine of the Book," constructed in the years 1961–64, is attached to the Museum of Israel, and stands amidst the cultural and political center of Israel, near the Knesset, Hebrew University, and other important official buildings. It is one of the landmarks of → Jerusalem, and stands as a symbol of Israel's religious and cultural tradition. The architecture of the construction, two-thirds of which lies underground, is in the shape of a scroll, and features a white cupola on black basalt walls—making the edifice a monument of the national and humanistic claim of the State of Israel.

1. Another example of this is the enormous influence of "Jesus and the Essenes" on → New Age myth-making; see Hammer, Olav/Snoek, Jan A. M., "Essenes, Esoteric Legends about," in: Hanegraaff, Wouter J. et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, Leiden 2005, 340-343.
2. Hagenow, Gabriele, "Khirbet Qumran oder die höhere Kunst archäologischer Interpretation," in: Jahrbuch des deutschen evangelischen Instituts für Altertumswissenschaft des Heiligen Landes 6 (1998), 92-108.

Literature

Sources: Various (eds.), Discoveries in the Judaean Desert, Oxford, 1955–2002 (39 vols. to date); Tov, Emauel/Pfann, S. J., The Dead Sea Scrolls on Microfiche: A Comprehensive Facsimile Edition of the Texts from the Judaean Desert, Leiden [2]1995; Maier, Johann, Die Qumran-Essener. Die Texte vom Toten Meer, 3 vols., Stuttgart 1995/1996 (German trans.); García Martínez, F., The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated: The Qumran Texts in English, Leiden [2]1996; Vermes, G., The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English, London 1997; Lim, T., in consultation with P. Alexander, The Dead Sea Scrolls: Electronic Reference Library, Oxford/Leiden 1997; Abegg, M. G., Jr. et al., The Dead Sea Scrolls Bible, San Francisco 1999 (the biblical scrolls); Tov, E. (ed.), prepared by the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies, The Dead Sea Scrolls Database (Non-Biblical Texts), Leiden 1999 (The Dead Sea Scrolls Electronic Reference Library 2).

Secondary Literature: Berger, Klaus, The Truth under Lock and Key? Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, Louisville 1995; Collins, John, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature, New York 1995; Collins, John/Kugler, Robert (eds.), Religion in the Dead Sea Scrolls, Grand Rapids 2000; Fitzmeyer, J. A., The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins, Grand Rapids 2000; Golb, Norman, Who Wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls? The Search for the Secret of Qumran, New York 1995; Harrington, D., Wisdom Texts from Qumran, London 1996; Schiffman, Lawrence H., Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls, Philadelphia/Jerusalem 1994; Schiffman, Lawrence H./VanderKam, James C. (eds.), Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, 2 vols., New York/Oxford 2000 (standard reference work); Stegemann, Hartmut, The Library of Qum-ran: On the Essenes, Qumran, John the Baptist, and Jesus, Grand Rapids/Leiden 1998; VanderKam, James/Flint, Peter, The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls: Their Significance for Understanding the Bible, Judaism, Jesus, and Christianity, San Francisco 2002 (perhaps the best introduction available).

→ Christianity, Jesus, Judaism, Palestine/Israel

Heidrun Eichner

Qur'an

General

1. The Qur'an (in Ar., al-Qur'ān) is the sacred book of Islam. For Muslim believers, it is the word of the one God, Allah, revealed to the Prophet → Muhammad, 'in clear Arabic,' by the Archangel Gabriel. Its content may therefore not be touched. But through the centuries, it has been subject to various interpretations, just as it is today.

Its 114 'suras' ('chapters'), comprising from 3 to 286 or 287 'verses' (in Ar., āyāt, 'signs') are ordered in roughly decreasing length. The verses, as well, are of varying length. There are still two different verse-numberings today. Muslims designated the suras not by number, but by their names (e.g., "The Star," "The Table"). The latter come mostly from the verbal content of the suras. They are key words for the dominant verbal memorization and recitation, and for auditory memory, but only seldom say anything about the content, and do not belong to the recitation itself. The language of the Qur'an takes its orientation in the 'rhymed prose' of the ancient Arabic soothsayers, and in the early suras is characterized by passionate rhythm, and a vocabulary of high emotion. It is regarded as inimitable—the miracle confirming Muhammad's prophetical mission, and, for this reason, originally, untranslatable. Thus, the expansion of Islam brought the spread of Arabic into all conquered regions, from Spain to the valley of the Indus, and also amongst the Christians and the Jews. Even after the renascence of the languages of Islam's convert peoples, Arabic remained the language of worship and the source of numerous loan-words from the region of worship and culture, as of most of the personal names. Although not very compatible phonetically, Arabic script was retained as cultural confession for languages such as Persian, Kurdish, Pashto, and (until Ataturk's reform of its script in 1926), Turkish.

History of the Qur'an

2. A scientifically undisputed history of the Qur'an remains to be written. According to Muslim tradition, it received its first written form from oral, and fragmentary written, testimonials—consisting in stones, bones, and palm leaves—under the regime of the third Caliph, 'Uṯmān (644–656). It is the first written work of Arabic literature. The oldest Qur'anic manuscripts (in the Arabian consonantal script), from the eighth century, are only partly vocalized (i.e., fixed in their pronunciation and, thus, meaning), and testify to different recitations (and therewith different textual interpretations). Oral recitation was always the precondition for written fixation. A fixed vocalization followed only in the tenth century.

The 'revelations' that Muhammad set forth orally, over the course of some twenty years, first in his Meccan, then from 622 his Medinan, environment,

A small Qur'anic school in the city of Bahla, in Oman. Until the nineteenth century, Qur'anic schools were Muslim children's only official opportunity for an education. With few temporary exceptions (Iran, India), they were open only to boys, who could enter them as early as the age of four. The most important material, throughout Islam, was the Qur'an, in the Arabic language (thus, also in areas whose language was other than Arabic), which, usually read aloud, was learned by heart, beginning with the Fātiḥa (opening sura), then the short are of a communicative nature. Many suras imply that Muhammad had visions from God; in many Meccan suras God summons him to 'Speak!' In others, God is spoken of as 'my,' or 'our,' Lord. The Meccans, opponents as well as followers, are directly addressed. Later the Medinan community often is the addressee. The speakers are God, Gabriel, or 'the Spirit' (rūḥ), as messengers of God, as well as Muhammad himself. The earliest suras demand belief in the one God Allah, warn the wealthy Meccan merchants of God's punishment, appeal to their social responsibility, and promise Paradise to believing men and women who fulfill their religious duties.

A few short, Meccan suras are identical in content. The later, longer to long, suras consist of parts with different content and structures, whose temporal origin is unclear. Nevertheless, a development is perceptible in the Qur'anic thought construct. On occasion, early 'verses' were 'abrogated' by later ones, although usually left in the Qur'an. The 'Satanic verses,' in suras 53:19-21, became the best known, at all events in the Western world in recent times, through the homonymous fantastical-ironic novel by Indo-Muslim Salman Rushdie (1988). They name the three Arabian goddesses al-Lāt, al-'Uzza, and al-Manāt as really existing, while the following verses 22-27 mention them as having become obsolete. Verse 52 of sura 22 is supposed to have been revealed, for Muhammad's comfort, concerning this 'intervention of Satan.'

Content, Genres, Function

3. The "Sura of Opening" (al-fātiḥa), is a prayer of fundamental relevance for Muslim believers; they use it ritually in a way comparable to the Christian use of the Lord's Prayer. The two, very short, last suras, "The Day Break" and "Mankind," are often applied in daily life as prayers for protection, like the Basmala (a formula presumably attached only later to most of the suras, "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate").

The Qur'an contains various literary genres, from formulae of swearing (81:15-20) and conjuration in the early suras, to other, formally summoning wording (82:1-5; 81:1-14), to rhetorical questions (104:5; 107:1; 83:4ff.), to maxims (10:35; 2:142), to narrative. These last are based on Near Eastern motifs or myths, and, usually in varying form, are also contained in the Hebrew Bible, such as variants of the temptation of the first human couple by the Devil in the form of a serpent in Paradise (not, therefore, Adam's temptation by Eve), and Noah (Nūḥ) and the Deluge. The creation story is not shaped as a seven-day sequence. The largest part of the Qur'an is formed by the tales of the Prophets, identified with several of the patriarchs of the Hebrew Bible: Adam, Abraham, Ismael, Moses, David, Job, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, and Solomon. These tales vary in detail from those of the Hebrew Bible. Jesus (Isa) is likewise a Prophet in the Qur'an, but not the Son of God. The lengthiest tale of the Prophets is that of Joseph (Yūsuf), in sura 12. Its second part, on the whole, is more favorable to woman than it is in the Hebrew Bible. Figures of non-biblical origin are, for example, the Prophet Sāliḥ, the ancient Arabic hero and sage Luqmān, and the 'Double Horned,' presumably Alexander the Great. Parabolic material, such as that of the pillar city of Iram (89:6), was further shaped in the literature. Iram became the parable of earthly impermanence. References to the Last Judgment also appear in the Qur'an. In the popular genre "Tales of the Prophets," Qur'anic stories of the Prophets, in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, took on characteristics of → fairytale or legend.

The Medinan suras contain cultic and social precepts, including particularly family law. These became the most important foundations of Islamic family law; they represent no complete legal corpus, however, as Muhammad unexpectedly died in 632. Some suras (e.g., 33:24), give glimpses of Muhammad's personal life conditions, such as his relationship with his wives, as well as his position in the community, and this became the cause of obligatory social directives or norms, such as, for example, the commandment of covering the hair and the bosom (→ Veil), gender separation, or punishment for calumny. The situations merely referred to in the Qur'an are more extensively portrayed in the Arabic, historical, and biographical literature, beginning in the eighth century. Works on the 'causes of the revelations' in Muhammad's life appeared from the tenth century onward. Commentaries on the Qur'an, beginning in the ninth century, reveal later religious and social developments and value judgments, for instance in the growing social deterioration of woman in the commentaries on sura 4:34.

On liturgical grounds, the text of the Qur'an was later divided into 7 manāzil (Ar., 'steps,' 'stations'), 30 ajzā' ('parts'), and 60 aḥzāb ('portions'). During the month of fasting, Ramadan, one thirtieth is to be recited daily. The seven manāzil are meant as texts for recitation for the seven days of the week. The sixtieths, a relatively late 'portioning,' are meant to serve individual or collective recitation after ritual prayer. They are brought into association with the brotherhoods, but are accounted by many as bid'a, (illicit) 'innovation.' The melodic recitation of the Qur'an in the fashion of psalms by voice-trained 'reciters' is generally of great importance for Muslims' emotional life, since, from early times, orthodox Islam has rejected religious music (like figurative religious art).

suras at the end, back to the longest sura, the second. The children's parents often materially compensated teachers. Ever since the gradual introduction of a secular educational system in colonial times, and later with the introduction of universal obligatory education, governments, especially in larger places, influenced the expansion of the material to be learned, introduced examinations, and managed the linguistic and content integration of Islamic teaching, which continues to be regarded as the core of all education. Under Ataturk, Turkey closed the Qur'anic schools in 1926, but today recognizes the (voluntary) Imam Hatib religious schools for boys and girls.

4. The Qur'an impresses the art and literature of the Islamic Near East to the present, especially that of the Arabic countries. As for the prohibition of images (not yet formulated in the Qur'an), it is not only sacred edifices that are decorated by citations from the Qur'an, and this in manifold calligraphic form: in literature, Qur'anic citations or allusions are often employed as metaphors, even, in the classic court poetry, in lighthearted, satirical, or erotic and sexual, even frivolous, fashion. Modern Arabic literature applies words from the Qur'an allegorically, in contexts ranging from social criticism to mysticism. Thus, they form a variety of codes, culturally specific, which stamp the community.

Qur'anic Schools

For hundreds of years, Qur'anic schools (kuttāb), in which the Qur'an was learned by rote, were the only educational opportunity for the lower social strata, for boys far more than for girls, who were married very early. Already in the classical Arabic literature, and still more in the modern, this school system led to the degrading of the image of the teacher, since it mostly educated neither in reading and writing, nor in thinking, but, with authoritarian methods and violence (flogging and caning), to unconditional subordination, and to the empty parroting of content that had not been understood. The teacher became the prototype of the dolt in older Arab literature, and the tyrant in modern.

The fact that every believing Muslim has learned the Qur'an by rote, leads to the words of the Qur'an being used as prayers, warnings, maxims, material for consolation, oaths, and instructions, as the basis for meditations and allusions in Muslims' everyday life, and thereby playing a great role, especially in Arabic countries. This renders them available for demagogic purposes, as well, in speeches by politicians, or, for example, during the First Gulf War, in the Friday preaching of Iranian mullahs supporting official governmental policy in Iran, and at the same time, in poetic encomia, in the style of the old Arabic poetry, of Saddam Hussein, which, propagated through the media, were to spur the Iraqi population on to heroism, and to instill in them the spirit of endurance.

Qur'anic Scholarship in Islam

5. In earlier centuries, the Qur'an had become the point of departure, in numerous works, for theological and philological discussion, historical biography, and (for instance, through the language of image) literary creation. Now, since the turn of the twentieth century, approaches to an Islamic Qur'anic scholarship have developed in the genre of historical criticism. However, it is narrowly bounded by doctrines of oral inspiration, inimitability, and miraculous character.

Especially with regard to the situation of woman, verses from the Qur'an have always been interpreted anew—for example in the Qur'anic commentary of Great Mufti Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905), in The New Woman, of Tunisian aṭ-Ṭāhir al-Ḥadḍād, or, since around 1985, by the Muslim feminists in the United States—such as Rif'at Ḥadḍād, Amina Waddud, and others—whose (re-) interpretation in the sense of a Qur'anic social parity and equality of woman and man (with observation of the biological differences) is impressive but not always defensible philologically.

Translation into Languages of Islamic Lands

6. a) Inasmuch as, for hundreds of years, the Qur'an was, and often still is, regarded by Muslim orthodoxy as untranslatable, commentaries on the Qur'an were translated before the Qur'an itself was. They were translated in other Near Eastern languages, since the tenth century into Persian. In the twelfth century, the entire Qur'an was first translated into Persian. Eastern translations of the Qur'an have been interlinear until the twentieth century. That is, the Arabic text always runs along with the foreign language. The 1928 founding of the Turkish Republic, and constitutional laicization of the country, paved the way for the printing of Turkish Qur'ans without the Arabic original. The 'Turkization' of the prayer ritual, however, met with the robust opposition of religious authorities, and has been officially allowed only since the 1930s.

Translations into European Languages

b) The first translation of the Qur'an into Latin, done in 1142–1143, was the fruit of missionary intentions, and was made by Robert of Ketton, at the behest of the Abbot of Cluny, Petrus Venerabilis. The first translation into a living European language, Italian, was published in 1547 by Protestant-oriented printer and book merchant Andrea Arrivabene, of Venice, and rests on Ketton's translation. The latter was also the basis for the first German translation, that of Salomon Schweigger, who from 1578–1581 was ambassadorial preacher in Istanbul, and later preacher at the Church of Saint Mary in Nuremberg. In the wake of the Enlightenment, new translations, no longer fraught with hostility toward Islam, from Arabic into several European languages finally appeared in the eighteenth century.

Literature

Abu-Hamdiyyah, Muhammad, The Qur'an: An Introduction, London 2000; Baljon, J. M. S., Modern Muslim Koran Interpretation (1880–1960), Leiden 1961; Bell, Richard, Introductin to the Qur'ān, Edinburgh 1953; Cragg, Kenneth, The Pen and the Faith: Eight Modern Muslim Writers and the Qur'ān, London 1985; Idem, The Event of the Qur'ān: Islam in Its Scripture, Oxford 1994; Gaetje, Helmut, The Qur'ān and Its Exegesis: Selected Texts with Classical and Modern Interpretation, Oxford 1996; Hussein, Iqbal S., The Qur'ān and Modernism: Beyond Science and Philosophy, Lahore 2000; Jansen, J. J. G., The Interpretation of the Koran in Modern Egypt, Leiden 1974; Kassis, Hanna E., A Concordance of the Qur'ān, Berkeley 1983; Madigan, Daniel A., The Qur'ān's Self-Image: Writing and Authority in Islam's Scripture, Princeton 2001; Rippin, Andrew, The Qur'ān and Its Interpretative Tradition, Aldershot 2001; Robinson, Neal, Discovering the Qur'ān: A Contemporary Approach to a Veiled Text, London 1996; Sherif, Faruq, A Guide to the Contents of the Qur'ān, Reading [2]1995; Watt, William Montgomery, Companion to the Qur'ān, Oxford 1994; Welch, A. T. et al., "al-Kur'an," in Encyclopedia of Islam[2] 5 (1986), 400-432; Wheeler, Brannon M., Prophets in the Quran: An Introduction to the Quran and Muslim Exegesis, London 2002; Zakaria, Rafiq, Muhammad and the Qur'ān, London 1991.

→ Bible, Book, Canon, Islam, Muhammad, Revelation

Wiebke Walther

Race / Racism

Race and Racism

1. Franco-Algerian sociologist Albert Memmi defines racism as the "generalized and absolutized evaluation of actual or fictitious differences, to the advantage of the complainant and the disadvantage of his or her victim, with the intent of justifying the privilege or aggression of the former."[1] This

An example of racist propaganda from the World Wide Web is the "White Aryan Resistance Hate Page" in the United States. Caricatures are labeled racistically, according to outer, phenotypical traits. There are the hook nose, the thick lips, the black hair, the beard, by means of which the disfigurations are identified as Arabs, Jews, Blacks, and Latinos. They are presented, in extreme hatefulness, as monsters, parasites, and therefore as a menace.

in an oft-cited definition, that describes today's widened concept of racism, how it is formulated by intellectuals from the once colonial lands, and how it has been introduced into the debate over (post-) → colonialism.

According to Memmi, not only certain biological traits but also cultural differences are invoked, to which to fasten negative evaluations of the foreign group, and positive evaluations of one's own group. Racial conceptions in the narrow sense are grounded, for one, on visible, 'phenotypic' bodily characteristics such as skin or eye color, head size, form of face or nose—and for another, on the concept of 'correct' descendancy that characterized the 'genealogical thinking' of the nobility ('blue blood'). In the modern age, this conceptualization has been linked to biological theories of reproduction. Today, instead, greater importance is attributed to cultural features, such as clothing (e.g., the head scarf), religion, or religious practices, with which are bonded, as a rule, negative, or, more rarely, positive evaluations. But differences are always made out, and distinctions produced, that can lead to the differentiation or exclusion of those so characterized.

The Concept, 'Race': Racial Theories and Racial Myths

2. The attempt to support the conception that human beings can be systematized in races invokes altogether distinct 'racial' theories and 'racial' myths. A fundamental presupposition for thinking in 'racial' categories, and ultimately for racism itself, is framed in terms of cultural anthropology: namely, 'ethnocentrism.' Ethnocentrism can be characterized by the attitude that one's own people, nation, or ethnic group, respectively, is inherently superior to others. It represents a special form of nationalism. French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss[2] has shown that the concept of superiority is a phenomenon extending throughout all societies.

In older theories of 'race,' linguistic science and anthropology found themselves charged with the task of dividing human beings into 'racial' types. First, theories of 'race' gained increasing importance in the late eighteenth century, in the developing science of linguistics. Next, in the second half of the nineteenth century, these theories were attached to those of (social) Darwinism and evolutionism.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, in the quest for the origins of humanity, an association was seen with the origin of speech. Linguistics replaced the theory that Hebrew was the original language of the human race, with the idea of a more ancient Indo-European tongue. In addition, the theory of linguistic kinship was developed as that of 'racial' kinship. A common linguistic foundation for Latin, Greek, and Indian Sanskrit was then assumed. This theorizing linked that foundation with a presumed common 'race.' And this prehistorical hypostasis was only a step away from the 'Aryan myth'—the idea that the Aryans possessed a superior, noble culture. The concept of 'Aryan' served the view that Indo-Europeans were a 'racial unit,' and were to be distinguished from the less highly rated Semites, whose Eastern Arabian languages were used by the peoples between Anatolia, Persia, Armenia, and the Red Sea. It was a myth of the superiority of the Aryan 'race' and the inferiority of the Semite 'race.'

In parallel, in ethnology, anthropology, and → eugenics, human beings were more and more typified in terms of biological 'race.' Among the criteria according to which persons could be thus classified were body size, skin color, eye or hair color, shape of the nose, lips, or head. In function of these traits, more than forty 'human races' were sketched out, among them the Northwestern European, the Northeastern European, the Alpines, the Mediterraneans, the Southeast Asians, the South American Indians, the Ethiopians, and a 'Murrayan race,' named for the Australian river along which these aborigines lived. Actual sub-disciplines developed, such as 'human being measurement' (anthropometrics), and 'skull science.'

At the close of the nineteenth century, racial ideology found its way into colonial policy, and sharpened the belittlement of the colonized on an allegedly scientific basis. Anthropological investigations, now with the wings of the new Darwinism, relegated to an earlier phase of humanity, if not indeed to the animal kingdom, the members of peoples who were not 'white,' 'Caucasian,' or 'Aryan.' The individual races were ascribed character traits by which they were also assigned a 'worth,' in terms of which they found their place on a scale of values—in the case of the European colonizers, a Eurocentric one. Inasmuch as Africans, for example, were not Christian, they were disqualified as pagans or → heathen, and subjected to a missionizing that was cultural as well as religious (→ Mission). Socially, to boot, Africans were regarded in the nineteenth century as slothful, savage, and cowardly. In the eighteenth century, Oceanians ranked at first as the 'noble savages.' In the nineteenth century, this myth was supplanted by the image of cruel, barbarian → cannibalism, and headhunting natives. When all was said and done, Africans and Oceanians alike, in terms of these evaluations, stood far beneath Europeans, in a hierarchy that was political as well as religious (→ Evolutionism).

This division, in terms of a racial ideology, into subhuman and superhuman, was thus 'scientifically' warranted, and it legitimized the extermination

"Be a Help! God reward you!"—Until recently, Christian children in Europe could have fun with a special 'piggy bank' that frequently decorated the Christmas crib: a Black African boy, a 'Negro' sat there, his teeth bared friendlily, on a base. If you put a coin in the slot at his feet (or in a box on his knees), a simple mechanism was set in motion, and, to the delight of the little contributor, the 'Negro' (from Lat., niger, 'black') nodded a "Thank you." The contents of the box, one was told, flowed to brave missionaries in their battle with heathenism and cannibalism. Of course, these 'nodding Negros' are only playful testimonials to the racism that has prevailed in the Western societies of the modern age. The Christian mission thereby fit into the larger association of missionary ideologies, and sought to justify the colonialist or imperialist take-over of land and religion through a 'cultural task,' a mission civilisatrice (Fr., 'civilizing mission'). Their approach differed from that of the campaigns undertaken by European 'defense forces' in the colonies and Europeanized regions. For example, Eduardo Galeano reports of a Father Gregorio García, that he has attempted to justify the seventeenth-century Spanish Conquista in Latin America on grounds that 'the Indians' were of Jewish origin: after all, like the Jews, they were "slothful, believed not in the miracles of Jesus Christ, and were not grateful to the Spaniards for all of the good offered them."[3] Adolf Bastian (1826–1905), the first professor of ethnology in Germany, in no way regretted the extermination of foreign peoples by German colonial policy, and declared: "The mind-bent of the savage is woefully feeble. Tap him in jest, and he scurries to his hut, so distracted, so confused, and forthwith so unaccountable that, like a wild animal, or the denizen of a madhouse, he must be fettered and bound."[4] In a report on his first journey to Congo, Leo Frobenius (1873–1938), the most distinguished Africanist in German ethnology, further developed that conceptualization: "The free Negro laborer here will work only when he feels like it. [. . .] Peevishly, and for entertainment, as he begins, and peevishly as he ends: the black child grows weary."[5]

This colonial racial ideology found its continuation—and intensification—in the policy and ideology of German National Socialism, with its mass murders of Jews, Sinti and Roma, homosexuals, and the handicapped. The National Socialists were able to appeal to the Aryan myth. But they narrowed the concept of the superior Aryan 'race' and culture from that of the Indo-Europeans to that of the Teutons, Celts, and Slavs, and later to the Teutons and their descendants, the Germans. On the other side, National Socialist racism concentrated its assaults on the Semite 'race,' and its belief in an inferior 'race' on the Jews. However, the National Socialist racial propagandists also returned to the concepts of natal origin and breeding: the tie of 'blood and soil' was to generate 'pure-race' farmers and soldiers, while racially 'second-rate material for persons' would be eliminated (→ Eugenics; Euthanasia).

3. In science, the notion that there are human biological races was given up in the 1950s. Progress in genetic research has led to a recognition that genetic differences and peculiarities are manifold, and cut across all nationalities and ethnic groups, so that a 'racial' theory based simply on phenotypic characteristics was recognized as false. But, although the racial ideology is no longer represented in science, the concept of 'race' still exists, in everyday speech and conduct, as well as among political groups of the extreme right. Unlike historical racism, negative evaluations are based on corporeal differences, and, for example, on IQ tests ("Negroes are dumb"). Concentration today is grounded far more culturally—on 'insuperable differences' among personal groups ('culturalistic racism'). In a very widespread case of racism in Western countries, the opinion prevails that Muslim women with veils or head scarves are oppressed, and that they are indulgent and passive, and have no right to contribute to a discussion of important family circumstances in their milieus (→ Veil). In modern research into racism, this basic pattern that comes to light is called a 'meaning construction,' as labeled by British racism scholar Robert Miles. Here, a negative meaning is attached to a cultural trait—in our example, the wearing of a veil—and this concept occasions the construction of a foreign, even hostile, image. No importance is assigned to whether or not a specific case of discrimination against women can be observed in Muslim society.

In sum, the function of racism is to make individual persons and groups unequal, and to 'hierarchize' them. At first, persons are theoretically presented as equal social partners. Then, through the appendage of an evaluation, they are assigned a negative label, on a ladder, and made unequal. In class societies—one type of class society is capitalism—a 'hierarchization' of persons is regarded as the key opportunity for the solution of conflicts. For example, it might be assumed that the problem of scarce resources like work, qualification, domicile, and economic well-being, could be 'solved' through the creation of a hierarchy. Like many → prejudices, an elementary 'hierarchization' vis-à-vis ideological racism is based on a 'we/they' stereotyping: one's 'own,' which is good, is set up against the 'other'—here, the second-rate foreigners. On grounds of their 'looks,' or their cultural usages, they become negatively evaluated groups of persons. The guilt for problems can be ascribed to them. Once, the 'money-mad' or 'usurious' Jews were pronounced guilty for their own economic plunge. Just so, today the 'foreigners' are attributed guilt for unemployment. Although today a scientific foundation of racial thought is discredited and ignored in scholarship, an 'everyday racism,' as a special form of hatred of foreigners, continues its accusations, for instance, against Vietnamese ('slit-eyes') and Africans ('niggers').

racism of extermination, which dismissed the 'natives' out of hand as subhuman or non-human, as they were weaker in technology (usually meaning weaponry). Missionaries, meanwhile, according to the model of the patriarchal family, sought to rear them, as a father his children, to care for them, to support and encourage them, and to 'elevate' them to the level of European civilization. Such 'developmental assistance,' of course, exacted its expressed or tacit price. It was attached to the seemingly obvious requirement that the recipient be grateful, and assimilate the character and religion of the foreign 'benefactors.' Thus, even the figure here represented wears clothing of a European style. Only at the end of the twentieth century did doubts spread, and find a voice, regarding the good of this paternal, well-meaning mentality of superiority. And in many churches, a nodding little angel quietly replaced the 'nodding Negro.' (Hubert Mohr)

1. Memmi, Albert, Rassismus, Frankfurt/M. 1987, 103 (see Memmi 1982).
2. Lévi-Strauss, Claude, Rasse und Geschichte, Frankfurt/M. 1972 (see Lévi-Strauss 1952).
3. Galeano, E., Die offenen Adern Lateinamerikas, Wuppertal 1981, 53.
4. Bastian, Adolf, Zur heutigen Sachlage der Ethnologie in nationaler und sozialer Bedeutung, Berlin 1899, 13.
5. Frobenius, cited in Theye, Th. (ed.), Wir und die Wilden, Hamburg 1985, 119.
6. Cavalli-Sforza/Cavalli-Sforza 1995.

Literature

Cavalli-Sforza, Luigi Luca/Cavalli-Sforza, Francesco, The Great Human Diasporas: The History of Diversity and Evolution, Reading 1995; Lévi-Strauss, Claude, Race and History, Paris 1952; Memmi, Albert, Le Racisme, Paris 1982; Miles, Robert, Racism, London 1989; Olender, Maurice, The Languages of Paradise: Race, Religion, and Philology in the Nineteenth Century, Cambridge 1992; Poliakov, Léon, The Aryan Myth: A History of Racist and Nationalist Ideas in Europe, London 1974; ter Wal, Jessika/Verkuyten, Maykel (eds.), Comparative Perspectives on Racism, Aldershot 2000.

→ Anti-Semitism, Colonialism, Eugenics, Evolutionism, Gender Stereotypes, Hierarchy, National Socialism, Orientalism/Exotism, Prejudices/Stereotypes

Burkhard Hergesell

Ramadan

Concept

1. The Arabic word Ramaḍān designates the ninth of the twelve months of the Islamic lunar year, to which a special holiness is ascribed in the Qur'an itself (sura 2:185, Paret ed.), where it is the only month to be mentioned. Ramadan has twenty-nine or thirty days (depending on the moment of the new moon), and annually shifts some eleven days vis-à-vis the solar year, so that it travels through the seasons. The Arabic root rmḍ refers to summer heat, so that it can be assumed that, in the pre-Islamic solar year, it fell in the hot season. In the Islamic calendar, as in the Jewish, the day begins at sunset. So also begins the ʿĪd al-Fiṭr (Ar., "Feast of the Breaking of the Fast"), that marks the merry close of the Ramadan fast, and is one of the two great feasts of Islam, in the evening of the first of Šawwāl, the following month. Prayers and other meritorious acts that are performed then possess a special importance. For one thing, the revelation of the Qur'an was made in Ramadan, according to sura 97 in the Laylat al-Qadr (Ar., "Night of the Divine Decree," or "Night of Power"), ordinarily celebrated by the Sunnis on the night before Ramadan. This night, or the last twelve days of the month together, count as especially sacred. For another thing, Ramadan has a prominent meaning in Muslim ritual as the only obligatory time of fasting in the calendar. Fasting for Ramadan represents the fourth of the five pillars of Islam, and has been practiced since the second year of the Hijrah (624 CE). There has been a great deal of speculation on its meaning as a sacred month in pre-Islamic times—for instance, whether the Laylat al-Qadr was the ancient Arabic New Year. Attempts have also been made to derive the Ramadan fast from the Christian fast time, or from the Jewish fast days before the Day of Atonement. Muhammad became acquainted with the latter in the Jewish milieu in Medina, and in Islam's infancy, Ashura Day, which corresponds to the Jewish Day of Atonement on the tenth of Tishri, was still a day of fast. Even after early Islam's departure from the Jewish ritual, fasting on Ashura was still regarded as meritorious.

A Day in Ramadan

2. Fasting (in Ar., ṣawm, literally, 'to be at rest') in Islam means total abstinence from all substances that would break the fast, and from activities (in Ar., mufṭirāt) explicitly proscribed in this context. The fast lasts from dawn to sunset.

Breach of the fast (in Šafiʿitic law) consists in the ingestion of any material substance. Thus, it includes eating, drinking, and smoking. Likewise proscribed is sexual activity. Generally added, as well, are acts regarded as sinful (such as breach of oath, or murder), and immoral speech, and/or the like. Instead, it is recommended that the Qur'an be read or recited daily, with other meritorious activities (almsgiving, prayer), or penance for any sins. In many Islamic countries, shops and offices have restricted hours. Especially the afternoons are used as times of rest. In various lands of the Near East, cessation of the fast is signaled by the discharge of a cannon. Then there is eating (ifṭār)—in many places, on the streets, with festive illumination and décor. This commensality—like the preceding fast—fosters a sense of social cohesion, just as do the fast usages of other cultures. The needy are to be supported by the comfortable. Until midnight, then, a festive mood prevails. As late as possible after midnight, a second meal (saḥūr) is taken, and the fast begins anew at dawn ("as soon as a white thread [can be distinguished] from a black one" with the naked eye)—that is, as soon as the morning light becomes visible on the horizon. Since sleep does not break the fast, activity in this month is postponed to the nighttime hours, especially in hot regions, and sleep is taken during the day.

Special Regulations

3. In Ramadan, fasting is 'mandatory' (wājib) for every adult Muslim of good physical and mental health, men and women alike. Inasmuch as the proscription of taking drink especially presents a physical burden during the summer, there are special regulations for the relief of persons performing especially heavy labor, for travelers, for the sick, for women who are menstruating or in childbed or nursing, for older persons, and for all of those for whom the observance of the fast could entail special harm. On the Internet, the "International Society for Ramadan Fasting Research" publishes contributions from Muslim physicians who take a position on, for example, the problem of the effects of fasting on blood fat, blood sugar, and offer recommendations for, for instance, diabetics. Those not impeded by a long-term illness, however, or anything similar, should make up the missing days as soon as possible, preferably on the days recommended for voluntary fasting (see § 4). For instance, persons impeded by metabolic diseases are recommended to compensate for the fasting with almsgiving. Intentionally breaking the fast is understood as sinful.

The Meaning of Fasting in Islam; Optional Fast Days, and Prohibitions

4. Ramadan is the sole mandatory fasting time in Islam. Still, there is an opportunity of practicing fasting on other days of the year, especially on Muḥarram (Ashura), two days before the Festival of Sacrifice (→ Mecca), or on the White Nights (the thirteenth to the fifteenth of every month), as well as Mondays or Thursdays. Fasting is forbidden on feast days such as the Tašrīq days, the Feast of Offering, and the Feast of the Breaking of the Fast; and also on Fridays.

Theology of Fasting

→ Fasting, in Islam, is understood as a meritorious act, a religious duty, and a means of → purification (such as from sin, or from major ritual impurity), but also of attaining self-control and fear of God (suras 2; 183). It is by no means to be a torment. Muslims, then, feel the fasting of Ramadan to be less hard than that of the weeklong abstinence of Christian fasting. The notion of fasting for pure penance, or indeed as penance for universal human sinfulness, is foreign to Islam. Buḫārī's ḥadīṯ Collection, for example,[1] gives a comprehensive view of the Sunnite practice, and of the meaning for Sunnite theology of the month-long fasting. It becomes especially clear that the festival aspect of Ramadan as a month of special grace is repeatedly emphasized. The Prophet is supposed to have been especially generous in Ramadan, and one ḥadīṯ declares that, at Ramadan, the gates of Paradise are opened, and those of hell closed.

Social Function

Fasting together, and subsequently eating together, promotes the social cohesion of the group, as previously noted. As with fasting in other cultures, however (for example, with Christian abstinence from meat on Fridays in parts of Europe), there also exists a group pressure by means of which the observance of the fast is protected. Those not fasting with the others exclude themselves from festival and community. In countries where public eating, drinking, and smoking during Ramadan are forbidden, these are therefore looked on with disapproval. In Saudi Arabia or Iran, there are particular punishments (in Ar., tazīr) for public breach of the fast. Restaurants might therefore be shut during the day, and even non-Muslims must share in Ramadan.

The postulate that good or evil deeds in Ramadan have special weight means that, for example, a deed of violence cancels the merit of the fast. For another thing, it encourages fundamentalist groups to seek to lend special weight to their actions by means of Ramadan. This can be by ostentatious fasting, and words (sermons), but it can also be by (violent) deeds listed theologically as sin.

Ramadan in the Diaspora

5. The precise definition of the fasting time in the diaspora sometimes confronts modern theology with a problem. The task presents itself of adapting the religious tradition of a pre-industrial era to the conditions of work and life in highly industrialized societies, especially when Islam represents a minority, as it does in Western countries. The criteria for the determination of the beginning or end of the month, or of the day, usually cannot be met, since they depend on the visibility of the moon to the naked eye. Therefore various solutions are appealed to.

For example, tables are displayed at the beginning of Ramadan, listing the astronomic sunrise and sunset for each day. Or the orientation taken is to the time in the nearest Muslim country, or at Mecca. These data are especially important where the position of the sun can determine a daily lengthening or shortening of the fast (for instance, in Northern latitudes).

There have been various → fatwas on these and similar matters over the last forty or fifty years—even on whether the fast is broken by watching television (this question was answered in the negative).

1. Al-Buḫārī, Sahih, Nachrichten von der Taten und Aussprüchen des Propheten Muhammad, selected, trans. from the Arabic, and published by Dieter Ferchi, Stuttgart 1991, 230-241 (Ḥadīṯ: transmittal of pronouncements or deeds of Muhammad; → Qur'an).

Literature

Ahmad, A., "Ramadan," in: The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, Oxford 1995; Athar, Shahid/Habib, Moazzam, "Management of Stable Type 2 Diabetes Mellitus (NIDDM) During Islamic Fasting in Ramadan," in: Hamdard Medicus 37 (1994), 94-108; Berg, C. C., "Ṣawm," in: Encyclopedia of Islam[2] 9 (1997), 94f.; Plessner, M., "Ramaḍān," in: EI[2] 8 (1995), 417f.; v. Grunebaum, G., Muhammadan Festivals, repr. London/Ottawa 1976; Wagtendonk, K., Fasting in the Koran, Leiden 1998.

→ Calendar, Eating/Nourishment, Fasting, Illness/Health, Islam, Mecca, Muhammad

Agnes Imhof

Rationalism / Irrationalism

Assertions and Truth

1. The fifteenth-century Renaissance effected a completely new orientation of the sciences. The manner of thinking appeared that was typical of the sixteenth century: rationalism. Here, it was the philosophy of René Descartes (1596–1650) that founded a new form of thought and made it the standard of the sciences. As Descartes demonstrated in his Discours de la Méthode (Fr. "Discussion of Method"; 1637), reason was no longer satisfied that it only maintain assent to received teachings. A doubt abiding in the reason prevents the latter from giving unconditional assent even to received truths, though these be pronounced by the highest authority, the ecclesiastical. Not only truths understood dogmatically, however, are met with this doubt: even sensory perceptions are doubtful, and thus can by no means function as valid testimonials for or proofs of truth. To use a now famous example, in the second of his Meditations (1641) Descartes shows that a piece of wax can be perceived in very different ways, depending on its condition: thus, the consistency and scent of wax completely changes when it is brought into the vicinity of fire: it becomes soft, and ultimately fluid. Despite this changed condition, however, it is still 'cognized' as wax. Normative for this cognition, Descartes holds, are not the sensory data, which constantly alter, but rather the judgment that the mind pronounces in consideration of the sensory data. And this judgment of the mind in this case, "This is wax," is determinative for cognition. The mind performs this judgment in the form of "an insight into itself" (in Lat., inspectio), whose highest end is self-cognition: the cognition found in the judgment, Cogito ergo sum, "I think, therefore I am." Here the mind has grasped itself as a res cogitans, a 'thinking thing (substance).' Abiding and radical doubt is the sole path to this insight. Inasmuch as the mind doubts everything, even itself, it then cognizes itself in the doubt as that which performs the doubt (the substance). Besides the thinking substance, there is also the res extensa, the 'extended thing,' that is, 'substance that occupies a space.' This substance, however, is not grasped immediately, but likewise, only through the judgment. This mediation is the basis of why, for Descartes and for rationalism across the board, one's own body is itself a foreign body. It is just as approachable as all other bodies, and just as unapproachable.

With this conception of cognition, Descartes founds the typical traits of rationalism, which can be summarized in the following criteria:

(1) Nothing is certain to thought (to thinking) except that which it has 'perceived'—comprehended—through itself. (2) This perception (comprehension) is reached by way of a radical doubt. (3) The objects of this doubt are not only doctrines or assertions, but sensory experiences, as well. (4) On this path of confirmation by way of doubt, thought encounters its own substance. (5) This substance is seen as radically different from the extended substance of the body. (6) In the splitting of thought from extension, of mind from body, the body can be conceived only through extension being taken into account.

Bounds of Rationalism: Feasibility

2. a) One of rationalism's weighty consequences consists precisely in the last point. This conception has led to a deeply rooted basic assumption concerning the possibilities of cognition of nature, that worked its way into the twentieth century, and that has become determinative for the sciences. Here problems arise when sciences are confronted with the human body. Thus, it is particularly medicine that has kept true to this rationalistic conceptualization of the human body. Even today we see this in the understanding of illness as a simple interaction with the human body—in the understanding of illness as a simple organic defect. It is not only here, however, that scientific intercourse with nature encounters certain bounds; rather, today, in increasing measure, the problematics result from a scientific understanding that makes nature accessible solely through calculation and utilization. Thus, rationalism's constriction and problematics, with respect to living nature, leads to irrationalistic countercurrents, that call into question not only rationalism's relation to nature, but also its entire conception.

Romanticism

b) These irrationalistic tendencies scarcely constitute a phenomenon of the twentieth century. → Romanticism itself, which was certainly widespread in Germany, arose out of this opposing stance. Stimulated by Rousseau's critique of the sciences and arts, which had not led to the → progress of the human race, they pursued their "Retournons à la nature!" (Fr., "Back to nature!") in the form of poetic, artistic, and philosophical relatedness to → nature. But this return to nature implies a political return to medieval forms of society and life. In philosophy, as well, a reactionary trait is recognizable. Ratio (Lat. 'reason') no longer stands at the focus of knowledge. It is seen as corruptive, and destructive of life. As in the systematics of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, it is the intellect that is responsible for the higher and authentic insights (→ Reason). Consequently, Romanticism established the concept of 'intellectual observation,' which then became the key concept of irrationalism. The common note of the otherwise differing systems maintained by Fichte, Schelling, the Romantically oriented Schelling school (especially von Baader), and Schopenhauer, is their 'discovery' that it is the sensory system in itself—therefore, without the logical operations of concept, judgment, and conclusion—that is the organ of cognition. Logic, in the best of cases, can only trail along behind this primary opportunity for understanding; but it thereby actually destroys these insights and cuts them off from life.

Philosophy of Life

Through the deficits of scientific cognitions, the triumphal march of the sciences in the second half of the nineteenth century provoked a reinforcement of irrational tendencies. These tendencies have always been joined under the diffuse concept of 'philosophy of life,' a designation that spans the critical attitudes toward scientific and logical positivism, but that also includes a dangerous mythologization of life forces. After the Marxist-oriented disparagement of the philosophy of life as having laid the groundwork for National Socialism, irrationalism in general and the philosophy of life in particular were improperly politicized. This shift rendered unilaterally suspect their important and valuable attacks on scientific and technological, progressivist thought.

Literature

Coreth, Emerich/Schöndorf, Harald, Philosophie des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart [2]1990; Dodds, Eric R., The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley 1951; Elster, Jon, Ulysses and the Sirens: Studies in Rationality and Irrationality, Cambridge [2]1984; Ilie, Paul, The Age of Minerva, 2 vols., Philadelphia 1995; Kondylis, Panajotis, Die Aufklärung im Rahmen des neuzeitlichen Rationalismus, Munich 1986; Patterson, Robert Leet Irrationalism and Rationalism in Religion, Durham 1954; Stein, Gordon (ed.), A Second Anthology of Atheism and Rationalism, Buffalo 1987; Wein, Wolfgang, Das Irrationale, Frankfurt/M. 1997.

→ Atheism, European History of Religion, Miracles, Progress, Reason, Romanticism, Science, Wholeness/Holism

Stephan Grätzel

Reason

Understanding / Reason

1. Today's concept of reason is a product of the philosophy of the Enlightenment, which places reason above simple understanding as the highest capacity of the mind. This ranking reversed the translations of the medieval and early modern ages. For scholastic and Reformation translators, 'understanding,' insight, was the English word for the Latin ratio, and the translation of the superior capacity, intellectus, was 'reason.' In most Western languages, in the Enlightenment, this correspondence was reversed: 'reason,' as a superior capacity, became intellectus, insight, while 'understanding' remained the translation for ratio, or discursive thought. In Romance languages (Fr., raison; Italian, raggione; Spanish, ración), as well as in English ('reason'), dependence on ratio was retained. These differences are the cause of many misunderstandings.

Faith and Reason

2. With its higher evaluation of reason, the → Enlightenment and → rationalism endeavored to emancipate the mind from the predominance of hierarchical conceptualizations. In the old conflict over the relationship between knowledge and faith, knowledge was accorded independence. Medieval philosophy's normative principle, Credo ut intelligam (Lat., "I believe in order to understand"), now became obsolete. Henceforward, understanding was possible without faith. This revaluation of reason not only broke with the biblical 'corruptibility' of reason, but went so far as to found an actual cult of reason, as practiced in the French Revolution, especially by Robespierre. True, le culte de la raison, which presents reason as the highest essence, culminated in the dictatorship of the 'common prosperity' of the state, and ended in mass executions. Auguste Comte then propagated another cult of reason in his Catéchisme positiviste (Fr., "Positivist Catechism"; 1852), the goal of which was a religion of surrender to reason. In service to an ideal of humanity, its doctrines promoted a special altruism that was to remove all forms of self-relation.

Kant

3. This relinquishing of the individual, in favor of reason, is also to be found in the philosophy of Immanuel Kant, as the most meaningful confrontation with reason. His 'critique' of reason is the result of his confrontation with the Scots philosopher David Hume and the latter's skeptical philosophy. According to Hume, it was not possible to find universally valid causal propositions. All propositions upon causes rest on habit, and have nothing that would be binding for the future. Kant felt Hume's propositions as an attack on human autonomy. In his Kritik der reinen Vernunft, Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, and Kritik der Urteilskraft (Ger., "Critique of Pure Reason," 1781, 1787; "Critique of Practical Reason," 1788; "Critique of Judgment," 1790), as well as in his anthropology (1798), he seeks to underline the independence of reason vis-à-vis the 'last' (that is, the eschatological) truths. Thus, he assigns the question "What can I know?" to theoretical reason, the question "What should I do?" to practical reason, the question "What may I hope?" to judgment, and the question "What is the human being?" to anthropology. The ultimate questions are not posed by the understanding, but by reason. Reason deals not with the concrete facts of experience, but with questions that touch the whole of the human situation and human existence. Here Kant sketches his fundamental concept of reason: reason is the capacity proceeding from human freedom, and is that which understands (science), performs (ethics), and shapes (art). The various tasks of reason have the common goal of emphasizing this freedom and independence as the value of the human being, and of holding and proclaiming it against all temptations to return to nature or natural associations. In Kant's theory, this independence of reason is seen with respect to the human being's interest in his or her ego, in the world, and in God. At this point questions arise that—as a result of the critique of reason and the critical self-appraisal of its capacities—cannot be answered conclusively and unambiguously. Thus, there can be no complete knowledge of the ego, its origin, and its destiny—whether or not it might be immortal. Just so, the world and its creation are not precisely determinable. Nor can the existence of God be ascertained, or, still less, demonstrated, any more than can the nonexistence of God. The fact that these questions remain open preserves the critical reason from slipping into dogmatism and superstition. Yet, at the same time—and herein lies the positive side of the critique—the critical reason provides the opportunity for a new kind of relation of the human being to → transcendence. The critical form of the questions, and the fact that they remain open, have the effect that, in a regulating mode, they reach into the inner-worldly problematic. Hence, only an → ideology—and not a knowledge founded in reason—can rule out the questions of the meaning of ego, world, and God. It is precisely the peculiarity of reason that it not only allows these meanings, but actually elaborates them scientifically. Ignoring these questions, or belittling them as fancy, corresponds to a reduction of reason to understanding, and thereby demonstrates a renunciation of the basic thought of the enlightenment: secularity. The latter is guaranteed when the human being can freely reflect on these questions, touching her and his inmost concerns, without being limited in them by any authorities.

Dilthey

4. Kant's concept of reason receives a further complementation through the hermeneutics of Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911). In a critique of historical reason, Dilthey shows that the capacity for a historical understanding of earlier areas depends upon having 'understood' the sketches, goals, and plans that have led to events. This mode of understanding is clearly distinct from an analysis of causal factors, which Dilthey leaves to 'explanation,' and thereby further clarifies Kant's already created distinction between reason and understanding. The 'elucidating' or 'explanatory' sciences contemplate nature from the standpoint of the outside observer, and in this are 'natural sciences.' The 'understanding' sciences observe expression and meaning association from within, and in this are 'humanities' (Geisteswissenschaften).

Twentieth Century

5. In the course of the century just ended—ever since this attempt by Dilthey to relate the critique of reason to one of its installations, 'history,' in a manner whose orientation is to Kant—there has been an entire series of such critiques of reason. Especially noteworthy is M. Horkheimer's 'critique of instrumental reason,' along with the "Dialectics of the Enlightenment" of Horkheimer and T. W. Adorno, which handles reason's confrontation with myths, and proceeds from a point of departure in reason as enveloped in myth. There are, besides the position taken in the philosophy of life, positions critical of reason (such as Ludwig Klages's Der Geist als Widersacher der Seele; Ger., "The Mind as Adversary of the Soul"; 1929), in which there are now approaches to thinking about the environment (Klages's Mensch und Erde; Ger., "Human Being and Earth"; 1913). Here, as with Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965) and his ethics of a 'reverence for life' (Kultur und Ethik; Ger., "Culture and Ethics"; 1923), the environment is drawn into ethical reflection. With Hans Jonas (Prinzip der Verantwortung; Ger., "Principle of Responsibility"; 1984), and the ecological thinkers of the present (such as K. M. Meyer-Abich, Praktische Naturphilosophie; Ger., "Practical Philosophy of Nature"; 1997), this eventuality leads to a system of problems arising from the fact that technological intrusions into nature no longer extend over encompassable distances and spaces of time; thus, a consequent assessment constantly becomes more difficult. In corresponding fashion, the treatment is no longer available to an ethical submittal to the principles of reason, but must be broadened to include → nature and the ecological association.

Literature

Audi, Robert, The Architecture of Reason: The Structure and Substance of Rationality, Oxford 2000; Frede, Michael/Striker, Gisela (eds.), Rationality in Greek Thought, Oxford 1996; Grant, Edward, God and Reason in the Middle Ages, Cambridge 2001; Habermas, Jürgen, Religion and Rationality: Essays on Reason, God, and Modernity, Cambridge 2002; Murray, Paul D. (ed.), Reason, Truth and Theology in a Pragmatist Perspective, Leuven 2004; Peterson, Michael et al. (eds.), Reason and Religious Belief: An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, New York 1991; Schulz, Walter, Vernunft und Freiheit, Frankfurt/M. 1981; Welsch, Wolfgang, Vernunft. Die zeitgenössische Vernunftkritik und das Konzept der transversalen Vernunft, Frankfurt/M. 1996.

→ Atheism, Criticism of Religion, Enlightenment, Ethics/Morals, Humanism, Rationalism/Irrationalism, Science

Stephan Grätzel

Rebirth

Rebirth may refer to both the idea of → reincarnation and that of being spiritually born again. Reincarnation involves a person being physically reborn into the world after having exited it through death in a previous individual existence. The previous existence cannot be consciously remembered by the individual, but still affects the person. For example, deeds and experiences in a previous life may influence the type of incarnation a person now has.

Around 1900 European religious historians tended to see reincarnation as a distinguishing characteristic of what was perceived as the cyclical and non-goal-oriented Eastern religions in contrast to the linear and goal-directed assumptions of European religions. This differentiation was sometimes used as a point of criticism, sometimes as a reason to affirm Eastern religions.

In the Christian tradition, rebirth also plays a significant role in the concept of being born again. It is not the actual experience of → death, but the fact of its inevitability that motivates 'rebirth,' not in a physical sense but as a → conversion to a new spiritual life. This experience, though it takes place within a single individual lifespan, is believed to have an influence beyond the point of that person's physical death by allowing an access to redemption. The paradoxical idea of a person being able to be reborn is portrayed

"My shaman belongs to me." The white man's gesture is plain: the Western adept has his master, Huichol shaman Don José Matzuwa, well in hand. This snapshot, from the First International Congress of Shamans, held in Alpbach (in the Tyrol) in 1982, shows the problematics lurking in Western reception of non-European forms of religion and healing: genuine interest in foreign modes of thought, and engagement for the 'threatened peoples' of this earth, is frequently mixed up inseparably with commercial exploitation. In other words: the route of transmission between the Third and First Worlds leads from the traditional →

in the Bible in a conversation between Jesus and Nicodemus in the Gospel of John (John 3:1-15).

This notion has remained broadly popular, as may be seen in the periodic prevalence of names like Renée and Renata. The inheritance of the Great Awakenings in the nineteenth century with their revivalist emphasis can likewise still be seen in the conviction of many American Christians that being 'born again' represents the very core of Christian life.

→ Reincarnation

Christoph Auffarth

Reception

1. The term 'reception' derives from the Latin recipere, 'to receive,' 'to take up.' It is applied with various meanings in scholarship. In the cultural sciences, it found wide application after its adoption from the Constance theory of option in literary reception. In the area of anthropology and religious studies, it denotes any orientation of a cultural or religious current to a tradition. The bearers of the latter are varied. Correspondingly, religious receptions are identified as forms of religion that, according to their own self-concepts, refer to certain 'foreign' elements for ritual or doctrinal content. These elements, unlike → tradition, lie outside the legitimized or conventional canon of cultural elements of their bearers' religious framework.

2. The reception at issue, then, is that of cultural elements. Among these, the following, in principle, can be received: (a) one's own past cultural elements; (b) one's own, or (c) foreign, cultural elements that are socially different. In the first case, borrowing a concept from religious ethnology, one speaks of nativism—in the second, of layer-specific adoption—in the third of exoticism (→ Orientalism/Exotism). With these categories, → European history of religion is understood as a process drawing its dynamic from the constant, contrasting, polemical or idealizing, new interpretation of various receptions. The latter can assume the most varied forms, and are not unambiguously divided from one another. Receptions describe respectively different viewpoints, with respect to the received cultural element of the bearers—the vessels, the vehicles—of a religious tradition, and not that tradition itself. It is Tacitus, in his Germania (98 CE), who brings forward the basic blueprints here, which are then evinced throughout European history of religion. However, a single pattern can become dominant in discrete phases. Thus, for example, in the baroque and rococo a reception of idyllically presented sheep herding societies predominates, that is marked by an idealization of nature. The poor, mountainous Greek regions of Arcadia, on the Peloponnesus, were promoted—even in antiquity—to the status of the ideal. The notions of the idyllic, Homeric scenarios and heroic landscapes in literature and painting (Claude Lorrain, 1600–1682)—but William Chambers's (1723–1796) English landscape → gardens, as well—had nothing whatever to do with the real Greece of this or any other time (just as similar phenomena, in later → Romanticism, had no real elements of a Nordic ambient). Rather, they shaped aesthetical concepts to genuine models of sensitivity (and later, to genuine models of German idealism), just as to genuine models of the notion of decadence, which conceptualized the transition from primordial innocence to civilization as a process of spiritual alienation. With classicism, and the French Revolution, came a temporal and systematic shift of received contents to the time of the ancient Greek 'polis' (philhellenism)—and of the Roman Republic (Jacques-Louis David, "Oath of the Horatians")—as well as of content moving from individualistic to the dogmatically communitarian (→ Paganism/Neopaganism; Civil Religion).

In the nineteenth century, → occultism explicitly received the cultures of ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, and India. These cultures had become accessible partly by way of sensational excavations, but also through the deciphering of (Ancient) Eastern Languages. On the heels of the ideas of historicism (→ History; Science) and nationalism, attention likewise went to the conception of a cohesive history of one's own cultural space—all the more so inasmuch as industrialization (→ Industrial Society) entailed the task of establishing an identity for the masses of the new urban population. The workers' and youth movements at about the turn of the twentieth century offered new modes of expression for identification that seized upon the alienation models of Romanticism, and finally issued either in the nature mysticism and political liturgicism of → National Socialism, or in holistic anthropologies of various esoteric content (→ Wholeness/Holism; Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). The last phase of Western reception so far was finally shaped by the emergence of the alternative and hippie movements in the 1960s (→ New Age; Esalen Institute).

master-pupil relationship to a new context, in which the shaman's (etc.) pupil must offer the knowledge—sometimes received over years of great self-denial—in a powerfully embattled market stretching from San Francisco to Tuscany. Here, the concealment of 'claims' and jealous guarding of masters is just part of business. Brant Secunda, Don José's pupil, has twelve years of apprenticeship behind him, and has taught 'worldwide' since 1979. In the year 2000, he was preparing seminars on, for example: "Shamanism of the Huichol Indians," and "Seminars at Places of Power," with titles such as "The Dance of the Stag" (with reference to the stag myths), "Sports and Spirit" (with a triathlon world champion), and "The Healing Path of the Heart." (Hubert Mohr)

Declaration of War against Exploiters of Lakota Spirituality

Whereas we are conveners of an ongoing series of comprehensive forums on the abuse and exploitation of Lakota spirituality; and whereas we represent the recognized traditional leaders, traditional elders, and grassroots advocates of the Lakota people; and whereas for too long we have suffered the unspeakable indignity of having our most precious Lakota ceremonies and spiritual practices desecrated, mocked and abused by non-Indian 'wannabes,' hucks-ters, cultists, commercial profiteers and self-styled 'New Age shamans' and their followers; and whereas with horror and outrage we see this disgraceful expropriation of our sacred Lakota traditions has reached epidemic proportions in urban areas throughout the country; and whereas our Sacred Pipe is being desecrated through the sale of pipestone pipes at flea markets, powwows and 'New Age' retail stores; and whereas pseudo-religious corporations have been formed to charge people money for admission into phony 'sweatlodges' and 'vision quest' programs; and whereas sacrilegious 'sundances' for non-Indians are being conducted by charlatans and cult leaders who promote abominable and obscene imitations of our sacred Lakota sundance rites; and whereas non-Indians have organized themselves into imitation 'tribes' assigning themselves make-believe 'Indian names' to facilitate their wholesale expropriation and commercialization of our Lakota traditions; and whereas academic disciplines have sprung up at colleges and universities institutionalizing the sacrilegious imitation of our spiritual practices by students and instructors under the guise of educational programs in 'shamanism'; and whereas non-Indian charlatans and 'wannabes' are selling books that promote systematic colonization of our Lakota spirituality; and whereas the television and film industry continues to saturate the entertainment media with vulgar, sensationalist and grossly distorted representations of Lakota spirituality and culture which reinforce the public's negative stereotyping of Indian people and which gravely impair the self-esteem of our children; and whereas individuals and groups involved in the 'New Age movement,' in the 'men's movement,' in 'neo-paganism' cults and in 'shamanism' workshops all have exploited the spiritual traditions of our Lakota people by imitating our ceremonial ways and by mixing such imitation rituals with non-Indian occult practices in an offensive and harmful pseudo-religious hodge-podge; and whereas the absurd public posturing of this scandalous assortment of pseudo-Indian charlatans, 'wannabes,' commercial profiteers, cultists and 'New Age shamans' comprises a momentous obstacle in the struggle of traditional Lakota people for an adequate public appraisal of the legitimate political, legal and spiritual needs of real Lakota people; and whereas this exponential exploitation of our Lakota spiritual traditions requires that we take immediate action to defend our most precious Lakota spirituality from further contamination, desecration and abuse.

Therefore We Resolve as Follows:

1. We hereby and henceforth declare war against all persons who persist in exploiting, abusing and misrepresenting the sacred traditions and spiritual practices of our Lakota, Dakota and Nakota people.
2. We call upon all our Lakota, Dakota and Nakota brothers and sisters from reservations, reserves and traditional communities in the United States and Canada to actively and vocally oppose this alarming takeover and systematic destruction of our sacred traditions.
3. We urge our people to coordinate with their tribal members living in urban areas to identify instances in which our sacred traditions are being abused, and then to resist this abuse, utilizing whatever specific tactics necessary and sufficient—for example—demonstrations, boycotts, press conferences, and acts of direct intervention.
4. We especially urge all our Lakota, Dakota and Nakota people to take action to prevent our own people from contributing to and enabling the abuse of our sacred ceremonies and spiritual practices by outsiders; for, as we all know, there are certain ones among our own people who are prostituting our spiritual ways for their own selfish gain, with no regard for the spiritual well-being of the people as a whole.

5. We assert a posture of zero-tolerance for any 'white man's shaman' who rises from within our own communities to 'authorize' the expropriation of our ceremonial ways by non-Indians, all such 'plastic medicine men' are enemies of the Lakota, Dakota and Nakota people.
6. We urge traditional people, tribal leaders, and governing councils of all other Indian nations, as well as all national Indian organizations, to join us in calling for an immediate end to this rampant exploitation of our respective American Indian sacred traditions by issuing statements denouncing such abuse; for it is not the Lakota, Dakota and Nakota people alone whose spiritual practices are being systematically violated by non-Indians.
7. We urge all our Indian brothers and sisters to act decisively and boldly in our present campaign to end the destruction of our sacred traditions, keeping in mind our highest duty as Indian people: to preserve the purity of our precious traditions for our future generations, so that our children and our children's children will survive and prosper in the sacred manner intended for each of our respective peoples by our Creator.

Wilmer Stampede Mesteth (Oglala Lakota)
Darrell Standing Elk (Sicangu Lakota)
Phyllis Swift Hawk (Kul Wicasa Lakota)

At the Lakota Summit V, an international gathering of US and Canadian Lakota, Dakota and Nakota nations, about 500 representatives from 40 different tribes and bands of the Lakota unanimously passed a "Declaration of War Against Exploiters of Lakota Spirituality." The declaration was passed unanimously on June 10, 1993. (Source: www.native-net.org/archive/nl/9308/0227.html; accessed 28 June 2005)

Today, patterns similar to those of Romanticism are received once more, but with far different—sometimes opposite—interests. Instead of anthropologies emphasizing reason, those characterized by patterns of a skepticism of rationality stand in the foreground. Then too, beginning in the nineteenth century, the focus of reception has shifted from classical antiquity and its Eastern pre-history, as well as from one's own pre-history, to extra-European cultures. Manifold lines of influence can be shown in these developments, as, for example, the collapse of the colonial empires, the oil industry, and the Social Democratic education reform of the 1960s and 1970s. Important objects of the reception that today forms an essential aspect of → esotericism and → New Age, are the North American Indians (→ North America [Traditional Religions]), the Buddhist culture of India and East Asia (→ Zen Buddhism), the Celtic peoples of Europe, and, recently, the native inhabitants of Siberia (→ Northern Eurasia/Circumpolar Regions) and → South America.

Types and Motifs of Religious Reception

3. The forms of expression developed by religious vehicles of reception, and assigned to what is received, can constantly be read as direct responses to the tensions in their own cultural space. The description, in the cultural sciences, of processes of reception, and of their forms and motifs, must elucidate how reception develops for the recipient within a broader culture, and what needs it answers. It sees the inner/subjective perception of its claim to reception, therefore, not as a dialogue, but as evidence, materializing against the background of a projected horizon of culture. The relation between recipient and received eventuates as multi-layered: the 'foreign' cultural element adopted is itself sketched in intra-cultural matters and convergences/oppositions. The cultural scientific analysis, then, has to be executed in terms of the following question, bearing on communication: what, how, why, and by whom, is anything received?

Reception as Mechanism of Projection

a) In what fashion does reception occur?—forms of assimilation: If and when foreign, past, or socially different elements of culture are taken up and received, they then often serve as projection screens for the compensation of moods such as uneasiness and discomfiture with processes of mechanization, urbanization, loss of identity through a dissolution of social-role images, or loss of privilege through a democratization of education and access to knowledge (with the assistance of unapproachably secret truths and mysteries). Thus, in current forms of reception, such as, for example, → fantasy literature, on the one hand there is the tendency to a projective metaphysical fixation of orientations that in the current world of recipients are increasingly relativized, and on the other, the creation of experimental fields in which, with new proportions between role-adoption and role-escape, there is room for 'play' or adjustment. Hence, receptions are often suited for a tendency to conservative value-concepts, that are felt as 'better' or 'natural' (wish-) orderings of that which is received.

Reception as Product of Synthesis

No cultural space is an enclosed unit that could be concisely defined, and would draw all of its members from a single form. Culturally determined forms of expression are therefore called into question again and again, and measured by the standard of the societal and social reality that, for their own part, they themselves shape. In many important traditions of reception, the cultural element received is constantly the product of syntheses of a preceding phase of reception, which, for its part, refers once more to the earlier one. Thus, one may speak of a mechanism of transmittal, in which the tradition reflects itself, and in which, in the presence of current social constellations, it is developed anew. In this mechanism, the quest for authenticity forms the subjective moment of motivation in the measure that the really intelligible cultural expressions become objectively more inaccessible. Widespread current religious forms of reception—such as the Native American, the Celtic and Teutonic reception, but also in folklore, and in today's → tourism—come away with only marginal, if any at all, 'chips' of a corresponding substrate. In these cases, the authentic, in the form of a religious and cultural continuity, has been reduced to a disappearing minimal value. Furthermore, the proportion of genuinely foreign cultural elements being submitted to processes of reception is not open to objective appraisal as 'authentic' or 'inauthentic': instead, the 'foreign culture' is constantly smelted together with one's own cultural interpretations, and thus metamorphosed.

Quest for Authenticity

Reception as Intra-Cultural Differentiation

Forms of religious reception are principally the expression of intra-cultural differentiation, then: they introduce new opportunities for action and new traditions of thought into one's own culture, and are therefore one of the important mechanisms of the European history of ideas. Bypassing the 'foreign,' 'archaic,' or 'buried primordial,' they make it possible to confront one's own current bestowals of meaning on the occasion of one's possession of a projection screen, which warrants a distance from one's own socialization.

Vessels of Reception

b) Who receives?—The vessels or bearers of reception: On the basis of the dynamic character of culture, in every cultural connection there exist deficits, or instances of one-sidedness, reliably experienced as subjective, on the part of the majority ('mainstream') culture, that motivate individuals or minorities to receive foreign elements of culture. The incipient rediscovery or → renaissance of past phases of culture is often the work of small, highly motivated groups: of intellectual circles (the Florentine 'Academy' under Lorenzo de' Medici in the fifteenth century for → Platonism, reception of antiquity in Munich's Bohemia around 1900), groups of social dropouts (reception of Buddhism by beatniks, reception of Indian culture by the counter-culture of the 1970s), or groups of representatives of scientific disciplines. In the nineteenth century, it was precisely the new disciplines of archaeology, ethnology, Eastern studies, and comparative languages that promoted the reception of many cultural and historical spaces in Europe and North America, or finally made them possible. Thus, Indian reception in the West, at the beginning of the twentieth century, built on the achievements of scientific Indology, and were nourished by the ever more available Buddhist texts (F. M. Müller's Sacred Books of the East, 1879ff.). Frequently, scientific interests and personal reception were joined in one person, as in the brilliant personalities of many researchers and explorers: African scholars Mungo Park (1771–1806) and David Livingstone (1813–1873); Alexandra David-Néel (1868–1969), who traveled Tibet in disguise, and who practiced as a Lamaist nun; Isabelle Eberhardt (1877–1904), who converted to Islam, and lived as a Sufi pupil in North Africa; or Sven Hedin (1865–1952), who researched Central Asia and the Silk Route, and became the forerunner of an esoteric Tibetology.

c) Why does reception occur?—Motives: Grounds for the reception of foreign cultural content can be found in the subjective discomfort with one's own culture that we have mentioned, as well as in fascination with the 'other.' Thus, purposes range from the attempt to replace one's personal practice of faith with that of the received culture ('going native' as a form of cultural → conversion), to an active and strategic commitment for the purpose of an alteration of one's cultural environment in terms of a given model of reception, as is the case in reform movements, redemption cults, or some of the → new religions.

Motivation Components and Patterns of Reception

The individual motives and subjective patterns of reception can be catalogued as follows.

- Motive of alienation: Many current models of religious reception refer to a motive of alienation for these models that can be demonstrated since ancient times. Individual patterns of socialization, like their framework of cross-societal functions, here appear out of current tensions as alienated from 'nature' (the variant of Rousseau), from 'human beings' (anthropological variant), from the cosmos or life (gnostic variant), or from God (mystical variant). The vehicles or vessels of the variants call for corrective behavior, in order to bring the unilateral and thereby alienated societal processes once more 'into good order.'
- Pattern of extension or complementation: Especially for the more recent forms of reception during the last thirty years, in the areas of → New Age thinking or the ecology movement, a pattern of extension or complementation can be identified: the cultural and social framework of the self-concept of these groups—equated, depending on its own political direction, to Christianity or to industrial capitalism—admits of only a limited and impoverished repertory of socially legitimated patterns of behavior. Others, and especially 'more authentic' kinds of human behaviors such as feelings for nature, protection of the biosphere (→ Environmentalism; Wholeness/Holism), emotionality and corporality, on the other hand, would have been abandoned, if not altogether suppressed, by the mainstream cultural tradition of the West, and consequently would have to be complemented, particularly by religious means.

- Pattern of compensation: A variant and radicalization of the pattern of complementation can be grasped as a compensation pattern. Here again, the possibilities of expression and the symbolical systems are felt as unsatisfactory and coercive. They are not complemented by a hypothetical whole, however. Instead, at one and the same time, they are to be neutralized, and are to have their compelling character overtaken by new types of expression. These latter now present themselves as diametrically opposed to socially legitimated expressions. In these cases, a systematically controlled violation of rules leads to psychological liberation, and compensates the daily role-pattern that has been experienced as so coercive. This mechanism enters the scene especially on the occasion of a 'European → nativism,' and therefore along with the reception of so-called indigenous European religions (→ Celts, → Teutons, 'Aryans')—not least of all in connection with Fascist movements—as well as in the Indian reception.
- Pattern of reaffirmation: On the other hand, where it is not so much a new orientation of personal meaning that is front and center, but rather the warranty of this new orientation, religious reception comes in contact with exoticism. In the latter phenomenon, along with a Romantic glorification of the alien, the foreground is shared by the indirect wish for the endorsement of one's own cultural elements—as with parts of nineteenth-century enthusiasm for the Orient and antiquity, which are applied in ornamental fashion, and are to serve to emphasize the sovereignty of one's own, allegedly superior and 'reason-ed' cultural context. With an intellectual orientation of reception, however, the opposite pattern can be followed instead: the endorsement of one's own overall cultural framework as the fallen condition of a heroic substrate of reception (see below, § 3d (1), Reception of Antiquity).

In sum, foreign cultural elements can be readied specifically, and worked into a new synthesis that will incorporate one's own notions (exegesis; → Translation). In the presence of receptions, groups develop new manners of expression, and of reflection, and finally, of → identities—all of which, in the overall cultural situation of (Western, etc.) mainstream culture, cut a new facet within the already many-faceted relation of tensions. This new facet can later be taken in hand once more, or else, with individual elements, radiate outward into the cultural mainstream. Thus, religious and cultural reception is primarily to be interpreted as an inner achievement of cultural differentiation, and can by no means be interchanged with intercultural dialogue or scientific discussion. This distinction is reflected in the fact that, for groups undertaking or maintaining religious reception, the current existence and dynamic of the received is unimportant, or even obstructive. Nothing can be so irritating for a Western group receiving Indian spirituality as to contact modern, all too real Indians. And the latter forbid themselves any interest in foreign persons and enterprises using their religious traditions (see the Lakota "Declaration of War") as special bargains on the 'cult market.' Thus, revitalizations of the 'primordial' or 'original' in the Western context are almost completely constructs of historical fantasy—extensively, receptions from other cultural spaces. Still, to summarily regard it as a 'pipe dream,' or 'forgery' would not do justice to the frequent subjective striving after 'the genuine' on the part of vessels of religious reception (→ Fantasy).

Horizons of Culture

d) What is received?—Horizons of culture: In the course of early and late European modernity, a broad repertoire of received horizons of culture was shaped:

(1) Reception of antiquity: For Europe, and largely for North America as well, the most important context of reception is classical antiquity. This reception builds on the → Renaissance as the foundation of modernity. Since then, approaches to the reception of antiquity, constantly transformed, have always been present in Europe; they develop in humanism, and in connection with Romanticism and classicism, especially in art (Johann Jakob Winckelmann, → Art Religion). In the nineteenth century, antiquity became the impelling means of the groundbreaking Prussian reform of the gymnasium, under Wilhelm von Humboldt and Baron von Stein, and thereby became a material for school formation that was extensively effective. With Friedrich → Nietzsche's iridescent 'Dionysian' legacy, The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music (1872), with the turn of the century in Vienna (Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Elektra, 1904), with the reception by the 'Cosmics' (c. 1900) of a 'matriarchal' prehistory as J. J. Bachofen had imagined it, as well as with James G. Frazer's ethnologization and folklorization of antiquity (The Golden Bough, 1890ff.), the threshold of a 'pagan' counterculture to the Christian West was crossed, and a nocturnal image was sketched out, full of mysteries, cruel rites, and primitive sacrificial cults. On the other hand, "The Naked and the Dead" (K. Wolbert), of classical provenance, and an ancient cult of heroes and the dead, continued to determine the aesthetics of the → political religions of the twentieth century, as well as the art and ideology of National Socialism and Fascism. The artists in the service of the state corrupted the Greek notion of the heroic-and-divine to an architecture of monumental emptiness (Albert Speer's 'Doric' Germania—Berlin—based on sketches of classical postal-card painter A. Hitler), and (as in the work of Arno Berker) to mighty and colossal plastics. The ideologies of the apparatus of government made analogous use of expressions of heroic honor in Greek religion, for the sacralization of violence and of military and political power (→ National Socialism). Classical humanism's formative ideal did not survive the collapse of an educated middle class and the modernization thrusts of the twentieth century; thus, knowledge about antiquity, its cults, myths, and materials, became marginal, despite instruction in Latin. Meanwhile, in its Romantic and archaistic variant, a reception of antiquity found sub-cultural interest chiefly in areas of spiritual feminism; in the feminist quest for a → matriarchy, and in the 'new → witches.' Knossos and Malta have replaced Athens and Sparta—an observation that is not altered with postmodern attempts at a confrontation with antiquity.

Reception of the East

(2) Reception of the East: Reception of the East was kindled in historical phases of strengthened contact—the Crusades (1096–1291) and the Turkish wars (fifteenth to beginning of the eighteenth century)—which, besides coffee and sofas, popularized a plenitude of oriental subjects in art (harem painting, Jean-Auguste Ingres, Ferdinand Cormon). In the eighteenth century, the Near East was joined by the Far East, whose reception led to, for example, Chinese pagodas and tea-houses in the gardens of European princes, as well as to the first products of a Japanese Samurai romanticism. Religious models and elements were mostly only ornamental, however, adopted as movable aesthetic scenery. It was in British → colonialism, especially, that enthusiasm for the 'Orient' reached its climax, with Lord Beckford's Vathek

(1786), Sir Richard Burton, who traveled the East in disguise, secretly visited → Mecca, and produced the new, fantasy-charged Tales from the Thousand-and-One Nights, and Rudyard Kipling's Kim. Colonial cultural contact with → Iran, → India, and 'Indochina' led to the discovery of the Ancient Persian, Indian, and Chinese religions (→ Zoroastrianism; Yoga; Zen Buddhism). Not only were they received in philosophy (Hegel, Schopenhauer) and literature (Pearl S. Buck, Hermann Hesse), but religious groups such as the Theosophical Society (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society) have their point of departure here. The penultimate wave of Eastern reception came in the footsteps of the hippie and drug culture of the 1960s and 1970s, and led to the success of neo-Hindu and Buddhist religions in Europe and America (→ Hare Krishna; Osho Movement; Dalai Lama; New Age; Esalen Institute). Reception of Islamic → Sufism is still in the ascendant.

Reception of 'Indigenous European' Traditions

3) The reception of ostensibly 'indigenous European' traditions: Teutonic and Celtic reception has a long tradition, accompanied by nineteenth-century Pan-Slavism, and the recent 'rediscovery' of the cultures of an ancient 'Baltia,' 'Serbia,' 'Croatia,' or even 'Magyaria.'

- Celtic reception (→ Celts) can be traced to the Middle Ages (Arthurian myth, Tristan and Isolde). It enjoyed a strong upswing by way of the middle-class Scottish regionalism of the eighteenth century (Robert Burns, 1759–1796), and in Romanticism it had its influence on the rest of Europe by way of the fashionable currents of Ossianism. In the nineteenth century, 'Celtic consciousness' awoke in Ireland (Irish Republican Brotherhood—or Fenian Movement—founded 1858). Cultural reception in Ireland and Scotland is still closely connected today with nationalistic movements (Sinn Feinn, Scottish National Party; → Northern Ireland). Since the 1970s, by way of J. R. R. Tolkien, the reception of 'Celtic' myths has flowed into the broader context of → fantasy literature and fantasy role-playing (→ Drama [Sacred]). In → New Age contexts, as well, 'Celtic' elements like ornamentation, rune oracles, or '→ Druid' teachings continue to be favorites.
- Modern Teutonic reception (→ Teutons) is found in the Nibelungen enthusiasm of the 1850s (Richard Wagner), continues in its utility for the founding of the German Reich in 1871, and finally, by way of → völkisch religions (Ludendorff Movement, 'Ariosophy'), leads to National Socialism. The defeat of the Nazi state in 1945 had its consequence in the discrediting of all blueprints of a völkisch religion that would relate to a 'Teutonic past.' Only since the 1980s have parts of the counterculture engaged in a modernization of 'Teutonic,' and even of völkisch, thought material—by way of Celtic and North American Indian reception—and managed their inclusion in the greater connection of a new → nature piety. Recent groups undertaking 'Teutonic' reception are, for example, the Armanenorden, or the Germanische Glaubensgemeinschaft ("Teutonic Faith Community," the former "Neo-Heathen Community").
- A variant of the reception of supposedly indigenous European substrata is represented by certain esoteric directions of a 'Great Mother' cult, and myths of the Matriarchate, with a reference to neolithic and bronze-age substrata (megalithic culture in Brittany, on Malta, and in Great Britain), as well as to Bronze Age cultures (Crete). Mingled with Celtic and medieval reception, these are prolonged in the twentieth-century witches' movement (Wicca). A more and more important form of reception is the assignment to prehistoric sites of special, although extremely abstract, meaning-content (Stonehenge, etc.), and their esoteric use as 'power places,' or as places of cult.

Reception of Extra-European Indigenous Religions

(4) Extra-European Substrates: Since the 1960s—along with the religious traditions of → India, → China, and Japan—religious receptions have adopted extra-European substrates, as well.

Reception of American Indians

Enthusiasm for American Indians deserves special emphasis. Its roots lie at the beginning of the past century, and, in connection with the nature-protection and the ecological movement has enjoyed a new phase in the 1970s and 1980s. In the 1990s, the midpoint of interest has shifted from the North American prairie Indians, to tribes of the Southwest, such as the Hopi, and to South American tribes of the rain forest. The high cultures of Middle America, meanwhile (Maya, Aztec, Inca), have been generally passed over, since they seem to be less suited for the function of an exemplar of a 'holistic' understanding of nature (for purposes of a critique of civilization). The use of hallucinogenic drugs in Western alternative culture since the 1960s led more strongly to the reception of the peyote cult of Central American tribes, such as the Huichol or Yaqui (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens).

African Religions

The reception of elements of African nature religions, for instance that of the Dogon in Mali, has been developed in the footsteps of French anthropology, and both the Jamaican Rastafari movement, as well as Haitian → voodoo, can be described as Americo-Caribbean forms of receiving African culture.

Reception of Shamanism

The newest form of reception of extra-European substrates is to be seen in → shamanism, which refers, along a broad spectrum, to conceptualizations entertained in nature religion. An identifying note of this newest phase of reception, a phase attracting attention since the 1970s in the United States, and since the 1980s in Europe, is a further detachment from concrete historical and cultural substrates. Components of the most varied traditions of healing, and most widely varied ritual elements of → Northern Eurasian and American Indian cultures, generate religious models as vague as they are flexible: these, under the label of 'shamanism,' or 'nature religion,' sometimes assume the patterns of natural religion or universal religion of the eighteenth century.

Forms of Religious Reception as the Expression of Current Sociopolitical Problem Situations

Nationalism and Separatism

4. Current problem situations, legitimated by forms of religious reception, are, on the one side, ethnicism, nationalism, and separatism. The centralizing policy maintained by national states finds a counterbalance in marginalized cultural spaces, precisely to the extent that the awareness prevailing there of political and cultural impotence is balanced by certain forms of religious expression. These, qua reception, enable a consciousness of cultural superiority, or at least a consciousness of indigenous traditions of equal value, to prevail. Thus, in the 'Celtic' regions of Europe, in Southern France (Languedoc), in various regions of Spain (Catalonia, Galicia, the Basque country), and among the peoples of the Balkans, as well as—in the wake of the political emancipation of the former Soviet Union—in the Baltic region and the Slavic states, political reconstructions of a former autonomy go hand in hand with a reinforced interest in supposedly independent cultural and religious roots.

Environmental Movement and Preservation of Nature

Religious reception sponsors another indicative connection by virtue of its proximity to the movement for the preservation of the natural environment (→ Environmentalism). The vehicles of that movement are groups that connect an anti-modernistic nativism, along with nationalistic or racist components, to a frankly enthusiastic relation to their own country.

5. Religious reception can appear in extremely varied connections and phenomenal visages, corresponding to the current, intra-cultural relations of their social environment. Capacity for reception is an important thermometer of a society's capacity for innovation and plasticity. The best analogy for the reception of supposedly foreign—but actually imagined—cultures is perhaps the phenomenon of individual → dreams and → fantasies. Both form the fundament of development and creativity, even on a societal level. Just as readily, however, they are jammed together, stunned, into deadening lies of power and stagnation, by way of an orientation to concrete political goals. And yet the aggressive success of Western culture is due partly to its capacity to assimilate the supposedly foreign, time and time again, as its own material.

Literature

Ben-Amos, Dan/Weissberg, Liliane (eds.), Cultural Memory and the Construction of Identity, Detroit 1999; Holub, Robert C., Reception Theory: A Critical Introduction, London 1984; Konstantinovic, Zoran (ed.), Literary Communication and Reception, Innsbruck 1984; Lovejoy, Arthur O., The Great Chain of Being: A Study in the History of an Idea, Boston 1933; Schama, Simon, Landscape and Memory, London 1995.

Further literature is provided at the respective entries.

→ Celts, Druids, European History of Religion, Fantasy (Genre of), Identity, Memory, New Age, New Myths/New Mythologies, North America (Traditional Religions), Orientalism/Exotism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Projection, Tradition, Translation, Teutons

Georg Hehn and (3d, no. 1) Hubert Mohr

Reformation

New Type of Religiosity

1. The Reformation radiating from Germany hosted a confluence of social, political, and religious developments. In terms of religion, the various motifs were focused through scriptural principles, and a teaching on justification. The criticism of the Church by that Church itself led to a collapse of the medieval concept of a unitary Christianity, the Corpus Christianum. Into its place stepped the co-existing confessional churches. In the Protestant regional churches, there arose a new type of Christian religiosity, one characterized by a rational piety, with an orientation to preaching, and a new, positive evaluation of the secular life of labor and profession. The juridical distinction between clergy and laity was abolished, and the condition of academically formed preachers replaced the condition of priest.

Theological Criticism of the Excluded Religion

2. Important preconditions for the Reformation included the growing requirement on the part of the urban middle class for suitable and apt religious care and concern, and the widespread criticism of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, as well as the theological criticism of the alienation and commercialization of religion, as it was shown in the practice of indulgence. It was against this last item that → Luther's protest was originally directed in 1517, and it became the initial event of the Reformation. Luther's reforming thoughts soon went beyond this scope, were quickly adopted and spread in sermons and pamphlets, and were concretized by Lucas Cranach and others. The Reformation found its fertile social sustenance especially in the cities. The cities institutionalized ecclesiastical and societal alterations, in a cooperation between councils and population that was as a rule complex. The impetus of the social revolution, brought to the countryside by reception of the new ideals in the context of social conflict, on the other hand, was suppressed in the Peasant War of 1525. The Reformation would probably not have been able to develop its system-demolishing effect, had greater territories—Cursaxony and Hesse—not continued to come in on the side of the cities in the 1520s. They understood the pronouncement of the Diet of Speyer in 1529, which left the implementation of the Edict of Worms to their responsibility, as a carte-blanche for the implementation of the Reformation, above all with the assistance of visitations on the part of the local rulers; these controls of the pastors and parishes soon became an important tool of 'social disciplining' in the pre-absolutist state. At the Reichstag of Speyer in 1529, the classes that had remained 'old believing' sought to enforce the Edict of Worms once more; however, the Reforming classes protested against it (hence their name: "Protestants"). After the rejection of the Reformational Augsburg Confession at the Augsburg Reichstag in 1530, the political fronts dug in. The result was belligerent confrontation, and various provisional regulations, until, with the Religious Peace of Augsburg in 1555, the coexistence of two confessions in the Empire was definitively recognized. The Reformation had made its transition then to the stage of confessionalization.

Normative Centering

3. Recent research has increasingly understood the Reformation against the background of changes in society and piety in the late Middle Ages. In this context, the Reformation represents neither a mere stage, nor a radical breach. Instead, by way of the principle of scripture and the teaching on justification, it availed itself of opportunities to establish a normative 'centering,' on whose grounds fundamental conditions of medieval society could be overcome.

Literature

Blickle, Peter, Communal Reformation: The Quest for Salvation in Sixteenth-Century Germany, New Jersey 1992; Collinson, Patrick, The Reformation, London 2003; Goertz, Hans-Jürgen, Antiklerikalismus und Reformation, Göttingen 1995; Hamm, Berndt, "Reformation als normative Zentrierung," in: Jahrbuch für Biblische Theologie 7 (1992), 241-279; Idem, The Reformation of Faith in the Context of Late Medieval Theology and Piety: Essays, Leiden 2004; Janz, Denis R. (ed.), A Reformation Reader: Primary Texts with Introductions, Minneapolis 1999; Levi, Anthony, Renaissance and Reformation: The Intellectual Genesis, New Haven 2002; MacGrath, Alister E., The Intellectual Origins of the European Reformation, Oxford 1987; Idem, Reformation Thought: An Introduction, Oxford [3]1999; Moeller, Bernd (ed.), Die frühe Reformation in Deutschland als Umbruch, Gütersloh 1998; Schilling, Heinz, Aufbruch und Krise. Deutschland 1517–1648, Berlin 1988.

→ Christianity, European History of Religion, Jesuits, Luther, Protestantism, Renaissance

Volker Leppin

Regeneration / Fertility

1. Fertility can be described as the capacity of human being, animal, and plant to reproduce and maintain life. 'Regeneration' comes from the Latin re-generare, 'beget again/anew,' a process including the moment of discontinuance, death. This peculiarity of living matter is bound up in shapes, specific to each respective culture, which also subject the human being to a process of socialization. "To be fruitful and to multiply" (Gen 1:28) therefore counts among the basic concerns of groups that seek to see the guarantee of their continued existence. Socio-demographic studies represent the theme chiefly under the aspect of varying human biological 'fertility' (birth rate, population growth), while anthropological studies seek to develop the reciprocal relationships between the relation of regeneration of social groups and the natural resources used by them, with attention to the → collective representations emerging from these relationships. These latter will be: processes of adaptation to nature; cosmologies; conceptions of social relations between the sexes and their tasks in the work of reproduction such as → hierarchy, division of labor, → sexuality, and gender roles, or categories of female and male (→ Gender Stereotypes), concepts of the → body (bodily substances); relations of kinship (patrilinear or matrilinear descent); and finally, the legitimization of progeny.

2. In many societies, the human capacity for regeneration is the object of rituals with which changes is the → life cycle (→ Birth; Puberty; Marriage/Divorce) are accentuated as critical processes. → Initiation or maturity rites, through which girls' and boys' entry into sexual maturity is modeled—sometimes even before the biological transition—, mark the conversion to the status of marriageability. Here, physical manipulations like circumcision oftentimes figure as a means of attaining to capability of procreation, or are performed in order to guarantee virginity as a prerequisite for marriage. The transmission of the 'elders" knowledge of sexual behavior, successful reproduction, and motherhood may be associated with initiation. For example, among the Mende in Sierra Leone, girls symbolically become respected women when they are received into the female sodality (sande). Included in this reception, as the most important pubertal rite, is the clitoridectomy (→ Circumcision). Their status, like that of male initiands in the Poro sodality, is described as that of "those who would procreate."[1] Frequently, the first menstrual blood (menarche), as a symbol of fertility, constitutes the most important point among the rites for girls. On the other hand, menstrual blood is often associated with physical passion, and temporary impurity (→ Purity)—dangerous properties, to be counterbalanced with prescriptions of ritual seclusion and → purification. Western observers have preferred to deal with this state of affairs as male control of female fertility, and it is sometimes criticized.

In societies whose social organization is based on structures of kinship, woman's fertility means that groups of kin to whose line of descendancy the offspring are ordered may grow in economic and political influence. The birth of a child means that the parent may become an ancestor, to receive the corresponding ritual demonstrations of honor. At the same time, the economic and political strength of the network of kinship is reinforced, and the status of the mother increases. Just so, childlessness is often regarded as grounds for divorce, or for the taking of a second wife.

3. Fertility was a key social concern in all pre-modern societies. The fertility of animals and soil guaranteed nourishment through successful hunting, husbandry, and harvests. Human fertility guaranteed the maintenance of the → family, the complex of kinship, and the religious community. Religious rites that symbolically support these elementary wishes are universal. In hunting cultures, rites of regeneration—perhaps as old as the Old Stone Age—effectuate the return of quarry (→ Northern Eurasia/Circumpolar Region; Shamanism; Animal I; Pre- and Early History). Farming cultures developed refined harvest rites, festival cycles, and myths, to promote the growth of crops, and to minimize periods of unfavorable weather (→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic). The rites of the life cycle conferred order on human sexual behavior. Saints, gods, and ritual specialists, as bestowers and intermediaries of the blessing that confers fertility, are present in these societies down to our very today.

Fertility as the potential for regeneration is accomplished, or made visible, in procreation. Here, in symbolical representations of regeneration, the biological propagation of the group, such as biological parenthood, may play a role subordinate to mythic accretions, when, for example, generative reproduction is referred to a primordial creation event. Propagation is then presented not as a biological capacity, but as a faculty that society receives as it follows the moral directions of the ancestors, and holds these ancestors in honor. In reverse, infertility in such a case is categorized as a consequence of moral transgression of the order bequeathed and solemnly imposed by ancestors or other transcendent beings.

Agricultural socieites especially offer metaphorical and symbolical representations of fertility, applied analogously to the areas of 'nature' and 'society.' In Java, in Indonesia, the ripening of the rice and the stages of pregnancy are matched with analogous conceptualizations and ritual acts: thus, with the formation of the ears of rice, the rice is ascribed the longings of pregnancy, and the development of the fetus, like that of the rice plants, stands under the protection of the goddess Devi Sri, for the warding off of insalubrious spirits.

Modern Ideologization and Neo-Mythic Positions

4. Anthropology and the study of folk religion that arose in the late nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, made regeneration and fertility, and their symbolic representations, a focus of the questions that these sciences posed in the history of religions. Stimulated by the social experience of industrialization (→ Industrial Society), together with the journeys to 'nature peoples,' researchers and scholars collected abundant material on the presence of corresponding religious conceptions and rites on the European countryside, just as in extra-European cultures. At the center of their theories—developed mostly in relation to individual discoveries—stood efforts to demonstrate correspondences between, on the one hand, economic, social, and cultural developments of societal organization, and on the other, conceptualizations of the divine (→ Evolutionism). The Judeo-Christian tradition, whose term of reference was their own God of creation, YHWH, had polemicized against the Canaanite religion's fertility cults. But the studies now undertaken afforded the occasion of a positive determination of concepts like 'fertility cult' and 'god,' 'harvest demons' (W. Mannhardt), 'orgiastic' or 'chthonic deities.' Here the connection that these supported between fertile earth and cult of the dead was included. They could also be interpreted as elements that had been incorporated into the Judeo-Christian tradition.

Maya rain ceremony in Yucatán, Mexico. If the rainfall for their cornfields fails, Maya peasants beg rain gods and santos (Span., 'saints') for it. In the open air, within the ceremonial space, a high altar is erected. On its eastern side stands a cross. Farther to the east stands the small altar, for the small but mighty rain god, who resides in the east of the arch of heaven, the direction from which the rain comes. At the four corners of the ceremonial space stand four arches of palm leaves. Under the arches, and east of the small altar, young persons sit on stones, striking the earth with agave leaves and generating sounds like thunderclaps. Beside them and under the high altar sit children, spraying water, which represents the wished-for rain. In the spirit of imitative

Owing not only to the existential meaning or importance of the theme, the interpretational pattern of 'regeneration/fertility' acquired elasticity in terms of the history of reception, which turned out to be problematic when it came to currents of neo-paganism and nature religion. Components of, for example, 'folk piety' in Christian Europe were now interpreted as remnants of the fertility cults of Teutonic and Celtic religion. Local usages, for their part, like May celebrations, or the Tree Blossom Fêtes, whose revitalization or creation emerged in the traditionalizing thrust of industrialization, were idealized in terms of nature mysticism. This pair of phenomena occasioned the metamorphosis of the interpretational pattern of fertility/regeneration into a formula that was undefined, as well as ideologically and mythically open. It could stand in the service of an 'archaizing' conception of religion, or of the 'blood and soil myth' of the National Socialists, or of the models of matriarchal spirituality in today's women's movement. In the discourse of feminism, the female work of reproduction at first registered as a 'biologizing' foundation of the theory and phenomenon of the equal rights that were being refused by a patriarchal 'government.' Thus, since the end of the 1970s, voices have multiplied and become audible that defend women's natural fertility and faculty of birthgiving as a self-defining difference vis-à-vis a 'male practicality-mania in reproductive medicine.' Followers of the new witch cults neo-mythically equate women's procreative capacity to the life-spawning force of the earth, and conceptualize the female body as a means of approach to nature by which woman can generate magical powers. Against the background both of the history of Christianity, and of an industrialized society so lethal for the environment, women's self-concept as witches, magicians, and followers of a mother goddess is the expression of a discourse critical of society and religion, a discourse that unites the beings of nature themselves with the re-mystification of woman as such a being.

Endless Fertility? The Religions in the Face of the Population Explosion and the Agricultural Industry

5. With the introduction of fertilizers, with the husbandry and geno-technological patenting of useful plants and breeds of animals, whose orientation is to secure or maximize a harvest, and with the success of birth hygiene and reproductive medicine ('in vitro fertilization,' 'surrogate mothers,' contraceptives) fertility today seems to have become a calculable quantity (→ Genetic Engineering). On the other hand, economic factors that affect human, animal, and vegetable fertility and regeneration (agricultural production for export, over-exploitation of resources) by fostering population growth, cause global population problems: urbanization and famine. The rationalities of end and value oriented to fertility, which are transmitted in the religions, stand today in a number of different relationships of tension with these developments. They maintain a likewise varied relationship to social modernization processes that seek to react to the consequences of fertility (social-security insurance by government legislation, migration of labor, family-planning programs). The ongoing criticism of the sexual-ethics guidelines of the Vatican—prohibition of prophylactic measures and abortion in the face of a world population of six billion persons by the year 2000—is but one example among these rationalities.

magic, they now imitate the croaking of frogs, heard in the rain. On the high altar stand offerings of food and drink, which are distributed to all participants after the closing ceremony. Before the high altar kneels the priest: he directs his entreaties eastward to the rain gods (cháak) who reside there and in the 'four corners of the sky,' as well as to various 'saints,' of Catholic derivation. Dark clouds loom, indicating a promising closing ceremony. (M. Gabriel)

1. MacCormack 1982, 119.

Literature

Becher, Jeanne (ed.), Women, Religion and Sexuality: Studies on the Impact of Religious Teachings on Women, Geneva 1990; Jacobson-Widding, Anita/van Beek, Walter (eds.), The Creative Communion: African Folk Models of Fertility and the Regeneration of Life, Uppsala 1990; MacCormack, Carol P. (ed.), Ethnography of Fertility and Birth, London 1982; Martin, Emily, The Woman in the Body: A Cultural Analysis of Reproduction, Boston [2]1992; Schlehe, Judith, Das Blut der fremden Frauen, Frankfurt/M. 1987.

→ Abortion/Contraception, Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic, Ancestors, Animal, Forest/Tree, Initiation, Paganism/Neopaganism, Puberty, Ritual, Sacrifice, Sexuality

Claudia Naacke

Reincarnation

Concepts

1. The standard word 'reincarnation' is a coinage of the nineteenth century: it appeared in the movement known as → spiritism, and is based on the term 'incarnation,' the Christian theological 'enfleshment' of the Divine Word as Christ. The concept of reincarnation designates the return of someone's aspect of soul or spirit in another person, or, less frequently, in an animal or a plant. In European thought, for centuries, the → soul itself has stood for this aspect. Only in the nineteenth century, further concepts join the latter, including spirit, ego, and entelechy. The ancient Greek metempsychosis has also been translated as 'transmigration of souls.' 'Rebirth' in Christian tradition means a spiritual 'new birth,' but in the nineteenth century was also applied to Hindu and Buddhist conceptualizations. Since the nineteenth century, the function of retribution for or accounting of guilt or merit has also been designated as karma, in dependence on Indian tradition.

History

2. In Europe, the notion of a renewed embodiment first occurs among the Pre-Socratics. Pythagoras (c. 570–497/496 BCE) is regarded as its ancestor, but was supposedly only the agent of crystallization of circulating concepts of reincarnation. It is disputed in scholarship whether it came from India, or from shamanic context, for example ideas of a journey of the soul, and whether it was inspired by or was the product of an intra-Hellenic development, the differentiation of body and soul. The content of the Pre-Socratic notion is known in sketches: Pythagoras assumed a re-embodiment into animals, Empedocles into both animals and plants. Functions of punishment and atonement usually formed the key soteriological concern.

In antiquity, ideas of reincarnation constituted a repeated theme of intellectual reflection. They are not attested, however, as a theme of popular piety. In Plato, they reinforce the sanction against transgression of the laws, in Virgil they are a metaphor in Aeneas's descent to the underworld, in Lucretius they are a biting satire on contemporary Pythagoreans. In ancient Judaism and Christianity, and accordingly in the Bible, notions of reincarnation are absent. Origen had conceptions of reincarnation imputed to him posthumously, although he had explicitly rejected such.

Since ancient times, there is scarcely any continuity of belief in reincarnation in European religious history. In the twelfth century, reincarnation emerges with the Cathari (→ Heresy), and around 1200 in Kabbalistic Judaism as well, although a connection of the two is improbable. In the → Kabbalah, the gilgul (Heb. 'to roll') achieved some popularity (for example, through Isaac Luria, 1534–1572). In → Hasidism it has lasted to our own day. The religious function could be determined in great variety. With Luria, reincarnation gave meaning to the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, inasmuch as existence abroad, as a temporary ('reincarnatorial') existence, prepared the coming of the Messiah. In → Hasidism, to be caught up in injustices plays an important role, as the return in reincarnation was to create justice or punish injustice for the powerless minority. Jewish notions often possess no system of karma as the logic of a condign reward. Re-embodiment is usually accounted a contingent deed of God.

In Christian Europe, spokespersons for a transmigration of souls were altogether rare. Giordano Bruno's (1548–1600) concept of reincarnation found no echo. Then, finally, through Christian Kabbalists like Franciscus Mercurius van Helmont (1614–1699), transmigration-like notions of Judaism—the 'revolution' of souls (a return in the same body)—were taken up and worked out in his successors to theories of transmigration—partially, presumably, in order to sharpen the consequences of a → predestination to damnation in Calvinism.

The popularization first occurred in the usually anonymous literature of the English "Dissenters." In Germany, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–1781), who had occasionally discussed a transmigration of souls, with the final chapters of his Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (Ger., "Education of the Human Race"; 1780), sparked the public debate. It is with him, at the latest, that the philosophical point of reincarnation is finally 're-set.' Re-embodiment is no longer punishment, but boon, and serves progress.

A bodhisattva, according to the Tibetan Buddhist conceptualization, renounces liberation from the cycle of rebirths, and accepts reincarnation once more. Out of compassion for others, a bodhisattva is re-embodied until all beings are liberated from that cycle. The Tibetan word for the reincarnation of an awakened one is tulku. Beginning in about the twelfth century, the re-embodiment of certain persons was sought. A good many tulkus, before their death, give indications of the place of their future return. Oracles, signs, and dreams help with the search for the right candidate, as a rule a small boy, who must also identify himself, for example by unhesitatingly recognizing, once more, certain persons or objects with whom he has dealt with in his earlier existence. Before China's invasion, tulkus were sought only in Tibet. In exile, the situation is more difficult. This young tulku, whose name is Tenzin Nüden Losang Chöphel, is the reincarnation of South Indian prince and monk Shantideva (in Tib., Shivalha), comes from the eighth century, was born in Jona, in the canton of St. Gaul, Switzerland, and was recognized as the eighth Shivalha Tulku. At the age of eight, he entered Sera, a monastery of the Tibetan exile in South India, where he is receiving his religious formation. Here he is seen in a meditation accommodation that he has built himself, at the lahrang, the domicile of a tulku. (Benita von Behr)

In the nineteenth century, the discussion on reincarnation is charged with the concept of evolution. Reincarnation becomes its spiritual pendant. The most decisive agencies of popularization are Allan Kardec's (1804–1869) → spiritism, along with Helena P. Blavatsky's Theosophy (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). The more illustrious recipients of the history of the Theosophical reception of reincarnation include, for instance, Irish poet William Butler Yeats, or, in Germany, Rudolf Steiner, who in his later years preferred to appeal to non-Theosophical sources.

In the twentieth century, many religious communities represent conceptualizations of reincarnation, for example → Scientology, Universal Life, or the Lectorium Rosicrucianum. A large market appeared for 'reincarnation therapies.' Attempts to demonstrate reincarnation empirically (Ian Stevenson is a serious representative) are not extensively followed by scientific → parapsychology. According to (rather unreliable) demoscopic deductions, some ten to twenty percent of the inhabitants of Europe and America in the 1980s and 1990s believed in reincarnation.

3. In oral religions, notions of reincarnation are found in which 'rebirths,' usually limited to the family clan, are to be read as models of vitalistic participation, in which parts of a collective life force are re-embodied. In Hinduism, the idea of reincarnation finally appears in religious history in about the eighth to the sixth centuries BCE, and in Buddhism, rebirth holds a key meaning, and has attained an effect that marks society (exceptions: China, Japan, Bali).

In Hinduism, the concept finally prevailed of an individual soul (in Skt., atman) that lasts beyond death, and that takes up a new body. The → Buddha's philosophy of 'no-self' (anatman), on the other hand, has its point of departure in a rebirth without an abiding subject, where only the five groups of corporeal and spiritual phenomena (skandha) emerge at the beginning of a new life. In place of such an 'incarnating' self, the conception of causal effects between two lives, or life courses, is taught. They consist of the ethically relevant activities of the will (samsara) in works, words, and thoughts, that in their totality, called karma, lead to rebirth. In Hinduism and Buddhism, the idea of karma was expanded in comprehensive structures of thought, in which the consequences of a deed (karma) were thought out. Here, a logic of retribution for good or bad deeds dominates, with positive or negative consequences in the present and in a new existence. The doctrine of karma is conceptually shaped as an impersonal juridical norm, to which, in Buddhist concepts, the very gods are subjected. Contrariwise, karmic guilt could be diminished or removed with the help of the bodhisattvas, or by the transfer of karmic merit. In the Hindu spirituality of Bhakti, even the inevitability of the karmic logic in the 'cycle of births' could be eliminated, by surrender, and gift of self, to God. The 'subject' of reincarnation can be differently, even contrarily, conceived. In Tibet, reincarnation serves to select the religio-political elite: the Dalai Lama and other important lamas are determined by reincarnation (→ Lamaism). In Islam, conceptualizations of reincarnation are found in the Shia, which hand down many probably ancient gnostic motifs.

4. The fact that, in Europe, notions of reincarnation long found no echo, is to be explained by the hegemony of a Judeo-Christian thought in which the dualism of soul and body required for re-embodiment was rejected, and the human being totally 'resurrects.' Reincarnation is ordinarily accepted only in view of an interpretation of injustice and suffering as consequences of an earlier life (→ Theodicy). In modernity, the Western tradition was radically re-coded on this point: reincarnation is no longer read as punishment, but as good fortune. It is also fundamentally distinguished from Hindu tradition: while, in Asia, redemption is read as an ascent from the cycle of rebirths, in Europe and North America today the entry into a new birth is often interpreted as part of a religion of self-realization. The current appeal, furthermore, may lie in the option of conceiving progress as something beyond the grave, as well, and thus of 'proving' reincarnation, and thereby → 'immortality,' through memories of earlier lifetimes. The price of ideas of resurrection is, for one thing, the relativization of the body to the point of enmity to the body, since only the spiritual element maintains identity vis-à-vis the interchangeable body. As far as reincarnation into animals and plants is concerned (which modern ideas usually preclude, in the West, owing to that culture's progressive orientation), these concepts do not ordinarily come to bear. Of course, pressure can arise in favor of an attention to nonhuman nature and a concern for it. Social and political effects of thoughts of reincarnation are practically unknown in the West. Conversely, for India, the supposition is discussed—and Indians also propose—that rebirths and their million-fold repetition in the cyclical theories may contribute to social passivity.

Literature

Kaplan, Steven J. (ed.), Concepts of Transmigration: Perspectives on Reincarnation, Lewiston 1996; O'Flaherty, Wendy Doniger (ed.), Karma and Rebirth in Classical Indian Traditions, Berkeley 1980; Sachau, Rüdiger, Westliche Reinkarnationsvorstellungen. Zur Religion in der Moderne, Gütersloh 1996; Schmidt-Leukel, P. (ed.), Die Idee der Reinkarnation in Ost und West, Munich 1996; Zander, Helmut, Geschichte der Seelenwanderung in Europa. Alternative religiöse Traditionen von der Antike bis heute, Darmstadt 1999.

→ Buddhism, Esotericism, Heresy, Hinduism, Immortality, Lamaism, New Age, Progress, Psyche, Scientology, Soul, Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society

Helmut Zander

Relics (Veneration of)

1. Relics (Lat. reliquiae, 'leavings'), in the religious understanding of the term, are remains having a relation to the Holy. Thus, especially in Christian veneration of relics, 'memorial pieces' of chief figures, or of figures who have served as models of Christian life or Christian death (saints and martyrs), such as their blood, bones, or ashes (primary, or 'first-class' relics), are reverenced or venerated. Relics of the second order, or relics of touch, are objects with which the saints, or the primary relics, have come in contact. These include objects of use, martyrs' tools or clothing. Relics are ascribed a God-given power or efficacy that acquires an influence on persons by way of seeing, touching (kissing), or through invocation of the saint. Functionally, relics are means of help that are supposed to guarantee defense in time of danger (storms, war), and healing in illness, and to serve as pledge and surety at the Last Judgment.

2. a) A precursor of the Christian veneration of relics was the ancient cult of heroes in Greece, where the relics of the heroes were deemed to secure the city. In early Christianity, the religious self-concept of the communities was directed toward the tombs of the saints or martyrs. For one thing, God, according to early Christian tradition, protected his faithful by patrocinia, 'patronages'; for another, the Eucharist might therefore be celebrated only atop the tomb of a martyr. Bodily relics, then, were connected with every altar: the latter served at once as tomb and as sacrificial place. In order to accommodate a growing demand, beginning in the eleventh century, the fractioning of the relics was justified if no injury or sacrilege had been done them, in which case, just as their efficacy was maintained in the 'entire and integral body,'[1] so also did it abide in the smallest parts. The wish to possess a relic soon led to a thriving commerce, such as, for example, with supposed splinters of the Holy Cross ('Jesus relics'), preserved in amulets.

Privileged members of the Brotherhood of Mary from the pilgrimage place of Kevelaer (Germany) bear the reliquary housing the relics of Saints Ludger and Willibrord (1980). The tradition of the procession of relics, with a typical frame for bearing a shrine, has been preserved to our own day.

"Elvis poured out his soul for you, and NOW you can let his PERSPIRATION be an INSPIRATION." The words of a good-luck greeting card by Maiden Jest, Inc. are theological 'directions for use.' They render the 'sweat-filled' plastic capsule a parody, in the extreme, of the ancient practice of the veneration of the relic. Blood containers, such as that of the blood of Saint Januarius venerated in and around Naples, or tear-containers, are found especially in Catholic worship. Believers ('fans'), saints, and magical objects testify reciprocally: the cloudy fluid here, purportedly a bodily secretion of rock singer Elvis Presley (1935–1977), 'hears prayers,' 'fulfills dreams,' and provides 'inspiration.' Pars pro toto, it refers to the erstwhile bearer of such gifts ('charismata'), who, through these things, posthumously rises to the status of miracle man. Indeed, not only that, but Elvis's body registers a rich allusion: with the help of the New Testament Christology, it recalls the 'Body of the Lord'; his perspiration is his soul, poured out for us, his community of fans (see Matt 26:28)—a soul whose location, in sweat, is rather unorthodox, but which recalls Elvis's ultra-energetic (for the time) stage performances. Indeed, fans are to know that "the King lives," and that—in accordance with the motto, Credo quia absurdum (Lat., "I believe because it is in breach of reason"; Tertullian)—precisely in their belief in the relic, they can feel themselves to be true, indeed the most dedicated of, believers ('most devoted fans'). Thus, the decision

A typical example of transregional traffic in relics is represented by the transference of the relics of the Three Wise Men from the East to Milan, and thence to the Cathedral of Cologne (1164). The 'translation' to the altar was always preceded by exhumation ('Elevation'). Other relics of the cathedral were set forth in the Shrine of the Three Wise Men (a reliquary) as well. These constituted the purpose of profitable pilgrimages, and were an expression of the claim to legitimacy, and aspiration to prestige, of bishops and kings. Only if the relics worked miracles, however, did the believer see in them the 'really present' twin existence of the saints: as helpers on earth, and as patrons and guardians in heaven.

b) Humanist Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466 [1469?]–1536) launched the critique of the veneration of relics. Reformers such as Luther and Calvin addressed themselves polemically ("veneration of the devil!") to an outgrowth such as the hoarding of remains in 'collections of relics.' The Council of Trent (1545–1563) countered this with an emphasis on the fundamental legitimacy of a veneration of relics, as it was directed not to the relics themselves, but to the person destined for resurrection, in whom the Holy Spirit dwelt, and who had worked miracles.

After a brief revival in the Catholic popular piety of the nineteenth century, the veneration of relics has played rather a subordinate role in the Catholic Church today. Nevertheless, the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) held to the usage of the veneration and the introduction of relics into the table of the altar: even in today's church law, every → altar must include a sepulcrum ['grave'] of relics; however, the sale of relics is prohibited and the 'translation' countenanced only with Rome's concurrence.

In Buddhism, the veneration of relics began with that of the corporeal relics of the Buddha himself, whose ashes were interred in eight relic containers (stupa). The Buddha's footprint and especially the relics of his tooth, in Sri Lanka, are still today the popular objects of many pilgrimages (→ Buddha). In Lamaism, it is especially the relics of the Dalai Lama, in his various reincarnations, that are venerated. In Islamic religion, it is especially the footprints and beard-hair of Mohammed, as well as the turbans of great saints, that enjoy veneration.

whether the fluid relic is a product of commercial tastelessness, a cynical parody, or a wonder-working talisman, also remains a matter of faith. (Hubert Mohr)

3. One hears practically nothing today about the veneration of relics from the side of the Church. Small memorial relics of the departed are tolerated; a macabre, discomfiting traffic in relics is avoided. But the auction of a relic of the Cross of Christ (with "Certificate of Authenticity") was reported in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, of May 15, 1993: "The relic was offered at auction by successors of emissaries of Napoleon III, the latter having received [it] as a gift from the Patriarch of Jerusalem. After an opening bid of 10,000 F, offers shot up, via two telephone lines, to a final figure of 100,000 F. The splinter of the Cross was said to have been transferred, with the disapproval of the Archdiocese of Paris, to a local church, and the ransom to have been donated to a social institution."

In Catholic sacred practice, especially in the Mediterranean countries, relics are connected with local, traditional piety, as they have always been. For example, the question of the actual authenticity of the Shroud of Turin scarcely applies a brake to that relic's ongoing veneration today, and this constitutes a profitable economic factor for the city of Turin and for the Church. Today, however, instead of the earlier blind faith in the power of relics, it is the moral (ethical) function of the saint's example that is recalled by these sacred objects. The secular now seems to be reconcilable with the religious: relics evince the character of a symbol, and it is the social salvific role of the saints that is emphasized. But other personalities shift into their place today, such as pop stars (Elvis; see illus.), political leaders (Lenin),[2] and media celebrities (Princess Diana). The need for idols and their marketing for economic or political purposes through the mass media leads to today's modern veneration of persons, in which the grave, the mausoleum, and thus once more the relics, are objects of reverence.

1. Angenendt 1997, 149.
2. Zbarskij, Ilja, Lenin's Embalmers, London 1998.

Literature

Angenendt, Arnold, Heilige und Reliquien. Die Geschichte ihres Kultes vom frühen Christentum bis zur Gegenwart, Munich 1997; Dinzelbacher, Peter/Bauer, Dieter (eds.), Heiligenverehrung in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Ostfildern 1990; Finucane, Ronald C., Miracles and Pilgrims: Popular Beliefs in Medieval England, London 1977; Rollason, David W., Saints and Relics in Anglo-Saxon England, Oxford 1989.

→ Amulet, Body, Magic, Materiality, Pilgrimage, Popular Culture, Procession, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult, Veneration of the Saints

Marcus Raach

Religion

The Power of Definition

1. a) The boundary between what religion is and is not, has important effects: it excludes it from undeserved privileges, and lays out its concerns as either illegitimate or unlawful. These issues arise in the debates over 'fundamentalism,' Islamic religious education, or over 'sects and cults,' as, for example, in the disagreement over whether Scientology is a religion or a (criminal) 'economic undertaking.' An example may clarify the point. In December 1992, Hindus destroyed a mosque, in Ayodhya, in India (→ Indian Subcontinent). There were then weeks of street fighting, with many deaths. → Hinduism is regarded as a peaceful religion, while → Islam is often seen as potentially aggressive. Here, then, what happened was precisely the reverse: Hindus destroyed a sanctuary, and killed people: Muslims are the victims. When these Hindu fundamentalists appeal to religion, do they then abuse the designation of 'religion'? According to both the Indian Constitution and the 'essence' of Indian religion, there ought to be no → fundamentalism.[1] Yet there is. The foundations must be interrogated: Mahatma → Gandhi had given a religious sense or meaning to the Indian democracy that had been created on the Western model (the essence of Hinduism, held Gandhi, is nonviolence)—that was the condition of the British for their withdrawal. This was an appeal to a → tradition that had already long grounded a religious opposition to British rule, as well as an opposition to the Muslims: the prohibition of killing cows, the 'sacred' cow. Reverence for every living being, ahimsa, of course, sounds much better to the Western ear. Furthermore, he punctured the traditional division, in Hinduism's social system, of the → caste system: according to a strict definition of Hinduism, the caste system excludes the 'untouchables' (*dalit*s) from the religion of the Brahmins, as from the rest of this society with its orientation to caste. Only ascetics, the sadhus, are not bound to the local, caste-determined, order. Gandhi took up the principle of the ascetics that shattered caste: that exception was then explained as the essence of the religion. Thus, even the dalits can be regarded as having equal rights. Gandhi called them harijans ('children of God'). This interpretation provided a religious solution for the danger that the 'untouchables' might be converted to the religions in which 'before God, all are equal'—to Islam or to Christianity. Gandhi's formula is a daring one, created for the purpose of linking Hinduism and → democracy. It signifies an enormous change in religion. On the other side, the fundamentalists, as well, can appeal to a religious tradition: that of the warrior caste, with its mythical God-King, Rama. Four hundred years before, the Muslims had happened to build their mosque on the legendary birth-site of this human form of the God Krishna!

b) In confrontation with other religions, the self-concept of a religion changes. The examples of Ayodhya and Gandhi show that the object of an academic study of religion is the given historical and local form of that religion, and not a form such as might spring up in terms of the wish of the modern Western observer, or in terms of what is declared to be precisely its 'essence.' Religions are not all peace-loving by essence: wars, too, are founded on religion. The attempt to determine religions according to their ideal concept, and to dismiss historical upshots as an abuse, is an attractive defense, especially at the hands of those who practice religion as a profession. The defense is a facile one, when the 'essence' of a religion is deemed to be that of one's own side, while the effects of the religion of the other side are adjudged evil. For a discipline aiming at historical description, then, religion must be determined otherwise.

'Religion'—a Word and Its History

2. a) But is there not, after all, something common to all religions—something that could be called 'religion'? The word that so self-evidently escapes our lips in Europe and America today has a long history, and a history principally European. For the Romans, religio especially denoted ritual precision. Being religious, 'having religion,' did not mean believing correctly, but performing acts such as sacrifice or oracles (sacra et auspicia) at the right point in time and in the right series of parts: religio, id est cultus deorum (Lat., "Religio, that is, the worship/cult of the gods").[2] Proverbially, the 'augur's smile' is that of the specialists who preside over the 'tricks.' Superstitio, then, the counter-term to 'religion,' was not aberrant belief, as it is usually translated, but aberrant activity, wrongly performed, exaggerated, often excessive or unauthorized. The meaning of practical divine reverence was taken over by Christianity, and even remained in the Middle Ages, when the practitioners of the monastic form of life in orders—as in Catholicism to this day—were religiosi, in a special meaning of 'religious.' In medieval discourse, religio was a designation for foreign religiones, especially for the Abrahamitic ones. In Christian theological discussion, however, it was always employed to a considerable degree, but had less importance for the 'Christian religion,' until the modern age, than did fides, 'faith,' 'belief,' 'loyalty,' or even devotio, 'piety,' or ecclesia, 'Church.' Two lines of interpretation mark modern times. For one, with the Reformation, 'religion,' a "concept of difference" (J. Matthes), received new meaning—one that marked it off from what was magical, from incorrect devotional action, especially in the sense of Catholic devotion. At the same time, with the Enlightenment, 'religion' became a 'general' concept of 'natural religion' (David Hume), or 'religion of reason,' itself standing behind, and as a concept standing above, 'individual religion.'

b) 'Religion' in the singular, as a general concept, first emerges—just as 'history' comes to replace 'histories'—in the late Enlightenment. 'Religion' was thought of as designating a 'whole,' imperfect in its respective phenomena, and deformed in its historical realizations. The normative aspect of this fiction of one religion impugns really existing religions in terms of a critique—and makes religion 'in itself' unimaginable, since there exists no corresponding reality. On the other hand, this idea of the one religion—and (consistently enough) of the one God, revealed in the form of the respective gods, YHWH, the Christian 'God of love,' or Allah, supplies a utopian potential that—as in Lessing's parable of the ring (Nathan der Weise, Ger., "Nathan the Wise"; 1779)[3]—could be turned and applied humanly against any totalitarian appropriation, or attempted missionizing, of a tradition.

Furthermore, the concept contributes to a critique of Christianity in the sense that, since there is now a unitary history of religion, religion is conceptualized as developing in steps (→ Evolutionism): from (1) 'primitive' forms of fear of the dead, and of spirits lurking in every tree, spawn offspring of a nature religion or a 'primitive' → animism , to (2) national religion that can imagine God only if he battles for his people, and who takes his sacred dwelling place in the capital of the land, to (3) the world religions that conceive of God as dematerialized and spiritualized, and dwelling in transcendence.[4] Now Christianity has lost its exclusive position, indeed, and has been inserted into a global 'world history,' one that transcends the biblical—to the very point that imperialism can be grounded in religious terms. And at the goal of its development stands the individual and his and her soul, in familiar communion, for which there was no more need of intermediaries (priests, sacraments)—the 'mysticism of modernity,' Protestantism in ideal form. Granted, this course opens the gates to other forms of a critique of Christianity, which conceptualize the 'religion of the future' pantheistically, monistically, or esoterically.

Incomparable Religion? The Comparative Problem

c) Religion, in terms of what comes to light through the history of the word, is a concept of → European history of religion. Consequently—as has been forcefully indicated in recent years—it has been formulated from the viewpoint of a Western-ancient-Christian vantage. More exactly: it is a concept of 'Christian object-speech,' that is applied 'exclusivistically' (H.-M. Haußig) within that speech. However, 'religious' science has taken up the legacy, albeit critical, of these tradition(s), and applied 'religion' as a comparative concept of 'meta-speech in religious studies' (B. Gladigow). As a result, that science at once finds itself exposed to the reproach of being Eurocentric, monopolizing, and inclusivistic, and now it seeks pronouncements and draws comparisons bearing on the relations and structures on the far side of this mental and linguistic space: each foreign culture, and, indeed, foreign religion, gets its own label. On the other hand, if one walks the path of a consistent relativism, and limits one's argumentation by a recognition of the immanence of each respective culture, then the Christian religion produces a multiplicity of self-images that cannot easily be brought over a common denominator. Now, instead of reducing 'religion' to the least common denominator, it seems more reasonable to observe and describe each distinct model of religion in the other cultures in its cultural differentiation and its other delineation. Thus, Hinduism presents the Sanskrit word dharma, whose spectrum reaches from '(world) order' to '(caste) order.' Its signification arose in the Vedic era from the mythic notion of the "power of the gods to maintain the world in being" (cf. root dhr, 'hold,' 'support'), and was later referred, concretely and exclusivistically, to the ritual and social order of Hinduism, especially the → caste system. The Buddhist concept, in its Pali orthography dhamma, addressed the Buddha's 'eightfold path,' and thus was a self-designation; but it could then mean the doctrinal systems of individual masters as well, and—in a generalized and comparative sense—the law and teaching of other religions.

In Judaism, again, one of the models of religion is that of a contract between God and his people, the 'Covenant' (in Heb., b^erit). In the course of history, the conditions of that contract were repeatedly broken; nevertheless, from his side, God kept the Covenant and renewed it. The Christian version of the "New Testament" could only be connected with the renewal: the Covenant with the Jews is never abrogated. The juridical character of 'religion' generated an altogether different pattern of what counted for 'profane,' and what for 'sacred.' What stood in the foreground was not the salvation of the individual, but that of the people.

If we take these examples seriously (and other designations, as well, circulated in the religions that we have cited), then, by reason of the diversity and varying span of the prevailing designations of 'self' and 'foreign,' the institution of an inter-culturally valid definition of religion turns out to be impossible.

b) Since there is no supra-cultural and supra-historical concept of religion, scientific investigation can no longer select, a priori, by virtue of such a definition, what is religious or nonreligious in a culture. Religion can then be researched only as a 'part in the whole' of culture (Fr., histoire totale), with the multiplicity of methods of cultural science. Religious juridical determinations are part of the respective history of law; religious images are only part of the 'art' that subsists in the whole of the respective culture. Comparisons are meaningful, then, not when they reduce to identity, but precisely when they observe the differential as well. Accordingly, the attempt of today's comparative study of religions, with a model proposed by linguistic philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, seems altogether plausible: not to think of 'religion' as an 'essentially' established quantity, but as a merger of similar significations, a 'family,' that possesses a kind of system of kinship—'family resemblances'—with one another.[5] In a similar manner, Dutch scholar of religion Jacques Waardenburg conceptualizes religion as an 'open concept.'[6] To be sure, the question then remains, by what means such a family can be recognized. One answer: by a catalog of criteria that distinguishes 'dimensions,' or 'components' within a 'system of religion,' and follows their occurrence, their connection, and their social dynamics.

Religion as System and Construct

3. a) A Christian experiences and lives 'Christianity' in many ways:

- One receives a knowledge, hears the biblical stories and myths, learns sentences and expressions by heart, and then knows them as one's 'faith';
- One learns by way of a register of sins (Ten Commandments, 'list of sins' for confession), upbringing and social control, the difference between 'good' and 'evil,' and behavior in the (religious or secular) community;
- One takes part in devotion and rituals, attends divine service on Sundays, participates in the Lord's Supper or goes to Communion, prays at meals;
- One belongs to a society, a 'religious community,' by baptism and membership in a specific parish or church, in which—by free contribution or church tax—one must pay membership contributions; one belongs to a church community, in which one meets persons of the same mold and attitude, and who provide succor in need, but one regards oneself as a 'vis-à-vis' of the pastor, bishop, nun, or pope, → specialists with theological, pastoral, and ritual professional knowledge; indeed, with appropriate additional formation, can oneself assume offices;
- One sees the sacred ornamentation, hears the ringing bells and the sermons, drinks of the Eucharistic cup, feels the 'Kiss of Peace,' recognizes 'God's house' by the Cross, and the Christian mind by the fish symbol on automobile bumpers, and enjoys the frescos of a baroque church, the homemade Christmas crib, the choir, Bach's "Passion according to Matthew";
- One feels 'uplifted' at a solemn service, swept into the solidarity of care for the elderly or the needy, consoled by Christian burial, euphoric as a member of the great mass of persons assisting at the closing ceremony of a Church Day.

It is American sociologists of religion Charles W. Glock, Rodney Stark, and Ninian Smart who, in the course of their research into religious attitudes and behaviors, have systematized such 'dimensions of religiosity' (Glock and Stark):

- The intellectual, ideological, or cognitive dimension: the system of belief, its narrative structure in the stories of the gods in mythology (→ Myth/Mythology), its rational penetration and systematization through → theology, its memorized compendia in confessional formulas, songs, maxims and dicta, dogmas—in short, religious knowledge and the resulting worldview;
- The dimension of social ethics: Certain values, norms, and patterns of behavior are interiorized with the help of rules for action, but also imitated by way of upbringing, legendary models, and behavior in the group; these are constantly practiced, and finally lead to attitudes and manners of living determined by religion;

- The ritual dimension: symbolical actions that develop in simple rite (→ Prayer/Curse; Proskynesis), or in the elaborated forms of ritual and cult;
- The institutional dimension: the formal or informal structure of the community that has been created: association, religious society, brotherhood or sisterhood, union, order, circle—its legal status and inner organization, especially the distinction between clergy (functionaries) and → specialists on the one side, and laity on the other;
- The aesthetic dimension: for one thing, the sensory and perceptual element of the religion—its colors, scents, and fabrics, its spaces and landscapes (→ Perception); for another, the symbolical system, with group emblems (crescent, Star of David, cross), special images, the historical supply of devotional images and iconographical formulae, and the ritual gestures, with artistic creations such as architecture, works of music, poetry in hymns, and edifying literature (→ Art; Symbol/Sign/Gesture);
- The psychic dimension: → emotions and 'moods' generated and lived out in cult and ritual, wishes and hopes awakened, confidence (for example, in a life after death) received, experiences of identity, concern for others (→ Charitable Organizations), but also such feelings and experiences, of an extreme and extraordinary kind, as isolation, experiences of union (unio mystica), and hallucinations.

Definitions

It is not difficult to recognize, from this—admittedly ideal-typical—model, that attempts to define religion are ordinarily limited to one of the following dimensions or components:

- Religion is 'faith': a Weltanschauung ('worldview') or a 'belief system' that, "through signs and actions, mobilizes the feelings and volitions of human striving;[7]
- Religion is 'church': an organization that—especially in → Catholicism—seeks to render it self-evident that it is the sole salvific instance and sacred government ('hierarchy');
- Religion is 'ritual action': "interaction with culturally postulated superhuman beings";[8]
- Religion is 'ethics': a store of ethical maxims and axioms;
- Religion is a 'symbolic system': a cultural 'text' (C. Geertz), or a communications system (N. Luhmann, F. Stolz, B. Gladigow);
- Religion is 'feeling': an 'oceanic' thing (→ Freud, according to R. Schickele), a tremendum and fascinosum (R. Otto), a sense of being overwhelmed and subjected ('complete dependency'; Schleiermacher).

Evidently, these determinations are reductionistic. They extract a single facet of the overall spectrum of religious facts and concrete behaviors, and often reveal more about the person and position of the one making the definition than about the object. Besides, they make such powerful abstractions that only the faintest glimmer of daily social intercourse with religion, and of its compass, actually shines through.

Religion as Scientific Construct

b) 'Religion,' then, is an umbrella concept. It packages the components and expressions of a combined field of facts, and molds an ideal type, a heuristic framework, a search screen, with whose help, among other things, religious studies can define and circumscribe its object. It is only in recent years that research has recognized the constructive and imaginative character of the concept of religion, and has ordered it within the broader, whole context of projection mechanisms, stereotypes, and 'social construction of reality'

(Berger/Luckmann). But it is not exhausted in this. The provocative declaration: "there is no data for religion. Religion is solely the creation of the scholar's study" (J. Z. Smith)[9] overlooks the fact that the word, concept, and thing 'religion' are also available outside the ivory tower. Not only is it found as colloquial and literary discourse (not to forget that of the tract and the pamphlet, or the audiovisual discourse of the television documentary), 'religion' also possesses, as word of correct speech, a tradition that reaches back into antiquity, and is present today in, for instance, juridical concepts like 'religious society' or → 'freedom of religion.'

Religion as Identity

4. Religion as a system asks for comparison, analogies, and correspondences, to the point of constraining the system. Experiences of lived religion do not always easily fit it. The difference between my religion and the system of religion together with its systematic sponsors can be experienced as a helpful interpretation of my identity in the context of the community, but can also seem to be a compression and a confinement.

(a) Religions installing priests as supreme authority have a low estimate of the ability and competence of the—unofficial—'laity.' The religion of the 'people' (in Gk., laós, whence 'laity') is utilized (wrongly) as a form of religion, and thereby distinguished from the true religion of the specialists, which is an expropriation of 'my' religion.

(b) In the opposite direction, one recognizes in Jewish religion the 'portable homeland' (Heinrich Heine)—the capacity received by every Jew at birth to qualify as a Jew through religion. Thus, according to the Christian self-image, which appeals here to Paul the Jew, religion was precisely not directed to laws, which it would be fearful to observe. However, Jews speak, for example in Ps 1, of their "delight [. . .] in the law." In their observance of the everyday rules of eating and clothing, the rules for festival days, and so on, is contained their membership in the community, even abroad, or even in a hostile environment. The Sabbath as a day of rest is a law—however, at the same time it is a gift, and is conferred not only on companions of the faith, but on slaves and on work animals (→ Sunday/Sabbath).

Crises, Routines, Alternatives

c) In crises, religion comes into competition with alternatives, when the usual means fall short—the rituals and routines that religion offers for the defeat of adversity. Or a crise may arise if, on religious grounds, such rituals are simply not offered, such as divorce in Western Christianity. In this situation, alternatives have a certain amount of 'luck,' including the sort prohibited by official religion (→ Magic). But reliance on traditional religion needs to be preserved in the everyday, if it is to be of support in times of crisis as well.

d) The customary definition of religion in sociology today implies the charge of religion as ultimate instance in questions concerning the sense of human life. When death renders all plans 'incidental,' religion offers a meaning against the 'coincidence'; religion is supposed to be an instrument for 'coping with contingency,' then. This analysis renders religion once more a marginal phenomenon—but not a vehicle of identity within life and the community, in a 'certified' system of interpretation that promises each individual person the competency to shape the world. In most religions, homo faber (Lat., 'the human being as artisan') and God's concurrence, prosperity as god's blessing, do not oppose, but confirm each other. Ascetical movements are not the whole religion: they can only exist in symbiosis with wealthy communities to support them, and offer the wealthy an opportunity to 'do a good deed.'

Religion as Communicative Act: Social Formation and Sitz im Leben

5. In order to inquire as to, or into, 'religion' in society, one must inquire as to, or into, human beings: their needs, wishes, cares, and especially their social acts. After all, the social formation of religion takes form and Sitz im Leben, as a part of societal activity.

Religion as Social Pattern for Act and Attitude (Behavior)

a) Religion does not exist in a 'vacuum,' but always as a 'social act' (É. Durkheim)—as part of societal activity. When Muslims gather for Friday prayer, when Jehovah's Witnesses offer a religious tract for sale on a street corner, when a Buddhist convert withdraws to a remote place on an estate for his or her meditation 'retreat,' when the pilgrimage to Lourdes gets under way, when the professor of theology sends his publisher the files for his next book, when the Sunday morning service is broadcast on the radio, or when a Santeria devotee lights a candle to keep the police from tracking him—these are always acts certified as religious in terms of the self-image of the participants and their environment (they are 'signs of' religion)—which, on the other hand, by being executed, once more generate religion, make it visible, and make it conveyable. They are 'signs for' religion.[10] Religion, in all of its historical manifestations, is constituted by way of the social activity of its members (and of those who come into association with them). To put it another way: religion appears in daily intercourse ('interaction'). That is, it arises by way of the constant interpretations, positions taken, decisions, perceptions, and gestures through which, as actors of society and of its groups and organizations, persons interact, make their opinions, interests, and needs understandable, divulge them, and even try to establish them. Thus, religion is not a 'depth-dimension' of human existence and being (P. Tillich), but a respectively historical and culture-specific means that allows one belonging to a religion to express and convey anthropological 'depth-dimensions,' and, in the course of his or her life, to share them with others, in the spirit of community. Religions offer a forum in which feelings are expressed, and in which opinions are acknowledged and cemented, but also are called into question—where community is produced, at times 'over the heads' of outsiders and minorities. Religions provide means of expression for giving symbolic expression to nonreligious ('pre-religious') experiences, and the coincidences and accidents of common life, and for enacting them. In religious communities and religious systems, members find rules, norms, and values—in general, 'patterns'—that make their lives easier (or, should they fail to do so, then 'make them hell'); patterns for interpretation that provide cognitive means for imbedding environment, temporal conjunctures, and life story in a 'meaningful whole'; patterns for acts that ritually guide the behavior of the individual, make the latter a respected member of a group, by way of good behavior, and, in given cases, promise him or her, by way of compensation, a reward after death; patterns of orientation that set goals, and give—mythical, theological, and ritual—responses to the ultimate questions of whither, whence, and for what purpose; patterns of experience that take up and thematize life situations and occurrences, as well as offering a platform for feelings, from 'exulting to the sky' (→ Feasts and Celebrations), to 'affliction unto death' (Christian Holy Week, Shia Ashura; → Iran), and indeed, produce such feelings, to the very point of the limit experience.

Religion as Discourse

b) Inasmuch as religion is constituted by way of social acts, and thus is interactively produced reality, it belongs to the social communications process as a whole. In the latter, it forms a 'meaning province,' or 'symbolical universe' (Berger/Luckmann), with an independent 'reality theory' (A. Schütz), and a 'cognition style' (H. Knoblauch), with its own content, themes, symbolical route-indicators, and vehicles. In brief, it forms a communicative repertoire, supported in media and institutions, of signs, acts, and enunciations—a 'discourse.' In order to determine the content of the → 'discourse that is religion,' and thus bound it off from other societal discourses, for example the political or the aesthetic, we must say: religion is the name for speech about the 'last things,' the ultimate things—about ultimate foundations ('legitimizations'), basic assumptions ('axioms'), binding rules for living ('maxims') and commandments—and the interactive presentation of this speech to view. Religion as discourse supplies a framework of designation and presentation of the spatial ('utopia': place of desire, the 'beyond'), temporal ('eternity'), cognitive ('the absolute'), and normative ('God's commandments') abolition of a frontier, the crossing ('transcending') and surpassing of social normality. It is manifested by agents ('actors') who present a certain role-activity related to religion, such as preacher, shaman, or monk. Formally, 'religion' means 'asymmetrical communication' (P. Watzlawick) with determinate partners—God, saints, demons of illness, totem-ancestors—or with → collective representations ('nation'). Religion means a communication ultimately produced only by the reality addressed: heaven becomes real when the pastor speaks of it, or when an angel wafts down from it in the Passion play; the sacrificial act, the soothsayer's interpretation of signs proves the existence of the gods.

But in the 'religious framework,' to act also means to speak and act 'in the name of the Lord,' with the authority and legitimization of an ultimate instance. The appeal to religion, then, is that to a source of legitimization beyond scrutiny or control. Formulated as a claim on rights, this arrangement can lead to significant privileges—or, in case of conflict, to turbulence (as the biographies of the Hebrew Bible prophets or the debate over → Scientology show quite adequately).

The 'discourse that is religion' bears on 'reality beyond control,' then: persons, personifications, and powers that are dependent on the role-activity of those participating in the discourse. Thus, that discourse has its preferential usefulness as a strategy of immunization: the 'Holy,' the 'mystery of faith,' is exempt from criticism and logical thinking—indeed, it is precisely as paradox that it is ultimately valid. "I believe because it is absurd"—in Lat., Credo quia absurdum (Tertullian)—"too good not to be true" (Chesterton). The code, 'religion,' and its derivations can just as well be an expression of the most intimate feelings as—qua a paragraph of blasphemy—a social technological instrument of 'power-guaranteed interiority.'

Internal and External Pluralism

c) Religions are lived in contexts that always have their alternatives:

(1) Alternatives in the form of non-religious institutions: For example, in ancient Greece, for healing from a disease, besides the 'healing houses' of the god Asclepius, and the protective capacity of the 'cleansing' god Apollo, there was the 'profane' or secular 'school medicine' of the Hippocratics, who were held together by a professional ethos—the 'Hippocratic oath.' Or, alongside traditional Indian medicine—for example, the system of the Ayurveda, which is closely tied to religion—stands the Western 'apparatus medicine' and 'medicinal medicine' that was introduced by the English in the colonial period.

(2) Alternatives in the form of alternative religious rituals: There can be distinct religious solutions for the same problem. In order to receive assistance for an imminent decision, God can be directly interrogated, in → prayer, or by the reading of Sacred Scripture; or a clergyman can be sought for counsel; or a look into the horoscope of the morning paper may seem directly related to the person making the inquiry; or home rituals, such as the use of the pendulum, can authenticate rationally determined decisions, or reverse them—or even, as in many ancient practices of divination, dismantle them—if they seem unfavorable.

These examples show that → pluralism is internal to religion as well, and not only to secular entities and phenomena. Even in scriptural religions, with a strict canonization, simultaneous alternatives remain available, whose relationships can be referred to distinct communities ('vehicles') within the religion—the various corpora in the Jewish Torah, the four gospels, the Hadith to the Qur'an—and especially to the appropriation of religion in everyday religious life. After all, each believer creates a personal approach to religion, by learning, developing, and appropriating its respective doctrines and practices. Of course, she or he does not stay as passive as the vassal in Kafka's famous parable of the porter, but—much to the chagrin of many a guardian of the faith and systematizing scholar—creates a personal image of God and the world. Owing to their tortuous nature, the results—religion as practiced, and private mythologies—are frequently only summarily filed as 'popular,' 'folk,' and → 'private religion.' Thus, it is this everyday religious availability to local adaptation, amalgamation, → translation, and transformation of abstract or general 'givens'—along with frictions that may appear—that religion begets and bears. Here, brooding master shoemaker Jacob Böhme at Görlitz is only an extreme case in the records. Granted, the multitude of followers itself puts a check on the variegated multiplicity of diffuse struggles, when it exercises an assimilating pressure. In case of a conflict with the → hierarchy, however, the pluralistic experiment speedily ends in → heresy.

'Religion' in the Modern Age

6. a) At first sight, all cultures seem to make a distinction between the sacred and the profane. But this assessment is the result of a nineteenth-century confrontation: while previously it had been birth that determined membership both in a people and in its religion, now religion was a part of the mechanism of society and government. The French → Revolution engineered a split: on the one side, there arose a comprehensive claim on the part of the state to exercise regulation over all persons, while, on the other hand, the individual was left free to join a religion or to leave it. The churches, by contrast, organized themselves into institutions, and these claimed their own autonomy. A consequence was the exclusion of institutionalized religion from political and public life, as well as from the educational system. → Laicism was the order of the day. On the other hand, a debate—without resolution—was conducted on the diminishing influence of the churches, and the reproach of → secularization was common. The transformed religion, meanwhile, was under suspicion of illegitimate application.

Religion as a Private Affair

b) Thus, as the French Republic of 1789 deprived the clergy of all peculiar rights and autonomous spaces, an apparatus of law claimed validity in the affairs of each person without exception, and, through courts, taxes, and arms control, forced, 'spoiled,' the (Christian) religion into a partial institution. The new liberal state programmatically delimited its totality in matters of religion: in freedom, what anyone believed might not be subjected to state pressure. Just as with the sphere of intimacy of the home, or with one's level of income, so also, in a state of citizen government and governing, religion became a private affair, and the state had no purchase on it. The consequence was twofold: religion lost meaning for social status in the modern age; at the same time, religion now became legitimate outside of the religious institution of the Church. On the other hand, anyone wishing to belong to the Church must become a member, and finance it. Religion was less and less determined by birth automatically: the individual, as a young person or as an adult, needed to make a decision. The situation was rendered more acute by the fact that entry into professional life, and the founding of a family at the same time was accompanied by a distance taken from the influence of elders, and by incorporation into an age class, a peer group, in which one became acquainted with the behavioral rules. In addition, industrialization and urbanization, and the growing pressure toward mobility, sharpened the situation still more. The situation in which one needed to make a decision was reinforced by a theological belittling of 'popular' or 'folk' religion, which was concerned to maintain sheer social-contract membership in a religious community ('card-carriers' church'), and to use the socio-religious proffer of cult only for baptism, marriage, and funeral. The astonishingly high percentage of generous financial contributions on the part of members, in order to finance the Church's engagement in the area of works of mercy, kindergarten, the care and upkeep of buildings, and church music, was to make the various levels and functions of religion clear again. Now, along with faith and active cooperation (commitment), these levels and functions indicate a less active identification. Nor must it be forgotten that the 'heretical imperative' (P. Berger), i.e. to select among offers of cult, means, positively, freedom of choice—the opportunity and possibility of dealing with religion in all autonomy.

Knowledge and Faith, Feeling and Law

c) The → Reformation's criticism of the exteriorism of religion as practiced leads to a deep breach in the understanding of religion: religion is to be reduced, interiorly and at its core, to the individual's relationship with her God. This reduction tends to the dissolving of the personal 'Thou, God,' my implacable judge after death, into → conscience within me, as it comes to expression in Kant's enunciation: "The starry sky over me, and the eternal law within me," are my severe judges at all times of life, and no offerings or prayers can render them gracious. God may be only a projection, then, necessary in earlier times for demanding social behavior; but when morals and law are subject to rational insight, and enforceable in the consensus of the citizen state, 'God' becomes superfluous.

As a consequence, this leads to the concept that religion can be visualized without God, and God without religion. Religion without God approximates the program of French sociologist Émile Durkheim, who holds that, for modern society, which no longer exercises control over itself through class and dignity, a citizens' or middle-class morality is surely indispensable in the area of scholarship, in order also to be able to control situations of lawlessness ('anomie'). The nation and its memorials form a point of projection for identification, rituals, and faith in history and future—a point that creates unity, over and above confessional and regional differences. A → civil religion determined by the state should replace the now absent consensus of society in things of religion. Is there, as there is considered to be in the question of → human rights, a consensus throughout the Western world in respect of human ethos on which a global world can build?

New Syntheses

d) Under the pressure of the thrusts of societal and technological modernization, the religious landscape has changed over the last two centuries, doubtless as never before in religious history. Juridical postulates such as 'religious freedom,' and → democracy, tendencies to 'de-Christianization' and 'privatization,' globally active 'new religious movements,' media-churches, immigrant religions not merely in the metropolises, gender-specific religions of the new women's movement—these are only some of the categories of that change. The traditional religions—and thus the understanding of 'religion' thence derived—have had to meet mighty competition in respect of their achievements in knowledge of orientation, bestowal of meaning, and salvific promises of practical assistance in illness and need, as well as security in society: the meaning-system of science—empirical natural science and the humanities, the social science that does the observing, and the sciences of historical criticism—has in the meantime altogether intercepted religious knowledge of the constitution and the disposition of person, society, and world. In parallel fashion, there arose, with the national states—these being, meanwhile, called into question once more—a 'faith in the nation,' that was supported by exaggerated ethnic values, by racism, or chauvinism, and that received its cultic solidification in the → 'political religions.' Today, the → popular culture of the mass media, in film, sports, and music puts the religious supply on the defensive. Nevertheless, this does not mean the end of traditional religions, or of religion as such. Only: the 'framings' (E. Goffman) of religion and other societal 'subsystems' are changing, new alliances and syntheses are forming—between religion and politics in → civil religion, between religion and media in the TV church (→ Televangelism) and in 'virtual' internet communities, between Christian and Buddhist forms of piety in Zen meditation. → Sports and political productions can also be religiously motivating. It is not loss of religion's function that one sees here, but change of function. Describing this 'religion beyond/after religion,' seeking out the old and new role-carriers and community formations, determining the lines of demarcation at which the (multi-) religious traits of a future information and 'multi-option society' (P. Gross) are bound up with worldviews, ideologies, or entertainment supplies—these are tasks of social reflection that may possibly yield up a new concept of religion.

1. Gensichen, Hans Werner, "Christen," in: Rothermund, Dietmar (ed.), Indien, Munich 1955, 195.
2. As in Feil, Religio, vol. 1, 48, paraphrasing Cicero, De Natura Deorum ("The Nature of the Gods") 3,5 and 2,9.
3. The parable of the ring, verses 395-545. On the future, cf. Niewöhner, Friedrich, Veritas sive varietas. Lessings Toleranzparabel und das Buch der drei Betrüger, Heidelberg 1988.
4. This series ultimately goes back to Paul, Rom 1-3 (natural religion, religion of the law, religion of freedom).
5. E.g., Saler 1993; cf. Wittgenstein, Ludwig, Philosophische Untersuchungen (1945), Frankfurt/M. 1971, §§ 66-69.

6. Waardenburg, J., "In Search of an Open Concept of Religion," in: Despland/Vallée 1992, 225-240.
7. "[. . .] which, through symbols and action, mobilize[s] the feelings and wills of human beings" (Smart, Ninian, Worldviews: Crosscultural Explorations of Human Beliefs, New York 1983, 2-3).
8. "[. . .] an institution consisting of culturally patterned interaction with culturally postulated superhuman beings" (Spiro, Melford, E., "Religion: Problems of Definition and Explanation," in: Banton 1966, 96).
9. Smith 1982, XI.
10. Geertz 1966 is foundational here.

Literature

Antes, Peter et al. (eds.), New Approaches to the Study of Religion, 2 vols., Berlin/New York 2004; Banton, Michael (ed.), Anthropological Approaches to the Study of Religion, London 1966; Berger, Peter L., The Heretical Imperative: Contemporary Possibilities of Religious Affirmation, Garden City 1979; Despland, M./Vallée, G. (eds.), Religion in History: The Word, the Idea, the Reality, Waterloo 1992; Elsas, Christoph (ed.), Religion, Munich 1975; Feil, Ernst, Religio, 3 vols., Göttingen 1986–2001; Geertz, Clifford, "Religion as a Cultural System," in: Banton 1966, 1-46; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Gegenstände und wissenschaftlicher Kontext von Religionswissenschaft," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 1 (1989), 26-40; Glock, Charles Y., Religion and Society in Tension, Chicago 1965; Hahn, Alois/Luckmann, Thomas (eds.), Religion und Kultur, Opladen 1993; Harrison, Peter, "Religion" and the Religions in the English Enlightenment, Cambridge 1990; Haussig, Hans-Michael/Scherer, Bernd (eds.), Religion—eine europäisch-christliche Erfindung?, Bodenheim 1999; Idinopulos, Thomas/Wilson, Brian C. (eds.), What Is Religion? Origins, Definitions, and Explanations, Leiden 1998; Kehrer, Günter, "Religion," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 4 (1998), 418-425; Kippenberg, Hans G., Discovering Religious History in the Modern Age, Princeton 2002; Lübbe, Heinrich, Religion nach der Aufklärung, Graz 1986; Manuel, Frank, The Eighteenth Century Confronts the Gods, Cambridge 1959; Penner, Hans H., Impasse and Resolution: A Critique of the Study of Religion, New York 1989; Platvoet, Jan G./Molendijk, Arie L. (eds.), The Pragmatics of Defining Religion: Contexts, Concepts and Contests, Leiden 1999; Saler, Benson, Conceptualizing Religion: Immanent Anthropologists, Transcendent Natives, and Unbounded Categories, Leiden 1993; Smart, Ninian, The Phenomenon of Religion, New York 1973; Smith, Jonathan Z., Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown, Chicago 1982; Idem, "Religion, Religions, Religious," in: Idem, Relating Religion: Essays in the Study of Religion, Chicago/London 2004, 179-196; Smith, William Cantwell, The Meaning and End of Religion: A New Approach to the Religious Traditions of Mankind, New York 1963; Tyrell, Hartmann et al. (eds.), Religion als Kommunikation, Würzburg 1998; Waardenburg, Jacques (ed.), Classical Approaches to the Study of Religion, 2 vols., Berlin 1973–1974.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Christianity, Church, God/Gods/The Sacred, Meaning/Signification, Theology—see also the introduction to vol. 1

Christoph Auffarth and Hubert Mohr

Religious Contact

1. 'Religious contact' denotes the encounter of at least two religions. In the following, → religion is intentionally applied in the broad sense. The concept ranges, then, from systems of belief, to → ideologies, and to liturgy and cult. Thus, it can relate to societies with a high degree of differentiation (industrial societies with diverse denominations and Weltanschauung communities), as well as to societies with less division of labor, in which religion is an integral component of social consciousness and the social everyday ('autochthonous ethnic communities').

Typology

2. Religious contacts, then, in the broad definition, can be at hand when believers of several religious communities live together in one area or one city, without any attempt on the part of any of them intentionally to provoke a change in the status quo. In these kinds of multiethnic or multi-religious regions—examples would be → Bosnia-Herzegovina before 1991, or → New York—long lasting types of relations characterized by a mutual tolerance, or at least coexistence, have frequently emerged among the communities. However, they are sometimes delusory (→ Conflict/Violence), and can collapse as the result of a fragile balance of interest and a climate of reciprocal mistrust.

Of special interest, alongside the others, are other religious contacts whose course is deliberate. This case obtains with missionary religions (→ Mission).

From these viewpoints, the following types of religious contacts can be distinguished:

- Two non-missionary and undifferentiated societies meet, for example two autochthonous peoples;
- A missionary society with high differentiation encounters one without differentiation, such as Christianity in the age of → colonialism and imperialism with American, African, Australian, and Oceanian peoples;
- A missionary society with high differentiation encounters a differentiated, but not missionary society, as in the case of Christianity and Islam in India and China, Christianity in Japan, Buddhism and neo-Hinduism in Europe;
- Two differentiated missionizing societies encounter one another, as in the case of Christianity and Islam or Buddhism, or of Islam and Buddhism.

Apart from these intentional religious contacts, there is the phenomenon in which the religion of a → minority is tolerated and protected by the dominant religion. Examples would be: Judaism and Christianity as 'religions of the Book' in Islamic countries; Judaism, but also dissident communities, in Christian states of the modern age (→ Dissident; Diaspora); or the religion of migrants (→ Migration), for example of Turkish workers in Western Europe today. Contact between religions can assume hostile forms, as religious war (→ Conflict/Violence; Jihad), or peaceful forms, as a dialogue among religions. Since the World Congress of Religions (1893) in Chicago, there have been institutionalized dialogues among the world religions on an international level. Informal contacts among believers of distinct religions in everyday life are an important element of inter-religious encounter, but one difficult to appraise, and standing in need of even more exact studies. Among these, the special contact form of modern → tourism should be listed.

Finally, the series of religious contacts includes intellectual—or more generally, cognitive—reflection on foreign religions. Thus, scientific manners of adaptation, such as anthropology and religious studies, are part of the process of contact. Here the fundamental problem arises of how believers and religious organizations react to foreign conceptualizations and usages. → Projections, stereotyping, and → prejudices can make perception and → reception of the 'other' religion difficult and even impossible.

Courses of Contacts: Michael Pye's Model

3. Contacts occur not among systems of belief, but among their social vehicles, persons. The most convincing model of courses of religious contacts of an ideal type—a model, however, that is far from having been received—was offered by English scholar of religion Michael Pye, in 1969. Here, each religious contact follows the schema of (a) contact, (b) ambiguity, and (c) recoupment.

Contact

(a) Religious contact is first and foremost a material contact, occurring by way of sensory perception. Media with physical qualities are the premises. Eyes see writings, rites, buildings, and pictures, ears hear speech and music, the nose smells scents, the mouth tastes food and drink. It is on this material level that the integration of individual elements from one religion into another is the least problematic. Here we are speaking of formal integration, or assimilation. The adoption of individual elements is unproblematic so long as the meaning content, and horizon of religious sense, belonging to them need not necessarily be adopted along with them. This occurs when elements can function as mere 'ornaments' in the adopting religion, for instance elements of dance from an African context in Christian worship, or the practice of Zen Buddhism in Christian meditation. By contrast, the adoption of elements from African and Indian religions in Catholicism led Latin America to a syncretism: some of the elements assumed were such as could confer identity, such as African belief in spirits taken up in devotion to the saints and Mary.

Ambiguity

b) Ambiguity denotes that stage in the contact of two religions at which it is still undetermined which development is being assumed: adaptation or differentiation. Ambiguity, then, is a consequence of that advanced religious contact in which the foreign simultaneously fascinates and unsettles—evokes self-assurance, or new orientation. Here a distinction must be made between unintended and intended ambiguity. Ambiguity intended for the sake of intelligibility is actually a necessary presupposition for the extension of a missionary religion. It occurs when a religious community permits the alienation of its proclamation in teaching and devotion to the extent that it can also be understood in a framework of the horizon of meaning of another religion: the new understanding, and misunderstanding, of one's own teaching is approvingly 'purchased' by the other religion. However, intended ambiguity need not necessarily lead to missionary success, as we see in a comparison between Buddhism and Christianity in the China of early modernity. Both religions emphasized those elements that were familiar to Confucians, and therefore acceptable to them, and suppressed foreign elements in doctrine and rite that Chinese could not understand. Thus, Catholic missionaries like Jesuit Matteo Ricci (1552–1610) accepted the rites of the Chinese → ancestor worship in Christian devotion (→ Confucianism; Daoism). The 'Figurists,' a group of French Jesuits in the first half of the eighteenth century, even sought to demonstrate, through a 'figurative' (allegorical or typological) interpretation, that Christian morality, and the Christian notion of God, were attested in the earliest Confucian writings. Had this approach been crowned with success, Christianity would have been deformed to the point of being unrecognizable, and doubtless would have taken the way of today's indigenous Christianity in Southern Japan, which likewise materialized from the first Christian missionary phase—or would even have dissolved into the foreign religion, as has → Manichaeism in China since the ninth century. The fact that, from Indian Buddhism, a Chinese Buddhism emerged, is to be attributed to social, political, and cultural structures. Comparable processes are to be found in today's Europe, with non-European religions, such as the Hinduism, and Buddhism of the immigrants.

Recoupment

Recoupment, or in rough translation, 'reverse orientation,' denotes a reflux to ambiguity—an orientation to a traditional religion that can be considered an 'original' and 'unfalsified' one. In a situation of contact, this means an orientation to the former religious tradition, the one that only through contact with the 'foreign religion' has been consciously acknowledged as one's 'own' religion (→ Nativism)—or else an orientation to the religion of the region of origin: in sixteenth-century China, Buddhism's orientation was to that of India, as Catholicism's was to Europe (more precisely, to the papacy). The Buddhists accepted the ambiguity, and, thus, partially adapted to it, by acknowledging the public order of the state and its Confucian foundations, nor did they interfere with the Chinese distinction between private and public. Meanwhile, in the case of Catholicism, in Europe the decision took the form of recoupments: Rome prevented the process of the intended ambiguity, by, for instance, prohibiting the rites of devotion to the ancestors, and therefore the reverencing of Confucius and other 'saints,' in a number of Papal documents between 1704 and 1742, and only the Roman rite was permitted. The Chinese state thereupon saw the papal decision as a fundamental assault on its autonomy, and exiled all Christians.

Today's Islamism and → fundamentalism in the Muslim immigrant communities of Europe can likewise be understood in terms of the above model of recoupment. Only the communication structures with the countries of their origin have changed, as these elements function with essentially more rapidity owing to modern technology. In the diaspora and the migration, phenomena of recoupment are observable with all religions. A special case is presented by → Judaism, since an immediate, concrete relation to the land of their origin has been missing for centuries. A common point of reference for Jewish identity, in all countries in which Jewish communities existed, was, instead, the Torah. Only since 1948 has Judaism also gained the land of its origin as point of reference.

Literature

Bitterli, Urs, Cultures in Conflict: Encounters between European and Non-European Cultures, 1492–1800, Cambridge [2]1993; Golahny, Amy (ed.), Points of Contact: Crossing Cultural Boundaries, Lewisburg 2004; Gregory, John S., The West and China since 1500, Basingstoke 2003; Jackson, Anna/Japper, Amin (eds.), Encounters: The Meeting of Asia and Europe 1500–1800, London 2004; Küng, Hans/Ching, Julia, Christianity and Chinese Religions, London 1993; Meyer, Michael A./Brenner, Michael, German-Jewish History in Modern Times, 4 vols., New York 1996–1997; Perreault, Melanie, Early English Encounters in Russia, West Africa, and the Americas, 1530–1614, Lewiston 2004; Pratt, Mary Louise, Imperial Eyes: Travel Writing and Transculturation, London 1992; Pye, Michael, "The Transplantation of Religion," in: Numen 16 (1969), 234-239; Seiwert, Hubert, "Hochkultur und fremde Religion. Buddhismus und Katholizismus in China," in: Pye, Michael/Stegerhoff, Renate (eds.), Religion in fremder Kultur. Religion als

Minderheit in Europa und Asien, Saarbrücken 1987, 55-75; von Brück, Michael /Lai, Whalen, Christianity and Buddhism: A Multicultural History of Their Dialogue, Maryknoll 2001; Winks, Robin W./Ruiz, Teofilo F., Medieval Europe and the World: From Late Antiquity to Modernity, 400–1500, New York 2005.

→ Colonialism, Conflict/Violence, Diaspora, Fundamentalism, Jihad, Migration, Mission, Pluralism

Ulrich Nanko

Renaissance

Concept and Period

1. The concept of 'Renaissance' (in Ital., Rinascimento, 'Rebirth') was coined by the historiography of the nineteenth century. Jacob Burckhardt adopted it from the French of Honoré de Balzac, and made it popular through his Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien (Ger., "The Culture of the Renaissance in Italy"; 1860). The denomination was intended to mark an era in European art history and intellectual history, that seemed especially characterized by a resumption of attention to now 'classical' objects and thought, and by fostering a 'rebirth' of Greek and Roman thought. All of this was then set in polemical division from 'dark' Middle Ages as the Dark Ages. The concept of a 'rebirth' (in Ital., rinascità) is to be found as early as Giorgio Vasari's biographies of artists (Le vite de' più eccellenti pittori, scultori e architetti—Ital., "Lives of the Most Excellent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects"; 1550; 2nd ed., 1568). At the same time, however, there is a great satisfaction with innovation that distinguishes the Renaissance as an era. Owing to the fleeting transitions, an exact dating is extremely difficult—many historians even leave the Renaissance out, and have the → Middle Ages cross directly into the → Enlightenment. Ordinarily, however, the space of time ascribed to the Renaissance spans the 170 years between 1430 and 1600 CE. Furthermore, a distinction must be made between the concept of era in the narrower sense, and its expanded application, in which 'renaissance' stands for any form of renascence or resumption (when anything 'experiences a renaissance'; see Panofsky).

2. Politically, the decline of papal authority and strengthening of the Italian city-states under mercenary captains (condottieri) particularly distinguished the Renaissance. Philosophies of the state, such as that of Niccolo Machiavelli (Ital., Il Principe, "The Prince"; 1532) took as their theme a new image of the ruler, one that had gone beyond a religious legitimization of power. That philosophy, as also the image of the 'courtier' sketched by Baldasare Castiglione (Il libro del Cortegiano—Ital., "Book of the Courtier," 1528), are the expression, in political philosophy, of the increasing importance of the individual, and the exploration of the latter's 'capabilities and creativity' (in Ital., ingegno). In addition, it points to the effort—despite the doubt that had arisen concerning the personal immortality of the → soul, as the Christian faith anticipated the same—to achieve worldly renown, and thereby live on, if not in Paradise, at least in → history. In this connection, it is easy to understand the stout ascent of representative art, for example that of the portrait, in the Renaissance, at times to the point of 'image magic': after the attempted assassination of Lorenzo de' Medici by the Pazzi, in 1478, in the Cathedral of Florence, the fleeing conspirators were represented as hanged. In his Adorazione dei tre Magi (Ital., "Adoration of the Three Magi"), Sandro Botticelli represents members of the Medici family—together with himself—in the entourage of the Three Wise Men. Simultaneously, artists were interested in an ideal type and form in their art. Reality is not only to be represented, but to be 'elevated.' To the same extent as literature euphorically describes beauty,[1] to that extent painting and sculpture also strive to present beauty in ideal form. Sandro Botticelli's female forms, for example his Venus, are characteristic of this ideal, which rests largely on the growing popularity of → Platonism. The 'good modern style' (in Ital., buona maniera moderna) should not merely imitate antiquity, but, if possible, surpass it. The cult of beauty, and enthusiasm for allegorical representation, in which ancient divinities represent ideal principles—such as Aphrodite/Venus beauty—finally issues in the mannerism of the sixteenth century.

The New Image of World and Human Being

3. The development of the sciences, and the secularization of representation in general, occasioned a new image of the world. Discoveries and achievements such as the theory of Copernicus (1473–1543), which placed the sun instead of the earth at the center, paved the way for a new image of the human being. On the one hand, man was robbed of his central position in the universe, and on the other, the new image produced a new ethics of self-/creation. Theologian Nicholas of Cusa, German Bishop of Bressanone (1401–1464), had already presented a 'pantheistic world image' (→ Pantheism) that understood the world as an 'unfolding' (in Lat., explicatio) of God, while presenting God as simply the 'coinciding of the opposites' (in Lat., coincidentia oppositorum) in the world. In his Oratio de Dignitate Hominis (Lat., "Address on the Dignity of the Human Being"), Giovanni Pico della Mirandola shaped the new picture of the human being in clear expression: unlike other creatures, the human being had no secure or surely predetermined place in the world—instead, it lay within human free → will alone whether an individual might reach divine perfection, or degenerate to the animal state. Deterministic movements, such as Calvinism, took the contrary position.

Humanism

Pico's image of the human being explains the high level of value accorded to education, and this in the framework of → humanism. The comprehensive development of all human qualities, to which the formation of character belongs just as surely as does the study of a comprehensive canon of sciences and good behavior, is understood as a 'formation toward God' (Nicholas of Cusa). By way of this new ideal of formation, → ethics achieved a great importance, and this attention led to an energetic confrontation with ancient philosophy, especially with Plato and the Neo-Platonists. It was through a concern with original texts—which were now made available in translation to wider circles—that philosophy grew in importance. Chiefly at the hands of Italian scholars, a deliberate attempt was made to uncover ancient writings. During the Council of Constance for example, Poggio Bracciolini (1380–1459) hunted for Latin manuscripts. The study of languages like Greek and Hebrew, just as, to some extent, Arabic, was no longer the privilege of monks. Now it became a common occupation in educated circles. Florentine Angelo Poliziano (1454–1494) was famous for his special, beautiful style in Latin and Greek, and was the first to compose poetry in the ancient Greek language. Even reading and writing, in foreign languages as well as in the vernacular (which had now been discovered for literature), was a component of the humanistic formation.

The 'Platonic Academy' in Florence, founded (1459) under Cosimo de' Medici, and headed by Marsilio Ficino (1433–1499), quickly became renowned for its work in publishing, translating, and commentating, especially where the Platonic dialogues were concerned. His celebrated commentary on the Platonic Symposium (1469) sketched out an ethics of mutual human attraction (in friendship) and coined the term 'Platonic love.' His involvement with the classical texts, which was not limited to pure philology, but which also included his own thoughts, under appeal to the 'masters,' can be seen as exemplary for a major part of Renaissance publishing and commentating. Within these circles, Plato was celebrated and reverenced as a representative of prisca theologia (the 'eternal philosophy'), and thus stood for a line of revelation that could go beyond the Judeo-Christian tradition (→ Esotericism). Most thinkers of the Renaissance, however, saw no contradiction between their philosophic considerations and their Christian faith, even though those considerations at times stood contrary to the latter. Thus, philosopher Pietro Pomponazzi (1462–1525) was concerned to refute the immortality of the soul philosophically, but accepted it as a Christian.

Reception of Antiquity and Paganism

4. The development of ancient textual sources, with early attempts at archaeological investigation, entailed considerable peripheral effect for the history of religions. Not that the ritual and mythic sketches of ancient polytheism had been until this moment unknown, but the interest now accorded them led to their entry into everyday living, and therewith into religion as well. On the one hand, 'pagan' religious concepts were somehow neutralized pedagogically (as educational material) or aesthetically (in representational motif). At the same time, they offered opportunities promptly seen as alternatives to (monotheistic) religion, and to spirituality across the board, and attempts were soon made to revitalize 'pagan mysteries' (→ Paganism/Neopaganism; Reception). As early as 1467, Pomponio Leto's (1428–1497) 'Roman Academy' whose ideal was to live 'as the old Romans did,' and consequently to revive their pagan rites and festivals, was closed by the Inquisition at papal command. Leto himself was arrested and tortured. By contrast, the attempt to revive the ancient Greek religion, by Georgios Gemistos Plethon (1355–1450? → Polytheism) one-half century before Leto, had entailed no juridical consequences (see § 6).

New 'Syncretisms': Philosophia Occulta, Hermeticism, and Esotericism

5. Essentially more frequent than this manner of paganism in a pure form, however, was the incorporation of ancient piety in the Christian religion, as with Ficino. Additionally, owing to the influence of magical and hermetical texts, new types of → syncretisms sprang up. Hermetical conceptualizations of a parallelism between → microcosm and macrocosm, along with composite systems of → astrology, mysticism, and magic, are documented by the reception of → Kabbalah, the Corpus Hermeticum (translated by Ficino by 1463), and Picatrix, a compendium of the occult sciences ascribed to Arab scholar Magriti. These materials found new entries into the world of the religious concepts of Europe. There arose a new speculative philosophy of nature and religion, still influential today (→ Gnosticism; Esotericism). Physician Paracelsus (1493–1581), for example, a favorite authority of these movements, speculated, in terms of the analogy between the human body and plants, that the latter were perchance suitable for the healing of the former, and early homeopathy took up this approach once more. Further, he delved into sympathetic → magic. Astrological speculations on the part of French physician Michel de Notredame ('Nostradamus,' 1503–1566), on the end of the world, became very popular once more at the end of the twentieth century, in a framework of → millenarianism.

The occult image of the Renaissance was fostered, for instance, by the nineteenth-century Gesellschaft der Naturforscher und Ärzte (Ger.; "Society of Natural Scientists and Physicians"), to which, among others, J. Salomo, C. Schweigger, C. G. Carus, and A. von Humboldt belonged. It was taken up in the twentieth century by → New Age currents, for instance in the framework of the apocalyptical prophecies uttered (with explicit reference to Nostradamus) on the occasion of the total eclipse of the sun on August 11, 1999, where appeal was made to the 'forgotten' and 'secret' knowledge of the Renaissance for the purpose of constructing a privileged tradition of special hermetic 'undercurrents,' and thereby legitimizing a worldview primarily maintained in private religion.

6. In the sixteenth century, the religio-political situation changed in Central Europe. → Reformation and Counter-Reformation, the founding of the → Jesuit Order, and the great powers' policies of alliance, which made use of the confessional tensions at hand, effected a reinforcement, and radicalization, of religious contradictions: the Inquisition then became the most important tool of the Catholic Church against heresies of all kinds. Granted, in the fifteenth century, Plethon had survived his calling Moses, → Jesus, and → Muhammad the "three swindlers who corrupted human kind," and had sought to revive and revitalize a polytheistic 'Greek' religion—and yes, Marsilio Ficino had still been able to reconcile hermetic ideas with his episcopal quality in Florence. But his younger contemporary Pico already had to confront the censure of the Inquisition. Giordano Bruno's (1548–1600) massive religious criticism, motivated by speculations of natural philosophy (on the basis of Copernicus and Nicholas of Cusa), is accompanied by powerful anti-religious polemics, and refers to the → Enlightenment at this early moment. It finally leads the author to the stake of Campo de' Fiori in Rome. His spectacular death made Bruno a 'martyr of Freethinkerdom.' The Neo-Platonic vocabulary of his writings, however, awakened the interest of Romanticism, as well, and that of the twentieth century: on the site where he had burned, Christian liberal circles in Italy erected a monument to him, as the leading figure in the protest against the papacy and the dogma of papal infallibility, of 1871 (→ Rome). Bruno served Anthroposophy, as well as the German Monist Union, in the capacity of a figurehead; conversely, Marxist authors of the end of the 1960s saw Bruno as one of the first materialists.

1. Castiglione, B., Il libro del Cortegiano, published by Giulio Carnazzi, Milan 1987, book 4, cc. 39ff.

Literature

Buck, August, Renaissance—Reformation. Gegensätze und Gemeinsamkeiten, Wiesbaden 1984; Garin, Eugenio, Italian Humanism: Philosophy and Civic Life in the Renaissance, Oxford 1965; Idem, Astrology in the Renaissance: The Zodiac of Life, London 1983; Kristeller, Paul Otto, Renaissance Thought, 2 vols., New York 1961–1965; Idem, Eight Philosophers of the Italian Renaissance, Stanford 1964; Panofsky, Erwin, Studies in Iconology: Humanistic Themes in the Art of the Renaissance, New York 1939; Idem, Renaissance and Renascences in Western Art, London 1970; Pfeiffer, Rudolf, A History of Classical Scholarship from 1300–1850, 2 vols., Oxford 1968–1976; Settis, Salvatore (ed.), Memoria dell'antico nell'arte italiana, 3 vols., Turin 1984ff.; Shumaker, Wayne, Renaissance Curiosa, Binghampton 1982; Warburg, Aby, The Renewal of Pagan Antiquity: Contributions to the Cultural History of the European Renaissance, Los Angeles 1999 (German [1]1932); Whitlock, Keith (ed.), The Renaissance in Europe: A Cultural Enquiry, New Haven 2000; Wind, Edgar, Pagan Mysteries in the Renaissance, London 1958.

→ Esotericism, European History of Religion, Genius, Humanism, Platonism, Reception, Reformation, Science

Agnes Imhof

Revelation

1. The word 'revelation' (in Gk., apokalypsis; in Lat., revelatio) is a category of reflection and abstraction, belonging to theological 'second-order discourse.' It can denote either the occurrence, or the content of a manifestation of the divine, by which, not infrequently, it performs a function of legitimization. After all, anyone professing to have received a revelation claims to be able, and to have the right, to make authoritative pronouncements concerning God or other things of faith. In this form, of course, the concept of revelation is foreign to the Bible or to the ancient Church. Only in the theological epistemology of medieval scholasticism is it elevated to the rank of a source for supernatural knowledge that transcends reason, and perfects it. With the Enlightenment, this intellectualist understanding of revelation entered a crisis. Immanuel Kant postulated: it shall no longer be the appeal to the authority of revelation, but only a critical examination by reason, that is to guarantee the validity of philosophical and theological propositions.

Revelation is not exempt from scrutiny on account of a supernaturally guaranteed foundation. Rather, it is itself an object and expression of faith. A defeat of the polarity between revelation and reason made it possible to create a broader understanding of revelation, one transcending the boundaries of epistemology: revelation is a process that includes a relationship (founded on and bestowed by God) of the creature that (moving in the contrary direction) actually reaches God. In this understanding, revelation, although open, remains concealed and unavailable to manipulation.

2. In terms of the phenomenology of religion, it is as suggestive as it is problematic to extend the concept of revelation to other religions, and to specify them as revealed religions, after the manner of Christianity, or, indeed, in all correctness, of the Abrahamitic family of religions. This extension requires that the concept be formalized and generalized in a manner that often fails to do justice to the self-concept of the individual religions. In this formal description, revelation designates a relation that consists of five basic elements: author (the Divine), recipient, means or medium, content, and effect. A correct determination of the content of these elements produces a correct concrete understanding of revelation. Thus, as to the means or medium, a distinction can be made between immediate revelation (through apparition or inspiration), and mediated revelation (through sacred objects, places, or times, written and oral traditions, or through authoritative teachings). Content embraces the self-disclosure of God or of gods in words, visions or auditions, and the disclosure of truths and commands through divine mysteries, the course of history (especially in apocalypticism), a commentary on the world as evil or malignant, the salvific goal or end, the salvific way or path, and so on. As to the effect, there are distinct manners of taking up and working through the message, for example, in the form of a fundamental 'existential' transformation (→ Conversion). It is not difficult to discern, however, that this systematic stands in a Christian framework of argumentation.

Literature

Brown, David, Tradition and Imagination: Revelation and Change, Oxford 2004; Dulles, Avery, Models of Revelation, Garden City 1985; Eliade, Mircea, A History of Religious Ideas, 3 vols., Chicago 1978–1985; Ward, Keith, Religion and Revelation: A Theology of Revelation in the World's Religion, Oxford 1994.

→ Apocalypse, Channeling, Communication, Epiphany, Esotericism, Prophet

Reinhold Bernhardt

Revolution, French

Development of a Civil Religion

1. The importance of the French Revolution (1789–1799) for → European history of religion emerges primarily through the → secularization process for which the Enlightenment had supplied a theoretical preparation. That process identifies the transition to the modern age. At the same time, the Revolution developed its own myths and cults—oriented, in the main, to Greco-Roman antiquity—with which it hallowed both its abstract values, such as liberty, reason, and homeland, and its heroes and → martyrs. The indistinguishability, for which it strove, between religious and political symbols—with which, according to Émile Durkheim's thesis, the principal function of religion is performed (the self-sanctification of a society)—compelled it to sketch a → 'civil religion.'

The Ancien Régime was replaced by the → utopia of a 'common entity of reason,' which was to rest on the foundation of a → nature interpreted as divine, and with which, through an absolutization of the common will, 'primordially good human beings' were once more to be brought into harmony. The dream of a new society was even manifested in a new chronology, introduced on October 5, 1793 with a Republican → calendar. As a symbol of equality, the calendar opened with a year 1 calculated according to ancient Egyptian tradition, with its summer equinox reckoned as occurring on September 22, 1792.

Although long-term developments materialized, and traditional elements did not completely vanish, the event of the French Revolution was experienced first and foremost as a cultural happening, and in the sense of a radical break with the past, and indeed its achievements (such as equality of confessions and → human rights, proclaimed on August 26, 1789) and tendencies (e.g., → Laicism) have in some measure extended to the present.

Secularization and De-Christianization

2. Even in the course of the eighteenth century, owing to the Enlightenment, especially in the effect of the latter among many of the educated, the French church had lost influence. Furthermore, owing to its secularization, and to the hedonism of extensive portions of the higher clergy, it had come into question. However, the National Assembly did not wish to do away with the Revolution's 'greatest loser,' the totality of whose goods were nationalized on November 2, 1789. It would only integrate the clergy into the new state as a social and moral instance, by their transfer to the status of state officials (Constitution Civile du Clergé, July 12, 1790). A split within the French church, and an increasingly sharpened cleft between Catholic Church and Revolution, occurred as numerous priests refused the oath of allegiance to the new Constitution (sworn on November 27, 1790), and succeeded in convincing many of the faithful—especially the agrarian population of the countryside—of the 'godlessness' of the Revolution. After the execution of the King, on January 21, 1793, which was felt by many to be a 'ritual parricide,' the conflict escalated, in the cities of the Vendée, to a 'crusade for God and the King' (March 10 to December 12, 1793). This uprising serves as an example of the violent confrontation between clericalist and monarchist reaction and revolutionary forces, which demanded numerous victims on both sides. Further, it stands as an incident of the 'de-Christianization campaign,' which was supported by not a few elements of the population. The conflicts were somewhat sharpened by the Directory, which declared religion a private affair, and, on February 21, 1795, established an official separation between church and state. An effect of this separation was a (not always successful) secularization of public life. The political and religious division of France into a clericalist conservative side and an anti-clerical 'laicist' side persists, in attenuated form, even today.

Festivals of the Revolution

3. The contradictory overlap between irresponsible destruction and the ideal of a political and moral harmony, with the hope of happiness here below—not infrequently proclaimed in a messianic or religious manner—was concentrated partially in the revolutionary festivals, which reached their climax in the time of the Jacobin government. Despite sometimes-considerable regional differences, they can be divided into three phases, analogously with those of the Revolution:

(a) The festivals of 1789–1792 were celebrated, alongside new forms, within the framework of traditional church ceremonies. Held under the open sky, they were meant especially to demonstrate a revolutionary unanimity, at the 'altar of the fatherland,'—as a sign of concord between nature and the Revolution. Now the soil of freedom was consecrated, and the spatial occupation of the Revolution displayed, with 'Liberty Trees'—a transformation of the traditional May tree. Even before the key Festival of Federation, celebrated on the occasion of the storming of the Bastille, local 'festivals of fraternity' generated a euphoric temper of national unity.

(b) The radicalization of the Revolution was reflected in the bewildering multiplicity of enthusiastic and provocative festivals of 1793–1794, which gradually yielded their spontaneous character. The old royal and monarchist symbols were solemnly burned, in an atmosphere of popular festival, and Christian elements, in pageants performed in the spirit of carnival, were reversed and ridiculed. At the same time, the ceremonies served to 'implant' and 'eternalize' revolutionary ideals in the populace. Thus, the 'garden projects' inspired by Rousseau symbolized the credence that the eternal laws of nature had been rediscovered and recovered. Along with the cult that centered on the 'patriotic saints,' and the 'martyrs of liberty'—above all the murdered revolutionary Marat was reverenced by great throngs—it was the 'cult of reason' that emerged, 'reason' being embodied in a beautiful woman in white array and liberty cap. Other principles were presented as well, usually by living women. "The Goddess of Liberty, accompanied by female Apostles of Republican virtue, processed through the cities in a triumphal chariot. The Goddess of Reason then took her place on the 'sacred mountains,' erected before or within the churches, from there to proclaim the new truths."[2] Here one beheld the myth of the Revolution, the myth borrowed from → nature piety, of the feminine as the living incarnation of 'Mother Nature.' Often, however, enthusiasm for the cults—whose aesthetics were staged very much by rote, and as a religious ritual—was restricted to educated circles, while the majority of the population remained relatively untouched. The Festivals of the Decades, intended to replace the traditional Sunday, were frequently boycotted.

For the stabilization of internal relations, Robespierre—to whose mind neither atheism nor Catholic 'fanaticism' was reconcilable with a political and moral order—introduced a deistic Cult of the Supreme Being, solemnly initiated on Prairial II 2 (August 6, 1794). At the same time, this disputed 'substitute confession,' which already proclaimed the normalization of the third phase, marked the turning point of the Revolutionary festival.

(c) After Robespierre's overthrow (9 Thermidor; July 27, 1794), the whole system collapsed. Symptomatic of the general 'sobering' was the disappearance of 'the general happiness,' until now declared to be the purpose of the state, from the Directorial Constitution. Now, for the first time since the beginning of the Revolution, the will of the people was no longer held to be infallible. As an expression of the system that had always been there, citizens' festivals and public cults were themselves converted into a stable system, that in the end collapsed in favor of a return to the old style festival.

4. Despite its historical failure, the Revolutionary festivals did not remain without result. They brought a new 'era' to Europe, by 'sanctifying' the value of a secularized world whose motto was freedom. On the other hand, the absolutist claim of the 'Jacobine ideology,' its promise of an earthly beatitude, and requirement of cultic veneration of the Revolutionary state—although inspired by the idealized politico-religious unity of antiquity and Rousseau's 'middle-class religion'—founded the beginning of modern dictatorships, whose 'religious undertones' are frequently discussed under the heading of → political religion.

1. Köhler 1989, 191.
2. Harten/Harten 1988, 20.

Literature

Durkheim, Emile, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, New York 1995 (French original [1]1912); Feher, Ferenc, "The Cult of the Supreme Being and the Limits of the Secularization of the Political," in: Idem (ed.), The French Revolution and the Birth of Modernity, Berkeley/Oxford 1990, 174-197; Grimsley, Ronald, Rousseau and the Religious Quest, Oxford 1968; Harten, Hans-Christian/Harten, Elke, Frauen—Kultur—Revolution: 1789–1799, Pfaffenweiler 1988; Higonnet, Patrice, Goodness beyond Virtue: Jacobins during the French Revolution, Cambridge/London 1998; Köhler, Jochen, Das Gewitter der Freiheit. Bedeutung und Wirkung der Französischen Revolution heute, Frankfurt/M. 1989; Ozouf, Mona, Festivals and the French Revolution, Cambridge 1988; Van Kley, Dale K., The Religious Origins of the French Revolution: From Calvin to the Civil Constitution 1560–1791, New Haven/New York 1996; Vovelle, Michel, The Revolution against the Church: From Reason to the Supreme Being, Cambridge 1991.

→ Civil Religion, Criticism of Religion, Enlightenment, Paganism/Neopaganism, Political Religion, Secularization

Manuela Sekler

Rhythm

Rhythm derives from the Greek rhythmós, 'time measure,' 'beat,' and can also mean, 'proportion' in general; gestalt or 'form' ('shape'); and, in Ionic, 'custom,' 'practice,' 'habit.' Originally, the word designates an invariable motion, such as that of the waves of an ocean (in Gk., rhein, 'to stream,' 'to flow'). Thus, rhythm is an 'arranging,' an 'ordering' (especially with respect to time) by way of cyclical, identical or varied, repetition of the same elements. A distinction must be made among (1) musical rhythm, (2) the rhythm of speech closely akin to it, (3) rhythms of nature (physiological, agrarian, and astronomical), and finally, (4) cultural rhythms. Rhythms have manifold physical, psychical, and social effects, so that, in varied stamps or impressions, they play a key role in many religious practices.

Musical Rhythms

1. Musical rhythm forms the neuro-acoustical basis of many religious trance-techniques, possession-cults, and ecstatic phenomena. Musical rhythm is frequently connected with → dance as cyclically arranged or ('membered') flows of movement. Thus, in Islamic Sufism for example, the dancing group adopts a gradually accelerating musical rhythm, from which individual dancers then break out in trance, a typical technique named sama': "hearing music with the ear of the heart."

In the simplest case, musical rhythms are generated by hand-clapping, or vocal sounds. Even more frequently, drums, drumsticks (the clipsticks of the Australian Aborigenes), rattles, and other percussion instruments are employed. Shamanic traditions the world over apply percussive rhythms as ecstatic techniques: the shamanic drum is actually the identifying sign of the North Eurasian religions. The drumming techniques of African and → Afro-American religions find their continuation today in modern secular musical styles and dance cultures, such as jazz, rock, rhythm 'n' blues, drum and bass, reggae, and techno (→ Popular Culture). Today as yesterday, state ceremonies, mighty marches, and the propagandizing presentations of → political religions and authoritarian regimes alike, along with the → civil religion of modern democracies, swell with the heart-kindling reverberations of solemn or peppy military rhythms.

Rhythmic structures in the wider sense are essential for many ritual actions, as shown, for example, in Christianity's triple immersion of the baptismal candidate, or in the repetitive actions of a priest, such as gestures of blessing.

Speech Rhythms

2. A special rhythm of speech lifts the formulae of oaths, or the recitation of sacred texts, out of the everyday application of speech, as in Islam, with reciting the suras of the → Qur'an, or, in Buddhism, in pronouncing → mantras.

Recitation or prayer can be supported by rhythmical movements, as with the Dikr rites of Muslim brotherhoods, which set those at prayer into a trancelike condition, or as with 'schockeln,' the forward and backward movement of the upper body in Jewish prayer. When Brahmans perform sacred Vedic texts, their singing, and singing precisely by verse, has the purpose of sustaining and reinforcing the act of memory, and the correct repetition of voluminous hymnic collections (→ Oral Tradition).

The kinship of musical rhythms is a close one. When a language no longer in current use finds application, for instance in the Latin, in Church Slavonic, or in Indian Sanskrit, rhythm presides, as quasi-musical, over the meaning of the words, and operates directly. Mantras do not operate through their sense, but through their sound, and their rhythmical structure. In these instances, there is a broad overlap with the manner in which poetical language performs, and this not only in the area of religious poetry in the strict sense.

Rhythms of Nature: Biological, Agrarian, and Astronomical Rhythms

3. The observation of biological rhythms, especially of those of the heart and the breath, plays an essential role in many meditative and ecstatic practices. Thus, for example, in Hindu meditation techniques, observation of inhalation and exhalation, and concentration on the instant between, constitute a frequent practice (→ Breathing; Yoga). In many cultures, the physiological rhythm of the female monthly cycle is negatively accentuated by temporary exclusion from worship. Another level of biological rhythm is that of the natural cycles of growth and regeneration in the animal and plant worlds. These are paid special attention in agrarian societies (→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic). Natural rhythms, in turn, rest on astronomical and cosmic ones: the alternation of day and night finds its ritual configuration, when, during → Ramadan, a fast is maintained during the day, and eating and drinking is done at night. This ritual configuration, together with the climatic conditions of the seasons of the year, as in midsummer celebration or → Christmas (as well as in the lunar cycle), accompanies the festal → calendar of, for example, Christianity, Judaism, and Islam.

Cultural Rhythms

4. Another important element in many religions is the rhythmic division and accentuation of → time: as individual time of life, or social time. The division of the day occurs in Christian cloisters and monasteries by way of the Prayer of the Hours, in Buddhism by way of established times for meditation. Mythically founded cycles divide a 'week' with a specified, and special, day of rest, in Christianity, Judaism, and Islam (→ Sunday/Sabbath). In many cultures, the festal calendar provides a rhythm for the year. → Rites of passage divide the individual's time of life into segments, give → birth and → death their shape and form, and bind to the religious community the events that are singular for the individual, by interpreting them in various ways as a repetition of something given. Very long rhythmic cycles, finally, are to be found in mythological and theological speculation on the eras of history, as, for instance, in the ancient Chinese religions, or in the Vedic religion, where entire world ages are conceptualized sequentially, as cosmological macro-rhythms.

Literature

Eliade, Mircea, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, New York 1964; Goodman, Felicitas D., Where the Spirits Ride the Wind: Trance Journeys and Other Ecstatic Experiences, Bloomington 1990; Eadem et al. (eds.), Trance, Healing and Hallucination: Three Field Studies in Religious Experience, New York 1974; Hart, Mickey, Drumming at the Edge of Magic: A Journey into the Spirit of Percussion, San Francisco 1990; Prendergast, Mark, The Ambient Century: From Mahler to Trance, the Evolution of Sound in the Electronic Age, Bloomsbury 2000; Rouget, Gilbert, Music and Trance: A Theory of the Relations between Music and Possession, Chicago 1985; Seidel, Wilhelm, Rhythmus: Eine Begriffsbestimmung, Darmstadt 1976.

→ Breathing, Calendar, Language, Life Cycle, Meditation, Music, Possession, Time, Trance

Karl-Peter Gietz and Heino Schmull

Rites of Passage

Passage as an Arduous Task

1. Animal and human life is carried out in 'passages': between luminous sun and the dark of night; between working day and sleep; between the spatial boundaries of secure, familiar home and open space; between the path of peril and the place that is safe; between the seasonal periods of superfluity and want; in the biographical passages from childhood, to sparkling youth, to generative parenthood, to the debility of old age, to death. Two different, antagonistic, or frankly contrary, conditions, areas, developmental phases, or functional insertions must be connected together, inner dispositions dissolved, and the accustomed surrendered. The necessary transpositions flow successfully precisely when they render conquerable the fear before the unknown, supportable the uncertainty of the new, and essayable the erstwhile strange and foreign. Certain sensations, wishes, and intentions cross with the situations of transition and the life interests of others.

Solution by Rites of Passage

2. Even in the social life of animals, these problems are solved by phases of passage that are ritually produced and formed. These phases are elementary components of every religion. Instead of the obligation to accept narrow, immediate adaptation to the outer world, communicative spaces of activity appear. The builders of these spaces, which enable the subject to make a successful detachment from the 'old,' are the phases of passage. Now the communicative spaces themselves come to constitute an interim threshold in terms of time (rite de marge, 'border rite'; → Marginality/Liminality), and can effect a creative insertion into the 'new' (A. van Gennep, Victor Turner; → Ritual). Rites of passage have special features. They are:

- Regulative, obligatory, and sequential: They consist of pre-established series of 'when/then' signals, which mold a stable, neurologically encoded or encodable, bio-cultural program, with acceptance transcending that of the individual person, and required in social exchange (smiling and making a gesture of submission at greeting or taking one's leave, and at prayer);
- Participatorial, repetitive, and generative: They offer a consistently professed and recognized framework for all respective individuals or biographical roles (ritual singing; godparent; bridal parents, bride and groom, bridesmaid);

- Self-referential, transformative, and irreversible: They create, in and for the individual, certain corporeal and inner psychic alterations, that irrevocably introduce new social conditions (→ tattooing, → circumcision, mutilation, deflowering, and tonsure at rites of → initiation; necktie, tuxedo, wedding ring at career initiation and change of status; initiatory → death, second → birth, and new → name at passages of religious status). In this fashion, rites of initiation shape a paradoxical ritual equilibrium of flow, in which the regularly 'general' and enduring interpenetrates the individually 'special' and immediate. Again—reciprocally—the candidate's erstwhile condition is acknowledged, closed, and overcome through a valid (and precisely, ritually obligatory) procedure, and 'passed beyond' (R. E. Wiedeman).

Ritual Worlds Beyond

3. It is the feature of the transformative in particular that lends even animal rites of passage a proto-religious coloration. Specifically human is the elaboration of the ritual threshold space in terms of sacred drama and liturgy, into the extraordinary (because festive) counter-world and religious world of the beyond (→ Christmas; wild night between old and new year; novitiate; → Carnival). Rites of transition become explicitly religious at the point where that which is ritual is meant to be constituted and guaranteed by an uncontrollable ritual power of the beyond, represented by a ritual expert, as, for example, with the formula of oath, "So help me God."

Radical Time Changes

4. Moments of great social transformation, and radical changes in terms of cultural revolution, are accompanied by an intellectual criticism of rites (→ Freud), by anarchistic anti-ritualism, blasphemous reverse rituals ('black masses'; → Satanism), and ritual clowning in court. Postmodern rites of passage tend to push rites of passage to their paradoxical extremes, in extremely personal and binding ritual experiences (fasting, lying in the saddle at full gallop, tests of courage through walking in fire and the ingestion of drugs). For the broad population, on the contrary, the conservative need is increasing for familiar, elementary rituals of passage (wedding with bride in white and organ) and the secure transmittal of active property (Confirmation and marriage certificates).

Literature

Holm, Jean/Bowker, John (eds.), Rites of Passage, London 1994 (Literature); Portmann, Adolf, "Riten der Tiere," in: Eranos-Jahrbuch 1950, vol. XIX, Zurich 1951, 357-401; Rappaport, Roy A., Ritual and Religion in the Making of Humanity, Cambridge 1999; Turner, Victor, The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure, Chicago/London 1969; van Gennep, Arnold, The Rites of Passage, Chicago 1960 (French [1]1909); Wiedemann, Rainer E., Ritual und Sinntransformation, Berlin 1991.

→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic, Baptism, Birth, Carnival, Circumcision, Communication, Crisis, Death and Dying, Drama (Sacred), Initiation, Life Cycle, Liturgy, Marriage/Divorce, Ritual, Road/Path/Journey

Hemma Boneberg

Ritual

Concept

1. 'Ritual' is a common word. In ordinary usage the term presents no problems. It is used for a category of individual or social behavior—such as religious or solemn ceremonies or, more generally, procedures regularly followed—that most people seem to recognize immediately. But the meaning of the term has been far from self-evident to its students. For over a century, ritual has been a 'standard' topic of study, especially within the social sciences and history of religion. Discussions have focused on the 'basic characteristics' of ritual behavior, on the question: What exactly is ritual?

In 1968 Leach observed that "even among those who have specialized in this field there is the widest possible disagreement as to how the word ritual should be used and how the performance of ritual should be understood."[1] A decade later the situation was unchanged, which prompted Grimes to advocate the development of 'ritual studies' as a distinct discipline. As he pointed out, students of ritual were isolated from one another in various fields and, although sharing a common interest in performative phenomena, they were separated by their methodologies and academic traditions.[2] Indeed, the heterogeneity of the studies on ritual is enormous, ranging from liturgics and religious studies to the social sciences and humanities, from drama and literature to psychology, ethology, and neurobiology.

What Is Ritual?

2. Some researchers have viewed ritual essentially as the means by which culture is passed on from one generation to the next, as the 'key' to → traditions. For others ritual behavior has been fundamental in establishing individual or social → identity. Others again have considered ritual basically a safety valve to release psychological or social pressures. The purposes or functions, moreover, which authors have ascribed to ritual behavior, link up with its perceived origin or cause. Ritual has been alternatively seen as biologically grounded, psychologically engendered, or socially generated. It has been seen as answering a universal human 'need' or, conversely, as a historically based socio-cultural phenomenon. For some, ritual is an essential feature of all human interaction; for others, ritual is confined to specific times and places.

Most authors have agreed that ritual is action: that it is done. This action of course implies bodily involvement. The exact nature of such bodily involvement, however, is subject to much debate. Moreover, the discussion on the nature of bodily performance in ritual is entangled with the issue of consciousness: there is no agreement that ritual action is (wholly) conscious or *un*conscious. The stand an author takes in these matters depends to a great extent on the author's views on → symbols and the nature of their meaning. In fact, the question of → meaning appears to lie at the core of the problem that ritual presents, and most researchers of ritual grapple with this issue.

Contemporary debates on ritual incorporate the postmodern preoccupation with hermeneutics, acknowledging the plurality and contextuality of individual perspectives. At the same time its most important lesson is ignored: that scholarly interpretative endeavors are largely constitutive of their subject. Mostly, the reality of ritual as an objective phenomenon is not doubted. The ever returning question 'what is ritual?' is crucial in this respect. It inspires the effort to formulate 'one coherent theory' of ritual and to describe 'ritual' in a definition which, in turn, leads to further questions on its 'origin' and 'purpose', and to discussions on the adequacy of one theory as compared to another, in capturing the essential qualities of ritual.

A History of the Concept

3. Most of the literature on ritual theory focuses on what has been written about ritual in the nineteenth and early twentieth century, going no further back than Robertson Smith's The Religion of the Semites (1889), Durkheim's Les formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse (1912) or Harrison's Ancient Art and Ritual (1913). Asad (1993) was the first to explore the etymological history of the word 'ritual' and its genesis as a concept, making use of old dictionaries and encyclopedias.

Whereas nowadays it goes without saying that ritual is action, Asad demonstrates that this has not always been the case. It was not until the seventeenth century that the word 'ritual' entered the English language as a substantive conveying either the prescribed order of performing religious services or the book containing such prescriptions. 'Ritual' was thus, at first, a word used to denote a → book. In the first edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1771), 'ritual' was "a book directing the order and manner to be observed in celebrating religious ceremonies, and performing divine service in a particular church, diocese, order, or the like."[3] There was no entry after that for 'rite' or 'ritual' until the eleventh edition (1910), when a completely new entry appeared under 'ritual.' It was no longer the short explanation of a word but had become a five columns long treatise on a phenomenon, linking ritual to psychological and sociological functions and also admitting that ritual is not confined to religion. These notions were absent from the 1771 entry. As such, the conception of ritual as symbolic behavior that is not necessarily religious is entirely modern.

But why was it that 'ritual' came to be conceived as a specific form of action? It is not easy to trace the actual genesis and development of the concept during the latter half of the nineteenth century. First, religious practice was viewed in part as symbolic before 'ritual' came into use as a term referring to religious action. Second, the term 'ritual' was used synonymously with 'rite,' 'religious practice,' 'religious ceremony,' or 'worship' before it became a concept of a specific form of action. Third, it developed in connection with other concepts such as → 'magic' and → 'taboo.' As Sharpe pointed out, the decade from 1859 to 1869 witnessed a rapid development of the evolutionary method in the study of religion, culminating in 'comparative religion.'[4] → 'Religion' was primarily conceived as a system of ideas, and religious practices were viewed as expressions of these ideas. Religious behavior was just a means to retrieve the belief systems of bygone or primitive cultures.

This outlook changed with The Religion of the Semites (1889), in which Robertson Smith emphasized the primacy of religious practice. Thus, religious practice became a subject worthy of study in itself. Furthermore, his argumentation in the matter was important to the conceptualization of 'ritual.' The meaning attached to ritual, Smith argued, is extremely vague: whereas ancient ritual was fixed and obligatory, → myth (i.e. meaning) was variable and 'at the discretion of the worshipper.' Smith used the term 'ritual' as synonymous with 'religious practice' and primarily took it to represent 'fixed' and 'obligatory' behavior. He did not view ritual as an instrument to recover belief: In his view, ritual was analytically separate from 'meaning': Ritual reveals nothing about individual mental states. By placing religious practice in the context of long-term social traditions and disconnecting it from individual mental states, he connected it to the collectivity. As such, religious practice—ritual—became a social fact.

Although it is obvious that Robertson Smith put 'religious practice' on the agenda of scholarly research as a social phenomenon worthy of study, this does not yet explain how 'ritual' came to be seen as a certain type of behavior. Smith used the term 'ritual' as synonymous with 'religious practice' and as having a fixed and obligatory nature. It was part of the vocabulary he employed as a matter of course and had no conceptual status. But by this time religious action had become a separate category of behavior. As Steiner (1956) explained in his treatise on 'taboo,' Victorian scholars became interested in religious behavior—i.e. prescribed ceremonial behavior—because its rule-based nature could not be rationally explained. The interest in 'irrational' rules generated the discussions on 'magic' and 'taboo.' It is no coincidence, then, that the authors who first used the term 'ritual' were not addressing 'ritual' as such, but were focused on explaining the myths and magical rites of savages (Lang 1913), or the nature of taboos in sacrificial rites (Robertson Smith). In the context of these discussions, their use of the term 'ritual' seemed inspired by its original meaning of a script for behavior: Because it had the connotation of 'rules' and 'prescriptions.' In short, recognition of the aspect of 'rules' as characteristic of 'religious action' as a separate category of behavior, may have instigated adoption of the term 'ritual' to refer to 'ordered sequences of religious acts,' 'acts based on (a) ritual,' later to be called 'ritual acts,' which, with the passage of time, became 'ritual.'[5]

Ritual and Psychology

4. From the nineteenth century onwards, most theories have, implicitly or explicitly, awarded a certain role to the → psyche. Ritual was, for instance, said to answer a 'human need' or was traced back to the 'human capacity to symbolize.' As such, ritual was seen as somehow inherent to the human constitution. Today also, it is remarkable how easily ritual is described in psychological terms or how matter-of-course the origin and ultimate function of ritual action are explained in psychological terms.

Rituals are said to be instructive and formative; they are said to convey knowledge, moral values, solidarity, and tradition. Also, ritual is qualified as an instrument for the regulation of human relationships; it is said to further the integration and continuity of human relationships. In this respect, rituals are often characterized as mechanisms that suppress selfish, socially damaging impulses, or, alternatively, as mechanisms which enable the expression or channeling of → emotions. In addition, they are seen as instrumental for both the formation of the individual 'self' and the social identity of the → group.

It is important to note the influence of general psychoanalytic theory on social studies of ritual (→ Psychoanalysis). In this respect, the ritual studies of Victor Turner must be mentioned, because they have been very influential in the field of ritual studies as a whole. As Turner himself explained, psychoanalytic theory had a strong formative influence on his conceptualization of ritual symbolic processes. In his view, implicit social conflicts find a symbolized expression in ritual. The ritual symbolic representations refer to existing social and/or intrapsychic tensions, which are normally unconscious and repressed. Thus, the psychoanalytical interpretation of ritual amounts to the analysis of ritual symbolism.

Next to an interest in psychoanalytic theory, in the last decade of the twentieth century ritual studies profited from a new interest in cognitive psychology within the social sciences and the academic study of religion. Lawson and McCauley (1990; 2002) are distinct proponents of a cognitive approach to ritual action. They present a model designed to chart 'ritual competence': Ritual participants possess cognitive representations of ritual forms, which enable them to competently re-enact specific ritual performances. Their focus is ultimately on mapping the structural features of religious ritual action. Psychological theory is used to identify the universally constant mental processes that are thought to underlie and structure these socio-cultural performances.

Most scholars of ritual tend to take the psychological aspects of ritual behavior as axiomatic. Over-simplifying, one could say that the psychological explanations on which many of the theories in ritual studies are based, often are little more than very general notions—such as 'the human need to symbolize'—functioning as a priori assumptions, which are not questioned or clarified. When, on the other hand, psychological theory serves as an explicit frame of reference—as with psychoanalytic theory or cognitive psychology—it is used to portray the universal psychological conditions that structure the variable social processes of which ritual is a part. Ritual is invariably seen as a social mechanism. The methodology developed to understand ritual—why it exists, how it works—is dependent on the particular psychological theory chosen. Once the psychological constants are established, they themselves are no further discussed but are used to lay bare the supposed universal principles of ritual structure.

The Problematic 'Essence' of Ritual

5. It is generally taken for granted that ritual phenomena present themselves to us to be studied objectively. This assumption is not surprising, since studying ritual initially means studying observable behavior—deeds done, bodily performances—which we strive to understand and explain. In this context many scholars state that it is pre-eminently the task of the researcher—as an outsider—to recover the 'true meaning' or 'underlying structure' of ritual, a meaning or structure of which the performers themselves are frequently said to be unaware. In the course of time, however, research has tended to become detached from the tangible events that gave the initial impetus to scholarly scrutiny, and focus has shifted to theoretical issues: the abstract concept of ritual itself then becoming the object of study.

Already in 1961, Goody addressed the problem of "what is involved in categorizing acts and beliefs as religious, or ritual, or magico-religious."[6] It was not his intention to determine the 'fundamental' meaning of these particular concepts, which he saw as part of the folk categories of Western society. As such, he emphasized, they cannot serve as analytic tools, but are nevertheless the inevitable starting point from which our analytic concepts develop.

In his analysis of the various definitions of religious and ritual phenomena, Goody refuted the Durkheimian assumption that the sacred-profane dichotomy (→ Holy) is a universal feature of how people view the world. Such a criterion for isolating religious or ritual phenomena is derived not from the actor's but from the observer's assessment of what is intrinsic. To take this criterion as universally valid is not only problematic because of definitional complications, but also because it takes as a general principle precisely what needs to be demonstrated in each particular case.

In 1977, Goody again addressed the definitional problem.[7] He discerned two general approaches to 'ritual.' On the one hand, 'ritual' is seen as an aspect of all social action. Consequently, the definition of ritual embraces almost all action that is standardized in some way. This concept includes such a broad range of activities, that it has no analytic utility and is certain to give rise to a proliferation of 'subcategories.' On the other hand, 'ritual' is looked upon as a category of action that requires a special kind of interpretation. In this case, the problem is to determine the criterion that distinguishes 'ritual' from 'non-ritual' behavior. Such a criterion cannot be found. Goody discussed a few of the criteria commonly postulated, such as the qualification of ritual behavior as 'formal' and 'repetitive.' As he pointed out, routinization, regularization, and repetition are at the basis of social life itself and thus cannot serve as distinctive criteria. In the same way, the analysis of ritual in terms of 'meaning' has been highly problematic. Meanings change in two different ways. First, meanings are often forgotten or elaborated. Second, in the course of time new social experiences engender new meanings and affect the entire fabric of meaning. What, then, is the meaning of a ritual event? Is it the 'original' meaning (and how does one recover that meaning?), or is it the meaning attributed by the actual performers? But the central meaning of a ritual event is not always evident to all the members of the social group enacting it. Interpretations of ritual differ, because it is inherent to ritual that meanings are communicated in a partial and superficial way, which induces performers, indigenous onlookers and outsiders, such as ritual researchers, to devise their own interpretations.

Final remark

6. Considering the vagueness of the term 'ritual' and the impossibility of adequately defining it, Goody rejected the use of the concept, except as a highly generalized pointer that needs to be translated every time it is used. His adequate assessment of the definitional problem, however, has not been able to put a stop to the debate.[8] It remains to be seen if discussions have really moved beyond Goody's identification of the theoretical deadlocks and impossibilities involved in the definition of ritual.

1. Leach 1968, 526.
2. Grimes 1982, xii.
3. Asad 1993, 56; see also Buc 2001.
4. Sharpe 1986, 27f.
5. Boudewijnse 1998.
6. Goody 1961, 142.
7. Goody 1977, 25-35.
8. See, for example, Bell 1992; Platvoet 1995; Kreinath et al. 2004 and 2005.

Literature

Asad, Talal, "Toward a Genealogy of the Concept of Ritual," in: Idem, Genealogies of Religion, Baltimore 1993, 55-79; Bell, Catherine, Ritual Theory, Ritual Practice, New York 1992; Boudewijnse, Henriëtte Barbara, "British Roots of the Concept of Ritual," in: Molendijk, Arie L./Pels, Peter. (eds.), Religion in the Making: The Emergence of the Science of Religion, Leiden 1998, 277-295; Buc, Philippe, The Dangers of Ritual: Between Early Medieval Texts and Social Scientific Theory, Princeton 2001; Goody, Jack, "Religion and Ritual: The Definitional Problem," in: British Journal of Sociology 12 (1961), 142-164; Idem, "Against 'Ritual': Loosely Structured Thoughts on a Loosely Defined Topic," in: Moore, Sally F./Myerhoff, Barbara G. (eds.), Secular Ritual, Assen 1977, 25-35; Grimes, Ronald L., Beginnings in Ritual Studies, Washington 1982; Kreinath, Jens et al. (eds.), The Dynamics of Changing Rituals, New York 2004; Kreinath, Jens et al. (eds.), Theorizing Rituals: Topics, Approaches, Concepts. With an Annotated Bibliography, Leiden 2005; LANG, Andrew, Myth, Ritual and Religion, 2 vols., London 1887; LAWSON, E. Thomas/MCCAULEY, Robert N., Rethinking Religion: Connecting Cognition and Culture, Cambridge 1990; Idem, Bringing Ritual to Mind: Psychological Foundations of Cultural Forms, Cambridge 2002; LEACH, Edmund R., "Ritual," in: SHILS, David L. (ed.), International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, New York 1968, 520-526; PLATVOET, Jan G., "Ritual in Plural and Pluralist Societies. Instruments for Analysis," in: PLATVOET, Jan G./VAN DER TOORN, Karel (eds.), Pluralism and Identity: Studies in Ritual Behaviour, Leiden 1995, 25-51; SHARPE, Eric J., Comparative Religion: A History, La Salle [2]1986; SMITH, W. Robertson, The Religion of the Semites, New York 1956 ([1]1889); STEINER, Franz, Taboo, London 1956; TURNER, Victor W., The Ritual Process, New York 1977; Idem, "Encounter with Freud: The Making of a Comparative Symbologist," in: SPINDLER, George D. (ed.), The Making of Psychological Anthropology, Berkeley 1977, 558-583.

→ Communication, Drama (Sacred), Feasts and Celebrations, Initiation, Liturgy, Meaning/Signification, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Rites of Passage

Barbara Boudewijnse

Road / Path / Journey

Path—Journey—Life Journey

1. Sedentary states and stationary existence entail no situation of risk. Only the journey—in the broadest sense, the journey of life—rouses the need for an orientation such that, even in a strange environment, one may possess a firm reference to one's own identity, and to fundamental principles. Before a traveler, dangers lie, along with the experience of insecurity and extreme situations, but with progress, and the development of fresh impressions, as well. Any tourist has already had at least the beginnings of this experience. The knowledge and discovery that all of life consists of changes, and that persons seek a goal for their life journey, had the effect that, in many religions, the symbol 'way' was appropriated as a description of life. This life-journey aims for distinct goals in different religious cultures: heaven, nirvana, the realm of light, or God. This religious context includes even the journeys of the altogether everyday.

Cultic and Mythic Assurance of Roads and Paths

2. Paths and roads are ways for travel and traffic. From the path through the rain forest to the superhighway, they make it possible for persons to have mobility, and to engage in communication. The construction and ongoing maintenance of travel networks are among the great achievements of the ancient high cultures. Thus, the world of the Greek city-states consisted of small stretches of land, amidst impassable mountainous country that needed to be conquered by paths or roads for 'cars and carts.' Against the perils of the route, busts were erected, as cultic protection along the overland way. Originally—as in the Himalaya region, or on Alpine crossings—these were probably heaps of stones (in Gk., hérma) on which each traveler placed one stone. The rite was to mark the route in prevailing use, as well as to provide a magical appeasement of unfavorable powers, and thus to secure the success of the journey. Since the Peisistratide era (end of the sixth century BCE), the Athenian network of routes had a peculiar form of image, a pillar with an erect phallus and a bearded head—a milestone, a fertility symbol, the seat of the God Hermes (as embodiment of the hérma), and a sign of rule all in

Two guardian figures watch over a road on the Indonesian island of Bali. The elevated throne provides a good vantage, and, along with the honorific umbrellas, lends dignity and authority. Pairs of 'watchers' like these frequently protect the entrance of a temple: there they mark the place of crossing into sacred space. The figures here have been clothed in aprons of poleng material. Unlike other, finer and expensive materials, poleng is woven of only two kinds of thread, or, as shown here, is printed in a checkerboard pattern. The black-and-white pattern of the poleng stands for the opposites in the whole, the twofold principle, whose place in the Balinese world-image is decisive. Spatially, they provide the orientation of the Balinese system: north and south, sunrise and sunset, and especially, those topographical opposites of the island, mountain and sea. Furthermore, the colors are attributed divine and demonic qualities, respectively: white stands for the arts of healing and the ability to apply them, black stands for the injuries of the insalubrious. The guardians wear poleng as a sign that they are protectors, as well, and ready to offer defense, and therefore are at the right place when stationed on critical stretches of roads, and at crossings. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Someone, about midnight on December 30, 1986, has built an altar, with sacrificial gifts for Pomba Gira, at the place where a road intersects with Avenida Atlántica, at the southern end of Copacabana Beach in Rio de Janeiro. The goddess is being offered candles, cachaca whiskey, cigarettes, and a red rose. This devotional practice shows a connection, not untypical for Brazil, to religious elements from West Africa and Congo. The West African deity who watches over intersections, known to the Yoruba as Eshu Elegba, and in Dahomey as Legba, is of the male sex, and is frequently represented with an erect phallus. The kind of apparition of Brazilian Exu (related to Yoruba "Eshu") specific for Rio is female, and her name Pomba Gira is derived from the Ki-Congo word mpambu zila ('crossroad'). The inflammable gifts (candles, whiskey, cigarettes), as well, point to the religious practice of Congo. The cigarettes offered here at the T-shaped intersection have been arranged in the shape of miniature crossroads. It may be that here, the protection of the goddess has been besought in order to find an escape from a particularly dangerous situation, perhaps in the life of business or love. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

one.[1] At forks and crossroads that were particularly dangerous for travelers—a badly beaten path could lead one astray—stood the three-faced image of Hecate (Trioditis; Lat. Trivia), before whom food was set and to whom dogs were sacrificed. Members of African diaspora religions in the Americas present sacrifices to their gods today, at crossroads in the metropolises (see plate).

Routes within one's own country were unsure, but journeys across the sea or to other countries were perilous. As the full dimensions of the earth were not yet grasped, one expected, on far journeys, to arrive directly at the limits of the world—a concept that prevailed in Europe until the discovery of America. In Brittany and Galicia, respectively, the extreme westerly point of land is still called Land's End or Finisterre (in Lat., finis terrae, 'end of the earth'). Adventure stories like those of the voyages of Odysseus, in which travel reports were interwoven, along with sailors' yarns and local sagas with stories of gods and monsters, into an imaginary geography, were recounted in early antiquity—rather as, today, science fiction offers speculation on the nature or condition of remote planets.

Invisible Companions on a Journey and Places of Security

Whether the land route or the sea route was used, in either case, and until well into the modern age, travelers turned for protection to invisible companions, with prayers and rites of sacrifice. Hermes, messenger of the gods, with his winged feet, was accounted at once a guardian on journeys and a companion for the passage to the realm of the dead. Egyptian god Thoth, likewise esteemed as companion for the dead, was identified with Hermes. In Jewish and Christian popular belief, it is the guardian → angels who, to this day, are deemed to offer travelers protection from assaults and accidents. Since the beginning of historical traditions, there have been locations of protection, and stretches of route, for which special, often locally limited, divinities were responsible (see plate). The 'dream paths' of the Australian → Aborigines consisted of a network of landmarks (formations of stone or hills, pools, water holes), regarded as dwellings of the totem ancestors, or places of their activity. Their wanderings provided the outlines for mythological maps that showed where primordial tales unfolded. Here were the inhabited regions, and the stories served for the orientation of the nomadic tribes. Even in Iceland, this kind of mythic awareness has endured to this day. There, based on received tradition, detours have even been built in the automobile routes, so that they not make any incursions into 'fairyland.'

Pilgrimage Routes

Along with 'sacred areas,' regions that ought not to be built up, and not opened with paths or roads, there are other places, as well, that are precisely places of pilgrimage, to which roads have now led for millennia. The Qur'an prescribes the pilgrimage (the Hajj) to → Mecca. In the High Middle Ages, the Christian 'ways,' as well, were heavily traveled. The high routes ran to Canterbury, in England, from Paris; to → Santiago de Compostela; from Paris and Central Europe to → Rome; and from Rome to → Jerusalem. The western way to Rome, called the Roman or "Frankish Way" (Via Francigena), ran through the Val d'Aosta (Graian Alps), Piedmont, Lombardy, Emilia Romagna, Liguria, Tuscany, and Latium. It was lined with chapels, churches, and pilgrim hospices. Pilgrims moved in bunches, in their special togs and gear that identified them as pilgrims in all countries and lands, over the Alps. Along the way, they made music and sang, playing bagpipes, lyres, and mandolins, and praying. All of this can still be observed in Southern Italy today.

Signposts

Sacred structures line medieval and modern pilgrimage routes, as they did in antiquity, but along with more modest religious 'signposts': at crossings, or at images on these posts, pilgrims can recite prayers; sacred cabins invite them in to rest, and offer protection from the inclemency of the weather. Stations of the Way of the Cross guide processions. Over the course of centuries, a religious → landscape has taken shape that is traversed still today, available to physical experience. Pilgrim paths are still used throughout the year. With the use of bus, rail, and automobile, of course, pilgrim routes have been radically abbreviated, and become invisible, so to speak. Walks of days and weeks ('foot pilgrimages') have become exotic exceptions. Signposts miss their targets, along the highways and railroads. Only a few, isolated highway churches are still reminiscent of pre-industrial religious practice.

Processional Roads and Ways

A special, very old type of sacred way is the processional road. It is always solidly connected with one or more sacred structures, and serves mobile cultic activities (→ Procession). It may possibly be found in the megalith cultures (Stonehenge), and is certainly at hand in the ancient high cultures, such as the (Ram) Sphinx Avenues among the temple areas in Egyptian Karnak, the cultic district of Delphi, or the "Holy Street" from Miletus to Didyma (Ionia), and the Via Sacra on the Forum Romanum in → Rome. In Catholic regions, one finds the Way of the Cross and 'Holy Mountains' (Piedmont, Varallo, Domodossola), or a Mount Calvary (Brittany). In this fashion, on Good Friday the faithful can symbolically accomplish the history of the suffering of Jesus Christ, his last walk, to the place of his execution, along the pathway of the 'Stations of the Cross.' The best-known example is the Via Dolorosa, in Jerusalem's Old City, the route that corresponds to the original scenic presentation of the New Testament event (→ Jerusalem). In cities, particularly in those of the Mediterranean region, the streets are symbolically divided into processional routes, so that urban space serves both for the presentation of a sacred act and for a communal devotion.

Religion in a Backpack

3. The religions have traveled the routes and ways of persons. Trade routes, such as the → Silk Route, document the history of the expansion of the great systems of belief. The very founders, such as the → Buddha, → Jesus of Nazareth, or Mani (→ Manichaeism) often trekked busy ways in their preaching. 'Missionizing' religions (→ Mission; Proselytes), such as Christianity, use the communication structures of the trade routes for their expansion, such as the primitive Christian mission of the Apostle Paul, and the Iro-Scottish preachers of the sixth to the eighth centuries. Wherever merchants set their courses, there, still today, they bring their religions. Thus, since 1990, it is not only merchandise that members of American faith communities have been exporting to Russia, but Calvinistic principles, too. The religion that has spread only by way of television broadcasts and books, without personal contacts with teachers, was unknown before the present day.

Spiritual Paths: Path of Life, Journey to the Beyond, and Arts of the Way

4. Pilgrim paths and processional routes are 'localities' that can be actually apprehended, part of human traffic systems, created for the activities of walking, riding, traveling. From them is derived the great, widespread picture of the spiritual way. In different cultures, the religious symbol of 'journey' is that of a journey to a remote (final) goal, or of a return to an earlier point. Accordingly, the life of the individual believer can be seen graphically as a 'path of life,' which is to be brought under control, and which, in some instances, can be prolonged, with a 'trans-ition'—a 'going across'—to other worlds, or a journey to the beyond.

Moral Ways

A familiar motif in many religious traditions is that of a person's decision between a morally good and morally evil way or path. It occurs in conjunction not only with the passage into another realm after death, of course, but also with the life decisions of maturation ('Hercules at the fork in the road'; edifying and instructive images of pietism). In literature, often at the end of a lengthy road stands the transformation and elevation of the 'real' journey into a journey to spiritual worlds. Now the route itself becomes the dramatic stage of wisdom, and the seeker after truth is transformed and elevated as well. In one of the most ancient known epics, the Babylonian saga of Gilgamesh, demigod Gilgamesh investigates his fate by wandering from place to place. A 'human scorpion' asks him: "Wherefore hast thou traversed so long a road, indeed hast come out to me, hast crossed laboriously to encumbering streams? I would fain know with what thou art concerned!" Gilgamesh responds: "For the sake of Utnapishtum, my forebear! That one stepped into the divine chariot, went to life! Of life and death will I ask him!"[2] The 'nomadic alternative' (Bruce Chatwin) of the achievement of knowledge along routes and ways transforms everyday experience into 'spiritual.'

Passages to the Beyond

However, religions have their directions, and know road markers, over ways to unknown worlds as well: namely, for the assumption into heaven, and the passage to the Realm of the Dead. Detailed descriptions were given by the Indians of South America, by the shamans of Mongolia and Siberia, in ancient gnostic documents, and in the tokens of the 'valleys of the dead' that accompanied the members of ancient Greek Orphic unification cults into their graves, descriptions handed down and recorded—to prevent believers from taking the wrong path to the beyond.

Teachings and Arts of the Way

Small wonder, in the presence of this pregnant abundance of word and act, if in many religions, 'path' can stand metaphorically for religious practice across the board, indeed for the religious community itself. Thus, 'the way' (in Gk., hê hodós; as early as post-Exilic Judaism, Heb., derekh) is the self-designation of the primitive Christian community (e.g. Acts 9:2, 19:9). Buddhism's orientation is to the Eightfold Path (in Skt., ashtangika-mārga), and to the great and small 'vehicles' (in Skt., Mahāyāna, hīnayāna. Dao or dao/dō, the onomastic basic concept of → Daoism, also means 'way,' to which relate the Chinese-Japanese arts of the way—kyū-dō, 'way of the bow,' ken-dō, 'way of the sword,' etc. (→ Martial Arts) It is easy to follow a transfer of the conceptualization of the 'way' to the notion of a spiritual route in Islam, as well. There, the concept sunna originally meant the habitual way of the Bedouin tribes to drinking water. In the transferred sense, the Islamic concept is applied in religious linguistic usage for the 'wont' (especially that of the Prophet), as concerning the life or certain pronouncements of the Prophet. This is the derivation of today's (self-) designation of the Sunnites, the followers of one of the two large subgroups in Islam (along with the Shia; → Islam).

The Way as Goal

5. In Romanticism, wandering became an ideal, and a religious experience. Novalis wrote of the quest for the 'blue flower' (Heinrich von Ofterdingen, 1802), which became the model for the longings of the later Wanderjugend. With the construction of highways, driving and 'moving ahead' often itself became the ecstatic experience (with travelers 'drunk with velocity' and automotive 'freedom'), and not arrival at a sacred place. On the other hand, beginning in the 1950s, beatniks and hippies resumed the quest for meaning 'on the road'—the programmatic title of Jack Kerouac's novel (1958). Some found a new object for their spiritual quest in India. With nothing but a backpack, they demonstrated an alternative route, one that departed the material world and the 'establishment' (even the Christian religious one), and turned to quasi-monastic communes like the → Osho movement ashram in Poona, in India. Political movements, in the tradition of the worker movement, likewise use the street as their public place: the 1970s and 1980s were the great period of the demonstrations and Easter parades of the peace movement, and of the opponents of atomic power. Everyday life in modern times is of course becoming more and more independent of consecrated places. Persons are becoming ever freer from sacred time and holy place. Considered superficially, the churches, mosques, temples, and synagogues are enclaves in a 'rationalized' culture. Perhaps, however, this is not actually the way it is. In many countries, upon dismissing or taking one's leave of a person, it is still customary to commend her or him to God. The French say 'Adieu,' the Spanish 'Adios,' the Germans 'Ade,' and those whose language is English, 'Goodbye' ('God be with you').

1. Wrede, Henning, "Herme," in RAC 14 (1988), 701-722; Burkert, Walter, Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical, Oxford 1985.
2. Schott, Albert/von Soden, Wolfram (eds.), Das Gilgamesch-Epos, Stuttgart 1982 ([1]1958), plate IX.

Literature

Dean-Otting, Mary, Heavenly Journeys: A Study of the Motif in Hellenistic Jewish Literature, Frankfurt/M. 1984; Freeman, Michael/Shearer, Alistair, The Spirit of Asia: Journeys to the Sacred Places of the East, London 2000; Himmelfarb, Martha, Ascent to Heaven in Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, New York/Oxford 1993; Housden, Roger, Sacred Journeys in a Modern World, New York 1998; Morinis, Alan (ed.), Sacred Journeys: The Anthropology of Pilgrimage, Westport 1992; Nussbaum, O., "Geleit," in: RAC 9 (1976), 908-1049.

→ Landscape, Pilgrimage, Place (Sacred), Tourism

Esther Kraus

Romanticism

On the Concept

1. The roots of the word 'romantic' lie in the Old French folk substantive romanz. The adjective was first transferred, in 1680 at the latest, to England, with the ambivalent signification (still retained today) of a sublimation (of some reality) with an orientation to interiority. Further: 'Romanticism' in the stricter sense identifies the era, almost entirely German, in the history of culture, between classicism or the Enlightenment and early industrialization—an era dated c. 1786/98 to 1815/35. Here was a period in which precisely the 'aestheticizing' contemplation of reality adapted itself to the program of the "art that incites the disposition of the heart" (Novalis) that transcended all types of culture. Instead of the old, chronological, interior differentiation of the era into early, high, and late Romanticism, an internal differentiation gradually got under way, listing specific forms of the various (literary, artistic, musical, political, religious, etc.) 'Romanticisms.' Each of the latter had its own developmental history—and of course, giving names to 'classic' Romantic products of art now became correspondingly more difficult. Somewhat less disputed is the notion that the programs of Romanticism can be found especially with the early Friedrich Schlegel, while, on the other hand, the theory of Romanticism will be that of August Wilhelm Schlegel's Berlin lectures, "Über schöne Kunst und Literatur" (Ger., "Fine Arts and Literature"; 1801–1804) or Viennese lectures, "Über dramatische Kunst und Literatur" (Ger., "Dramatic Art and Literature"; 1898).

On the Religious Structure of Experience of Nature

2. The extent to which this systematization of the Romantic, from the very beginning, possessed a religious 'inner lining' will best be grasped in the classic formulae of Romanticism's own self-exposition. Thus, Novalis (i.e., Friedrich von Hardenberg) designates the sense of Romanticism as that of giving "the common a high sense, the ordinary a mysterious aspect, the known the worth of the unknown, the finite a glow of the infinite."[1] Jean Paul explains: "The Romantic is the Beautiful without limit, or the beautiful Infinite";[2] and Bettina von Arnim can even describe the entire Romantic artistic endeavor as a "spelling out of the divine (creative) 'Let there be . . .' "[3] In the several governing Romantic means of expression, not only in literature, but in all of the arts, the experience of nature is sublimated in the lyrical, the symbolical, the allegorical, and the mythological (→ Nature). One and all, they serve to bring to expression the indicative character of the earthly (Eichendorff), and the infinite as interwoven with the finite: "The higher world is closer to us than we ordinarily think [. . .]. Most intimately, we glimpse it interwoven with nature."[4] Especially, it is to this 'aestheticizing' event itself—and not only to the finalized artistic product, for example, the presentation of a → landscape as a religious object (C. D. Friedrich)—that the specifically religious valence adapts itself. Its roots lie partly in the discovery of the pre- and subconscious (K. Ph. Moritz, C. G. Carus), and partly—in connection with the former—in a professionalizing of the direction of perception to the organic, in which the practice of the perception of a landscape advances to constitute the paradigm of religious perception. Consequently, the artistic and the religious practice of the 'productive aesthetic' also runs its course in its quality as bolster of the strivings of art and religion for 'autonomization.' Thus, these practices are comparable to each other in their tendency not only to liquefy all 'solid orders,' and set them flowing, but also to absolutize the areas of art and religion (→ Art Religion). Simultaneously, of course, one observes a progressive fusion of this religious dimension of Romanticism with the institutionalized forms of Christian, especially Roman Catholic, religion, church, and theology. It effects a waxing uniformity, and partly, as well, a clericalization of the Romantic Movement.

This movement accompanies a 'type switch' within its community of protagonists, and leads to its abandonment by its one-time vehicles—H. Heine, 1835, for example, with the remarkable self-characterization that he was a romantique defroqué (Fr., 'unfrocked Romantic'), a Romantic who has discarded the vesture of the order's 'habit.'

On Religious Practice

3. To be sure, these developments were favored by the fact that tendencies creative of religion emerged so early in the literary, philosophical, and artistic Romantics. Literary Romanticism had long since evinced a certain affinity for Christianity—especially, for example, for 'book piety.' This tendency registers in the manifold attempts—that furthered the self-presentation of the Romantic Movement—at a functional literary canon-formation:

- Ludwig Tieck's rediscovery of the Old German minnesinger literature (1803);
- The collection of old German Lieder, under the title Des Knaben Wunderhorn (Ger., "The Boy's Miraculous Horn"), due to the friendship of Achim von Arnim and Clemens von Brentano;
- The 'discovery,' of fairytales and folk myths, by Joseph Görres (Die teutschen Volksbücher (Ger., "The Old-German Folk Books"; 1807; Altdeutsche Volks- und Meisterlieder (Ger., "Old-German Folk and Troubadour Lieder"; 1817), as well as of that of the Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Ger., "Children's and Home Fairytales"; 1812–1815) by the Brothers Grimm;
- Finally, the turn to the 'night side of religion,' to mysticism, ecstatic elevation, possession, magic (J. Görres, Die christliche Mystik, Ger., "Christian Mysticism," 4 vols.; 1836–1842), as well as to symbolism, mythology, and secret doctrine (Friedrich Creuzer, Symbolik und Mythologie der alten Völker, besonders der Griechen, Ger., "Symbolism and Mythology of the Ancient Peoples, Especially the Greek," 4 vols.; 1810–1812).

This affinity favored the constructions—intended to attach to and surpass Christianity—of a messianic 'new mythology,' with F. Schlegel, or a triadically structured panentheism, with Novalis. Formally, these dimensions of Romanticism that are akin to Christianity were fashioned in such a way as to be useful for institutionalized Christianity; but then, their utility would next be on the Evangelical side, namely, in Friedrich Schleiermacher's conception of autonomous Christian piety, and his Christological sketch of a convergence between God's self-revelation and the immediate self-awareness of the religious subject.

The Movement of Catholic Romanticism

On the Catholic side, on the other hand, one could actually speak of a formal movement of 'Catholic Romanticism,' that, between 1800 and about 1850, established various local and personal centers of gravity. Thus, in Münster, a group formed around Count Stolberg, in Landshut around J.-M. Sailer, and, in Vienna particularly around Friedrich Schlegel (who converted to Catholicism in 1808), C. M. Hofbauer, and preacher Zacharias Werner. In Munich, Franz von Baader seeks ties with theosophical traditions, Joseph Görres with the tradition of a primitive religion, and Clemens von Brentano with mysticism. Johann Adam Möhler (Symbolik, oder Darstellung der dogmatischen Gegensätze der Katholiken und Protestanten, Ger., "Symbolism, or Presentation of the Dogmatic Oppositions of the Catholics and Protestants"; 1832), and Franz Anton Staudenmaier (Der Geist des Christentums, "The Spirit of Christianity," 2 vols.; 1835) were with the Catholic Tübingen school around Johann Sebastian Drey. Through these thinkers' program of a connection between historical and speculative thought, Catholic Romanticism also gained influence in the academic theological milieu.

On the Dimension of the Social, Political, and Sociological

4. Religion-impregnated Romanticism is characterized by a societal and future-related pathos of change, that, in multiple respects, evinces functional equivalents to the French Revolution, modeled on specifically German relations. These modelings bear especially on the fact that, from the beginning, the concept of Romanticism fostered individual and collective orientation that restricted religious and political elements. Correspondingly, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, in the context of Europe's political 'new order,' the religious and the national dimensions of the Romantic Movement turn out to be inseparable. This correlation is copied once again in the sociogram of those groups of Romantics who—as F. Schlegel put it, early in his writing—came forward with the aim, externally, of a new Church, but internally, with that of a republican community.

This limitation of the religious and the national is also shown, for example, by the fact that, in both areas, the Romantics' durable 'movements of quest' obey parallel dynamics. To the gradual reshaping of Romanticism's religious dimension—from the philosophical to the mystical mode—corresponds the gradual reshaping of the 'political national' dimension of Romanticism: from the form inspired by revolution, to the republican and conservative form, to apocalyptical forms. The history of the development of Romanticism, then, in the area of the religious, as in the area of the 'political national,' reveals a tendency—resting on reciprocal causality—to the gradual 'self-hermeticization' of the Romantic protagonists.

Reception

Part of the contemporary criticism of Romanticism was directed against the Romantic Movement's 'mustily Catholic' medieval yen (H. Heine); and part comported the attempt to validate basic liberal Protestant propositions mounted against the restoration of clerical Romanticism (J. H. Voss, with an appeal to the Hegelian criticism of T. Echtermeyer and A. Ruge). The striking thing is that the great nineteenth-century critics of Romanticism (Goethe, Heine, Haym, Kierkegaard, → Nietzsche, Wagner) actually, in the most varied ways, remain tied to its fundamental ideas, and thereby reflect the movement's inner ambivalence. Then, again, twentieth-century reception of Romanticism (C. Schmitt, W. Benjamin, G. Lukács, E. Troeltsch, J. Habermas, M. Frank) prefers to concentrate on these ambivalences, such as, for instance, the obvious simultaneity of Romanticism's progressive and the reactionary elements. Yet to be elucidated, in terms of the history of scholarship, would be, for instance, the emergence of the history of religion and myth from the spirit of Romanticism (G. F. Creuzer, J. Görres, J. J. Bachofen), the roots of the expansion of norm criticism and perspective, in the religious theories of the nineteenth century, to the 'existential' phenomena of piety from the spirit of Romantic aesthetics, and the genre-specific multiplicity of literary publicists' expressive forms of 'existential' piety.

1. Novalis, Schriften. Die Werke Friedrich von Hardenbergs, ed. Paul Kluckhohn et al., vol. 2, Stuttgart [2]1960, 545.
2. Jean Paul, SW 1/5, Vorschule der Ästhetik, ed. Norbert Miller, Frankfurt/M. 1996, 88.
3. Bettina von Arnim, Werke und Briefe, vol. 2, ed. Gustav Konrad, Frechen 1959, 287f.
4. Novalis, Heinrich von Ofterdingen, 2nd ed., KS 1:289.

Literature

Adorno, Theodor W., "Zum Gedächtnis Eichendorffs" (1957/58), in: Gesammelte Schriften 11, 69-94; Brinkmann, Richard (ed.), Romantik in Deutschland, Stuttgart 1979; Cunningham, Andrew/Jardine, Nicholas (eds.), Romanticism and the Sciences, Cambridge 1990; Curran, Stuart (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to British Romanticism, Cambridge 1993; Frank, Manfred, "Unendliche Annäherung": Die Anfänge der philosophischen Frühromantik, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Jasper, David (ed.), The Interpretation of Belief: Coleridge, Schleiermacher and Romanticism, Basingstoke 1986; Reardon, Bernard M. G., Religion in the Age of Romanticism: Studies in Early Nineteenth Century Thought, Cambridge 1985; Riasanovsky, Nicholas V., The Emergence of Romanticism, New York 1992; Rigby, Kate, Topographies of the Sacred: The Poetics of Place in European Romanticism, Charlottesville 2004; Roe, Nicholas (ed.), Romanticism: An Oxford Guide, Oxford 2005; Williamson, George S., The Longing for Myth in Germany: Religion and Aesthetic Culture from Romanticism to Nietzsche, Chicago 2004; Wu, Duncan, A Companion to Romanticism, Oxford 1998.

→ Art Religion, Emotions/Feelings, Landscape, Nature, Nature Piety, Revolution

Christian Albrecht

Rome

1. The city of Rome is unlikely to be overlooked in a context of the political and religious history of Europe. A person speaking altogether generally of Rome does not usually have in mind the capital of Italy, with some three million inhabitants, but the former center of the Roman Empire, or the center of Catholic Christianity. Rome's function as a religious center is solidly fastened in the consciousness of Western culture.

Unlike → Jerusalem, however, Rome was never a 'holy' city in the strict sense. Rome did not receive its special role principally by way of a religious meaning, but first and foremost by way of the fact that it was the capital city of the Imperium Romanum. Even when it had lost this function in late antiquity, the political claim to be the 'head of the world' (caput mundi) was maintained under the popes until into the Middle Ages, and finally, was briefly revived under Mussolini and Italian Fascism.

Rome attained to the status of a supra-regional religious center only late, in its capacity as seat of the Catholic popes. Their claim on a leading role within Christianity was originally derived from the fact that, on the one hand, as bishops of Rome, they were the de facto successors of the Roman emperors as metropolitan rulers of the caput mundi, and on the other, they stood in the direct succession of the Apostle Peter, and therefore enjoyed a special role in religious questions. The popes' 'primacy of jurisdiction,' deduced from that special role by Catholic theology—that is, the claim on the right to ultimate decision-making in questions of religious law—has always been rejected by other Christian churches. In most Orthodox Churches, nevertheless, a 'primacy of honor' ascribed to the Roman bishops is regarded as altogether acceptable. In this sense, then, among the various episcopal sees, the City of Rome is still accorded the primacy.

Goethe House
Lutheran church
Vatican City-State, Seat of Pope as head of Catholic Church
Ara Pacis (Altar of Peace) Augustan cult of ruler and state
All Saints
San Giovanni (Marone) Lebanese Maronite Church
Vatican Museums, Largest collection of antiquities in the world, incl. Apollo Belvedere Santissima Trinità dei Monti
Augustus Mausoleum
Piazza di Spagna
Chiesa Valdese
San Basilio Armenian church
Castel Sant' Angelo, Until end of City-State, refuge of the popes
Santa Maria della Vittoria Bernini's statue of St. Teresa of Avila in rapture
Palazzo di Propaganda Fide, Congregation of the Faith Mission center (formerly Inquisition)
University of Rome (state university)
Campo Verano Main cemetery Feast of All Saints, Nov. 1
San Lorenzo fuori le Mura
Saint Peter's Basilica, Chief church of Catholicism, Memorial of Apostle Peter Collegio Teutonico Camposanto Teutonico
Fontana di Trevi Tourists' magical offer of money
Pantheon, Best-preserved Roman temple; built 27 BCE
Jewish cemetery
Pontificia Università Gregoriana Jesuit university
Oratory of the Philippines / Chiesa Nuova ("New Church") Gathering place of Counter-Reformation Oratorians Order of St. Philip Neri
The Gesu Chief church of Jesuit Order Grave of Ignatius Loyola
Santa Maria Maggiore Cult of Mary
National Memorial: Vittorio Emanuele II, first king of a united Italy (d. 1878)
Campo de Fiori, Execution site of papal Rome, Constructed 1900 Statue of Giordano Bruno (burned 1600) Cultic place of Freethinkers and Enlighteners
Santa Maria in Aracoeli (Child Jesus), At the place of the former Juno Moneta
Lapis Niger Grave of Romulus; sacrificial pit
San Pietro in Vincoli Michelangelo's statue of Moses Synagogue Former Ghetto
Forum Romano
Church of Saint Cecilia Grave of St. Cecelia, early Christian martyr and patron of music
Colosseum Consecrated to Christian martyrs by Benedict XIV Papal Way of the Cross
San Clemente Former Mithraeum
Santa Maria in Cosmedin Bocca di Verità Oracle of Wisdom
Holy Cross in Jerusalem
Basilica dei SS. Giovanni e Paolo, Built over home of Pammachius, 4th cent., With Confessio
Circus Maximus
San Giovanni in Laterano Pope's church as Bishop of Rome
1 Spanish Steps, Statue of Mary Handicapped blessed by Pope on Feast of the Immaculate Conception, Dec. 8
Protestant cemetery
2 Vesta Temple, House of Vestals, Sacred Fire
ROME
F.D.2005
Roman and other ancient religions
Christianity of early and late antiquity, and Middle Ages
Catholicism
Catholic Patriarchal Basilica and church of pilgrimage
Catholic church of pilgrimage
Anglican Protestant Waldenses
Other Christian churches
Judaism
Islam
Popular religions
Art religion
National Memorial
0 250 500 m

The Rome of Ancient Times

2. According to tradition, Rome was founded by Romulus in 753 BCE. This tale is a legend, granted, but it is true that the earliest archaeological traces of a settlement on the Palatine Hill can be dated back as far as the eighth century BCE. The interesting thing here is that the founding of the city is connected with a religious action: Romulus plows a furrow around the future city area, and determines the so-called Pomerium, the sacred center of the city, from which everything military is banned. Thus, the Comitia Centuriata, the republican popular assemblies, which were organized according to the military census, might take place only outside of this district. The military power of the consuls also came into force only with the abandonment of the Pomerium. Regular troops were not permitted—at least originally—within this district. From the fourth century BCE, to be sure, the area of the Roman settlement was no longer identical with 'sacred' Rome, although the sacred boundary continued to stand.

First and foremost, Roman religion always was a city religion, and the Rome of antiquity never attained to the status of a supra-regional religious center. Nearly all priests and other religious officers were responsible for Roman city worship alone. The Emperor himself, as 'High Priest' (Pontifex Maximus)—contrary to common opinion—had no oversight over all other non-Roman religions and cults in the Empire. The office of Pontifex Maximus was always an office of the city of Rome, and not of the Empire. Only the popes, after adopting this title, connected it with a universal claim.

From the outset, to be sure, Rome was a kind of religious melting pot. All great cults and religious communities of the Imperium Romanum (for example, the devotion to Mithras, or the Jews) were also to be found in Rome. This presence, however, resulted from the fact that the city was the capital of the Empire, and not from any status of Rome as a 'holy' city. No one went on 'pilgrimage' to Rome on religious grounds. Immigrants often brought in new cults, such as that of Isis, or of Serapis. Surely there was the religio-political tendency, even in the early Republic, officially to introduce important devotions and deities from other regions: in 396 BCE, Juno of Veji; in 293 BC, Asclepius of Epidaurus; or 204 BCE, the Magna Mater, from Pessinus in Asia Minor.

Christian Rome

3. The beginnings of Christianity in Rome reach back to the first century. It was only in late antiquity, however, under Emperor Constantine I (reigned 306–337), that Christians began to mark the image of the city of Rome. While their assemblies had previously been held in private homes (not, as frequently imagined, in the catacombs, which were only burial places), now the Emperor financed great sacred edifices. True, he most often had them built outside the city center, and not on public property; and yet on imperial domain. Of particular importance are:

1. The Basilica of Saint Peter (San Pietro), on the Vatican Hill, built over the supposed grave of the Apostle Peter, and today the center of the ecclesiastical papal state;

2. The Lateran Basilica (San Giovanni in Laterano), on whose grounds, originally, a cavalry barracks of the Imperial bodyguard was to be found, and which still today is the authentic episcopal church of Rome;

3. The Basilica of Saint Paul Outside the Walls (S. Paolo fuori le mura), built outside the city wall, over the supposed grave of the Apostle Paul.

In the succeeding time, the building of Christian churches pressed on, and they were built partially over existing private sanctuaries. Thus, the Basilica of Saint Clement lies atop a temple of Mithras. In the fifth and sixth centuries, medium-sized basilicas (S. Maria Maggiore, S. Sabina, S. Vitale) progressively replaced private home churches.

With the abolition of imperial power, the Roman bishops gradually attained to the role of city rulers of Rome, and, over the course of time, assumed all state duties, from care of the population to urban construction. Until well into the High Middle Ages, popes were usually recruited from the Roman city nobility, with whom—and against whom—they governed the city, and upon whom they were more or less dependent. The papacy was thereby a city office, with a universal claim to power beyond the city limits! One example: the circumstance that only the pope, as ruler of the city and superior of the Church, could crown the German king Emperor of Rome. As ruler of ancient Rome, the pope bestowed the dignity of Emperor; as Bishop of Rome and "Vicar of Christ," he conferred political power over Christianity.

The extent to which medieval Rome was dependent on the popes can be seen in the case of the deterioration and fall of the city in the fourteenth century, during the 'Babylonian Captivity' of the popes at Avignon. From 1309–1367, no pope resided in Rome, which therefore rapidly decayed, becoming meaningless as a city. True, pilgrims continued to journey to Rome, but, without the pope, the city lost its function as the center of Western Christianity. Finally, after the end of the Great Western Schism (1378–1417), and the new strengthening of the papacy, the Rome of the next centuries gained a high status once more. During the Renaissance and Counter-Reformation, not only was the city built up, it developed into a center for artists and scholars. Not even the plundering by Imperial troops in the year 1527 (sacco di Roma, Ital., 'sack of Rome') caused any really lasting damage.

The next genuinely deep caesura in the history of Rome was the unification of Italy at the close of the nineteenth century, and the elevation of Rome to the status of capital of Italy (1871). At this point in time, the rule of the popes over the city, and the bordering ecclesiastical state, ended, and only in 1929 was the position of the pope within Rome definitively normalized with the Treaty of the Lateran, as the Vatican was declared a sovereign state.

Rome as Center of Pilgrimage

4. Relatively early, pilgrims already sought out Christian Rome, as here were the graves of Peter and Paul, greatest among the Apostles. A veritable flood of pilgrims inundated the city on the occasion of Boniface VIII's proclamation of the 'Holy Year' 1300. Since then, this event has taken place at intervals of twenty-five years (originally one hundred, then thirty-three), with 'extraordinary' Holy Years, such as 1983 in celebration of the nineteen-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of Christ's salvific death and resurrection. In connection with the pilgrimage in such a 'year of Jubilee' (see Lev 25) comes a plenary indulgence. In order to receive this latter, besides confession and Communion, a visit to the four major churches of Rome (Saint Peter's Basilica, the Cathedral of Saint John Lateran, Saint Mary Major, and Saint Paul Outside the Walls) is prescribed.

But with modern mass transportation, Rome is the goal of the world's Catholic pilgrims not only every twenty-fifth year, but almost constantly. At every public papal appearance, thousands of persons are regularly present, so that here the boundaries between tourism and pilgrimage are surely fleeting. At the beginning of the third millennium, then, Rome seems to be building up its religious function as center of the Catholic world. Much of this is occurring thanks to the media. Every year, at Easter and Christmas, the papal blessing Urbi et Orbi (Lat., "To the City and to the World") is broadcast 'live' across the globe. The attached indulgence even reaches the 'pilgrims in spirit' who have remained at home. Thus, Rome regularly enters the consciousness of millions of persons as a religious center.

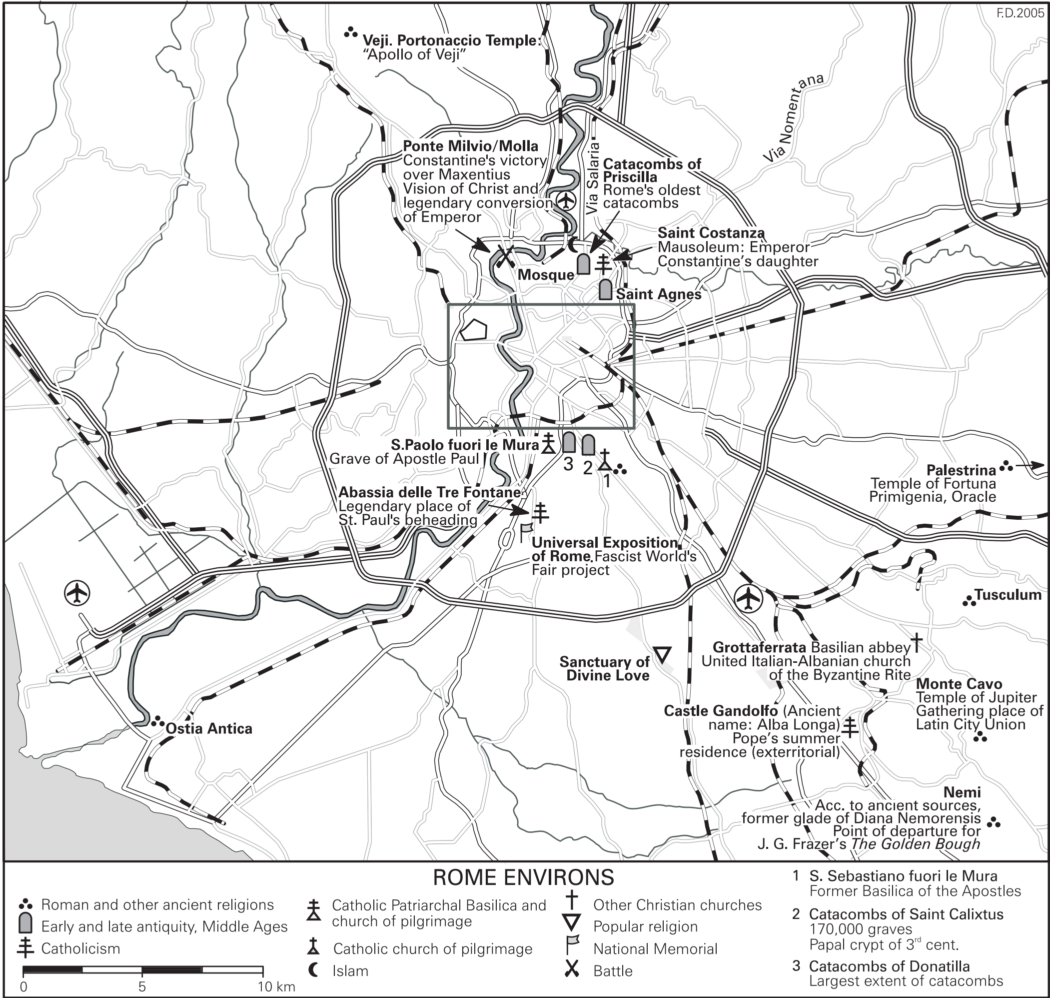
First and foremost, Rome is indeed the center of the Catholic world. It must not be overlooked, however, that, meanwhile, like all 'great cities of the world,' Rome is multi-religious. During the 1990s, for example, in the North of the city, the largest mosque in Italy was built for immigrant workers.

Rome as an Idea



5. Far more powerful in its effect than the actually existing city of Rome, was Rome as an ideal quantity. This concept received its most prominent stamp in ancient times at the hands of Roman poet Virgil (70–19 BCE): Jupiter bestowed upon Rome an imperium sine fine (Lat., 'rule without end'). It was not only Rome's right, but also its duty, to govern the peoples of the world, and thus to bring them peace. For the early Church, Rome at first still represented the 'great whore of Babylon' (see, e.g., Acts 14:8), and 'Edom' for the Jews. Nevertheless, with the Christianization of the Roman Empire, the ancient 'ideology of Rome' was fairly quickly adopted, and re-interpreted in Christian concepts. Although ancient Rome gradually lost its significance as a political center—the Emperor no longer even resided in the city—its ideological function grew ever stronger. For early Christianity, Rome even became the symbol of salvation history: so long as Rome should stand, so long would the Last Judgment upon the world be delayed. The capture of Rome by the Visigoths, in the year 410, therefore produced its shock particularly in Christian circles; → Augustine sought to counter its terror with his doctrine of the Two Cities or empires, the earthly and the heavenly, then featured in his chef-d'oeuvre of political theology, De Civitate Dei (Lat., "The City of God"; 413–426 CE). Notwithstanding, Rome remained the ideologically lofty, ideal center of the world, until well into the Middle Ages. Constantinople, established in its role as new capital, was only styled 'Second Rome' (Roma Secunda) or 'New Rome' (Roma Nova). The extent to which the dignity of Emperor continued to attach no longer to the real city, but to the symbol, of Rome, is manifested in the fifteenth century: with the transfer of the East Roman imperial capital to that of the Russian Czars: now Moscow became—the Third—Rome. Finally, in the context of → civil religion, the idea of Rome as the center and redeemer of the world entered modern discourse as well.

Literature

Ayres, Philip, Classical Culture and the Idea of Rome in Eighteenth-Century England, Cambridge 1997; Curran, John R., Pagan City and Christian Capital: Rome in the Fourth Century, Oxford 2000; Hibbert, Christopher, Rome: The Biography of a City, Harmondsworth 1985; Mazzolani, Lidia Storoni, The Idea of the City in Roman Thought: From Walled City to Spiritual Commonwealth, Bloomington 1970; Kytzler, Bernhard (ed.), Rom als Idee, Darmstadt 1993.

→ Antiquity, Catholicism, Christianity, European History of Religion, Late Antiquity, Mediterranean Region

Markus E. Fuchs

F.D.2005
Veji. Portonaccio Temple: "Apollo of Veji"
Via Nomentana
Ponte Milvio/Molla
Constantine's victory over Maxentius
Vision of Christ and legendary conversion of Emperor
Via Salaria
Catacombs of Priscilla
Rome's oldest catacombs
Saint Costanza
Mausoleum: Emperor Constantine's daughter Mosque
Saint Agnes
S.Paolo fuori le Mura
Grave of Apostle Paul
3
2
1
Palestrina
Temple of Fortuna Primigenia, Oracle
Abassia delle Tre Fontane
Legendary place of St. Paul's beheading
Universal Exposition of Rome, Fascist World's Fair project Tusculum
Sanctuary of Divine Love
Grottaferrata Basilian abbey
United Italian-Albanian church of the Byzantine Rite
Monte Cavo
Temple of Jupiter
Gathering place of Latin City Union
Castle Gandolfo (Ancient name: Alba Longa)
Pope's summer residence (exterritorial)
Ostia Antica
Nemi
Acc. to ancient sources, former glade of Diana Nemorensis
Point of departure for J. G. Frazer's The Golden Bough
ROME ENVIRONS
Roman and other ancient religions
Early and late antiquity, Middle Ages
Catholicism
Catholic Patriarchal Basilica and church of pilgrimage
Catholic church of pilgrimage
Islam
Other Christian churches
Popular religion
National Memorial Battle
0 5
10 km
1 S. Sebastiano fuori le Mura
Former Basilica of the Apostles
2 Catacombs of Saint Calixtus
170,000 graves
Papal crypt of 3rd cent.
3 Catacombs of Donatilla
Largest extent of catacombs

In Momostenago, in Southern Guatemala, an endangered marriage is healed. The couple kneels before the three small crosses. After the husband, some months ago, had been unfaithful to her, the wife besought help of the shamans. A penance was imposed on the husband, his wife has left him, and now he is to be restored to the condition of purity, and the marriage is to be reestablished. For the celebration of the renewal of the marriage bond (renovación), the shaman has selected a favorable date in the Mayan calendar. In the ceremony, he stands next to the couple, dressed in blue, while an assistant (right) casts sacrificial gifts into the fire. Around the fire lie readily burnable pine branches. Shells to hold the copal (the indispensable sweet-scented smoking resin) stand ready. The shaman calls the gods to witness. In conclusion, the pair is once more blessed, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. The mutual presence of both indigenous and Christian elements, typical of the region, is evident here in the Mayan Quiché ritual. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Doubtless the most stunning and aesthetically positive example of an ornamental mass is the massive, concentric prayer mass that comes into being when, during the month of pilgrimage, one to two million Muslims travel to → Mecca in fulfillment of their religious duty and assemble around the Ka'aba. The onlooker does not know which to find more astonishing: the organizational achievement—so many persons gathered in so narrow a space—or the discipline of the believers. The geometry of this mass arises by way of the fact that, on the ground, circular lines have been drawn, upon which respective prayer areas are marked. This mass ornament comports an impressive symbolism: it is constantly directed toward the center of belief, the Black Stone. (Hubert Mohr)

The picture shows a typical monastic religious service of the Orthodox Church, celebrated by a bishop, with several archimandrites, abbots, deacons, and monks. As spiritual superior, the bishop stands in the center of the podium, facing the altar. He wears the sakkos and the omophorion (corresponding to the Western pallium). To the right and left of the bishop stand two deacons, and one sub-deacon who holds the bishop's crosier. To the left of the altar stand four archimandrites (highest monastic title), wearing miters as a sign of their dignity. To the right of the altar stand several igoumens (abbots) and priest-monks, who wear the klobuk (a high hat with a veil in the back) as a sign of their priesthood and monasticism. The sub-deacons (left), who carry fans (repids) or candles, underscore the festal character of the divine service.

Even the divine services of a simple city parish or village are saturated with an atmosphere that 'brings heaven to earth': in the light of burning candles—reflected in their multiple images in the icons—with their splendid liturgical raiment and their solemn, beautifully harmonized singing. (F. Schnider)

Pallazolo Aereide, Sicily, June 29, 1 p.m. “Now! A roar, as if a storm were brewing. Canons sputter sparks, and shoot long, colorful paper strips high into the air over the statue of the Patron. Cherry bombs explode, the church bells resound, applause, tinny music. The Paolo! Paolo!—cries, again . . . Clouds of smoke hang in the air and darken the sun, little colored cards rain down, with the saint’s picture on them.” German journalist Barbara Baumgartner portrays the high point of the local festival year of a farming town west of Syracuse, as an event that bewitches and stuns the senses. All senses are engaged, the whole town is buzzing, when, on the feast of his patronage, Saint Paul is borne from the church to the piazza by the male village youth—at least downtown; uptown has its Saint Sebastian. The feast of the saint of a quarter gives occasion to reverse the country drab of the everyday in one grand explosion: instead of ocher and gray, now yellow and red prevail, instead of the quiet of the noonday heat the noise of the crowd and the playing of the banda, the music band, instead of the abandoned spaces of siesta time the seething, shouting → mass. For many, this is too much, as for Sicilian writer Leonardo Scascia: “But what is a religious festival in Sicily? The simplest answer would be, ‘anything but a religious feast.’ ” But is this not being a ‘spoilsport’?

A follower of Afro-Cuban Santería becomes a medium of the god Shango. Assisted by the cult leader, he has allowed the god take possession of him, clothing himself in the god's color (red), and assuming his attribute, the double axe. Shango is one of the Orisha, deities of Yoruba (Nigeria), who have come to the Caribbean region. The picture shows the moment at which the dancer is 'seized' by the being of the god. His eyes stare into the void: he is transported in trance. The ritual goes on for days, accompanied by singing and drums. Each Orisha has a personal musical rhythm, which accompanies the possession. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Two guardian figures watch over a road on the Indonesian island of Bali. The elevated throne provides a good vantage, and, along with the honorific umbrellas, lends dignity and authority. Pairs of 'watchers' like these frequently protect the entrance of a temple: there they mark the place of crossing into sacred space. The figures here have been clothed in aprons of poleng material. Unlike other, finer and expensive materials, poleng is woven of only two kinds of thread, or, as shown here, is printed in a checkerboard pattern. The black-and-white pattern of the poleng stands for the opposites in the whole, the twofold principle, whose place in the Balinese world-image is decisive. Spatially, they provide the orientation of the Balinese system: north and south, sunrise and sunset, and especially, those topographical opposites of the island, mountain and sea. Furthermore, the colors are attributed divine and demonic qualities, respectively: white stands for the arts of healing and the ability to apply them, black stands for the injuries of the insalubrious. The guardians wear poleng as a sign that they are protectors, as well, and ready to offer defense, and therefore are at the right place when stationed on critical stretches of roads, and at crossings. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Someone, about midnight on December 30, 1986, has built an altar, with sacrificial gifts for Pomba Gira, at the place where a road intersects with Avenida Atlántica, at the southern end of Copacabana Beach in Rio de Janeiro. The goddess is being offered candles, cachaca whiskey, cigarettes, and a red rose. This devotional practice shows a connection, not untypical for Brazil, to religious elements from West Africa and Congo. The West African deity who watches over intersections, known to the Yoruba as Eshu Elegba, and in Dahomey as Legba, is of the male sex, and is frequently represented with an erect phallus. The kind of apparition of Brazilian Exu (related to Yoruba "Eshu") specific for Rio is female, and her name Pomba Gira is derived from the Ki-Congo word mpambu zila ('crossroad'). The inflammable gifts (candles, whiskey, cigarettes), as well, point to the religious practice of Congo. The cigarettes offered here at the T-shaped intersection have been arranged in the shape of miniature crossroads. It may be that here, the protection of the goddess has been besought in order to find an escape from a particularly dangerous situation, perhaps in the life of business or love. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Sabbath → Sunday/Sabbath

Sacrifice

1. On New Year's Eve, on the beaches of Rio de Janeiro, toilet articles for women, champagne, mineral water, white corn pudding, or flowers are placed in the water. It is the festival of the Sea Goddess Yamanjá (see picture), one of the most meaningful feasts in the life of the Afro-Brazilian population. The breakers carry the gifts out to sea, and then the people have assurance that their gifts have been acceptable to the goddess, and that their hope for the granting of their requests is justified.[1] Still more 'exciting,' however, to the Western observer and the media, are the rituals of slaughter in the Afro-American religions, that arouse such spectacle, shudder, fascination—and perplexity. In the course of a divine service that may last several days, sanctuaries are transformed into 'slaughterhouses' (G. Bataille). Many and varied rites of consecration impart a divine character to the sacrificial animals: the latter are washed, perfumed, and powdered. Bulls and goats are draped in splendid attire, of velvet or silk, in a color symbolizing the divinity to whom sacrifice is being made. The horns of bulls are decorated with lighted candles; fluids (water, rum) and foods are set on the backs of animals in the form of a cross. Now they are offered their consecrated nourishment, and by way of being consumed themselves, they become the irrevocable property of the deity. If they decline the meal, they must be replaced with other animals—the god would not accept the sacrifice ('topos of voluntareity'). Participants stroke, embrace, and kiss the animals, which stand symbolically facing the four directions of heaven. Detailed regulations determine the killing of the sacrificial animals. By way of a preternatural → possession of the slaughterer, the divinity itself slays the victim. In → voodoo, the participants drink the blood of the sacrifice, or preserve it for ritual actions, while in Afro-American religions the 'divine seats' are steeped in the 'emission of blood.' Blood contains 'sacred power' (ashé) in a high measure. The carcasses are distributed: the portions for the deity—blood, head, ears, tongue, feet, and tail—are set down on the altar. Bones are sometimes buried separately. The best of what remains goes to the community members present. Believers then consume the meat in the festal meal—sacrificial festivals are 'good for eating.'

2. Sacrificial actions play a key role in the religions of humanity. Sacrifices are often very complex ritual actions, in the course of which communication between human beings and spirits is thought to be produced or broken off, as participants part with an object (statue or figure, food item, liquid, inscribed paper) or living being. A definition of the concept is problematic, since such different kinds of religious phenomena are understood under 'sacrifice' as Jesus's sacrifice of atonement, votive gifts, and animal sacrifices, that are basically distinct, in the intentions of actors as well as in the principal theological world pictures and faith systems.

Clarification of Concepts

3. The concepts that denote 'sacrifice' (in English and French) are unclear and polyvalent. In other modern languages, the word for 'sacrifice' (German Opfer, Dutch offer, etc.; cf. the English 'offer') is not a scientific concept, but

Pilgrims from Iraq sacrifice a sheep before the journey to Mecca. At the right, in the picture, a man is already wearing the ihram garment (pilgrim's attire). Animal sacrifices, in Islam, can be offered at various occasions; the most frequent are the two great Islamic festivals, the breaking of the fast at the end of Ramadan, and the sacrificial festival during the month of pilgrimage. Classic sacrificial animals are camels and sheep. The ceremony consists of prayer, and the recitation of certain formulae, at which the animal is laid in the direction of Mecca, and sacrificed. Except in the case of a vow, the flesh is partly consumed by the participants and partly distributed to the a loan word, formed from the church Latin operari, 'to serve God through works' (concretely, since Church Father Cyprian, 'to give alms'). The concept of Opfer, 'sacrifice,' in German, falls in both an active ('renounce') and a passive ('victim,' someone 'suffers an evil'; cf. the Dutch slachtoffer) region of meaning. Modern everyday speech, therefore, applies the word 'sacrifice,' on the one side, in keeping with Christian moral conceptualizations for the designation of non-ritualized, ethical activity, distinguished by 'renunciation,' by 'painful loss for a higher end': one 'sacrifices a day for one's family.' Theological ideologies of renunciation can be re-formed and harnessed for political ends. In the sacrificial ideology of the National Socialists the 'sense and meaning of cultic sacrifice' lay in the idea that soldiers of the German Wehrmacht offered themselves 'for the good of the community' ('sacrifice for the Fatherland,' 'victims of war').[2] On the other side, the meaning of the Latin word victima echoes in the passive region of meaning—the 'sacrificial animal' that is delivered up apart from its own will, that is led to the now metaphorical altar of slaughter—as 'road casualty,' or, indeed, that is produced as a sacrifice of the Holocaust (from the Greek, holokaútoma, 'whole burnt offering'). This double meaning was composed against a background of the Christian theology of sacrifice. These ambivalent uses and subtexts of the words used for 'sacrifice' have led to conceptual confusion. Hence, modern religious studies takes its orientation more precisely in the content of the Latin concept sacrificium ('sacred action'). However, no unitary scientific usage prevails.

How Can Sacrifice Be Classified?

4. Descriptive classifications of sacrificial rituals are differentiated according to the composition or the handling of the sacrificial material. Nevertheless, one can distinguish vegetable sacrifices, animal sacrifices, human sacrifices, bloody and unbloody sacrifices, or, again, burnt offerings, sacrifice in which the victim is slain, immersion sacrifices, drink offerings ('libations'), and sacrifices of annihilation. Typologies regard rather the actors' intentions that underlie the sacrificial rituals: the traditional categories of praise, thanksgiving, impetration, and satisfaction would correspond here. In theoretical and descriptive works, classifications and sacrificial types frequently overlap. If sacrifice is conceptualized as an action performed by human beings, one effectuating a symbolic exchange with gods or spirits—thus, in a communicative structure—then the 'connecting' type of sacrifice versus the 'dividing' will be conceived as follows: sacrifices are then rituals performed by the actors in order to produce or discontinue a communication with the sacred region, the divine powers. To the connecting type of sacrifice correspond the sacrifices of praise, thanksgiving, and impetration. It is especially the material of the sacrifice that produces connections between human and spirit beings, and, in the course of the communicative process, human intercourse is withdrawn, 'destroyed.'[3] Examples of a connecting aspect would be the 'food sacrifices' of Afro-American religions, or votive gifts modeled on the Do ut des concept—"I give in order that you give." In the dividing type of sacrifice, the ritual process is set in motion in order to break off contact with spiritual beings, by means of a communicative act. Thus, in the Afro-Brazilian rite of the 'exchange of heads,' the evil or the psychic or physical infirmity is transferred from the head of the patient to that of the sacrificial cock—it is interpreted as a 'quest for a homecoming' on the part of the malevolent spiritual being. The animal is then exposed or slain—that is, offered as a whole to the deity in question.[4] In the 'scapegoat rituals,' the meal to be eaten by human beings is absent (in Israel, a buck was slain, or driven into the wilderness, as a 'sin offering' for the community; cf. Lev 16).

needy. At the sacrificial festival in Mina, there is usually more meat left over than can be distributed, which, earlier, would have led to problematic hygienic circumstances. Today, therefore, sacrifice is no longer offered by individuals. Instead, a contribution, in a specified amount, is made with the Islamic Bank for Development, and then the slaughtering is done by butchers, while the meat is put in deep freeze and sent to needy persons in the Islamic world. (Agnes Imhof)

Occasions Arising in the Practical World

5. Practical occasions of sacrifice that arise in 'everyday' life are as manifold as are the situations in which human beings must live: here, sacrifice is offered in order to 'impetrate' the benefaction of the deity in existential need (the 'impetratory sacrifice'), to render thanks to it ('sacrifice of thanksgiving,' 'firstfruits,' thanksgiving festival after the harvest), to foster the fertility of the fields by means of sacrificial blood and other sacrificial matter (→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic), to placate the wrath of the deity or to purify the community ('scapegoat'), or to render the dead sympathetic by placing offerings of nourishment on graves (sacrifices to the dead). Sacrificial acts can also form components of complex rituals, for instance of → prophecy (the sacrificial 'reading' of the innards of the slain animal), → initiation (V. Turner 1977), or → feast.

Economy of Sacrifice

6. As for the handling of the sacrificial material, theories of sacrifice usually underscore the economic aspects of sacrificial rituals: hunting rituals, with hunting peoples, guarantee the continuity of the scarce, valuable, nourishment by meat, and the "symbolical surplus value of the meat" (G. Baudy) is reflected in the code of distribution. Originally, even the slaying of the animal may always have been accomplished only in the course of a religious ritual—in the course of a 'sacrifice,' then—and thereby publicly 'checked' and controlled (W. Burkert). In the Hebrew Bible, however, a distinction was drawn between

At the celebration of the New Year, the Afro-Brazilian population offer sacrifice to the goddess Yemanjá, on the banks of the Rio de Janeiro: flowers, dolls, and other gifts especially dear to the goddess are committed to the sea. In their sacrificial prayers, believers beg of Yemanjá the granting of their requests and wishes. (J. Drexler)

A special sacrifice, under the all-seeing eyes of the Buddha, at the ornamented stupa of Bodnath (Katmandu, in Nepal). At this Tibetan Buddhist sanctuary, it is seen as spiritually meritorious to have limewater poured from the edge of the one-meter-high hemisphere by temple workers, in exchange for a monetary contribution. The action is performed several times a day, so that, in the some five centuries of its existence, the monument has materially expanded. A second form of ritual libation is more expensive: from the base of the hemisphere, in high bows, saffron water is cast up upon the limestone to make dark stains, from which emerges the pattern of a lotus blossom—a sacred symbol in Buddhism. (E. Stapelfeldt)

In many religions, the burning of sweet-scented essences (incense, rosin, sandalwood, aloes, myrrh, camphor, cedar, etc.) constitutes an important component of worship or cult. In Catholicism, for example, the burning of incense (or 'incensation') has been practiced since the fourth century, and stands as an image and symbol of the prayer that ascends to God. The sacrifice of smoke and fragrances serves for the consecration or dedication of places, for ritual purification, to dispel demons, and to rejoice the gods by the ascending fragrance. Especially in → Daoism, the burning of incense sticks plays an important role in ritual, and in the everyday practice of believers: the vessels for sacrifices of smoke are key components of the temple. Here a young mother in Hong Kong offers a bundle of incense sticks in a Daoist temple, dedicated to the gods Man and Mo. Both deities go back to persons who, according to legend, lived some 1,500 years ago. Man, the God of Literature, is the patron of government officials, while Mo, the God of Martial Arts, is venerated by both police officers and the criminal milieu. (Benita von Behr) cultic slaughter that was concentrated in Jerusalem after King Josiah (cf. Lev 17:3-4, from the post-Exilic law of holiness), and profane slaughter that was entirely permitted. Furthermore, there are types of sacrifice, such as the sacrifice of nourishment for the gods in the Sumerian-Babylonian, Egyptian, or Greco-Roman regions, which are compatible with a broader application of the sacrificial material. Indeed, it was the distribution of the nourishment—grain, or the meat of the animals that had been slaughtered—that belonged to the main tasks of ancient temple complexes. The Greeks used sacrificial implements, such as the sacrificial spear (in Gk., obelós), before the seventh century BCE, as a kind of 'tool money.' The 'sacrificial stock' developed from the sacred grain supply (in Gk., thesaurós). Again, the German/Dutch word Geld ('money') derives from the Old High German, a 'sacrifice to the gods.'[5]

Human and Divine Benefits of Sacrifice

But sacrificial gifts are distributed not only literally among participants, but also symbolically between believers and mythic powers. In Greek myth, the 'unjust' distribution of sacrifices between or among human beings and gods is, proverbially, the 'betrayal of → Prometheus': the gift that the Greek gods received was only the smoke of burnt thighbones, while human beings would take all of the flesh.[6] It has been observed that, among hunters of the Old Stone Age as well as of today, there are comparable hunting rituals: burnt thighbones, preservation of skulls (boukrània) and horns of sacrificial animals at the sacred place were said to have been undertaken as hunting rites of regeneration, in order that new life be restored to the animal. Again, the ritual topos of voluntary slaying ('comedy of innocence') probably has its origin in hunters' hesitation to kill. Homeric offerings of nourishment, then, would have been the "ritual slaughter" of an animal, "that the human beings might eat it."[7] Finally, economic considerations enter into the distribution practice. When the African Nuer have no bullocks to sacrifice, they sacrifice a cucumber, called a 'bullock' in the ritual context. 'Renunciation' from the side of those sacrificing is thereby reduced to a minimum. In the extreme case, in serious crises (drought, hunger, war), the distribution can take on the form of unilateral 'eradication sacrifice': Nuer slaughter bullocks in the bush, where the sacrificial meat is entirely surrendered to spirit beings who are hostilely disposed. Here, renunciation becomes painful loss. Gifts are then not only for the gods, but also against them, so that they are kept at a distance; dispelled, reconciled, accorded sacrifices. In such a ritual, with the assistance of this 'sacrifice of satisfaction,' or a 'sacrifice of firstfruits' offered in some other way, situations of fear are subjected to control: they are dampened, as the inimical spirits are demonstratively awarded the best or first portion (and therefore the 'alpha position'; B. Gladigow 1984).

Sacrificial Ideologies

7. A diversity of religious worldviews underlies sacrificial rituals. Thus, the word for sacrifice used by the African Dogon is bulu, 'to restore to life': the reference is to the idea of the bloody sacrifice as a ritual technique leading to a new distribution of the power of life, nyama. The different linguistic usages betray culture-specific conceptual worlds, and sacrificial ideologies, that cannot be brought over a common denominator. This diversity is what caused the older scientific theories of sacrifice to fail, to the extent that they sought to formulate a general 'theory of sacrifice' according to a unitary 'meaning and end of sacrifice.' The unitary nature of sacrifice emerged as an illusion; the theoretical constructions had been especially infiltrated by Christian conceptions.[8] Just so, ethnographic observation in no way justifies the emphasis on bloody, or even 'bloodthirsty' rites of sacrifice that occurs in recent theories (R. Girard, W. Burkert): in this perspective, the latter must be interpreted as exoticising reception of the 'other.'

Sacrificial Interpretations

8. Scientific theories usually emphasize partial aspects of sacrificial rituals: the slaying, distribution, and eating of the material of the sacrifice. As a rule, these aspects form components of the 'bloody-sacrifice complex.'

Sacrifice as Gift Exchange and Renunciation

(a) Building upon his concept of → animism, evolutionist E. B. Tylor (1871) defined sacrifice as gift, formed on the exemplar of human social relations: 'originally,' sacrifice was not a selfless gift, but a 'bribe'; in higher evolutionary development, gifts were offered out of 'homage,' or, in the properly ethical form, out of 'renunciation.' In the animistic view of sacrifice, deities take their nourishment from the 'substance,' 'essence,' or 'soul' of the sacrificial material. Afro-American sacrificial rites confirm this view in that, here, the duty of the believer consists in 'giving the gods to eat.'[9] Blood, innards, extremities of slain animals, are set before the images of the gods, that the gods may consume their 'essence.' In ethnographic literature, the 'dynamistic' interpretational variant occurred as well, i.e. that this kind of sacrifice of foodstuffs is a matter of a reciprocal magical exchange of power (G. van der Leeuw; → Power) between gods and believers: thus, the sacrificial acts of Afro-Americans or Dogon are ritual techniques of the redistribution of life power, so that the theoretical model in the sense of dynamistic tendencies remains disputable.

The Sacramental Sacrificial Meal

(b) Scots theologian and oriental scholar William Robertson Smith recognized the importance of the sacrificial meal ('communion') for the founding of community. Here, holds Smith, by way of the consumption of the collectively slain animal, mystical unification is realized with the deity being honored. Smith's speculative theory of the origin of the sacrificial meal influenced Freud's psychoanalytical interpretations of sacrifice as the murder of one's father, and anthropophagous sacrificial meal. Smith's understanding also influenced the sociological approach of Émile Durkheim, who, like Smith, saw the animal totem as a symbol of society. Of course, the 'sacramental' eating of God at the → Lord's Supper, that doubtless acted as patron of Smith's theory, is to be distinguished from the eating with the god of the Afro-American festival of sacrificial food.

Sacrifice as Communicative Act

(c) In 1899, French sociologists Henri Hubert and Marcel Mauss, close collaborators of Émile Durkheim, created the interpretation of sacrifice that has been most important ever since. In their analysis of the structure of the ancient Indian, Vedic animal sacrifice, they defined sacrifice itself as a mediated communication between the profane and the sacred world: the sacrificial animal, which must first be sacralized, is a means of communication, and the sacrifice itself is a → rite of passage between the two worlds. Rites of entry and exit, or sanctification and de-sanctification, place a framework around the actual sacrificial act, whose climax, held Hubert and Mauss, was formed by the slaying of the animal. With the act of slaying, the sacred and dangerous 'energies' have been released, which now flow out both to the Holy and to the persons performing the sacrifice. The social function of sacrifice consists in the reconciliation of those making the sacrifice, and the society represented by the gods for whom the sacrifice is intended: the person performing the sacrifice presents society with its concept as a 'gift.'

Sacrifice as Purifying Power

(d) If, for J. G. Frazer (around 1900) scapegoat rites rested on the 'magic' transfer/conveyance of the insalubrious to the matter or material of the offering (animal, human being), René Girard saw (in 1972), in the mechanism of the scapegoat procedure, the means used by society for controlling the threat of the violence that ever looms in its inmost being, by projecting it onto a surrogate sacrifice. In the dismal, gloomily archaic, vision of homo necans (Lat. 'human being who slaughters'), entertained by scholar of antiquity Walter Burkert in the same year, interhuman aggressions are liberatingly ('cathartically') called on to invest the sacrificial animal in the sacred act of slaying, in a fashion that is harmless for society. This manner of '→ catharsis theory' entertained by sociology of religion can be understood as a quest for a psychically hygienic escape from the societal violence being recognized as the "key problem of the present."[10]

9. Crisis of sacrifice:[11] In the Christian theology of sacrifice, Jesus's eschatological sacrifice of atonement ends the biblical practice of the bloody sacrifice, criticized by the prophets themselves as external ritualism. The concentration of the Israelitic sacrificial system in Jerusalem had the effect that, after the destruction of the Temple there (70 CE), the institutionalized cult of sacrifice by slaughter had ended. The 'divine services of the word,' celebrated in the synagogues, replaced the Temple of sacrifice; spiritualized and imagined modes of sacrifice replaced the bloody cult; humility and prayer replaced burning flesh. The metaphorization and spiritualization of the Hebrew biblical concept of sacrifice progressed in Christianity with even more force than it had before: human beings are to offer themselves as a "living, holy, sacrifice pleasing to God" (Rom 12:1). The 'spiritual sacrifices' of Christians include all acts of self-giving and surrender to God, all ascetical self-denial, all altruistic works of love of neighbor. In the Western Christian tradition, phenomenal modes of sacrifice that are material are ascribed to early, 'unenlightened' stages of humanity: societies bearing a Christian stamp know only profane slaughterhouses—unlike Judaism, in which any killing of an animal is still ritualized. Anti-cultic tendencies are also observable in other religions: pre-Socratic philosophers, or Pythagoras (→ Vegetarianism), criticized the practice of the bloody sacrifice; Buddhism sharply rejects the Vedic animal sacrifices.

Spiritualized Modes of Sacrifice

10. Modern observation, as practiced by cultural studies, ought to be concerned not with formulating a general theory of sacrifice, but with a consideration of the imbedding of sacrificial rituals in particular cultures. Instead of the essentialist, theological question of the meaning of sacrifice in itself, concrete sacrificial rites should be investigated and researched as components of religious practice and of a symbolical worldview.

Modernity

In the multi-religious common life of Western post-modernity, as in the undertow of current globalization, state religions with binding monopolies on norms and belief are cast adrift, at an obviously accelerating rate, from a basic plurality of worldviews and religious communities. However, precisely in the practice of bloody animal sacrifice, conflicts can germinate: thus, recently, in the "Orgies-Mysteries Theater" of action artist Hermann Nitsch (→ Blasphemy, ill.), whose 'Dionysan' private cult, despite correct professionally executed slaughters, called forth raging protests from animal protectionists and Catholic officials—who, granted, are rarely willing to renounce their hot dogs!

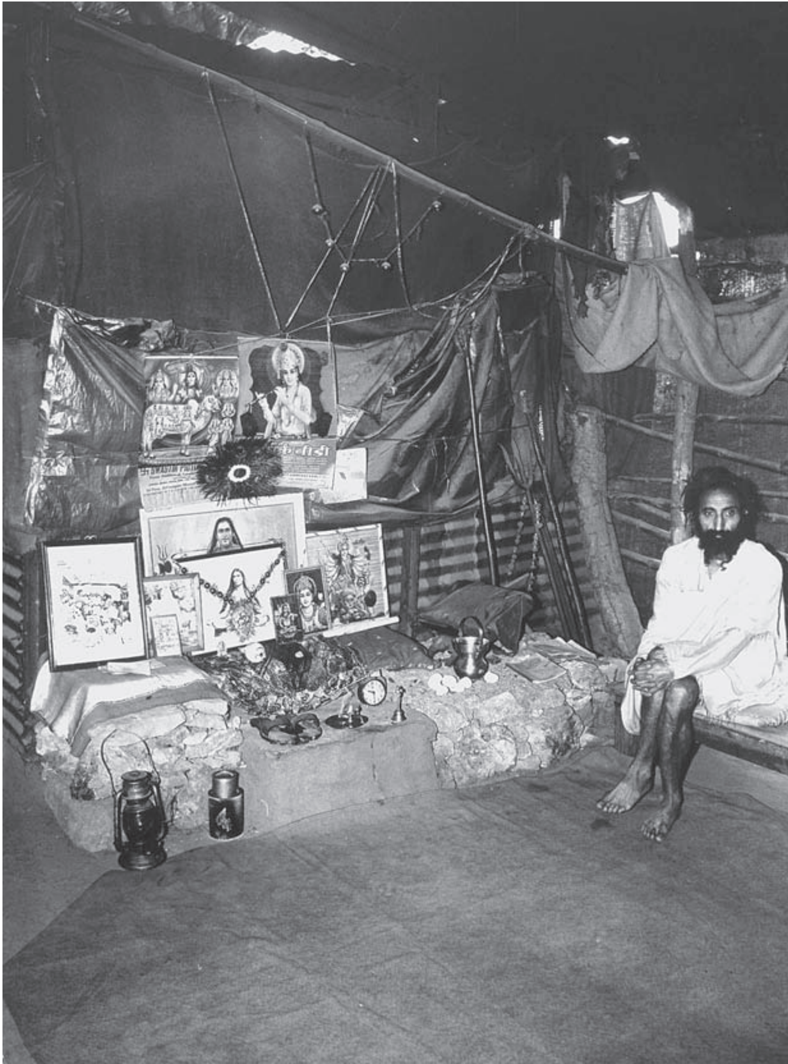
1. FIGGE, Horst, Geisterkult, Besessenheit und Magie in der Umbanda-Religion Brasiliens, Munich 1973.
2. Cf. BERTHOLET, Alfred, Der Sinn des kultischen Opfers, Berlin 1942, 27.
3. HUBERT/MAUSS 1968, 11ff.
4. FIGGE (as in note 1) 1973, 131f.
5. Cf. BAUDY 1983, 150f.; GLADIGOW 1984.
6. Hesiod, Theogony V, 535ff.
7. MEULI 1946, 281f.
8. DETIENNE 1986; DREXLER 1993.
9. Cf. FIGGE 1973, 90; MÉTRAUX 1959, 168.
10. BURKERT, Walter, Homo necans. Interpretationen altgriechischer Opferriten und Mythen, Berlin 1972, 8 (Engl. version BURKERT 1983).
11. GIRARD 1977.

Literature



ANDERSON, G. A., Sacrifices and Offerings in Ancient Israel: Studies in Their Social and Political Importance, Ann Arbor 1986; BAUDY, G., "Hierarchie oder: Die Verteilung des Fleisches," in: GLADIGOW, B./KIPPENBERG, H. G. (eds.), Neue Ansätze in der Religionswissenschaft, Munich 1983, 131-174; BURKERT, W., Homo Necans: The Anthropology of Ancient Greek Sacrificial Ritual and Myth, Berkeley 1983; DETIENNE, M./VERNANT, J.-P. (eds.), The Cuisine of Sacrifice among the Greeks, Chicago 1986 (Fr. 1979); DREXLER, J., Die Illusion des Opfers: Ein wissenschaftlicher Überblick über die wichtigsten Opfertheorien ausgehend vom deleuzianischen Polyperspektivismusmodell, Munich 1993; FIRTH, R., "Offering and Sacrifice: Problems of Organization," in: Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 93,1 (1963), 12-24; GIRARD, R., Violence and the Sacred, Baltimore 1977; GLADIGOW, B., "Die Teilung des Opfers," in: Frühmittelalterliche Studien 18 (1984), 19-43; HAMERTON-KELLY, R. G. (ed.), Violent Origins: Walter Burkert, René Girard, and Jonathan Z. Smith on Ritual Killing and Cultural Formation, Stanford 1987; HUBERT, H./MAUSS, M., Essai sur la nature et la function du sacrifice (1899), in: MAUSS, M., Oeuvres I, Les fonctions socials du sacré, Paris 1968, 191-307; MÉTRAUX, A., Voodoo in Haiti, London 1959; MEULI, K., Griechische Opferbräuche, Basle 1946, 185-288; READ, K. A., Time and Sacrifice in the Aztec Cosmos, Bloomington/Indianapolis 1998; TURNER, V., "Sacrifice as Quintessential Process: Prophylaxis or Abandonment?," in: History of Religions 16,3 (1977), 189-215.

→ Afro-American Religions, Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic, Animal, Animism, Blood, Communication, Eating/Nourishment, Exchange/Gift, Human Sacrifice, Lord's Supper/Eucharist, Materiality, Ritual, Suicide, Vegetarianism, Voodoo

Josef Drexler

Sadhu

1. Derived from the Sanskrit verb sadh ('to attain,' 'to perfect' or 'to improve'), sadhu is the designation for holy men (and/or, rarely, women) in India. Any religious ascetic or holy person can be called a sadhu. In the more proper sense, sadhus are initiates of various ascetical orders, who either live in settlements (matha) similar to monasteries, or wander about homeless. Although most of these orders, like Indian religions across the board (→

In India, a multiplicity of ascetical groups exist, all having different orientations, practices, and distinctive traits. This Hindu sadhu, in the vicinity of Rishikesh (Uttar Pradesh), is identifiable as a follower of Shiva, by the trident in the corner. However, the representations above his home shrine show that the veneration of other Hindu divinities (e.g., of flute-playing Krishna, or of ten-armed goddess Durga riding on the lion), with the bell, oil lamp, and mussel horn is entirely a part of his spiritual practice. Other photographs testify to the meaning for the group of the personalities of founders and teachers. Staff and wooden shoes indicate the tradition of the overland traveler; the water pot recalls the vow of mendicancy. His cabin is itself an expression of the ideal of poverty. (E. Stapelfeldt) Hinduism), can be considered as Shivaites or Vishnuites, in their religious practices many traits of Tantrism (→ Tantra) are found, as well. In addition, ascetics of other Indian religions—such as Jainism and → Buddhism, along with even the followers of North Indian mystic Kabir (fifteenth century), who is reverenced by Hindus and Muslims alike—are called sadhus. Ascetics of Islamic currents, on the other hand, similar to the sadhus, are called fakirs (Ar. faqir, 'poor').

2. To the Vishnuite sadhus, also called vairagins (Skt. 'passionless'), belong the Shri-Vaishnavas, Ramanandins, and followers of philosopher Vallabha (1479–1531) or mystic Caitanya (1486–1533; → Hare Krishna Movement). Shivaitic sadhus descend from the famous philosopher Shankara (788–820), to a certain extent, who is supposed to have founded the four orders of the Samyasins, Dandins, Paramahamsas, and Brahmacarins; or else they belong to other, rather heterodox currents, such as the Lingayats, the tantric Aghoris (→ Tantra), or Alakhnamis. Acceptance into these orders is joined to rituals of initiation, at which the sadhu receives a new name, one typical of the order. Sadhus are addressed with the term of respect baba ('Father'), often despite their age. Especially at great religious festivals, sadhus of the various denominations join larger groups, in which they then enjoy privileges. Thus, at the Kumbha Mela festival, celebrated every six years, the various groups of sadhus may bathe first in the sacred river (→ Feasts and Celebrations, with ill.). Often, the order of honor assumed by the respective religious orders is disputed, even to the point of martial violence. Even apart from this, sadhu groups often demonstrate pretentious, outright bellicose attitudes and deportment.

Nudity and Fasting

3. If indeed they do not go naked, as some do, sadhus are most often clad only in loincloths. Their possessions are often limited to a begging bowl, and a few objects typical of their order. Thus, Shivaite sadhus, as a rule, have an animal skin to sit on, a trident (trishul) or staff (danda), used as a hiking stick as well as a weapon, and a small, double drum called a damaru. Their respective denominations are indicated by signs painted on their foreheads and upper arms, (tilak: Shivaites mostly three diagonal lines, Vishnuites a U), as well as by adornments about the neck (Shivaites wear a chain, mala, of rudraksa kernels, Vishnaites one of Tulsi wood). Shivaitic sadhus are often seen performing the chillum ritual, at which cannabis products are smoked (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens). Many sadhus hold themselves to strict prescriptions of fasting and diet, others observe no sort of dietary limitations, and eat even cat and rat meat. Most sadhus live in celibacy.

Vows

4. Sadhus sometimes keep incredibly strict vows (trata): on pilgrimages, they draw weights behind them, or lie down and roll for hundreds of miles; they lie on the celebrated bed of nails, or stand for years under a tree. 'Standers' are recognized by their typical rack construction, with the help of which they can even sleep standing. Frequently, observance of such vows has an extremely deleterious effect on the ascetic's body; on the other hand, the sadhus, who support all torments with such iron consistency, are credited with immense supra-sensory powers, so that people are afraid of them, besides revering them and supplying them with food. In rural areas, through virtuosic accomplishments, a sadhu can achieve considerable social prestige, and a position of local authority. Sadhus, who at times preach publicly, constitute an ever-present counterbalance to the conservative, ritualistic Brahmans and temple priests. It is obvious, of course, that only some sadhus are actual practitioners of the spiritual disciplines; others are simple beggars, who cause wonderment and 'earn' money with pocket tricks. Persons, who would be classified as mentally ill by Western criteria, are venerated in India as saints, indeed, as sadhus. The institution of the sadhu offers the opportunity of rising above the caste-oriented societal system in India, and acquiring great social prestige.

Adepts from the West

5. The sadhu movements have received adepts from the West, some of whom wander about with the Indian orders or brotherhoods, and are scarcely distinguishable from them. Others return to the West, to lead an ascetic life there in reclusion.

Literature

Bhagat, M. G., Ancient Indian Asceticism, New Delhi 1976; Davis, Martin P., Sadhu Hagenstein: A White Man among the Brown. The Record of a Man of God, Washington 1930; Gross, R. L., A Study of the Sadhus of North India, Berkeley 1979; Hartsuiker, Dolf, Sadhus: India's Mystic Holy Men, Rochester 1993 (photographs); Streeter, B. H./ Appasamy, A. J., The Sadhu: A Study in Mysticism and Practical Religion, Delhi 1987.

→ Asceticism, Guru, Hinduism, Indian Subcontinent, Tantra, Veneration of the Saints

Karl-Peter Gietz

Salvation Army

William Booth

1. The Salvation Army goes back to the former Methodist preacher William Booth (1829–1912). In view of the enormous misery—including moral misery—and great alienation from religion, of the inhabitants of the poor quarters of East London, Booth saw the need for a radical spiritual conversion. Economic and social circumstances were depressing, especially in districts of industrial concentration, and were characterized by great material poverty. Large areas of the population were plunged in misery. Wages were ordinarily beneath subsistence level, and life expectancy was short. Diseases were numerous.

Booth's Christianity was that of the Methodist direction, with its emphasis on a tireless missionary toil. However, he soon recognized that the destitute classes would be little open to the Christian gospel without social welfare. Therefore, his work purely for the conversion of the people would have to be complemented by activity that was social in a religious way (→ Charitable Organizations).

2. As an organization, the Salvation Army emerged in 1865 from the "Christian Mission"—a work constituted by then of over one hundred missionary societies of East London, for which Booth worked as a preacher. The organization bore the name "Salvation Army" only from 1880 on. Gradually, Booth succeeded in winning ever more influence over the Christian Mission, and establishing his ideas. Although he was confronted with more and more hostility, he had great success with his missionary work. Of particular concern to him here were the collaboration of the laity, and the public profession of the newly converted. Booth also gained respect by his street sermons, and by the processions that he held to attract the curious and convert them. These marches were later to become characteristic of the Salvation Army.

By 1877, Booth had succeeded in bringing the Christian Mission entirely under his influence, and all instances of control and all groups that had hindered him in the implementation of his concepts had been dissolved. Now he had realized his goal of a powerful salvation movement. Hand in hand with this phenomenon went a strong hierarchization, with a quasi-military apparatus at whose summit stood 'General' William Booth. Booth was chosen for life, and might designate his successor himself. Not only did he dispose of the Salvation Army's entire fortune, but he also enjoyed extensive powers of decision. Again, the great financial success of his book, In Darkest England and the Way Out (1890), in which Booth castigated the deplorable state of social affairs and called for a remedy, gave him the financial means to lend his activities a greater force. The concept set up 'urban colonies' and 'land colonies,' whose personnel had been provided with training as farmers, against the flight from the land, as well as against organized emigration to the United States or to British colonies overseas. The social program was innovative. Among other things, it provided attorneys for the poor, 'poor man's banks,' clinics, search services for missing persons, and a social service of its own for sailors (Whitechapel-by-the-Sea).

Army of God

Conceptual and organizational elements from the area of the military became characteristic of the Salvation Army. It is organized as the 'Army of God.' At the side of the General, who has been elected every five years since 1929, and who is at the top, stands a staff of collaborators, the Staff. Under the General are the Superintendents—the district leaders—followed by the high-ranking collaborators of a mission station. Unlike the 'Officers,' whose main occupation is with the Salvation Army, are the lay assistants, the 'soldiers,' who practice a civil profession. The Officers are prepared for their later profession in a school for cadets. All of the offices, including that of General, are open to women. The countries in which the Salvation Army is active are divided into various 'corps.' The members wear a uniform, and carry a flag. Beginning in 1887, choruses were established: spiritual texts were set to the melodies of popular songs, and this greatly contributed to the popularity of the movement. A weekly organ The War Cry appeared, which is still distributed today.

Belief and Religious Practice

3. In 1878, the Profession of the Salvation Army was formulated as eleven binding articles of faith. Special importance attaches to repentance and conversion to God, which are regarded as prerequisite for personal salvation. The Salvation Army does not hold sacraments, such as Baptism or the Lord's Supper, to be necessary. There is no regulated formula of worship, not even for weddings or the dedication of children. Rather, the Holy Spirit should be permitted to work freely: rigid precepts would only be a hindrance here. What is important, instead, are public proclamation and the salvation assemblies, which serve to bring the unconverted to the table of repentance and thus to move them to conversion. Members of the Salvation Army oblige themselves to renunciation of the use of alcohol and tobacco. A double membership in the Salvation Army and in another church is possible.

Great worth was ascribed to the Salvation Army through its works of charity (→ Charitable Organizations). These shifted more and more into the foreground even during Booth's lifetime—altogether against his personal convictions, as the religious aspect was far more important to him. Members have always focused their work on the most urgent social problems of large cities' slums, city centers, and red light districts. Thus, for example, Booth's spouse and fellow combatant Catherine (1829–1890) worked for the establishment of houses for prostitutes. The Salvation Army managed, besides, to have the minimum age of emancipation for girls raised from thirteen to sixteen. Through the creation of soup kitchens and shelters for drinkers, women, the homeless, sailors, prisoners of war who had been released, and much more, the Salvation Army extended its charitable services.

Although the Salvation Army was first active in London, it spread throughout England and nearly the entire world, while its founder was still alive. In 1880 work began in the United States, Ireland, and Australia, a year later in France, and in 1886 in Germany. Worldwide, the Salvation Army counts circa three million members and friends (including 17,000 active 'Officers'), and exists in ninety-three countries, divided into 14,428 'corps.'

Literature

Eason, Andrew Mark, Women in God's Army: Gender and Equality in the Early Salvation Army, Waterloo 2003; Hattersley, Roy, Blood and Fire: William and Catherine Booth and Their Salvation Army, London 1999; Murdoch, Norman H., The Origins of the Salvation Army, Knoxville 1994; Sandall, Robert, The History of the Salvation Army, 4 vols., London 1947–1964; Taiz, Lillian, Halleluja Lads and Lasses: Remaking the Salvation Army in America, 1880–1930, Chapel Hill 2001; Winston, Diane, Red-Hot and Righteous: The Urban Religion of the Salvation Army, Cambridge 1999.

→ Charitable Organizations, Charismatic Movement, Industrial Society, Mission

Astrid Czerny

Salvation / Redemption

Salvation and Disaster

1. a) Extra-worldly and intra-worldly salvation: Any striving for salvation is a quest for an ideal condition, a 'better world.' It presupposes the experience of the contrary, of 'disaster,' as with war, imprisonment, sickness, or even simply the finitude, the limitedness, of life. One hopes to be freed, rescued, or redeemed, in a lasting or eternal condition delivered from such disaster. Over against a reality felt and experienced as imperfect, a perfect world is set, (1) which, in the future, will replace the negative state of the present and its misery—or which is already reality, but (2) which, either only in the community of believers, is realized formatively or as an exemplar, or (3) which is at hand only in another world—for instance in a → hereafter—as the ideal (because not experiential) counter-model. Thus, all divinities are 'perfect'; even future, or imaginary, persons can model the redeemed state, from the mythical, fabled peoples such as Homer's 'righteous Abians,' to → Nietzsche's Hyperboreans, to extraterrestrials. All of the sufferings of the 'here' or 'here below' receive a higher, ultimate sense and meaning, as believers interpret them as heralding signs of an approaching salvation. Here, the more helpless the situation of the moment, the greater seems the need for salvation. The less one has the powers and means to avert the cataclysm, the more one will hope for another, mightier power, such as a political leader, or a superhuman messiah or god, as a replacement for this purpose. Since the → Enlightenment, the idea of the improvement of human beings (through repentance and redemption) in the future has been connected with the development by which they gain their highest stage or perfection in the further course of evolution, and thus also perfect themselves: the new person, the new human being.

Drama of Salvation

b) But in so doing, the traditional pattern of redemption awaiting a drama of salvation is transformed. When redemption seems very improbable, one hopes for a 'miracle.' Before the advent of the new 'realm of salvation,' or new age—to come by way of a global reckoning, and the annihilation of the wicked—a final battle is usually expected between two opposed powers or poles (along with a kind of world judgment, or divine judgment) such as between good and evil. Traditional as well as modern concepts of redemption build on a three-step model, which begins with a 'Golden Age,' followed by the 'fall' of the human being (as, in Christianity, the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise after the 'original sin'), and then salvation: the reconstitution of the primordial mythical, 'paradisiacal,' condition.

Ways to Salvation

2. a) Salvific life and rituals: In religious concepts, a person can share in salvation by way of surrender and offering oneself to the deity or the highest being, the absolute; by following the respective foundations of faith, various ritual practices such as prayer, meditation, veneration of images of gods; as well as by asceticism and the renunciation of certain profane pleasures. Believers expect salvation as a 'reward,' often only in the life hereafter, for their efforts, but cannot attain it solely from and by themselves. By Jesus's vicarious death on the cross, Christians stand even now redeemed from their sins, if they confess them before him. The goal is the immortality of the soul and eternal community with God; in Hinduism, to become one with Brahman by escaping the cycle of → rebirths, and thereby ending earthly → sufferings. Buddhists strive for an 'extinction' of individuation or individuality, by becoming one with what is actually real as opposed to what seems real in the present in life. Buddhists can receive assistance from bodhisattvas, who have renounced entering nirvana even now, in favor of the beings living on the earth. The starting point for a collective expectation of salvation, such as is maintained by → Jehovah's witnesses, takes its point of departure in the concept that the totality of the members of the faith community will be redeemed, ordinarily as individuals. By a contract or covenant with God, Jews, too, are the chosen, the called, a people redeemed only in the 'heavenly' Jerusalem. Individual salvation places the redemption of the individuated person in the foreground, who need not be definitively bound to a community. Thus, many Christians strive for the 'redemption' of their own souls, rather than, mainly, for the salvation of the entire community of Christians. In modern esotericism (→ New Age), people might strive for an individual salvation through reuniting with a primordial life force, through meditation or ritual practice that fosters a process of individual and collective redemption.

b) Intermediaries of salvation: Here, mediators of salvation or gurus tend to play a significant role. They are ascribed a → charisma, superhuman capacities, and, especially, the power to guarantee salvation for their followers. After all, they share in the divine power themselves, often even as 'half God, half man.' Especially with leaders of a political religion (e.g., Hitler, Mussolini, Lenin), it is not infrequently they themselves who lead their faith community into misery, after which they are elevated to the status of the redeeming figure seen as precisely the one to show the way out of that misery. Modern mediators of salvation include extraterrestrials, who, on the strength of both their intellectual and their technological superiority, are seen as being capable of redeeming the earth, or of solving the problems that lie at the root of human failing.

Concepts of Redemption

3. The aim of this-worldly concepts of redemption is the future perfection of all humanity, and a happy life here on earth. The transformation of the human being into the superhuman being in Nietzsche, for instance, takes up the idea of a spiritual and intellectual rebirth. Human beings reach perfection 'on their own,' without the intervention of an other-worldly power, although often by means of a secular leader who manifests strong parallelisms with the type of the religious leader. 'Worldly believers' insist on actually experiencing their desired salvation themselves, and in the near future, precisely because, in their vision, it can take place only in this life, and this life is the 'only one there is.' In → National Socialism, Adolf Hitler came forward as eschatological intermediary of salvation, who was to rescue, i.e. redeem, the entire German nation from threatening collapse and ruin. From the Thousand-Year Reich a 'New Germany' was to emerge, like a 'New Earth' (cf. Rev 21). Parallels with Jewish → Zionism are manifested in → Marxism, with its ideal of the equality of all human beings. Its prophet is Marx: the historically elect people, called to world revolution, are at the same time the most powerfully oppressed proletariat, which now introduces global, perfected humanism. A counter-sketch is offered by the → Unification Church: it awaits an anti-Marxist final battle, in the form of a Third World War, 'necessary for salvation,' in which, under the leadership of the founder of the Church, Sun Myung Moon, the democratic world will exterminate the 'Communist world of Satan.'

Modern Paths of Salvation

4. Beginning in the 1970s, the goal of the currents outside established psychotherapy has been self-knowledge, or the 'finding of oneself,' which could be regarded as equivalent to a 'spiritual rebirth,' or redemption of those undergoing the 'therapy.' In many → New Age contexts, the goal is referred to as 'whole(ness),' 'being one,' and the attainment of a 'cosmic consciousness.' An attitude toward modern medicine, and to → genetic engineering can also bear a religious stamp. The medical 'Gods in White' lead a battle against the evil of the world, seen especially in the incurable illnesses that are the 'scourges of humanity.' An ultra-refined medical technology rescues ever more persons from the threshold of death—for example, out of a coma—and brings them back into life. Human beings replace God, create new living beings by way of genetic engineering, reproduce themselves as clones, and thus eternalize themselves. The quest for the gene that is responsible for aging, and finally for death, promises nothing less than the abolition of death, a beauty that remains, and everlasting life. Human beings produce a "brave new world" (Aldous Huxley) on earth itself, and ensure their own immortality.

Literature

Braaten, Carl E., History and Hermeneutics, Philadelphia 1966; Buchanan, George Wesley, Revelation and Redemption: Jewish Documents of Deliverance from the Fall of Jerusalem to the Death of Nahmanides, Dillsboro 1978; Löwith, Karl, Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen, Stuttgart 1953; Idem, Meaning in History, Chicago 1970 ([1]1949); Küenzlen, Gottfried, Der Neue Mensch: Eine Untersuchung zur säkularen Religionsgeschichte der Moderne, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Ruether, Rosemary Radford, Women and Redemption: A Theological History, Minneapolis 1998.

→ Cross/Crucifixion, End/Eschaton, Hereafter, Jesus, Light/Enlightenment, Luck/Happiness, New Age, Socialism, Suffering, Utopia

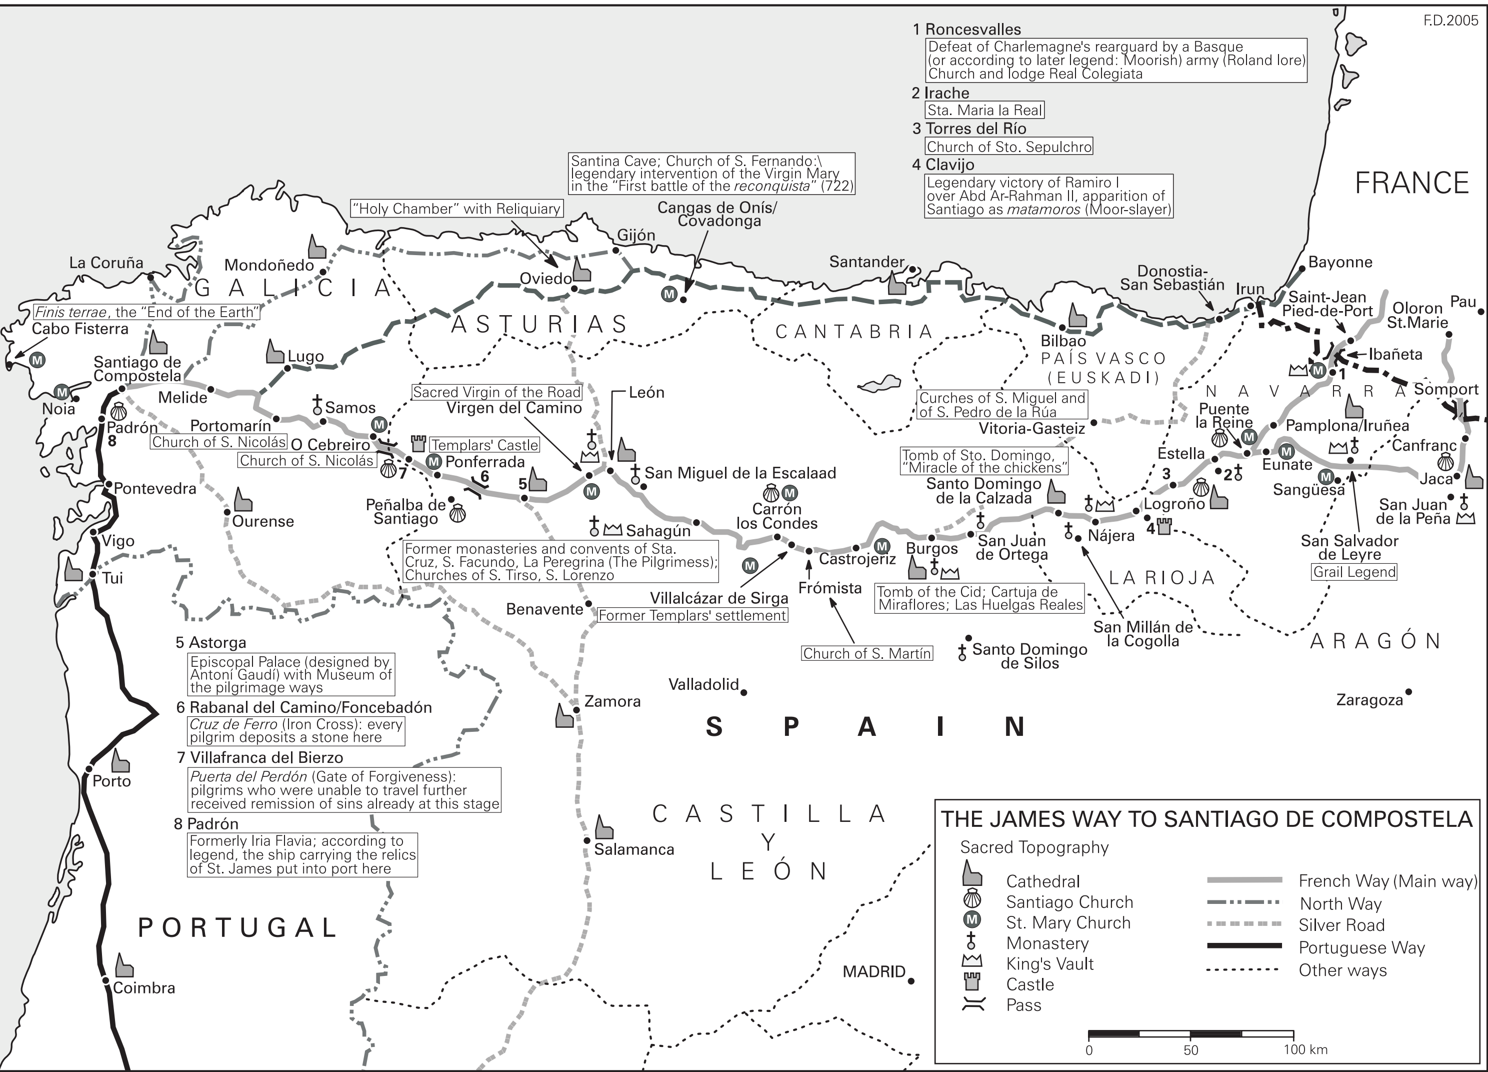
Gabi Brodbeck

Santiago de Compostela



Center of Europe at the End of the World

1. As a place of pilgrimage, a city, a diocese, and later, an archdiocese, in Galicia in the Northwest of Spain, Santiago de Compostela, along with and in rivalry with the far older centers of Rome and Jerusalem, is to be numbered among the three most important centers of extended pilgrimage (peregrinatio maior) of Western Christianity. The pilgrims' goal is the supposed tomb of Apostle James the Greater, who as 'Sant'Yago' gives his name to the city of Santiago. The legendary discovery/creation of the Apostle's grave in the early ninth century was extraordinarily appropriate when it came to contemporary mentalities: as a response to the complex situation resulting from (1) the Crusades of extra-European expansive medieval Christianity (2), the conditions of the special Spanish situation of the intra-European reconquest of areas and regions occupied by the Arabs (reconquista), and (3) their Christian repoblación ('re-population'). In the highly ideologized battle against Islam, the imbedding and foundation of the new local grave-cult was so successful that, in a short time, Compostela and the pilgrimage to Sant'Yago became an outstanding instance of European migration.[1] From all over Europe, including England and Scandinavia, the Baltic region, Poland, and Hungary, the network of 'James's roads' and 'ways,' with their churches, monasteries, and hospices of Saint James, leads to both of the passes of the Pyrenees, behind which, in Puente la Reina, all routes flow into the one common, royal way (Camino Real) to Compostela. Fascination and semantic depth of the cult and cult center of the phenomenon 'Santiago' are all the more present, inasmuch as, with the tradition of Charlemagne and Roland, they are coupled with European foundational myths. Connection with the place is no longer necessary. As a sword-swinging 'Moorslayer' on his white horse in heaven (matamoros), James the Elder is patron of the troops of the Reconquista. Like the Cid in the Spanish national epic, they take the field with their battle cry "Santiago!" against the Arabs and their "Mohammed!" As the Apostle with the Scripture scroll, the saint, in unverified, but extremely popular, tradition, had his mission and martyr's death in Spain. He bears the responsibility and title of Spanish National Patron—Patrón de España. As Santiago Peregrino (Sp. "Santiago the Pilgrim") in pilgrim attire, and with the James shell, he represents not only himself, but all pilgrims and travelers. His name attaches to the phenomenon of the 'James pilgrim.' Thus, despite powerful swings and conversions of meaning over the course of the twelve-hundred-year-old cultic tradition, the enormous, and now so long effective, political, economic, juridical, artistic, religious, and spiritual dimension of the phenomenon provides the basis that the European Council today classifies Compostela as a European cultural capital, and the Camino Real as a European cultural memorial.[2]

The Three Great Places of Pilgrimage

2. a) The history of the Santiago pilgrimage, after its first beginnings at the start of the ninth century, is characterized by an extraordinarily speedy expansion. In its heyday, between the twelfth and fifteenth centuries, the Camino Real outdid both the pilgrimage to Rome, to the grave of Saint Peter and the seat of his successor the Pope, and the pilgrimage to Jerusalem and the sacred sites of Jesus.

b) With the replacement of the original local West Gothic Reconquista in Spain by a pan-European one, Santiago de Compostela, instead of a mar-

THE JAMES WAY TO SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA
Sacred Topography
Cathedral
Santiago Church
St. Mary Church
Monastery
King's Vault Castle Pass
French Way (Main way)
North Way
Silver Road
Portuguese Way
Other ways
0 50
100 km
F.D.2005
1 Roncesvalles
Defeat of Charlemagne's rearguard by a Basque (or according to later legend: Moorish) army (Roland lore) Church and lodge Real Colegiata
2 Irache
Sta. Maria la Real
3 Torres del Río
Church of Sto. Sepulchro
4 Clavijo
Legendary victory of Ramiro I over Abd Ar-Rahman II, apparition of Santiago as matamoros (Moor-slayer)
5 Astorga
Episcopal Palace (designed by Antoní Gaudí) with Museum of the pilgrimage ways
6 Rabanal del Camino/Foncebadón
Cruz de Ferro (Iron Cross): every pilgrim deposits a stone here
7 Villafranca del Bierzo
Puerta del Perdón (Gate of Forgiveness): pilgrims who were unable to travel further received remission of sins already at this stage
8 Padrón
Formerly Iria Flavia; according to legend, the ship carrying the relics of St. James put into port here Santina Cave; Church of S. Fernando:\ legendary intervention of the Virgin Mary in the "First battle of the reconquista" (722)
"Holy Chamber" with Reliquiary
Cangas de Onís/ Covadonga
FRANCE
SPAIN
PORTUGAL
GALICIA
ASTURIAS
CANTABRIA
PAÍS VASCO (EUSKADI)
NAVARRA
LA RIOJA
ARAGÓN
CASTILLA Y LEÓN
La Coruña
Mondoñedo
Gijón
Oviedo
Santander
Donostia-San Sebastián
Irun
Bayonne
Saint-Jean Pied-de-Port
Oloron St.Marie
Pau
Ibañeta
Somport
Finis terrae, the "End of the Earth"
Cabo Fisterra
Santiago de Compostela
Noia
Padrón
Melide
Lugo
Samos
Portomarín
Church of S. Nicolás
O Cebreiro
Church of S. Nicolás
Templars' Castle
Ponferrada
Sacred Virgin of the Road
Virgen del Camino
León
San Miguel de la Escalaad
Carrón los Condes
Sahagún
Pontevedra
Ourense
Peñalba de Santiago
Vigo
Tui
Former monasteries and convents of Sta. Cruz, S. Facundo, La Peregrina (The Pilgrimess); Churches of S. Tirso, S. Lorenzo
Villalcázar de Sirga
Former Templars' settlement
Benavente
Castrojeriz
Frómista
Church of S. Martín
Burgos
Tomb of the Cid; Cartuja de Miraflores; Las Huelgas Reales
San Juan de Ortega
Santo Domingo de la Calzada
Tomb of Sto. Domingo, "Miracle of the chickens"
Curches of S. Miguel and of S. Pedro de la Rúa
Vitoria-Gasteiz
Bilbao
Nájera
San Millán de la Cogolla
Santo Domingo de Silos
Logroño
Estella
Puente la Reine
Pamplona/Iruñea
Eunate
Sangüesa
Canfranc
Jaca
San Juan de la Peña
San Salvador de Leyre
Grail Legend
Zaragoza
Valladolid
Zamora
Salamanca
Porto Coimbra
MADRID

ginal locale at the "end of the known world" (Finis Terrae), became a European center of the Western periphery. Thus, the twelfth century marks the fall of the West Gothic fractional tradition, against the pressure for generalization and 'internationalization': successfully initiated by the Spanish kings, completed by the Cluniacs brought into the country, attended by the imported French knights, and supported by the architectural cottages—that is, the Latinization of West Gothic script and the Mozarabic rite of the Mass; the Romanization of sacred architecture (a pilgrim basilica), sculpture and painting style, which now became obligatory throughout Europe.

Levels of Mediation

c) The Camino de Santiago became a space of communication as privileged as it was programmatic. A number of concrete cultural factors contributed to that status: (1) It was spiritually bolstered in/by pre-Christian backgrounds of Teutonic and Roman religions of light—semantically charged by Christian cosmology through the concept of the West as the Way to the End, and thereby to the future of the world; (2) it was juridically defined by the development of legislation for pilgrimage; (3) it was infrastructurally fixed by the construction of bridges, roads, hospices, and cathedrals, and by policies of settlement and privileges of city and trade; (4) it was overspread by a media-combination of oral, written, and iconic programs of the meaning of the James cult. The highly continuous and massive execution of the act of pilgrimage in this space of communication generated the James Way as a memorial space of Christian expansion westward and thereby as an "identity-conferring space of self-reassurance."[3] At the same time, in this function, it was an aggressively monocultural corridor—delimited by conflict with the zones of cultural contact surrounding it—in a Spain of the three cultures (Jewish, Arabic, Christian), with its defined manners of coexistence (convivencia), far beyond 1492. Despite their fascination for doggedly increasing quantities of pilgrims, the comprehensive literature of pilgrim reportage documents a qualitative 'decline' of the James Ways, i.e., a transformation of function. It was in a framework of the conversion to the 'new styles of piety' of the devotio moderna, that a 'credence in wonders,' and conceptualizations of self-sanctification through '(merely) bodily pilgrimage,' fell irredeemably under suspicion of an 'exteriorism' of ritual that could no longer endure in the face of the guarantee of justification of an interiority-orientated devotio spiritualis. Thus, with Luther's sermon on Saint James's Day, July 15, 1522, the Protestant polemic assaulted the James pilgrimage, as well: "Do not go there, then, for it is unknown whether what lies there is Saint James or a dead dog or a dead horse."

The secularized curiositas that marks modern times where geographical and ethnological otherness is concerned has long since permitted the religious pilgrimage to turn into an educational trip. Further, the 'receptacle' of the James Ways accommodates the most wide-ranging varieties of migration, due to poverty, mendicancy, and worker migration. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries it lost quantitative attraction, as well. Without an independent dynamics as an area for trade, fairs, and finance, and with its secondary market-trade, tailored only to service to pilgrims, Compostela has sunken back into the marginality of the periphery.

New Meanings

d) With the appearance of the new Marian pilgrimages of the nineteenth century, and with the transition of the function of patronage of travelers to Saint Christopher, Saint James is disappearing from the extra-Spanish

'little tradition' of the popular practice of veneration of the saints, although, naturally, the 'great tradition' of a theology of history continues to 'archive' it. Only since the beginning of the 1980s is Santiago de Compostela coming to be included among the destinations of an organized tourism of pilgrimage and study, which is opening the Camino to experiences having dimensions of spiritual meditation, as well as making it available to historical formation in art and architecture.

1. Belonging to the type "temporary religious mass mobility"; see Jaritz/Müller 1988.
2. "A highly symbolic and significant European cultural route," "a representative symbol of our identity." See the documentation in Hassauer 1993, 80-93.
3. Hassauer 1993.

Literature

Dunn, Maryjane/Davidson, Linda Kay (eds.), The Pilgrimage to Compostela in the Middle Ages: A Book of Essays, New York 1996; Frey, Nancy Louise, Pilgrim Stories: On and Off the Road to Santiago, Berkeley 1998; Hassauer, Friederike, Santiago—Schrift. Körper. Raum. Reise, Munich 1993; Jaritz, Gerhard/Müller, Albert (eds.), Migration in der Feudalgesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1988; Myers, Joan et al., Santiago: Saint of Two Worlds, Albuquerque 1991 (photographs); Rudolph, Conrad, Pilgrimage to the End of the World: The Road to Santiago de Compostela, Chicago 2004.

→ Pilgrimage, Procession, Road/Path/Journey, Tourism, Veneration of Saints

Friederike Hassauer

Satanism

Satan in Christian Theology

1. The notion of Satan was coined by Christian theology; in the course of the last two centuries, however, an independent Satanism has developed that can no longer adequately be described through only theological approaches. In terms of religious history, the forerunners of the Christian doctrine of Satan, as well as of explicit Satanism, can be considered to be Iranian → dualism, ancient Hebrew demonology (→ Demon/Demonology), and → gnosticism. The Christian image of Satan emerged in the first centuries of the calendar. Here, Satan, who, in the Hebrew Bible, was still a plaintiff in the heavenly court, became God's extra-celestial adversary. In the apologetics of that time, competing cults were at times regarded as inspired by Satan; but the reproach of an authentic veneration of Satan was leveled only in the eleventh century. The ecclesial conception of Satanism, which would be valid for centuries, was produced in a framework of the persecution of witches and of the confrontation with the Enlightenment.

2. The actual basis for the modern variations of Satanism was created by the demonization, and at times explicit 'Satanization,' of individual striving for freedom that emerged in the times of the Counter-Reformation. The verso of this process was the stylization of Satan as the prototype of the free individual, which found its climax in the works of Milton and Blake. Beginning in the seventeenth century, if not before, Satan was no longer merely an incarnate catalog of vices, but a rebel against the old order, that placed limits on the individual. The literary Satanism of the nineteenth century,

When British rock-group Venom brought out its second album, "Black Metal," the name of a new sub-genre of rock music was born. In 'black metal'—an especially extreme form of 'heavy metal'—demons, spirits, and witches come together. → Paganism, → atheism, or Satanism are personally professed, and polemics are raised against Christianity, which is looked upon as wishy-washy, and destructive of instinct and therefore of nature. Frequently, cover designs and texts, in the form of the corrupted cultural content of black Romanticism, bring Christian conceptualizations to life, as shown here. A black-robed figure in an apparently subterranean setting, offers buck-headed Satan a stone head—perhaps inspired by the Knights Templars' reputed Caput LVIIIm. This reactive, paradigmatically conformist Satanism finds application in areas of the 'heavy' scene, for the purpose of lending a particularly plastic shape to rebellion, machoism, and strivings for freedom. A separation from the values of a society or adult world, apostrophized as hypocritical, is just as intentional as the division from everything effeminate and powerless: things that the fan of such music may just as especially fear. Earnest confrontation with Satanist groups like the Church of Satan, or Temple of Set, takes place only rarely, or in phases. Musicians like Christofer Johnson, of Therion, one of the co-founders of the occult order, Dragon Rouge (Fr., "Red Dragon"), as well as the which had its point of departure in poets like Lord Byron, and which influenced 'black Romanticism' especially, has its roots in the processes described above. Artistic Satanism is still at work in the present, for example in the performances of "Vienna Actionism," and in the 'black metal' style of heavy-metal rock music (see illustration).

3. An explicit (cultic) Satanism has finally grown larger only in the second half of the twentieth century and the first years of the twenty-first. A binding dogmatics of Satanism has never existed. Thus, not surprisingly, numerous, sometimes contradictory forms of the Satanistic phenomenon are to be distinguished.

- Reactive Satanism takes its point of departure in an unbroken theological Satanic image. Here, Satan is considered as the personification of evil, and venerated as such. Corresponding conceptualizations of Satan are found in, for example, 'youth Satanism.'
- In 'gnostically reassessed' Satanism, Satan is seen as the calumniated God, well-disposed to human beings, while the Christian God is the deceiver and oppressor of human beings.
- Integrative Satanism seeks to transcend the boundaries between the Christian God and Satan, and to see the two as, for example, two collaborating poles of a single unity.
- Syncretistically broken Satanism embraces all of the occultist currents in which Satan does play a role (→ Occultism), but does not stand at the focus of the cult or of the doctrinal system. As a particularly salient example, we may cite the 'Thelemic' cults of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947). It may be questioned, of course, if this still belongs to "Satanism" at all.
- Autarkic a-Christian Satanism describes a Satanism that does derive from Christian teachings, but in its current phenomenal form developed into a 'positive' religion in the full sense of the word, and extensively abandoned Christian relationships.

events surrounding the Black Circle in Norway, are exceptions in a variegated scene. It should be noted that ideological warnings that youth are turning into brainwashed minions of Satan, betray the disposition of the respective authors or speakers more than they do that of heavy-metal fans. Furthermore, it is counter-productive to mix up the causes and effects of youthful behavior and to veil complex social and industrial problems by demonizing a subculture that is actually more harmless than it is pernicious. (Anselm Neft)

Organizations

4. All organized Satanistic groups important today haven an inclination to autarkic a-Christian Satanism. Here, first and foremost, we should cite Anton Szander La Vey's First Church of Satan, Michael Aquino's Temple of Set, as well as Paul Douglas Valentine's Church of Satanic Liberation. The worldwide membership of these associations ranges from perhaps 300 to 3,000 members each, most of these being members of the upper middle class, with an education above the average. In the United States, these associations are officially recognized as churches; European branches are, as a rule, organized as incorporated association. Politically, a tolerant libertarianism, bordering on social Darwinism, is preferred. Contraventions of the existing laws of society are, in general, rejected.

Youth Satanism?

3. Spectacular cultic practices (→ Cult), usually covered by the media in exaggerated form, are, of course, found less in organized groups than in marginal ones, or in what is often referred to as 'youth Satanism.' According to recent research, however, this usually represents a transitory phase of protest and self-discovery. Helsper sees, as the main characteristic of youth occultism, not the quest for a new system of meaning, but a new intercourse with everywhere available bits and pieces of various Weltanschauungen. Helsper describes this as "Bricolage of meaning" ("Sinn-Bastelei"). Finally, Helsper holds that all of this reflects a loss of meaning in the religious itself. Many of the concrete practices repeatedly reported, as, for example, the desecration of cemeteries, are essentially inspired by such media reports themselves, which at times are even dramatized for fictional media 'presentations.'[1] In the individual cases in which this 'youth Satanism' takes extreme forms, these forms cannot be reduced to the causality of one element. Rather, an investigation must be made into the interplay of a plurality of causes.

Media Sensationalism

6. Up until now, public perception of Satanism has been dominated, first and foremost, by traditional church conceptions of Satanism, as fructified by media sensationalism. In this sense, Satanism is a projection screen for all of those moral abysses that the shadow side of society supposes it to contain—or that are actually to be met on that shadow side itself. Explicit, organized Satanism will probably continue to be an insignificant marginal phenomenon in the future, as well, although, in recent decades, an astonishing consolidation of the basic Weltanschauung of a Satanistic mainstream is to be observed. Finally, in these conceptions, the actual reality of modern neo-liberal societies, so marked by their individualism, is reflected in all but blinding clarity.

1. See Helsper, Werner, Okkultismus—Die neue Jugendreligion?, Opladen 1992; Müller, Ulrich, Das Leben und Wirken des Satanisten T., Regensburg 1989.

Literature

Source: La Vey, Anton Szandor, The Satanic Bible, New York 1969.

Secondary Literature: Ellis, Bill, Raising the Devil: Satanism, New Religions, and the Media, Lexington 2000; Idem, Lucifer Ascending: The Occult in Folklore and Popular Culture, Lexington 2004; Lewis, James R., Satanism Today: An Encyclopedia of Religion, Folklore, and Popular Culture, Santa Barbara 2001; Medway, Gareth J., Lure of the Sinister: The Unnatural History of Satanism, New York 2001; Ottens, Allen/Myer, Rick, Coping with Satanism: Rumor, Reality, and Controversy, New York [2]1998; Richardson, James T. et al. (eds.), The Satanism Scare, New York 1991; Schock, Peter A., Romantic Satanism: Myth and the Historical Moment in Blake, Shelley, and Byron, Basingstoke 2003; Victor, Jeffrey S., Satanic Panic: The Creation of a Contemporary Legend, Chicago 1993.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Blasphemy, Cult, Devil, Demon/Demonology, Dualism, Evil/Evil One, Exorcism, Occultism

Joachim Schmidt

Scholasticism

Faith/Reason

1. Definition, eras, and main currents: a) In the abstract, the principal theme of scholasticism (from Lat. schola, 'school') may be regarded to be the relationship between 'reason' and 'Christian faith,' or, better, the tension between the principles of faith and the requirements of rationality. A comprehensive material definition understands scholasticism as the totality of the sciences established in the European Middle Ages, which, with theology and philosophy, also included mathematics and the science of nature. Ultimately, then, only the counter-movement of mysticism (such as with Bernard of Clairvaux, → Hildegard of Bingen, or → Meister Eckhart) remains outside of scholasticism. But scholastic analyses—in terms of the ideal of their own understanding—are not ultimately premise-free knowledge. Rationality, or reason, the lumen rationale (Lat., the 'light of reason'), must restrict itself to legitimating and illustrating what a Bible-based faith in revelation complements by way of a comprehension of the patristic Church Fathers. After all, their doctrine is itself regarded as 'assured truth.' Creativity does not correspond to the spirit of the Middle Ages.

Nevertheless, with early scholasticism, there emerged, for the first time since antiquity, in the history of the Christian West, a scientific culture. The latter relies no longer only on the 'recitation' of Biblical revelation and patrology: it seeks, rather, by means of a 'new,' logical dialectical method, to further a discussion of the faith. The fides quaerens intellectum ("faith should be insightful") of early representative Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109) could be installed as the comprehensive motto.

Three Ages

b) In the scholarly literature, a tripartite division of the era has prevailed. Thus, in the early age of scholasticism (the tenth to the twelfth centuries), a development of the doctrine of method stands in the foreground. In Peter Lombard's Sic et Non (Lat., 'Yes and No'), voices of authorities pro and contra on basic questions, are understood as dialectical poles, weighed against one another in analysis, and—ideally—decided. The other standard work for basic scholastic training is Peter of Spain's (d. 1277) Introduction to Logic for Beginners.

The development of the great *Summa*s (Lat., 'Compendiums') of Albertus Magnus (1193–1280) and Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) marks the center of high scholasticism (thirteenth century). The goal of those self-conscious and ambitious projects was the systematic summary of all of the areas of knowledge, and research of the enthusiastic 'discovery' of the works of Aristotle—not least through the intermediary of Arab Islamic commentators (Averroes, Avicenna)—which flows into a far-reaching amalgamation of church doctrine and Aristotelianism.

Frequently, late scholasticism (the fourteenth to the fifteenth centuries) is wrongly interpreted as a time of decline and fall, in and by virtue of the phase of nominalism, connected especially with William of Occam (1300–1350). Standing in focus here is the debate over the universals—already discussed in the strict sense since the twelfth century: nominalism versus realism in the question of the reality of universals, that is, of general concepts. Realism, whose ultimate source is Plato, attributes a comparatively higher reality to general ideas and concepts than attaches to individual things. For extreme nominalism—which names Aristotle as its authority—only the individual is real: universals are not actually real, but are available only in the intellect.

Society: "What is Christian?"

2. Social and political aspects of scholasticism: a) The tradition of the philosophico-theological interpretation of scholasticism is genuinely concentrated on the reconstruction of intellectual questions. But this emphasis on rationality, on argumentative discussion, must not be allowed to conceal the fact that the theologico-philosophical confrontations of the Middle Ages are not conducted exclusively in terms of reasoned disputation.

The establishment, in theological disputations defining which positions are orthodox in terms of church policy, always serves factually the discrimination, the exclusion, of heterodox, 'not right believing,' positions. The definition of what is Christian makes possible, correspondingly, the delineation of heresy, the regulation and elimination of heretical individuals and groups that transgress the determined framework of theological acceptability.

To be sure, the question of 'orthodoxy' versus 'heterodoxy,' asked again and again, was not raised against outsiders alone, such as the heretical groups, but also outstanding participants in scholastic discourse itself. Even Thomas Aquinas fell under posthumous suspicion of heresy. Only the determined opposition of his Dominican Order preserved his writings from the bonfire, and then made possible, on the contrary, his canonization (1332). Roger Bacon (1214–1294) spent the last fourteen years of his life in monastic imprisonment. William of Occam only managed through flight to escape his condemnation before a papal court at Avignon (1324). Examples such as these illustrate the power politics on/of the verso of the learned, methodically rational discussion that marks our modern picture of scholasticism.

b) Thus, the background of the conflict over universals, which today is interpreted principally as an abstract philosophical discussion concerning the epistemological status of concepts, also calls attention to the question of the power politics of the Roman Church, which defines itself as 'catholic'—universal, all-comprehensive. Nominalism's position formulated a frontal attack on the theological monopoly of the papal Church. If the individual alone is real, then the universal Church can lodge no claim to the higher evidence of its dogmas and teachings. The Church is therefore only the voice of its individual believers, without claim to higher eminence. Medieval contemporaries—unlike today's researchers—saw very clearly that connection between the philosophical position and the politics of the real. Thus, a radical nominalist like William of Occam had to flee Cambridge, with its loyalty to the pope, to Munich: there, precisely by reason of the political volatility of his nominalism, he found asylum with papal enemy Louis the Bavarian. "Defend thou me with the sword, I shall defend thee with the word," William is said to have demanded of Louis.

Although on the basis of its effect on medieval thought and activity, scholasticism's influences on intellectual history, politics, and law must be regarded as dominant, one should not forget that, ultimately, the vehicle of scholasticism was but one, very small, elite circle—a literary and intellectual minority at the few universities then in existence (Bologna, Oxford, Paris), as well as at the urban cathedral schools (Chartres, Lyon, Cologne, Cambridge). Neither the secular princely courts, nor the traditional monasteries, played any decisive role in its development. In a time of restricted communication, the content of scholastic thought spread among the centers of scholastic research by way of the travels and international mobility of scholars, in the facilitating presence of Latin as the universal scholarly and scientific language.

Reformation

3. Protestantism and Neo-Scholasticism: a) Right in the face of "the whore that is reason," Martin → Luther's Protestant theology rejected a certain type of scholasticism—one which, with the help of logic, formulates propositions of faith from the premise of a basic principle. Nominalistically educated, Luther insisted on grounding faith on the Bible. By way of nominalism, the individual sciences, too, became independent of divine teaching. Luther's noisy fight with "the whore that is reason" was directed only against Thomists.

Neo-Scholasticism

b) The application of the designation 'scholasticism' was transformed beginning in the sixteenth century into a pejorative, upbraiding usage. The (often complicated) methodological stringency with which problems were analyzed was then disqualified as a 'how many angels on the head of a pin' or nit-picking type of 'argumentation.' Reduced to the exclusively theological area, scholasticism found its continuation in the works of Francisco Suarez (1548–1617), until it experienced a renaissance as neo-scholasticism in the second half of the nineteenth century, with, among others, Josef Geyser (1869–1948). Neo-scholasticism emphasizes the primacy of Christian theology vis-à-vis the currents of modern-age atheistic philosophies and sciences. It is also imbedded in an ecclesial attempt to ward off modernism,[1] against which a return to the theology of Thomas Aquinas (Neo-Thomism) was mounted. As recent representatives, we may cite Jacques Maritain (1882–1973), Joseph Bochenski (1902–1995), and Étienne Gilson.

1. Every Catholic priest, upon taking office, had to abjure modern theology. The requirement of the anti-modernist oath of 1910 was rescinded after the Second Council of the Vatican, in 1967 (see Denzinger, H., Enchiridion, Freiburg 1976, nos. 3537-3550; → Laicism).

Literature

Kretzmann, Norman et al. (eds.), The Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy: From the Rediscovery of Aristotle to the Disintegration of Scholasticism, 1100–1600, Cambridge 1982; LeGoff, Jacques, Intellectuals in the Middle Ages, Cambridge 1993 (French [1]1957); Russell, Bertrand, Wisdom of the West: A Historical Survey of Western Philosophy in Its Social and Political Setting, New York 1959; Secada, Jorge, Cartesian Metaphysics: The Late Scholastic Origins of Modern Philosophy, Cambridge 2000.

→ Aristotelianism, European History of Religion, Middle Ages, Mysticism, Platonism, Science

Stefan Hartmann

Science

Knowledge, Science, Research

1. 'Science' (from Lat., scientia 'knowledge'; cf. German Wissenschaft, Dutch wetenschap, etc.) is a form of → knowledge, distinguished from everyday knowledge, the knowledge of the 'ordinary man,' in two respects. For one, it is systematic: that is, it orders knowledge, creates connections, and promotes it to a completeness and integrity. For another, it reflects upon the conditions of its knowledge. In the history of cultures, including those of the European West, there are several forms of science (§ 3a). One of them, dating from the nineteenth century, is science as research. 'Research' or 'scholarship' is defined by the assumption that its object, the empirically cognoscible world, is 'endless,'—that the process of research into this world can never reach an end, because any conclusion generates new problems (§ 3d).

Truth, Scientism, Historicism

2. The notion of science held by scientists and among the public is often molded by historical conceptualizations. One instance of the latter is that science is the only rational, indeed even the only 'true' knowledge of the world, and therefore stands in competition to any kind of religion. Here, religion is 'irrational,' and, at best, a 'stopgap,' responsible for the (still) unexplained, and, for that matter, unexplainable. This manner of understanding represents scientism, as it elevates science to the status of touchstone of all knowledge. It stems from the (self-) interpretations of nineteenth-century scientists, or at least appeals to them. Other varieties of the relativization of religion rest on historicism, which hails from the end of the eighteenth century, and which proclaims that all that exists is a product of → history and conveyed by history. This implies the problem of the relativization of norms and values in any 'present age.' As early as the first half of the nineteenth century, the question arose of the validity of the Christian proclamation in its historical foundations (research into the 'life of Jesus,' history of dogma, issues of religious studies). But not even science could escape the effects of historicism. The claim of the science of history, of the early nineteenth century, to be able to show 'how it actually was' (Leopold von Ranke) had to face the recognition that even the content of our 'I' is a 'historical result,' as historian Johann Gustav Droysen formulated it as early as the middle of the nineteenth century. The question of whether scientific knowledge is supratemporally true, or whether it is also culturally and therefore historically conditioned, recently ignited a 'science war' in the United States between physicists and historians of science.

Stages

3. For the sake of a relativization of reductionistic concepts of science, it will be useful to look back at certain stages of the history of science in the European West.

Scholasticism

a) High medieval science presents an independent form of science that rests on the basic premise of a recognizable order in the world as an order created by God (→ Scholasticism). The world is a cosmos, a beautiful and inwardly ordered shape and arrangement, created by God, in the super- and subordination of the things pre-thought by the intellect of the divine creator and created in perfection. After all, God is spirit—intellect and knowledge—and thus the order of the world is recognizable in its truth: the human intellect shares in the divine intellect as an intellect created to be similar. Recognition, knowledge, attains being, it is an "agreement between things and the recognizing spirit" or intellect (adaequatio rei et intellectus), as Thomas Aquinas's famous formula runs. A problem of knowledge in the modern sense is absent here. It is the task of science to collect all available knowledge of the world and all available book learning (including pre-Christian science and philosophy) and to present it in grand *summa*s.

Nominalism

b) The problem of knowledge in the modern sense, and hence a new form of science, enters the scene with the nominalism of the fourteenth-century (William of Occam, d. 1348), with the dawn of to the modern age and the constitution of the key problems of modern science. The primary problem is of a theological kind. If the world in its order can be known, then it follows that God must have created this world in such a way that he would be the 'servitor' of the world. This arrangement is irreconcilable with the notion of God's omnipotence. The only possible consequence to be drawn for the solution of the problem (while saving the concept of God's omnipotence) is the sacrifice of a cognoscibility of the world as a cosmos, and in its truth. All that is, can no longer be known as a whole, but now occurs only as an individual thing. Nothing any longer provides testimony concerning the order of the world as a whole through the means of science. Scientifically, the world is now to be grasped only as a 'mixtum-gatherum' of occurring things. Its form and style are unknown. And this includes its frontiers, so that the world itself is 'endless'—of course, in an immanent sense. The individual res ('thing') is not absolute, but is henceforward to be known only in its allusion to something else. The concept of 'substance' (the existent conceptualized as existing for itself, and at the same time at its specific place in an ordered whole) is replaced by the idea of function and relation. The consequences of this epistemological revolution are visible in all areas. The whole, and the sense of the world, can now only be spoken of in faith. Science must surrender its notion of a knowledge of the whole. The position of the person in the world becomes a matter of question. The question of the human being, and what she and he ought to do, becomes a problem. Theology can no longer be a science. Science is now merely knowledge of the individual. The question of the 'essence' of things is replaced by the question of the 'empirical' propositions, to be conveyed by experience and in experiment, upon the individual, and upon its functional connections with other individual things. Henceforward, knowledge needs foundation: epistemology. The question arises of the 'objectivity' of knowledge, and of its subjective conditions and limits.

Knowledge without a Claim to Truth?

c) During succeeding centuries, the basic premise of nominalism continued to prevail. For theologian Nicolas of Cusa (d. 1464), 'negative theology' and physics stand over against each other as modes of knowledge. Human knowledge is docta ignorantia—a 'knowing non-knowing,' or 'knowing of not knowing.' It knows something—indeed, a great deal, and knows ever more, but knows nothing in truth. It even knows why it ultimately knows nothing. Here are its capacities, as well as its boundaries. With similar intent, mathematician and physicist Blaise Pascal (d. 1662) offers a foundation for human science as an ignorance savante, and formulates his thesis of the plurality of 'knowledges': there are everyday knowledge (esprit de finesse), which understands decision and action, scientific knowledge (esprit de géométrie), and faith (l'ordre du coeur). As scientist, says Pascal, the human being must understand how to live at one and the same time in all three forms of knowledge, without being able to refer them to one another.

Critique of Knowledge

d) At the end of the eighteenth century, Immanuel Kant (d. 1804; Kritik der reinen Vernunft, "Critique of Pure Reason"; 1781) defined the capacities and boundaries of knowledge by positing the determination of the objects of knowledge by the condition of the knowing mind. It is not knowledge that conforms to objects, but objects that conform to knowledge: "The understanding grasps only that which it itself produces according to its composition."[1] Human knowledge is therefore empirical—directed upon experience, but at the same time determined by conditions that themselves do not have the character of experience. Absolute knowledge is impossible for human beings: they will never know 'things in themselves,' but only what is accessible in the light of their questions and sketches ('appearances,' 'phenomena'). The phenomenon gained through empirical work is the reality graspable by knowledge. Scientists find themselves in the position of judges of investigation, who listen to witnesses in order to experience something about an event at which they themselves were not even present. They come to know something, but not in the mode of 'truth,' although 'truth' must be the 'regulative idea' of their activity. Since the field of experience stretches to an indeterminable breadth, and the number of possible questions is unlimited, science is a process that runs ad infinitum: any outcome leads to new questions. This is science as investigation. No judgment as to the sense and meaning of this science-process is available through the means of science itself. The range of knowledge is therefore limited. However, this constraint is offset by the certitude that lies in the knowledge of precisely this limitation, and by the insight that knowledge is now a creative act. The reflection of 'subjectivity' belongs to the essential conditions of any 'objectivity.'

Positivism

4. In spite of the extraordinary effects of Kant's critical theory of knowledge, the 'naïve' concept of science, the concept shaped by everyday knowledge, as a true reflection (at least as nearly as possible) of outer reality, becomes determinative again and again, and has led to a claim mounted in the most varied forms in the nineteenth century and until today. This objectivistic idealism is represented by historian Ranke (history as a narrative presentation of 'how it really was'), or in the form of materialistic 'image theories' in historical materialism since Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (→ Marxism), or in the form of a positivistic scientism.

Historicism

5. Beginning in the 1830s and 1840s, science has been more and more determined by the purpose of the acquisition of 'facts,' now historical or scientific. As to what a 'fact' is, however, and what epistemological status it enjoys, no agreement prevails.

The scientific development of the nineteenth century took place under the sign of the notion that everything that is, is historically generated and conditioned. The same development basically determines the specific way in which the modern age constructs history. This historicism constitutes the rise of historical science as one of the principal sciences of the century, as well as involving a historicization of other, systematic areas such as theology, juridical science, and national economics. At the same time, around 1840, with the discovery of the cell, and of the functions of the nucleus as the basic unity of vegetable, animal, and human life, the modern, empirically based natural or physical sciences emerged.

Natural Science

a) From this point onward, the epistemic method of the empirical sciences—observation as the exclusive method of scientific knowledge in the area of natural or physical science (represented by outstanding scientists such as Rudolf Virchow, Hermann von Helmholtz, and Emil Du Bois-Reymond)—was represented as enjoying unlimited validity. Here it was a matter of the knowledge of unassailable ('hard') facts, and of the ('eternal') 'laws' demonstrated by the same. All progress, it was assumed (R. Virchow), rested only and solely on these eternal laws of nature having been established more precisely through a constantly advancing empirical observation. Natural or physical science, accordingly, was seen more and more as the "absolute organ of culture," and the history of natural science as the "authentic history of humanity" (E. Du Bois-Reymond). The triumph of the 'authority of the facts,' and the 'sovereignty' of the laws of science, must therefore extend, as well, beyond natural science, and form the totality of society and politics. Science must become the "method of the entire nation," and constitute the "authentic maxim of thought, of the moral act" (R. Virchow). At the close of the century, in his Welträthsel (1899; Eng. as "The Riddle of the Universe"), zoologist Ernst Haeckel explained that all open questions had been solved, or at least were soluble in principle, that 'culture' was reducible to 'nature,' and that it was the laws of nature that must create the basis of a new 'moral teaching.'

Experience and Understanding

b) What responses are appropriate from those sciences that are concerned with culture? One response was in their subjection to the arguments of the physical sciences, so that historical science was to be defined as a natural science. On the model of Newton's physics, likewise in history the erection of the historical totality must be presented as a recognition of law, developed from a gradual recognition of individual facts. Over against this scientific positivism, historian Johann Gustav Droysen called for an independent theory of historical knowledge (Historik, 'historics') that did not yet exist by any means. In this Wissenschaftslehre der Geschichte (Ger., "Scientific Doctrine of History"), developed from 1857 onward, it was on the foundation of the Kantian transcendental philosophy that Droysen defined the historical science as an empirical science, and therefore precisely as scholarship and investigation. But the given by which this empirical investigation was directed was not the 'past that was,' which after all is past, but the historical material at hand, the remnants and testimonials of that which has been. What is called 'history,' then, is not a model or reflection of 'the past event' (which, for that matter, is impossible), but a mental construct—not an arbitrary one, of course, but one gained by empirical investigation on historical material. The character of that material, according to Droysen, determines the difference, here, from natural or physical science, as the "other major method of empirical investigation." After all, the research of the investigating historian (and this distinguishes the latter from the investigating natural scientist) finds, within, the same ethical and intellectual categories as confront him and her in the actual objects of their episteme: thus their research is an 'understanding.' Furthermore, insists Droysen, even this 'understanding' is historically conditioned, since historical investigation "presupposes the insight that even the content of our ego is a historical result, an outcome, conveyed in many ways" (Droysen).

In contraposition to Droysen, philosopher Wilhelm Dilthey, in his Einleitung in die Geisteswissenschaften (1883; Eng. as "Introduction to the Human Sciences"), while defining all science as science of experience, nevertheless derives all experience essentially from the 'inner experience' of the individual, and there grounds the independence of the Geisteswissenschaften ('human sciences,' 'humanities'). It is the inner experience of the latter that means actual 'reality as it is,' and not only, as in the case of physical science, as the shadow of an outer, and ultimately concealed, reality. The 'understanding' (Verstehen) of the humanities has therefore a higher dignity than that of the mere 'explanation' (Erklären) produced by the natural or physical sciences. Natural sciences are only "sensual experiences about nature," while human sciences are the "comprehensive experience of the mental and spiritual world." There are two classes of sciences, then, and they are of very different kinds.

'Paralysis of Life'

c) Meanwhile, an embittered adversary of both historical science and natural science had arisen: Friedrich → Nietzsche (d. 1900), who called into essential and crucial question any science, and any claim to scientific objectivity, on both sides. As early as 1874 (Vom Nutzen und Nachteil der Historie für das Leben (Ger., "Usefulness and Disadvantage of History for Life"),[2] Nietzsche delivered a fulminating indictment of historicism, and of a history that had 'spread out' and become science. History was destructive, an 'illness,' that destroyed 'life,' because of its indefatigable construction of historical facts that could no longer be brought into any connection; because the scientific objectivity to which it appealed was a fiction; and, above all, because this historical knowledge showed all things and each in their emergence, and thereby also in their expiration, and thus historically relativized them. This knowledge had a paralytic effect on life powers, on decision, and action. Accordingly Nietzsche argued for a new validation of the 'unhistorical'—namely, of the forgotten—and of the 'supra-historical'—namely, of art and religion, and would now only validate a history that sought to serve 'life,' and had therefore left off being a science. 'Scientific objectivity' was something altogether different from what it held itself out to be: it was nothing but an expression of the 'will to power.' This is also the reproach that Nietzsche leveled against the natural science of his time: it was something 'fearful and menacing,' a 'problem with horns' (as Nietzsche formulated it in 1886), since, here again, was the claim to universal validity and acceptance of this knowledge with all of its consequences, the "unbridled, fanciful optimism" of modern science, "faith in everyone's beatitude on earth itself," a seed of annihilation, an insane conceptualization, which, abetted by claim to reach objective causality, arrogates unto itself the capacity to "base and establish the innermost essence of things." But: there are simply no 'facts,' only interpretations, and, of course, the 'will to power,' that 'interprets.' Thus, on the occasion of the pretenses of the historical sciences, as of physical science, and of the motto that knowledge is power, Nietzsche rips the mask from science as a fiction, as an appearance, behind which lurks a will to power of an altogether different kind, a will to power for its own sake.

Kulturwissenschaft, Cultural Studies

6. At the close of the nineteenth century, then, the grounding of science must be achieved anew. For historical science, this was done by the representatives of a historical Kulturwissenschaft (Georg Simmel, Max Weber), who once more sought to return to Kant's criticism and thereby at the same time to answer Nietzsche's question of the relationship between science and 'life.'

a) Max → Weber, especially, defines historical science as a 'reality science,' and 'experience-science,' which, of course, does not simply go around copying historical reality, but which presses forward in concepts and judgments "that are not empirical reality, nor copies of historical reality, but occasions of the ordering of reality in valid fashion." There is no such thing, says Weber, as to copy historical reality without premises. Science is empirically based science with hypotheses. Weber determines it (once again) as research and investigation, namely, as a process that cannot be closed or sealed, a process that proceeds ad infinitum, as Kant had explicated, because every result or conclusion at once raises new questions, and because, at least in the historical disciplines, the "eternally proceeding flow of culture ever introduces new problems to be solved." In this "proceeding into the indefinite," in this infinitude and endlessness of possible problems, as well as of possible objects, the range of science is grounded, as are at the same time, its limits. A science that always receives its questions from the contemporary 'culture' (which is why it also has something to say to its respective present) replaces a science with an absolute claim to knowledge, as well as the contrary, a science that ceases to be science 'in order to serve life,' as Nietzsche had demanded. That kind of historical science also has a different relation to physical science, than it had been defined in the nineteenth century. It understands itself in the sense of a complementarity of both areas of science. If, as Weber established, Begriff ('concept') and 'experiment' are in the same way the "great means of all scientific knowledge," then this also means an indication of the 'conceptual' in the 'experiment' of natural science, and the 'experimental' in the 'concept' of the cultural sciences.

Natural Knowledge as Conditioned by the Question Posed

b) It striking that, since about 1900, similar events in the natural sciences correspond to the new definition of historical knowledge in a framework of 'historical cultural science,' inasmuch as an analogous break occurred with the objectivism, scientism, and positivism of the nineteenth century. In physics, this 'revolution of the way of thinking' was significantly expressed in Werner Heisenberg's 'principle of indeterminacy,' as well as in Niels Bohr's concept of 'complementarity.' Heisenberg's famous formulation (1927) of the 'track' or 'path' of a particle, that comes into existence "only by virtue of our observing it," expresses the fact that the objectivistic subject-object model is inaccessible, because, in the world of the smallest particles, observed phenomena are constituted through, and only through, the observer and the event of the observation. Not even physical cognition, therefore, has an absolute character, but only a relational one. This physical science describes nature not as it is 'in itself'; rather it describes "the nature that is exposed to our question(ings) and our methods," and therefore understands itself as "a part of the oscillation between nature and ourselves." Atoms, therefore, are no longer 'things' or 'objects,' but are "components of situations of observation," which, for a physical analysis of phenomena, possess a "high explanatory value." This new physics, then, has taken hold of hitherto fully unknown worlds, and has, at the same time, reflected upon what it does, in the sense of a self-limitation. It is a "theory of possible knowledge of reality, not a theory of reality as such" (A. Gierer).

Science Today

7. This manner of historical recapitulation of science in history may contribute to an assessment of the dimensions of science in today's society. A modern grasp of science can afford an unrestricted indication of the range of scientific cognition, although it should also be aware of its limits. Historians of today at times still claim of true knowledge of facts, and of the past 'as it actually was.' On the side of the natural or physical sciences, this position corresponds to a 'naturalistic' claim, with the thesis that any event is an authentically physical event, which can be completely described and explained with the means of physical science, and that it is possible to physical science to take an absolute observational perspective, and give causally complete explanations of total reality. Contrariwise, the question must be asked whether and to what extent even natural science, for its part, is conditioned by cultural history, which limits, not the range of its conclusions, but doubtless a possible universal claim to validity in all areas of life. Of natural scientists themselves, the question is being asked to what extent even physical science moves within very strict boundaries, set, on the one hand, by nature, and, on the other, by the structure of human thought (F. Jacob)—as well as whether there even is a precise theory of science, and a complete guarantee of science through its own means—thus, whether natural science can itself actually demonstrate its own completeness and freedom from contradiction (A. Gierer).

The relationship between science and religion, so antagonistically conceptualized, especially in the nineteenth century, can be otherwise defined on such a basis. Competition in a bestowal of meaning with a monopolistic claim to truth is a thing of the past. One might even ask whether it is a matter of persons' having to learn to live once more in one world (J. Mittelstrass), or whether the philosophical excitement of modernity does not consist precisely in the fact that the human being has learned to live in many worlds at once (H. Blumenberg). Religion and science are then no longer antagonists, but dimensions of reality that can enter into a multiplex relationship to one another.

1. Preface to the 2nd ed., 1787.
2. "Unzeitgemäße Betrachtungen," 2nd piece (KSA 1:243-334).

Literature

Blumenberg, Hans, Wirklichkeiten, in denen wir leben, Stuttgart 1981; Daston, Lorraine, "Fear and Loathing of the Imagination in Science," in: Daedalus (Winter 1998), 73-95; Gierer, Alfred, Im Spiegel der Natur erkennen wir uns selbst. Wissenschaft und Menschenbild, Reinbek 1998; Godfrey-Smith, Peter, Theory and Reality: An Introduction to the Philosophy of Science, Chicago 2003; Goldstein, Jürgen, Nominalismus und Moderne: Zur Konstitution neuzeitlicher Subjektivität bei Hans Blumenberg und Wilhelm von Ockham, Freiburg 1998; Hacking, Ian, Representing and Intervening: Introductory Topics in the Philosophy of Natural Science, Cambridge 1983; Heisenberg, Werner, Physics and Philosophy: The Revolution in Modern Science, New York 1961; Kanitscheider, Bernulf/Wetz, Franz-Josef (eds.), Hermeneutik und Naturalismus, Tübingen 1998; Losee, John, A Historical Introduction to the Philosophy of Science, Oxford [4]2001; Latour, Bruno/Woolgar, Steve, Laboratory Life: The Social Construction of Scientific Facts, Princeton 1986; Mittelstrass, Jürgen, "Das ethische Maß der Wissenschaft," in: Rechtshistorisches Journal 7 (1988), 193-210; Oexle, Otto Gerhard, Geschichtswissenschaft im Zeichen des Historismus. Studien zu Problemgeschichten der Moderne, Göttingen 1996; Idem (ed.), Naturwissenschaft, Geisteswissenschaft, Kulturwissenschaft. Einheit—Gegensatz—Komplementarität, Göttingen [2]2000; Rheinberger, Jans-Jörg, Toward a History of Epistemic Things: Synthesizing Proteins in the Test Tube, Stanford 1997; Shapin, Steven/Schaffer, Simon, Leviathan and the Air-Pump: Hobbes, Boyle, and the Experimental Life, Princeton 1989.

→ Criticism of Religion, Enlightenment, History, Knowledge, Natural Science, Rationalism/Irrationalism, Reason, Theology

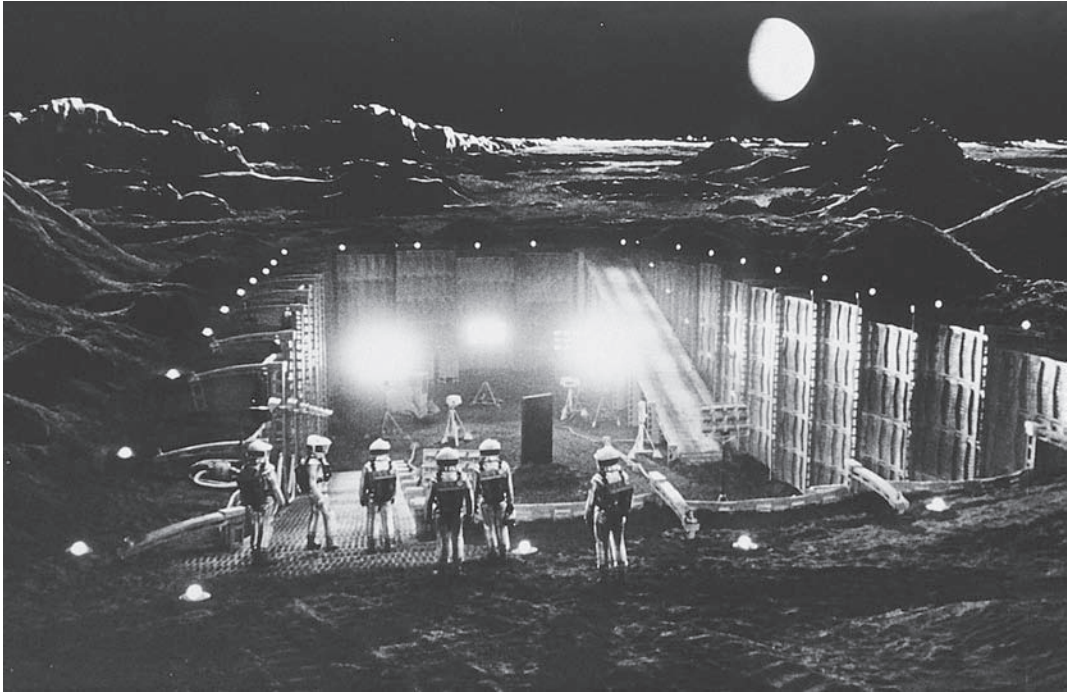
Otto Gerhard Oexle

Science Fiction

Mythic Reports

1. Mythic reports of gods and heroes, such as Gilgamesh, Odysseus, or Thoth, who had come to the boundaries of the world and of their own existence, have, over millennia, formed the narrative style that connects a mythic geography with reflections on 'other gods and other persons.' The fundamental enclosure of the traditional world thus remains preserved, even if, in journeys to the beyond, and heaven, or to 'new realms,' frontiers are overcome in narrative, and new spaces of existence are unlocked. Only with the 'open universe' of the Copernican world did the discussion on the 'plurality of worlds' gain currency—for which Bernard de Fontenelles's Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes (Fr., "Conversations on the Plurality of the Worlds") provided the heading—and become a problem for philosophy and Christian theology. With the threat of the loss of the geocentric system, even original → sin and redemption become precarious in a new way. Furthermore, the discovery of a 'new world,' America, altogether concretized the problem. Since original sin was visualized as being 'transmitted by sexual generation,' were the Indians then without any sin, and therefore not needful of redemption?[1]



Mythic Geographies

2. The close connection between a mythic geography and a quest for salvation in the distance, or the idea of an alien god who comes from afar, entailed the concept that science-fiction literature, arising with the dawn of the twentieth century, has brought along religious lines of questions from the beginning. → Utopias and voyages imaginaires are the literary (and critical of its respective 'present times') common background of science-fiction literature and its forerunners, while the 'entertaining' → fantasy literature connected, instead, to sagas, folktales, and romances of chivalry. After the technological problems of space travel and time journeys had been 'solved,' relatively quickly, by the leading authors, in 'fantastic' recourses to science, the questions arising in the point of departure were very promptly transformed, after a presentation of the conquest of time and space, into anthropological discourse. (The modern science-fiction literature of magazines, which spread during the 1920s in the "Bible Belt" of the United States, emerged at first as technological and moral instruction.[2]) The 'tremendous moment,' in another world, of encounter with an 'other' (an alien), summoned up in science-fiction literature practically all basic religious patterns. In terms of the latter, contacts with the 'other' could be dramatized: superiority and 'cosmic brotherhood,' dependency and need for redemption. The science-fiction genre acquired a special power after the Second World War, through the partial switch of media from literature to film. In films like Stanley Kubrick's "2001—A Space Odyssey" (1968; see photograph), or Steven Spielberg's "Close Encounters of the Third Kind" (1977), the contrary motifs of galactic colonization and of an invasion from Outer Space were transposed with graphic effect. The mobilizing fantasies of a 'flight from the world,' and those of a menace or rescue from the All, for decades determined the psychodynamics of science-fiction reading. After real space travel began to be routine in the 1980s, new frontiers and limit regions were thematized. In William Gibson's novel, Neuromancer (1984), the interface of computer systems with the human brain (and vice versa) led to a new 'beyond,' in which, and behind which, tremendous opportunities emerge. Neuromantics and Cyberpunks are the Argonauts of a new mythology.

3. In the general reception of science-fiction literature, three fundamental motifs overlap, and at the same time support one another.

- One motif takes its point of departure in the present stance of the world, and has foreign, strange worlds and 'gods' entering into contact with it, or having already done so. Thus, the schemata of epiphany and redemption, of appearance and rescue, are taken up into an intergalactic communication, and included in, transferred to, the sequence of an earlier presence ('parousia'), and possible return of the gods—the delay of a parousia. Working from this view, C. G. Jung and E. Benz have designated 'UFOlogy' (→ UFO) a modern religion of redemption ('soteriology'; → Salvation/Redemption).
- Another motif, like the first, begins with the existence of foreign worlds, but postpones contact with them to a distant future. Earth then frequently exists no more. The key soteriological pattern is then no longer a rescue from the All, but is a new manner of human existence, in the spaceship or in new frameworks. After the loss of the 'old world,' the question of meaning accompanies the spaceship, even under the new conditions of an 'astro-escapism,' in undiminished brutality. Dramaturgically, what unfolds is tantamount a series of pastoral conversations with the 'ship's chaplain.'
- A third motif, finally, develops something like a religious anthropology of space. In the foreign worlds (or even on the spaceship, as its own 'new world') are found the most diverse types and 'variants' of religion: ascetical (H. Harrison) or Hindu (R. Zelazny) 'gods,' for example, who

Stanley Kubrick's film epic, "2001—A Space Odyssey" (1968), can be regarded as one of the most important science-fiction films of the twentieth century. Its importance rests not only on its innovations in film and technological tricks, and in the visual power of its scenarios, but also, and especially, on its mythic and metaphysical quality. Arthur C. Clarke's and Kubrick's plot covers the whole history of humanity—from the prehistoric generation by way of a 'primordial murder,' in the prologue, to the era of the space travel of the near future, with a stop on the moon and space flight. It contains a parallel history of technology—or better, of the human confrontation with the tools and instruments gradually conducting their self-emancipation, from the deadly tool of the 'bone,' to an intelligent, sensate machine, the computer HAL have determinate functions for that world, or who lead a euhemerism further through to 'god programs' that can be played by human beings. Besides, monotheism, as the traditional religion 'on board' the spaceship, often collides with an opaque cult of persons; or else super-systems, in dramatic interpretation 'ships' (as in Frank Herbert's "Dune Chronicles," 1965ff.), are transformed into gods. In this case, the latter produce 'absolute dependency' (Schleiermacher) and tolerate no other 'subjects' beside themselves.

4. As a mythology of the 'age of space travel' (→ New Myths/New Mythologies), science fiction posits the traditional questions of meaning under the pressure of a new demand: What remains, if the salvation history of the demolished earth has been abandoned? What founds → 'values' and → 'meaning,' if the 'priests' are only functionaries of a pragmatic system of government? Despite all of the passages of religious criticism in this genre, there remains an element of religious reflection that comes forward all the more clearly, the more consistently the traditional religious convictions, in their spatial and temporal removal from Terra, are abandoned. Reading groups focusing on certain science-fiction authors and cult films ("Star Trek—Spaceship Enterprise") proclaim modern interfaces between reflected fiction and imagined reality.

1. On the motif of 'sin' in 'other worlds,' see Gladigow 1988, 255ff.
2. For the development of the genre, and thematic areas: Alpers et al. 1988, 26ff.

Literature

Alpers, Hans J. et al. (eds.), Lexikon der Science Fiction Literatur, Munich [2]1988; Galipeau, Steven A., The Journey of Luke Skywaker: An Analysis of Modern Myth and Symbol, Chicago 2001; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Andere Welten – andere Religionen?," in: Stolz, Fritz, (ed.), Religiöse Wahrnehmung der Welt, Zurich 1988, 245-273; Idem, "Welche Welt paßt zu welchen Religionen? Zur Konkurrenz von 'religiösen Weltbildern' und 'säkularen Religionen,'" in: Zeller, Dieter (ed.), Religion im Wandel der Kosmologien, Frankfurt/M. 1999, 13-31; Gunn, James (ed.), The New Encyclopedia of Science Fiction, New York 1988; James, Edward/Mendlesohn, Farah (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Science Fiction, Cambridge 2003; Pederson, Jay P. (ed.), St. James Guide to Science Fiction Writers, [4]1996; Porter, Jennifer E./McLaren, Darcee L. (ed.), Star Trek and Sacred Ground: Explorations of Star Trek, Religion, and American Culture, Albany 1999; Reilly, Robert (ed.), The Transcendent Adventure: Studies of Religion in Science Fiction/Fantasy, Westport 1985; Yeffeth, Glenn (ed.), Taking the Red Pill: Science, Philosophy and Religion in The Matrix, Dallas 2003.

→ Cosmology/Cosmogony, Fantasy (Genre), Machine, Natural Science, New Myths/New Mythologies, UFO, Utopia

Burkhard Gladigow

9000. And finally, there is a fragmentary heroic history here, as well—the expedition to Jupiter, with departure, danger, battle, tragedy, death, and rebirth: with Kubrik, science fiction crosses over into anthropo-fiction. The unifying element is the → epiphany of a supra-dimensional, flawless metal monolith at the turning point of human and individual development—the materialization of a world soul, divine principle, or collective will to progress. In a decisive scene, a team of scientists inspects the monolith (center of the photograph), after it has been found on the moon by excavation. Kubrick stages the investigation of the artifact as a ritual circling 'approach to the Holy,' to the fascinosum, the tremendum (Rudolf Otto). The beams of light that emerge from the monolith point to Jupiter—and beyond. The final image shows an embryo wafting in the universe—symbol of the reincarnation or transformation of the human being into the Nietzschean 'superman'? (Hubert Mohr)

Scientology

1. Lafayette Ron Hubbard (1911–1984), active in the 1940s as a → science-fiction writer, in 1950 published a bestselling book Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health, in which he set forth a model for the analysis and healing of psychic sufferings. It has remained a component of Scientology to this day.

According to the (etymologically erroneous) asseverations of Scientology, dianetics derives from the Greek dia-, 'through,' and nous, 'soul,' 'mind.' The aim of dianetics is to detect and remove 'engrams'—mental/spiritual images impressed into the soul/mind. Engrams arise through negative experiences stored in the 'reactive mind.' In situations that can be brought into connection with the sensations or feelings of an engram, the original pattern of defense or repulsion is once more activated. This mechanism, according to Hubbard, is responsible for bodily malfunctions and the impairment of the human psyche. Once all engrams are extinguished, persons find themselves in the condition of the 'clear.' The reactive mind then no longer exists. Guided by the analytical mind, which is in a position to deal with the consequences of the engrams, persons, in their actions, can follow the basic 'command' at the basis of all life: "Survive!" They are healthy and successful because they can use their abilities in optimal fashion.

Auditing

Extinguishing the engrams becomes possible through 'auditing' (from Lat., audire, 'listen to'). By purposeful questions, an 'auditor' hunts out the engrams, which are thereupon extinguished through the conscious recall of the occurrences that underlie them. An important tool in this process is the 'electropsychometer,' developed by Hubbard, which indicates to the auditor the existence of engrams.

Members of the Church of Scientology demonstrate in Berlin, on October 27, 1997, before a very historic background: the Kaiser Wilhelm Memorial Church. They make an appeal for public acknowledgment with an American flag, as well as German and Swiss flags, and a 'living image' of the Statue of Liberty. In her hand, the white-clad woman holds not only the obligatory torch, but also the original American edition of What Is Scientology?, which is an official presentation of the Church of Scientology. If we were to combine the signs used associatively, the intended message would be formulated somewhat as follows. The European states, too, are summoned to exalt religious freedom, after the example of the United States, and accord Scientology formal legal status as a religious community. Simultaneously, the appropriation, here, of the national symbols of the United States conveys a missionary thought: only with Scientology will one really be a participant in the liberty and freedom promised by the dream of the 'land of the free.' For those with whom this message has no success, Scientology is a spark that, at present, is igniting vigorous discussions on the definition of the concept of religion, and on the relative importance of state-guaranteed religious freedom as weighed against other goods. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

'Scientology,' derived from the Latin scire/scientia ('know/knowledge') and the Greek logos, is understood internally as 'knowledge, how one knows.' It broadens the dianetic model to include a mental component. The human being is no longer only body and mind, but a spiritual being ('thetan,' from the Greek letter theta). A thetan uses body and mind as a connective member to the physical universe, with the purpose of creating and controlling her own universe, consisting of matter, energy, space, and time (MEST). A thetan is immortal. When someone dies, the thetan leaves that body, and enters one of a new person being born. Having available a human body and understanding that work ever more optimally, without engrams, the thetan develops his spiritual and mental liberty and freedom in the MEST universe, and becomes an 'operating thetan' (OT).

Ethics and Practice

2. In the framework of Scientology, the partial aspects (dynamics) constitutive of the "command: Survive!" were broadened. To the four dynamics in the concept of dianetics (self, procreation, group, humanity) were added four more (whole of life, material universe, spiritual being, infinity). The thrust to survival in the eighth dynamic (infinity) marks the point of intersection with the Divine, which is not enlarged upon in the Scientology literature: the eighth dynamic is also designated as the Supreme Being. In a framework of her spiritual development, the person or thetan must aim at progress in all dynamics.

The path to spiritual freedom is called a 'bridge,' and is to be walked through numerous courses that build upon and complement one another. In terms of its structure, the bridge resembles occult systems of initiation. The path on the bridge can be traversed by way of either the pure use of the corresponding course, or the attendant training to the status of auditor. While the first courses exact a high price, the training generates a stronger integration into Scientology. Then comes a further conclusion: that the teachings of Scientology are imbedded in a rigid ethics, in which all those activities are labeled good that are serviceable as "constructive survival activities" of the development of the individual Scientologist or of his or her own group. Evil, accordingly, is everything harmful for Scientology. Critics, within its own ranks or from without, are seen as 'repressive persons' or 'anti-social personalities,' against whom a battle is to be waged.

The Scientologist's everyday is determined by the pursuit of the course, and by working in the organizations. Higher stages of the 'bridge' can only be traversed in seeking out churches. The outlay of time is great, so that social relations with non-Scientologists are scarcely possible. Hubbard established procedures for the celebration of naming, marriage, and death. The extent to which such celebrations are held is unclear. The weekly Sunday service is not held in all churches. For other feast days, as for Hubbard's birthday, or the anniversary of the publication of Dianetics, there is no established ceremonial: by and large, they have the character of a secular event.

Organization

3. a) The development of Scientology came in large part as a reaction to external influences. Originally, Hubbard wished to reform the psychology of his time. As the professional community rejected his Dianetics, and the stream of the Dianetics self-help groups dwindled, the foundation established by Hubbard in 1952 was met with competition, and he lost his copyright to Dianetics. It was at this point that he expanded his Dianetics into Scientology. In 1953, the first church was founded. The 1960s marked the appearance of Narconon, an organization to combat drug-addiction and offer rehabilitation, along with the Citizens' Commission for Human Rights (CCHR), for the discovery of abuses of received psychiatry. Both organizations cultivate a negative image of pharmaco-psychiatry. With the close of the 1970s, Scientology was reconstructed as a universal service organization. The existing Scientological principles of the perception of reality and communication, as well as the chief structures of the organizations themselves, were extended to the areas of economics, training, and education. With special organizations for persons in public life (Celebrity Centers), the credibility of popular members is utilized in order to correct the negative image arisen since the 1960s. Since 1982, the headquarters of Scientology are maintained at the Religious Technology Center in Los Angeles, which administers the materials of Scientology, and licenses the respective organizations and clients.

Self-Image

In Scientology's self-image, on the other hand, history since 1950 has been the experience of a progressive knowledge and understanding concerning the universal validity of its own principles. With the purpose of building "a world without war and violence," and to "be able to have the rights pertaining to its competency, and to ascend to spiritual heights," it sees itself as standing in the tradition of the great religions of redemption. The knowledge contained in these religions is viewed as subsumed in Scientology, and complemented there with new elements of knowledge. Hubbard is honored as the founder of Scientology, and as a great scientist and philosopher.

Is Scientology a Religion?

c) Conflicts still prevail over the character of Scientology as a religion. While, for some, auditing is a religious act comparable to confession, critics regard it as psycho-manipulation ('brain-washing'; → Anti-Cult Movements). The perspective of a need for financing on the part of religions is opposed by the picture of an organization existing solely for profit. Scientology's legal recognition as a religious community is not uniform worldwide, and has repeatedly been the object of legal proceedings. In the United States, in 1993, it was recognized as a religious community by the tax offices with de facto responsibility for this determination. The decision was preceded by years of quarrel, and political influence is suspected. In Germany, on the other hand, in 1955, the Federal Labor Court decided that—at least where labor laws are concerned—Scientology is to be treated as a commercial business. But a definitive clarification is still pending. Appraisals of the character of Scientology as a religion are also always connected with the traditions of the respective countries, not least of all with public debate over alternative religion.

Pending further research, religious or spiritual references in the core area described in the beginning can be established. Independently of this, Scientology is the object of criticism on grounds of its particular hierarchical structures of leadership, the close control of its members, and acts of individual Scientologists in the gray areas of lawful permissibility. But there has been no proof of the allegation that Scientology is a Mafia-type organization that strives for world rule, and that systematically infiltrates politics and the economy.

For several decades now, Scientology has counted its own world membership at 8,000,000. Although as yet no independent reliable data is available on a global scale, it can be assumed that the actual membership is considerably smaller.

Literature

Sources: Hubbard, Ron L., Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health, Los Angeles 1950; New Era Publications International, What Is Scientology?, Los Angeles 1992.

Secondary Literature: Christensen, Dorthe Refslund, Rethinking Scientology: Cognition and Representation in Religion, Therapy and Soteriology, forthcoming; Lamont, Stewart, Religion Inc.: The Church of Scientology, London 1986; Melton, J. Gordon, The Church of Scientology, Salt Lake City 2000; Wallis, Roy, The Road to Total Freedom: A Sociological Analysis of Scientology, New York 1977; Whitehead, Harriet, Renunciation and Reformulation: A Study of Conversion in an American Sect, Ithaca 1987; Winther, Joseph A., Dianetics: A Doctor's Report, New York 1951.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Church, Esotericism, New Religions, Occultism, Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming

Steffen Rink

Secrecy

Secrecy as an Evolutionary Strategy

1. Secrecy is a strategy developed by evolution, in the case of beast and human alike within the biological food chain, that attains an elevated degree of individual opportunities and possibilities for survival and reproduction by way of the accumulation of various informational prospects. The person or animal with a successful disguise does not become prey, the one that hides his/her/its food survives times of want, the creature of restrained impulses and hidden intents can secretly dodge competitors for nourishment, sexual partners, and territory, and the one that protects progeny to the third generation ensures the safe transport of her/his/its genes. The greater the concealment and silence vis-à-vis the competing side ('information reduction'), or the more that that side is deceived and 'tricked' ('disinformation'), the greater the chances of reproduction on one's own side. A shortcoming with regard to secrecy can mean death. Fear and triumph, therefore, are the constant companions of secrecy. The invisibility of one is the insecurity of the other.

Human Secrecy Intelligence

2. Explicit pleasure in the generation of secrecy that can become a craving or addiction appears only with the human being. Discovery in a game of hide-and-seek arouses squeals of delight in a child, even a very young one, the dissolution of the state of tension between hiding and showing oneself is enjoyed in all merriment, stubborn silence out of spite signs a new stage of development, and re-interpreting reality with words is the lovely ruse of others, not only for Huckleberry Finn.

Double-Coded Secret Signs

a) The basis of all of these phenomena is that, through cultural evolution, the human brain has become specialized in the practice of signs, and in intelligent, secretive ways of dealing with reality. Signs stand for something that, in itself, is invisible, insensible, and inaudible. Olfactory, optical, and acoustical behavior, in the sense of positing markers, here forms the evolutionary basis, but is the prisoner of the materiality of things. Only the achievement of a transformation from the openly communicative marking to the exclusive secret sign sparks the evolutionary breakthrough. In order to introduce the sign durably and reliably, a practice of secrecy, by means of a positing of signs, must represent the absent, secret thing in the present sign in such wise that it is double-coded—coded as an 'open secret sign.' All see or hear the sign; however, only some recognize, know, and take charge of that which the sign indicates (wild game depicted on rocks, the early Christian fish symbol, the Zen garden).

Co-Evolution of Secrecy and Revelation

b) Simultaneous esoteric and exoteric secrecy arouses not only the curiosity and craving of the excluded, but also the temptation of a profitable betrayal. The dynamic co-evolution of secrecy and revelation, thus launched, has today produced several tamper-resistant strategies of secrecy:

- Semantic double-coding, in word and image, divides reality into a visible-and-real world and an invisible-and-virtual one (→ masks, whizzing-sticks, bread and wine in cults of life-renewal; allegories and the narration of parables in speech and writing).
- Performative initiation and introduction that make the individual a member of a closed chain (years-long rites of initiation in men's associations and brotherhoods; exclusive teacher-pupil and master-disciple relations; trials of courage).
- Unexaminable vehicles of information, such as ancestors, dreams, visions, divination, omens, oracles, miracles, and charms (→ Esotericism; Occultism).
- Unverifiable histories (narratives of → origin, ascensions to heaven, after-death reports and near-death experiences, eschatological histories and → apocalypses).
- Magical secret rituals that can be successful only when held without witnesses (→ Voodoo cults, spiritual alchemy, black → magic).
- Secret cults that render secrecy an immediate, ecstatic, and extraordinary experience of wholeness (ancient → mystery cults, Australian → Aborigines' corroborees).
- Hierarchical structures, in which the organization's secret can be known and used only by the invisible master-superior (certain Rosicrucian groups, the "Esoteric Section" of the → Theosophical Society, Opus Dei, → Scientology).
- Transformation of the—as yet—unknown or unknowable to the status of the 'secret' (mysteries of faith; promises of revelation; speculations on cosmology or on the theory of evolution; TV cult-series "The X-Files").
- Self-reliance and independence, which keep nothing secret except this fact (traffic in secrets; esoteric mania for betraying secrets; many secret societies after the abandonment of their original purpose of their organization, e.g., German Masonic Lodges in the nineteenth century).

These forms of secrecy are characteristic of all religions. They function on the principle that the whole is more than the sum of its parts. Only those in control of the whole are in charge of the secret. Individual participants in the secret, integrated but subordinate, cannot destroy the operational force of the secrecy. In the extreme case, the secret becomes a mystery of faith, and of self-bewitching imagination, impenetrable to all.

Secret Knowledge by Reflection

c) On the other hand, self-reflexive secrecy knows and understands what it does. It successfully shifts the dynamics of concealment and revelation to the level of reflexive knowledge in the area of individual cognition. A self-aware, self-controlled, attentive ability to remain silent is characteristic here. In creative play, and secret, confidential experiment with the possibilities of representing sign and signal, limits and boundaries fall from around the respective axiomatic conceptions of world and self (→ shamanism, scholarly → Daoism, → mysticism, alchemy).

3. Of such elements, religious acts build up a world invisible and out of reach, a world of the spiritual and believed, an 'otherwise world,' a 'world behind,' behind the world of outward facts and conditions. Secrecy protects and immunizes this second world, which determines life here and hereafter, together with the well-being of those who deal with the world of secrecy. The unequal chances for life and well-being, presented this way in gerontocracies, caste societies, patriarchates, or other forms of government has, as a rule, very stable credibility. It makes religions the connective tissue of human socialization. A self-reflexive piety of silence, and falling silent, can, on the contrary, become the catalyst and motor of cultural evolution, or make survival possible in an environment of deadly enemies (Jewish and Christian → gnosticism; Taquia and Sufi brotherhoods [→ Sufism]; 'Marranos').

4. The world's retransformation into an enchanted garden of occultism and esotericism, parliamentarily uncontrollable bank secrets, and new enchantment at the hands of the media, is at full speed. In this situation, secrecy still deserves the self-reflexive elucidation of who it is who produces which secrets, in what situation and against whom, for what reason and to what end, and how and by means of what procedure or operation.

Literature

Assmann, Aleida/Assmann, Jan (eds.), Schleier und Schwelle I: Geheimnis und Öffentlichkeit, Munich 1997; Bok, Sissela, Secrets: On the Ethics of Concealment and Revelation, New York 1982; Bolle, Kees W. (ed.), Secrecy in Religions, Leiden etc. 1987; Keen, Ian, Knowledge and Secrecy in an Aboriginal Religion, Oxford 1994; Kippenberg, Hans G./Stroumsa, Guy G., Secrecy and Concealment: Studies in the History of Mediterranean and Near Eastern Religions, Leiden 1995; Mensching, Gustav, Das heilige Schweigen. Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, Gießen 1926; Meyer, Birgit/Pels, Peter (eds.), Magic and Modernity: Interfaces of Revelation and Concealment, Stanford 2003; Simmel, Georg, "The Sociology of Secrecy and of Secret Societies," in: American Journal of Sociology 1 (1905), 441ff.; Urban, Hugh B., Tantra: Sex, Secrecy, Politics, and Power in the Study of Religion, Berkeley 2003; Wolfson, Elliot R. (ed.), Rending the Veil: Concealment and Secrecy in the History of Religions, New York/London 1999.

→ Apocalypse, Epiphany, Esotericism, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Kabbalah, Mysticism, Occultism, Perception, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Trickster

Hemma Boneberg

Sect

Concept

1. In antiquity, the concept 'sect' (from Lat., sequi, 'to follow'; free translation of Gk. haíresis, 'choice,' → Heresy) served to denote the followers of a philosopher; in republican Rome, it was also used for political followings. In Acts 24:5 (cf. 24:14), the concept appears in connection with the High Priest's indictment of Paul before the Roman governor as "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes." Christianity adopted the concept 'sect' quite early. The term denoted the members of a community adhering to a faith orientation and teaching that had been declared deviant, but it could also be applied to an independent religion, such as Islam, which, in the Acts of the sixteenth-century Inquisition, was referred to the secta de Mahoma (Sp., 'sect of Muhammad').

The ecclesiastical application of the concept 'sect' to other groups is to be understood only from the relation between the → Church, regarded as rightly believing, and its self-concept (indeed as the one, universal, and common Church), and 'deviation' from this orthodoxy. In religions in which a central instance and a hierarchical church do not exist, such as in Sunni Islam, the concept is not applicable. Both the conceptual application and the distinction between 'Church' and 'sects,' were subject to change.

Criteria in Christian Theology

2. Even in the primitive Christian Church, those who deviated from nascent orthodoxy in their views were excluded as heretics (→ Heresy) or schismatics. This judgment held as well for many dissenting and deviant groups of the Middle Ages, as, for example, the Cathars. In some cases, such groupings could be integrated into the Church by way of the founding of new orders. In the wake of the → Reformation, other definitions of 'sect' emerged: groups that were not included in the religious Peace of Augsburg and in the Peace of Westphalia, qualified as such; later, communities, as well, that introduced other scripture than the canonized texts of the Bible and held to them as vehicles of divine revelation. Finally, those who failed to acknowledge the apostolic succession and adopted other professions of faith were given the same label. In Protestantism today, Christian groups that have not joined the World Council of Churches, or ecumenical Christianity, or have not been received into them, are understood as sects. The same applies to those that, besides Christian traditions, use extra-biblical sources of revelation. Other criteria often cited are: (a) a split from a larger religious community, (b) cultic components in comparison with Weltanschauung, and (c) an unambiguous division from all other organizations in teaching and practice. Here it is often imputed to sects that, in disparate measure, they render their members psychically disturbed; make them dependent; destroy social connections; sketch an unhistorical image of history; see things in black and white; use all available means to prevent members from leaving the group; and not least of all, exploit their members financially. As representative of groups against whom these reproaches are made, we may here cite the Church of → Scientology (→ Anti-Cult Movements).

Sociological Criteria

3. Along with these theological distinctions, sociological criteria are also set up. Max → Weber and Ernst Troeltsch have established distinctions such as: One is born into a church; one joins a sect. Churches are institutions in which all can be members on an equal footing; in the sects only the true believers are promoted to such equality. In the sects, only one → charisma is acknowledged, while, in the churches, charisma is managed by professional → priests. In their relationship with the world, churches are said to be more available to compromise than are sects. Weber's classification had in view the effects of Calvinist and Pietistic religious motivation on economic activity; the extent to which his intent was sociological categorization is questionable. Furthermore, some characteristics of the sects do not apply to those of today; many of these evince a claim to universality, or readiness for compromise with the world.

R. Stark and W. S. Bainbridge offer another definition. They designate those groups as 'sects' that have split off from existing religious communities: groups that 'import' concepts, or that adhere to new images, are → 'cults.' According to this definition, Christianity would be a Jewish sect. B. Wilson and B. Johnson, on the other hand, have suggested that groups standing in social tension with their environment, and excluded on this account, or excluding themselves, be designated sects. But meanwhile, this criterion applies to many churches as well: in questions of sexuality and family planning, the Catholic Church, for example, might contradict the prevalent views of modern society. Another trait was seen in the number of members. On the other hand, many churches (as the Coptic Church or the Orthodox churches in Poland, Finland, and America), in spite of rather small membership numerically, are certainly not regarded as sects.

Generation of Problems

4. The colloquial use of the term, according to H. Hemminger, designates groups that "instead of freedom of development produce dependency, demean persons, and generate intolerance."[1] It is questionable whether new religious movements (→ New Religions) can be appropriately characterized with this usage, and whether religious studies ought to adopt this concept. Thus, H. Zinser points out that, with the application of this concept, "a difference and an inequality [is] still held that [has] become essentially inappropriate, through the dismantling of the state church, and the dissolution and transformation of the popular church into a community church."[2] Applying the concept consequently neglects the altered position of religion and churches in modern Western societies.

The question arises whether the concept of sect is not invalidated by the privatization of religion issuing from religious freedom.[3] The concept of sect stems from religious traditions that it served for the purpose of self-definition, and division from without. Although many (even Christian) scholars repeatedly indicate that the concept of sect is marked by undue bias, it is still used. But ultimately, it is nothing but a polemical concept and altogether unsuited for the formation of theory in religious studies.

1. Hemminger 1995, 65.
2. Zinser 1997, 132.
3. Ibid.

Literature

Bainbridge, William Sims, The Sociology of Religious Movements, New York/London 1997; Hemminger, Hansjörg, Was ist eine Sekte?, Mainz 1995; Lewis, James R., The Encyclopedia of Cults, Sects, and New Religions, Amherst 1998; Stark, Rodney/Bainbridge, William S., The Future of Religion: Secularization, Revival and Cult Formation, Berkeley 1985; Troeltsch, Ernst, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1911), trans. Olive Wyon, Chicago 1981; Wilson, Bryan, Religious Sects: A Sociological Study, London 1970; Idem, The Social Dimensions of Sectarianism: Sects and New Religious Movements in Contemporary Society, Oxford 1990; Zinser, Hartmut, Der Markt der Religionen, Munich 1997.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Church, Cult, Denomination, Group, Heresy, Minorities, New Religions, Polemics

Babett Remus

Secularization

Concept

1. The term 'secularization' can represent either of two distinct concepts, as it denotes either of two distinct events. One of the latter is any process either of 'making worldly' or 'becoming worldly,' while the other refers to the state appropriation of church property. 'Secularization' has a somewhat different meaning in the legal terminology of the Catholic Church, where it has its place in the distinction between 'order' priests and 'secular' priests or deacons, and denotes the juridical process of (at least a partial) dispensation of order priests from observance of the rules of their respective religious orders. Etymologically, it derives from the Latin saeculum, the meaning of which as '(world) age' was broadened in the Middle Ages to include 'world.'

'Secularization' as State Appropriation of Church Property

2. In the meaning of 'secularization' as the process of appropriating church property, the word itself can occur only in Christian religious history. But the process of an appropriation of religious property by state instances is by no means limited to that religion. Naturally, it is a prerequisite for secularizations in this sense that the special quality of property (as a rule, of property acquired by the Church in the bestowal of a foundation, or in the founding of a church institution) be previously formed as religious property that enjoys a different legal status than does the property of a private person. For the ancient pre-Christian religions, the temple comes especially to mind, reckoned, as it was, as the property of a deity conceived as present in it by virtue of the cultic image. In principle, all things belonging to the temple—including money deposited there—were regarded as sacrosanct. Nevertheless, in time of war temple treasuries were robbed again and again, and this act was frequently counted as sacrilege, even apart from cases in which an attempt was made to legitimize the destruction and plundering of a temple as 'punishment.' At bottom, the Christian Church adopted the ancient model of the formation and designation of religious property. Through gifts and other mechanisms, episcopal churches and monasteries inherited property that was extensively withdrawn from the disposition of their functionaries, and that, on account of the prohibition of alienation, had the tendency to grow. Similar procedures can be observed in Asia, in the societies that stood under Buddhist influence. Endowments fulfill the same function in Islamic lands, and in India. No extrinsic cause was needed for the property thus amassed to stir the greed of political institutions finding themselves in notorious financial need. Here it did not make much difference whether the political systems in question were friendly or hostile toward religion. In the Christian West, a number of secularizations can be observed: in the eighth century in Franconia through Charles Martel, in the sixteenth century in many countries of Europe with the introduction of the Reformation, in France in the wake of the Great Revolution of 1789, in the German Empire in 1803 by decree of the Imperial Deputation, in Russia after the October Revolution of 1917. Despite the different justifications attempted for these occurrences, the result was, in principle, always similar: the loss of treasure of the religious establishment was compensated only in rare instances. The secularizations of the Modern Age, especially, issued in the sale and privatization of the property of foundations that, at first, fell to the state, and thus joined the overall process of capitalist utilization. As one might expect, this privatization occurred also in Russia, and in still greater scope.

Secularization as Making or Becoming Worldly

3. Scarcely any other concept in history or sociology of religion is the object of such dispute as is secularization understood as making or becoming worldly. There are positions that adopt the concept of secularization as an irreversible development—of course with extremely diverse designations of the beginning of this process or event. For others, the point of departure is that there is no such thing as secularization at all, but only an alteration of the social gestalt of religion. A third—and most recent—position argues that secularization has taken place in (Western) Europe only, thus making Europe the 'exceptional case,' while earlier on scholars saw Europe as the 'normal case' and the United States (→ North America) as the—religiously committed—exception.

This astonishing discrepancy is due first and foremost to the employment of different definitions of → religion. If the starting point is a functional definition of religion, then there can be no 'irreligion' in the strict sense. The indisputable deterioration of ecclesial influence on society and culture in the last two centuries is explained as the religious transformation of monopolistic religious organization into a → 'spirituality' whose orientation is to the individual. It is denied that rejection of church can be understood as secularization. On the other hand, if one's point of departure is a substantial definition of religion, that ultimately has a particular religious content (belief in God, conceptualizations of the hereafter, etc.,) as its subject, then a deterioration can indeed be verified, in traditional conceptualizations of faith and in religious acts (church attendance, baptism, etc.), that can be designated as secularization. Common to both positions is that their starting point is a transformation in the area of religion. But the very adoption of this point of departure entails problems, since it is only to a very limited extent that indisputable propositions can be made regarding the relation of religion to culture and society when it comes to a discourse upon the past. Even relatively simple phenomena, such as past participation in the operation of religious institutions, are known at all reliably for only approximately 150 years. The influence of religious notions on persons' activity is altogether beyond the range of our knowledge. The construct of secularization owes its survival to the assumption of a pre-modern condition in which religion—of whatever form and contour—is considered to be a major influence on daily life. That this influence was great on a certain circle of persons cannot be disputed. Of course, the same is applicable in the Modern Age, as well, including the present. To render the extremely imprecise concept of secularization operational, it might be helpful to define it in such a way that secularization will be an object when the participation of religious products in the overall quantity of goods and services deteriorates. This definition raises plenty of technical problems; but, under reference to a substantial concept of religion, it affords the opportunity of making empirically more fully charged propositions concerning religious changes. Here, in terms of an increase in production in society as well, it can be verified that, in certain circumstances, even with an increased production of religious goods in absolute quantities, a relative diminution is to be noted in the production of those goods. This very development is indicated in, say, the second half of the nineteenth century. An enormous expansion in productivity therefore favors primarily the proportionate balance of nonreligious goods and services. Whether this process should be called 'secularization' in an exacting sense depends once more on the observer's understanding of religion.

Literature

Ashford, Sheena/Timms, Noel, What Europe Thinks: A Study of Western European Values, Aldershot etc. 1992; Berger, Peter L. (ed.), The Desecularization of the World: Resurgent Religion and World Politics, Washington 1999; Brown, Callum G., The Death of Christian Britain, London 2001; Idem, "The Secularisation Decade: What the 1960s

Have Done to the Study of Religion," in: McLeod/Ustorf 2003, 29-46; Chadwick, Owen, The Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century, Cambridge 1977; Davie, Grace, Religion in Britain since 1945: Believing without Belonging, Oxford 1994; Eadem, Europe: The Exceptional Case. Parameters of Faith in the Modern World, London 2002; Halman, Loek/Riis, Ole (eds.), Religion in Secularizing Society: The Europeans' Religion at the End of the 20th Century, Leiden 2003; Kehrer, Günter, Einführung in die Religionssoziologie, Darmstadt 1988; Lehmann, Hartmut (ed.), Säkularisierung, Dechristianisierung, Rechristianisierung im neuzeitlichen Europa, Göttingen 1997; Lübbe, Hermann, Säkularisierung. Geschichte eines ideenpolitischen Begriffs, Freiburg [3]2003 ([1]1965); Martin, David, A General Theory of Secularization, Oxford 1978; McLeod, Hugh, Religion and the People of Western Europe, 1789–1989, Oxford/New York 1997 ([1]1981); Idem, Secularization in Western Europe, 1848–1914, Basingstoke 2000; McLeod, Hugh/Ustorf, Werner, The Decline of Christendom in Western Europe, 1750–2000, Cambridge 2003; Stark, Rodney/Finke, Roger, "Secularization, R.I.P.," In: Idem, Acts of Faith: Explaining the Human Side of Religion, Berkeley 2000, 57-79.

→ Criticism of Religion, Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Economy, Endowment/Foundation, Enlightenment, Modernity/Modern Age, New Religions, Spirituality

Günter Kehrer

Security

Needs for Security

1. From prehistoric times, security and shelter from the hardships of nature, from threats by hostile animals and human enemies, and from the risks of illness and death, have been among the key concerns of cultural practice. As civilizing and cultural achievements have multiplied, certain elements of security and expectations of safety, in various areas of that civilization and culture, have multiplied as well, and determinable risks have been reduced. Attire and housing, nutritional substances and stocks, social organization and cultural tradition, all set boundaries to times and zones of insecurity. Famine, drought, and cold, for example, are limited as far as possible, and danger zones are limited and bounded by building and fencing, by roads and bridges. Religious practices (rites, rituals) are involved, and expand, with collective resistance to possible enemies, with reaping, safe storage for harvest and fruits, and with the hope of success in certain undertakings. These religious practices legitimate, for one, the culture's achievement as such (e.g., sowing, foundation of a wall, gates and fences, walls and ditches, the defensive throw of a lance against the enemy); for another, they have the task of reducing the remaining uncertainties (contingency) connected with these activities, or of making them at least bearable. When prey are distant, when seed fails to grow, or a surprise drought supervenes, then hunting rituals or weather 'magic' have doubtless failed. They must be repeated, reinforced, and broadened. The emergence of complex → rituals is likewise the outcome of growing needs for security, and a consequence of reflection on possible uncertainties.

Explaining Failures

To the extent that cultural demands and needs for security grow and become a constitutive part of social organization, the religious patterns of interpretation shift as well—from a technical control of the rituals to the interpretation of possible failures (contingency control). Specific amplifications are bound up with the absorption of uncertainties and insecurities in religious and cultic systems, and with their forestallment thereby. Failures are no longer only failures of rituals, but consequences of an inimical, or even merely indeterminable, divine will. Discovering the will of the gods by way of divination and → oracle (→ Prophecy/Divination) means, at the same time, the fashioning of security for oneself concerning a future determined by the gods—or, in any case, the assurance of the agreement and consent of the highest god (as in Roman divination). Against the horizon of time that governed the outlook of the early city-states, the polytheistic pantheons, with their clashing, hating or loving, protecting or destroying gods, shifted security and insecurity onto a 'meta-level.' Under these conditions, it could ultimately offer more security to be 'loved by the gods' than rightly to fulfill all ritual obligations. With the transfer of security—and of reflection on insecurity—to the status of a privileged relationship with 'my' god (premised in the special case of the monotheistic religions), the structures or conceptualizations of security basically alter. Now, in given cases, security is guaranteed by a third person—becomes an element of a relationship of dependency. In circumstances of the 'professionalization' of religion (→ Experts [Religious]), it can be determined that a person has reverenced a 'false' god with 'false' rites. Security then becomes equivalent to professionalization, while insecurity must be a feature of 'dilettantism.' The problem of insecurity is then transferred, to an extent, to a meta-level. The security of a naively awaited connection between action and outcome is transformed, under certain conditions, to a paradoxical relationship of utter insecurity and utter certainty of → salvation. Election, redemption, and certitude then stand as key concepts of a Christian theology, at the end of the lengthy process here cited.

Warranty of Security

2. In parallel with a religious history of personal need for security, a religious history of the warranty or 'guarantee' of security was finally sketched out. Especially the great gods, the city and state gods, such as Babylonian Marduk, the Semitic forms of Baal, or the Artemis of Asia Minor, bestowed protection and security upon the city. Accordingly, their human representatives, the Hellenistic kings, were addressed as divine 'Redeemers' and 'Saviors' (theoí sotêres): in this position as guarantors, they are at once human beings and gods ('dyophysitism'). Securitas—being, along with 'peace' and 'freedom' (pax and libertas), an element of the idea of empire of the Imperium Romanum—finally overflowed into the protection of 'freedom and security' on the part of the Christian Emperors. Behind the latter then stood the Christian God, as "Defending Lord" (protector). With the Renaissance, securitas publica became an aim of political thinking, and, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, issued in a definition of the goal of the state in terms of 'common well-being and security.' Absolutist rule saw its climax once more in the program of making the goal of state intervention an 'interior public security'—the 'general happiness,' the 'commonwealth.'

From Sacrifice to Insurance

In parallel with this these processes of a state engineering of security, there develop, with the beginning of the modern age in Europe, concepts and institutions of an individual insurance. Both the state processes and those relating to the individual now occur in detachment from religious models or patterns. → Sacrifice to the gods of the sea, at the departure of a ship, in pre-Christian and Christian antiquity and beyond, has become life insurance or damage policy. The size and earnestness of the sacrifices corresponds to the dangers of the ocean voyage, just as, in modern insurance structures, premiums are balanced against risks. Similarly, entreaties and votives to Saint Florian disappear, to the extent that public fire protection and a system of fire insurance have reduced the dangers that threaten in case of a blaze. On the basis of a general securing of the public area, finally, reflections and considerations are entertained that have codetermined the conditions of modern rationality, joining theories of probability to risk management. "The revolutionary that divides the modern age from the historical past is the conception and the reflection that the future does not arise simply out of the caprices of the gods […] The risk control that this produced has replaced a person's passion for game and hazard with economic growth, improved quality of life, and technological progress."[1]

God and Coincidence

3. In a tangled way, the emergence of the modern theory of probability is connected with a determination of the relationship between luck and God, and a wager on the existence of God. In the seventeenth century, Puritan clergyman Thomas Gataker noted that the outcome of a game of chance was determined not by divine law, but by the law of nature. Finally, Blaise Pascal employs the question, and the concepts, of hazard in the question of the existence of God: "God is, or God is not. For which alternative shall we decide? Reason can determine nothing here."[2] The central European question of the existence of God is clad in the schema of a wager (le pari de Pascal), and the risk of the two possible decisions is determined by the differing consequences of the outcome. Only the person who 'bets that God exists' is on the sure side, after the course of the ages, at the last judgment. If the other alternative—God does not exist—should turn out to be the correct one, then at least no insupportable disadvantages emerge. "Pascal's wager" has been dubbed the installation of the modern association between theory of probability and risk management: the inauguration of a life decision that leads to the passage of the inexorable incertitude of the future to a certitude actually resulting from calculation.

1. Bernstein, Peter L., Wider die Götter, Cologne 1997, 9f. (See Bernstein 1996.)
2. Pascal, Blaise, Pensées. Über die Religion und über einige andere Gegenstände, Gerlingen 1994, 122f. (Engl. ed.: Pensées, trans. by A. J. Krailsheimer, rev. ed., London 1995).

Literature

Beck, Ulrich, World Risk Society, Cambridge 1999; Bernstein, Peter L., Against the Gods: The Remarkable Story of Risk, New York 1996; Bertocci, Peter A., Religion as Creative Insecurity, Greenwood 1976 ([1]1958); Douglas, Mary/Wildavsky, Aaron, Risk and Culture: An Essay on the Selection of Technical and Environmental Dangers, Berkeley 1983; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Konkrete Angst und offene Furcht. Am Beispiel des Prodigienwesens in Rom," in: von Stietencron, Heinrich (ed.), Angst und Gewalt, Düsseldorf 1979, 61-77; Kaufmann, Franz-Xaver, Sicherheit als soziologisches und sozialpolitisches Problem, Stuttgart 1973; Rescher, Nicholas, Pascal's Wager: A Study of Practical Reasoning in Philosophical Theology, Notre Dame 1985; von Graevenitz, Gerhard/Marquard, Odo (eds.), Kontingenz, Munich 1998; Wilkinson, Iain, Anxiety in a Risk Society, London 2001; Wissmann, Hans (ed.), Zur Erschließung von Zukunft in den Religionen, Würzburg 1991.

→ Fear/Dread, Meaning/Signification, Prophecy/Divination

Burkhard Gladigow

Sermon

1. The word 'sermon' denotes that form of religious → communication fitted to the condition of public discourse. Sermon forms in this sense are found especially in the book religions Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. In the Christian tradition, the sermon is usually incorporated into the liturgical connection of a divine service, for the purpose of strengthening the certitude of faith entertained by the audience, as well as to provide an orientation in various life situations.

History of the Christian Sermon

2. In its historical origin, one of the orientations of the Christian sermon has been taken in the expounding of a citation from Scripture (in Heb., *d*ᵉ*rasha*) as presented in the synagogues of rabbinical Judaism. Another orientation is taken in the lecture on or presentation of philosophical teaching (in Gk., diatríbe), as practiced in the Hellenistic world for the purpose of offering counsel for persons' lives. Not a few texts of the New Testament are accounted oral proclamation in written form, and these have preserved certain testimonials of the earliest Christian preaching (Acts 2:14ff.; 17:16ff.). In the ancient Church, there followed a textual paraphrase (homily), extensively patterned on Origen's doctrine of the four-level sense of Scripture (literal, allegorical, moral, and that of salvation history). With → Augustine, the sermon underwent a modification, with an orientation to ancient rhetoric. In the mostly illiterate society of the Middle Ages, frescos, altar pictures, and sculptures were the preferred media of communication. The sermon, which it was long permitted to omit at Mass, then lost its importance, not to be reinstated as an 'essential part of the Mass' until Vatican Council II. In the monasteries, meanwhile, it has always retained its place, as also, since the thirteenth century, in universities, and now the lay movements have cultivated it. Wide propagation by agitators developed on the occasion of the Crusades (Bernard of Clairvaux), or in the struggle to oppose the 'heretics.' But the sermon was also at work in the heretical circles of the Cathars and the Waldenses, and with John Wyclif and Jan Hus; and it served in the mystical introduction to spiritual and ascetical 'composure' (→ Meister Eckhart, John Tauler). The penitential sermon of itinerant preachers and monks (Savonarola in Florence), denounced sinful behavior with its social criticism, and found strong echoes. In the cities of the up-and-coming middle class, a renewed culture of the sermon grew out of an increased need for education and formation.

Ancient Church and Middle Ages

Reformation, Confessional Age, Modernity

With the Reformation, it was the word of the Gospel, in its literal and paraphrased communication (Augsburg Confession, Art. V), that won key importance for piety in Protestant Christianity. It was in terms of this communication that worship and the sacraments were understood. Religious assurance was expected then neither from conventionalized tradition, nor from the mere citation of Scripture, nor from inner impulse and inspiration alone. Instead, with Martin Luther, such assurance needed conveyance through example and experience, in a competent and responsible sharing of faith. → Conscience itself, as the confidant of the human heart before God, becomes the relevant instance for the sermon, both in its preparation and in its reception.

A Muslim preacher (in Ar., ḫaṭib) at the Friday sermon. At noon prayer, in the mosque, a sermon (ḫuṭba) precedes the prayer. Supported by a staff, the preacher stands on the pulpit (minbar), usually to be found to the right of the mihrab, the prayer niche that faces Mecca. Minbars have been used only from the time of the Omayyad Dynasty, and exclusively in the mosque. Originally movable, today they are more often a stable component of the mosque. The sermon consists of two parts, between which the Hatib sits. The first part is rigidly formulaic, and includes praise of God and of the Prophet, as well as, traditionally, prayers for the faithful and their ruler. Together with the right of coinage, the mention of the ruler in the sermon was a traditional sign of the claim to sovereignty. The second part of the sermon gives the preacher room for his own thoughts. Although not originally of a didactic character, the genre of the sermon today is used in many places as an instrument for religious politics, for example by television preachers, who take a position on current problems. Traditionally, the sermon is preached in High Arabic rhyming prose, although, especially in Turkey, and at times in the diaspora, it is delivered in the national language. (Agnes Imhof)

It was to the lecture presentation that orthodox Lutheranism gave preference. That presentation was made repeatedly on Sundays, and it lasted, as a rule, up to an hour. With the Pietist sermon, on the other hand, it was a matter of awakening a practice of reverence that would embrace the hearer's entire life. But the pulpit was also a 'cathedra of the Enlightenment' (L. von Mosheim, J. J. Spalding, J. G. Herder). Court preachers worked under the regime of the determination of religious adherence according to the will of the respective regional sovereign. Abraham a Sancta Clara, in Vienna, stands at the highpoint of Catholic Baroque preaching. L. Bourdaloue, Court Preacher, along with J.-B. Bossuet, for Louis XIV, is said by Voltaire to have been celebrated as the "first to have permitted an ever eloquent (sense of) reason to speak," and Goethe has sung the praises of the "good and pure style of religion, and the moral doctrine so nearly akin to it," of H.-G. Zöllikofer, at work in Leipzig, as well as that of others. As pioneer of a sermon in the spiritual key of the modern age, we may cite its theoretical establishment by Friedrich Schleiermacher. This concept, foundational for the liberal → Protestantism of the nineteenth century, was contradicted, at the

In abrupt and provocative fashion, the Reformed Christians shape their identity through a distinction from the 'old believers' in their rituals and symbols. While Catholic divine service speaks to the eyes with the colors of the priestly vestments and the sweetness of grace-bestowing images, to the palate with the carefully prepared host and, occasionally, the taste of the wine, to the nose with incense, to the ears with a liturgy in song—the extremely jejune Reformed houses of prayer concentrate on 'the word' of God, in the intellectual language of the well-studied Pastor. Only Bible and lamp are on the smooth table, amidst bare walls. The baldachin over the pulpit functions as a sounding board, directing the minister's words to the congregation. The gold decoration actually looks a little Catholic, the empty cross has been added later. The laity are to listen from hard pews, and enter into themselves. In common song, however, the unison of their Confession of Faith, their articulation of the Our Father, and their enunciation of the words of the Bible, their means of community are evident. (Christoph Auffarth) dawn of the twentieth, by dialectical theology, with its call to the 'essential sermon.' The latter style, with its pure exposition of Scripture, was regarded as adequately avoiding such 'figurative' subjects as 'people and fatherland,' which prevailed, for example, in the 'war sermon.'

3. In the culture of the mass media, today's sermon has met with many competitors. Replaceable functions, required in earlier times, include especially information, education and formation, and a ritualized interruption in everyday life. As shown by the television sermons of the TV church (→ Televangelism), the awakening sermon in → charismatic movements, or other forms of religious communication in the mass media, the pulpit is no longer the sermon's only place. As religious locution based on an ecclesial duty, the sermon today, even the laudatory one on special biographical occasions, must meet the requisites of a complex goal. An indispensable premise for doing justice to those requirements, a premise that is on an equal footing with that of a solid theological formation, is the perception of a differentiated society, and of the thrusts to modernization that alter that society.

Literature

A New History of the Sermon, 3 vols., Leiden 1998–2002 (vol. 1: Corran, M. C./Allen, P. [eds.], Preacher and His Audience: Studies in Early Christian and Byzantine Homiletics; vol. 2: Muessig, C. [ed.], Preacher, Sermon and Audience in the Middle Ages; vol. 3: Taylor, L. [ed.], Preachers and People in the Reformation and Early Modern Period); Müller, H. M., Homiletik. Eine evangelische Predigtlehre, Berlin 1996; Niebergall, A., "Die Geschichte der christlichen Predigt," in: Leiturgia 2 (1955), 181-354; Schneyer, J. B., Geschichte der katholischen Predigt, Freiburg 1969.

→ Charismatic Movement, Communication, Language, Mission, Oral Tradition, Televangelism, Theology

Hans Martin Dober

Sexuality

An Approximation: Sexuality in Myth

1. The relationships between sexuality and religion appear on many levels, and are reciprocal. On the one side, religions have a powerful effect on the meaning of sexuality and gender roles in a society (→ Gender Stereotypes), and on the other, sexuality is a key theme in religious systems of interpretation. Especially, the myths of the various religions illustrate the complex meaning of sexuality as a frontier between 'nature' and 'culture,' and their close connection with border regions of human experience, such as the appearance of life and creativity, the transient, and death, but also areas such as power and governance, dependency and love. A creation myth from Japan can illustrate these complex associations.

The mythological first couple, Izanagi and his sister and bride Izanami, carry out a commission attached to their duty to mold the earth by inventing a wedding ritual and the first sexual act. A 'leech child' results from this act however, who is consigned to death in the sea. According to an oracle of the gods, Izanami is responsible for this failure, since it is she who first spoke at the ritual. A second attempt—now the husband is the first to speak—results in the birth of the shimmering world of the Japanese isles, and the emergence of other gods. At the birth of the God of Fire, Izanami dies, and from the excrement, vomit, and tears of her husband, new deities emerge. An encounter with the underworld follows, with death and corruption, and a series of sexual encounters, which, in their true identity as struggles for power over divine and human governance, actually lead to the emergence of culture, and to the first race of Emperors.

Levels of the Relation between Sexuality and Religion

Sexuality as Concept and as Pattern of Explanation

2. a) Sexuality is not a 'phenomenon on its own,' or 'object in itself.' Rather, its meaning and importance emerge only in the co-efficiency of physiological 'conditioning,' individual experience and practice, societal institutions, and cultural and religious conceptualizations. Even the concept of sexuality, and its current meaning, first appeared only in the Western culture of the nineteenth century. Religions are concerned in this process somewhat as models of interpretation and bestowal of meaning, as they apply sexuality as a pattern of explanation. At the same time, of course, they integrate the meaning of sexuality into these models. Thus, many myths describe the emergence of the world in sexual metaphors, or as sexual relations among gods (→ Cosmology/Cosmogony). 'Duality,' and the destruction of a 'paradisiacal oneness,' is often explained by a sexual transgression on the part of the human being (→ Dualism).

The Category 'Gender' between Myth and Science

b) By way of exemplars ('idealization'), or dreadful presentations ('demonization'), religion possesses a great deal of influence on imaginary images of gender and role-orderings. Insofar, for example, as abstract dualisms such as → 'body' and 'spirit' are transferred to real men and women, or certain behaviors are attributed to them as essential features, pictures of gender roles, gender relations, and gender differences firmly inscribe themselves, and become elements of stereotyped world-images. Often it is mythical female images, such as Pandora (→ Prometheus) or Eve, who bring death and unhappiness into the world. Such images—such as that of Izanami, in the case above cited—often become bases for attempted religious justifications of woman's subordinate position in society, and thereby deeply affect the construction of rule, government, and social differences.

In European culture, one of the agents of the undermining of the concept of a 'God-willed' or 'natural' polarity of the sexes was the new sexual science arising about 1900 (Richard Kraff-Ebing, Psychopathia sexualis, 1886; Magnus Hirschfeld's battle against the criminalization of homosexual practice). It began to distinguish biological gender from individual gender-identity. Then came the feminism of the 1970s, and today many research disciplines include the category of gender in their thinking. Since the 1980s, a distinction has been invoked between (biological) sex and (social) gender. As the relation between sex and gender becomes defined, it is becoming the object of discussion, and is variously adjudged (Butler 1990; Irigaray 1993).

c) Sexuality can be an element of the molding of → cults, and key for the distinction between the 'sacred' and the 'profane.' Through a ritualization of the sexual, norms are observed in society, and rendered subject to control, whether sexual acts are 'sanctified' ('Holy Matrimony,' Gk. hieros gamos, ritual sexual intercourse, sacred → prostitution), and sex symbols are venerated (e.g., yoni/linga cult in Hinduism, veneration of symbolical sexual parts), or, just the other way around, sexuality is excluded from cultic acts (e.g. prescription of virginity or celibacy for religious specialists such as priestesses and priests). In the orgiastic experience of 'enjoying life to the full' at Carnival, and in a religious festival culture, sexuality, and other drives potentially dangerous for society (aggression, lust; → Emotions/Feelings), receive, as it were, a legitimate place.

Cultic rules, sanctions, and taboos are closely connected with the idea of → body and sexuality, conveyed as the former are by conceptualizations of → purity. Who may take part in a given function, and who may not, as well as who is invested with capacity and competency for cult, is often dependent on bodily condition or gender. Taboos are often related to body fluids (blood, semen), and to bodily indications of sexuality such as pregnancy, → birth, menstruation, or defilement by semen; in certain cases they may occasion (temporary) exclusion from cult or from gender-specific rituals.

The extent to which competency for cult becomes dependent on gender, depends on the gender roles that have validity at a given moment. Cult can be the place for crossing the boundaries of the gender role (shamanic transvestitism; → Gender Stereotypes). Men and women alike may be the principal characters in cultic celebration (e.g. priestesses, prophetesses, healers), take on certain tasks, or can be regarded as the only person capable of taking the leading role in a cult. Gender-specific presidencies in religious cult—one thinks of the office of bishop or pope in the Catholic Church—by way of esteem, public authority, and monopoly of interpretation, have a powerful effect on the hierarchization of genders.

Founded in 1991, the large Christian organization 'Promise Keepers' has won hundreds of thousands of members in the United States. With their motto, "I can do all things in Him who strengthens me" (Phil 4:13), the 'task to change the world' challenges men to take over the leadership role in family and society, and as "followers of hero Jesus Christ" to battle against the collapse of modern society. Among their basic premises are: "spiritual, moral, and sexual integrity," "dedication to marriage and family," "obedience to the commandment of love, and the missionary commandment." In their emotion-laden ideal of friendship, and their display of maleness in the style of Hell's Angels (which helps to differentiate them from homoerotic elements) the historical tradition of the Crusades and the 'Holy Warriors' marches on.

d) Religions exert direct influence on the social role of sexuality by way of concrete directives, injunctions, and prohibitions. Especially religions that have developed a religious juridical system, as has → Islam, offer clear guidelines regarding permitted and forbidden relations, marriage, divorce, and family law, legitimate and illegitimate offspring, hygiene, the relation between the sexes, initiation and frequency of sexual intercourse, pregnancy and birth, and sexual behavior in various respective stages of the life-cycle. Initiation and puberty rites, such as the Jewish Bar Mitsva, mark sexual and religious maturity alike (→ Initiation; Puberty). Such determinations are far-reaching in the political and economic molding of a society, if, for example, property rights are connected with matrimonial law, or if women may not move in the public arena. Religions, too, that possess no express regulatory structure for daily life (e.g., many forms of Christianity), avail themselves of ethical and moral conceptions in order to exercise direct influence on the practice or sexuality, for example, by their position on birth-control (→ Abortion/Contraception), or their denunciation of homosexual practice (→ Homosexuality/Homoeroticism). Seeing that religion scarcely seems to exert an influence on sexual norms today, the 'secular' meaning of the sexual often takes its orientation (confirming or rejecting such norms) in religious traditions.

The religious interpretation of sexuality, however, is not limited to the production of social order. Its border-crossing and anarchic potential as well, the eradication of civilizing controls over the drives of the human being, plays a great role. Sexuality forms, as it were, a boundary line between 'consciousness' and 'the unconscious,' between 'sensuality' and 'supra-sensuality,' closely connected with the 'mystery of life,' with birth and creativity, death and aggression. It is not without basis that sexuality and 'potency' form a projection screen for (fantasized) power and violence—as well as for yearnings for salvation, happiness, and redemption—directed toward a state that stands beyond rational visualization. Hence its meaning in religion is closely connected with border-crossing conceptualizations of an existence after death, of a → hereafter and → transcendence, but also with the transitory and → nature. Thus, for example, Western religious culture, which has referred to the corporeal as 'devil' (Ger., the Leibhaftige) can be interpreted as a defense mechanism against the uncontrollable, destructive aspects of nature—in a revolt against human mortality (Paglia 1990).

In particular, the sex act and orgasm, as human boundary-experiences ('little deaths'), have been variously regarded in the religions. As a component of fertility cults, coitus represents, in many ways, veneration of nature in its cyclical return (→ Regeneration/Fertility). In some religions, the sexual act is regarded as an opportunity for spiritual experience, that can climax in the dissolution of the individual consciousness and an 'experience of cosmic oneness' (→ Tantra). Sexual unification as a metaphor for the conquest of duality, as coincidentia oppositorum (Lat., 'falling together' or 'coinciding of opposites'), is a very widespread religious motif. Even the Christian mystics of the Middle Ages applied the sexual language of 'union,' of 'fusion' and 'merging,' in order to describe the ecstatic deletion of the boundaries between the human being and God in the unio mystica.

On the other hand, the defeat or 'transcending' of sexuality is said to offer assistance on a salvific journey. It occurs in many religions as a notion of → asceticism. In Hinduism, for instance, no moral boundary is drawn between sexuality and spirituality. Instead, both areas are connected, in terms of an 'energy model': sexual self-denial represents an opportunity to amass tapas (Hindi, 'fire')—to transform sexual energy into spiritual. It would be interesting to know to what extent these religious interpretations of sexuality as an idealization affect the concrete practice of believers.

Sexuality in Terms of Questions Posed in Religious Studies

3. For religious studies, from the perspectives just sketched—the developing gender-interpretation of the discipline—emerges a cluster of new lines of questioning. What role does religion play in the formation of female and male identity, which stereotypes and expectations does it propose, and how does it legitimate them? How is the relation between the genders determined by religion? What opportunities are afforded men and women to participate in religion? What are the consequences of the conception of gender differences and sexuality for the human image, and for the social function of a religion? A critical consideration of the following material would be in order.

- Pronouncements by the religions on sexuality are not identical with the everyday practice of believers. Indeed, laws and prohibitions can even reinforce, or bring about, contradictory forms of sexual life. Thus, pornography flourishes precisely in the presence of a repressive morality. The object of investigation, therefore, ought to be, for one thing, the everyday religious consideration of theological norms and religious laws. For example, the object should include the interiorization and mythologization of a religious interpretation of sexuality in the early Modern Age, as persons were accused of sexual contact with the devil, or as impotence was ascribed to witchcraft (→ Witch/Persecution of Witches). On the other hand, and the other way around, the religious discourse on sexuality can be understood as a copy and thematization of human conceptualizations, and become useful for research into gender.

- The authors of religious sources have usually been males, of determinate functions and determinate interests, so that religious sources have neglected the reality of broad parts of society. Although the meager religious history of relations between the sexes, and of women, contains shocking data, the pattern of 'repression' as a one-sided perspective displaces a view of the active role of women in the emergence of the religious interpretation of sexuality. Furthermore, a theory of sexual repression must always submit to an investigation of the counter-concept of 'sexual freedom,' which is just as culturally determined, and does not occur 'naturally.'
- It is precisely pronouncements on sexuality that are so frequently a part of the positive presentation of one's own religion, and the disparagement of that of others (→ Polemics). Thus, these pronouncements are not to be appraised as a description of reality. Neither theological nor scientific literature can be separated from a respective contemporary production of fantasies. This production will be specific to each society, and easily lets its own ideas of value and wish in the area of sexuality become the criterion not only of a perception of other religions, but also of their appraisal or condemnation. Answers to the question, how 'modern' or 'backward' Islam is, often refer, expressly or implicitly, to sexuality, not to mention being determined by the gender of the persons providing the answers to the questions. It was once the same with the outlook of Christian missionaries, or European literati, regarding the cults of a 'nature people.' Observers were shocked by → nudity, and by seemingly indecent fertility rites. Their sexual standards were why they so frequently adjudged these peoples' attitudes as either 'unholy' or 'paradisiacal.'

Feminist Criticism

4. a) The relationship between religion and sexuality in Western culture has become an object of self-criticism. Especially in recent, and feminist, theology, the 'Judeo-Christian tradition' is frequently made responsible for the expulsion of the feminine from religion, and for the hostility of Western culture to the body and the senses. This way of seeing things is problematic. First, it relates to conceptualizations of a feminine presence in the religions that are difficult to demonstrate and interpret (→ Matriarchy/Patriarchy), and that are not infrequently connected with the religious idea of a 'Golden Age.' What is certain is that there have been powerful female figures, and differently structured relations between the genders, in mythical notions and religious functions. Their operation on social relationships, however, is difficult to appraise. Second, the thesis in question ignores the fact that it has been from non-Jewish traditions of thought that biblical authors have adopted feminine/masculine polarizations between body and soul (Plato), matter and form (Aristotle), and (in a Manichean and 'gnostic' dualism) 'sinful flesh' and 'divine spirit.' Third, it is precisely with reference to sensuality, corporality, and sexuality, that the differences between Jewish and Christian doctrine are passed over. Conceptualizations of salvation in Judaism are in no way connected with a disparagement of the sexual; nor has the distinction of body and soul there the same motif as it has in Christianity. Indeed an enjoyable sexuality in marriage is of particularly high value, as it guarantees the preservation of the people of Israel (→ Kabbalah). What connects Judaism and Christianity—and Islam as well—is, of course, the conception of one God (→ Monotheism), without a 'sexual biography,' such as have, for instance, the Indian or Greek gods. In both Judaism and in Islam there stands an androcentric morality, rigidly ordered by religious laws, along with a positive appraisal of the sexual, all of which is evident from the Jewish rejection of celibacy, or the glorification of male sexual fantasies in Islamic notions of Paradise. Ancient Christianity, especially through Paul and → Augustine, developed, in its doctrine, an essential devaluation of the sexual. The Fall is first and foremost a sexual transgression, that has been transferred to the whole of humanity. The original sexual lapse (→ Sin), and the idea of a defeat of the body (resurrection), bind 'the material,' along with its representatives, 'sexuality,' and 'woman,' to prevailing and conquering 'evil.' Thus, sexuality receives a theologically justifying place in soteriology, as an obstacle, and the sexual transgression becomes heresy. Just the contrary, in Greek and Roman antiquity, sexual morality had taken its orientation in the consequences of sexuality for a society apportioned by masculinity and militarism. It was not so much religious restrictions on enjoyable sexual relations, but a social 'code of honor,' that prevailed. Thus, it was the free middle-class male who had the active role to play where the act of sexuality was concerned, whether with free women, slaves, or men, and the gender of his partner was—at least for the moment—of secondary consideration. Asceticism and celibacy, in Christian contexts, are to be traced to the radical division of sexuality from the godly, and, comparably with gnostic groups and today's 'eschatological sects,' to be seen in connection with an imminent expectation of the End. Apart from the ascetical ideal, the exercise of sexuality was permitted, but only for purposes of procreation without sensation of pleasure, or of a necessary satisfaction of the sex drive, in marriage alone. Under this premise, special religio-sexual phenomena developed: a hostility to the body that stamped the mentality, the highly erotic presentation of an experience of God in medieval mysticism, with its spiritualization of a craving for → love, and a superabundance of sadistic sexual violence motivated by religion in the early modern persecution of witches.

Modernity: The Project of the Enlightenment

b) In the Modern Age, the relation between religion and sexuality—along with inter-religious battles—was determined by the project of the → Enlightenment. The human being's self-concept as an individual was to be grounded, and—partially with a reference to Greco-Roman antiquity—a humanistic ethics was to be sketched out. First, Luther's concession of clerical marriage and sexuality was an element of the confessional rift. The Enlightenment requirement of personal responsibility and autonomy, two of whose preludes were the interiorization of piety and the ethic of Protestantism, was more fundamental, however: it changed existing morality. The development that led to the modern age was a movement of innovations and their countermovements (Counter-Reformation, Counter-Enlightenment), even in the area of sexual morality and practice. One of the last attested witch-murders (1782) was practically contemporaneous with the high point of the Enlightenment—the declaration on human rights during the French → Revolution (1789). Sexuality and sexual morality became a component of the radical Enlightenment → criticism of religion. The Marquis de Sade, for example, conveyed his sharp criticism of the Christian categories of good and evil by way of sexual provocation. Rousseau's powerful picture of the human being, and of an ideal education and upbringing, again, idealized a 'natural' morality ultimately based on Christian norms, and indicated problematic areas of sexuality of 'culture,' an argumentation repeated as a pattern of religious cultural criticism down to the present.

For daily life in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, there was no progressive movement of 'sexual freedom.' The morality of the strengthening middle class, not least of all on account of church influence on pedagogy and legislation, was extremely 'normed' and narrow in the area of the sexual, and was tied to socioeconomic conditions of rising → capitalism. Counter-sketches of workers' and women's rights, as well, usually took a conservative stance in the area of sexual morality. An ambivalent role for the modern understanding of sexuality is played by the sciences. For one, they replace the Church in its function of authority, and produce 'dogmas' themselves: theological argumentations turn into scientific ones, moral verdicts are replaced by the concept of disease, as in the case of homosexuality or onanism. For another, the → theory of evolution, and critical sexual science, fundamentally challenge theology and sexual politics. Especially Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytical theory of drive and religion remains today, often against critical resistance, the focal point for the confrontation over religion and sexuality. Freud takes the 'libido' as a key human 'driving' power (even for the emergence of religion!), and coins the concepts of 'compensation,' 'sublimation,' and 'repression.' Thus he transfers human sexuality from the moral area to that of a value-free unconscious, open to analysis.

Sexuality Today

5. In the late 1960s and the 1970s, there appeared the 'sexual revolution,' which developed into a drastic social phenomenon. With the development of the contraceptive pill, a sexuality emphasizing lust and enjoyment, and severed from procreation, became the medium of anarchic social and political criticism, and central for the new myth of the person who now had been delivered from taboos and was engaged in self-development. The feminist → women's movement used the growing sexual knowledge of quantitative sexual research (Kinsey Reports, 1948 and 1953) in a radical critique of the erstwhile 'privately' handled sexual relationship of marriage and family, and insisted on its political meaning. As for the quest for a female identity not defined by structures of male dominance, most Western states saw the beginning of a revision of prevailing, extensively Christian-oriented norms, and this was reflected in an alteration of the law (right to divorce, position of female labor, immunity of homosexual acts from punishment). Through these alterations, Christian churches came under a growing pressure to revise their sexual norms in the direction of a 'modern' understanding. The Catholic Church in particular was fundamentally challenged by a waning acceptance of clerical celibacy, and a demand that women be accepted into the priesthood. A religiosity that was traditionally Christian was in crisis, and many persons sought alternative models in pre- or extra-Christian religions, in order to incorporate sexuality and corporality in a way that seemed positive (→ Esalen Institute; New Age; Paganism/Neopaganism). From the women's movement, there emerged—in part, neo-mythical—religious interpretations of a 'new femaleness,' and sketches of a 'feminist spirituality.' In new religious movements (→ New Religions), as well, sexuality plays an important role as a moment of attraction. Apart from organized religion, the relationship between religion and sexuality in the literature and music of the pop-culture (beat generation, flower-power movement, pop icon Madonna) grew into a key theme. It remains to be explored to what extent, through these developments, needs and expectations formerly directed to religion have today been transferred to sexuality.

Judgment upon the consequences of the sexual revolution has become an object of controversy. First, it is alleged that liberation from religious morality has been exhausted in the mere commercialization and medial presence of sexuality. The 'demystification' of sexuality is seen in opposition to the—even religiously coded—'allurement of the forbidden and concealed.' The spread of the HIV virus since the 1980s has stirred a counter-movement, which goes as far as to embrace conservative values (marriage, fidelity), and finds itself provided with new, fertile soil, so that even the new religious movements are revising their perception of 'free sexuality.' Thus, the Neo-Sannyas movement, on the occasion of the spread of AIDS, is radically altering its practice and interpretation of sexuality (→ Osho Movement). Again, increasing knowledge and acceptance of 'sexual variance' (homo-, bi-, trans-sexuality, S/M practices) has led to a 'neo-sexual revolution,' in which the meaning of sexuality, gender identity, and gender roles is open as never before. The tension among individual needs, traditional morality, religious orientation, the ideal of a positive, problem-free sexuality, and of independence from procreation and 'natural' ascriptions of role, has been problematized. The question of the meaning of sexuality, the relation of sex and mind or spirit, and bodiliness and sexuality is posed anew in our era.

Literature

Ariès, Ph. et al. (eds.), Western Sexuality: Practice and Precept in Past and Present Times, Oxford 1985 (French [1]1982); Biale, D., Eros and the Jews: From Biblical Israel to Contemporary America, New York 1992; Butler, J., Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity, London/New York 1990; Foucault, M., The History of Sexuality, 3 vols., New York 1978–1986 (French [1]1976–1984); Garber, M., Vested Interests: Cross-Dressing and Cultural Anxiety, New York 1991; Giddens, A., the Transformation of Intimacy: Sexuality, Love and Eroticism in Modern Societies, Cambridge 1992; Irigaray, L., An Ethics of Sexual Difference, Ithaca 1993 (French [1]1984); Keuls, E., The Reign of the Phallus: Sexual Politics in Ancient Athens, Berkeley [2]1993 ([1]1985); King, U. (ed.), Religion and Gender, Oxford 1995; Pagels, E., Adam, Eve and the Serpent, London 1990; Paglia, C., Sexual Personae, London 1990; Parrinder, G., Sex in the World's Religions, London 1980; Idem, Sexual Morality in the World's Religions, Oxford 1995; Sigusch, V., "Lean Sexuality: On Cultural Transformations of Sexuality and Gender in Recent Decades," in: Sexuality & Culture 5 (2001), 23-56; Talvacchia, Bette, Taking Positions: On the Erotic in Renaissance Culture, Princeton 1999; Westheimer, R./Mark, J., Heavenly Sex: Sexuality in the Jewish Tradition, New York 1995.

For further literature see → Eroticism, → Gender Stereotypes, and → Love.

→ Asceticism, Body, Celibacy, Communication, Criticism of Religion, Enthusiasm, Eroticism, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Gender Stereotypes, Homosexuality/Homoeroticism, Initiation, Life Cycle, Love, Matriarchy/Patriarchy, Nudity, Puberty, Purity, Sin, Utopia

Alexandra Grieser

Shamanism

1. Shamanism, originally and exclusively a theme for anthropologists, religious scholars, medical professionals, colonizers, and Christian missionaries,

On the day immediately preceding, or following, the night of the year's first full moon, in villages and city quarters of the island of Cheju (Republic of Korea)—at the point in time, then, traditionally celebrated as the beginning of spring—a shaman performs extended rituals such as those here illustrated. They are performed to the honor has won more and more attention in Western industrial societies since the 1960s. Here it plays quite an important role in the quest for spirituality, in efforts to preserve the environment ('nature-based spirituality'; → Environmentalism), in projects for fortifying women's rights, and even in alternative medicine. Neither scientific nor political in its basic nature, shamanism nevertheless persists as an object of interest, including the more popular interest. Shamanism tenaciously captures perceptions and attitudes that surfaced in the older discussions, but that must now be considered deficient. New views and concepts have come in, as well, although they are often illusionary. Behind the multiplicity of interests, expectations, and attitudes that meanwhile play a role in discussions, there are facts that threaten to fade from view, thus blurring the limits of shamanism.

Older Types of Perceptions and Evaluations of Shamanism

2. The answer to the question of the nature of shamanism and the answer to the question of its geographic extent are mutually conditioned. Any definition of shamanism broadens or limits the number and size of the areas that come under examination in an investigation of 'shamanism.' Conversely, extensions or limitations of the space that one must bring into consideration, also lead directly to extensions or limitations of the concept of shamanism.

As a particular religious practice, shamanism was first observed and described in the seventeenth century, in communities of Northern Eurasia, especially Siberia (→ Northern Eurasia/Circumpolar Region). The term 'shamanism' derives from a designation first used among the Tungus, and applied to those who officiate in this religious practice; but the term itself of the local patronal deities, anthropomorphic beings one or two of whom guide and guard every locality. Marking the temporary presence of such deities among the people, these rituals afford the latter the opportunity of celebrating amusing and entertaining presentations that will ensure the benevolence of the deities for the year about to begin. The photographs show the climax of the annual ritual of the patron deities of Wahul. Amidst great excitement, and attention, Shaman Kang Chonggyu—seventy-seven years of age at the time the pictures were taken, on May 5, 1993—honors the deity before whom stands such a copious table of welcome.

is probably not a Tungus word. The designation then found entry into Europe's intellectual world, and into its languages, through Russian and German. Like the term, the concept of shamanism was also first determined in relation to Siberian and Tungus contexts.

Then, over the course of time, religious practices and conceptualizations that had been met outside North Eurasian culture came to be designated by the term. In the meanwhile, there is scarcely any longer a part of the world lacking religious practices some would classify as shamanic. The extension of the perception and concept of shamanism has had two kinds of results. First, shamanism began to be seen as endowed with at least the potential of a worldwide, and therefore universally human, if not indeed primeval, religious manifestation. Secondly, in attempts to specify the nature of shamanism, external conditions were gradually renounced as the touchstone by which shamanism could be recognized. Thus, for example, specific ritual practices, or a shaman's attire, were less utilized for this purpose, and more and more attention was paid to → ecstasy and → trance, usually designated 'extraordinary states of consciousness,' or the like. Not only ecstasy and trance were gathered under these sorts of terms, but some researchers and authors even subsumed possession under them.

This development of the concept of shamanism occurred first in the academic disciplines concerned with shamanism. The older, evolutionistic religious history saw primarily an 'earliest beginning' in shamanism, but a phenomenon whose remnants had survived into the modern age. This view may have been based on the circumstance that religious scholars of a former time had been concerned to work on the basis of written sources. But as shamanism is a cultic practice extensively performed in the absence of written associations, it was easy to assume, under the conditions just named, that it was an a-historical religion that had always existed. This assumption, in turn, readily led to the view, particularly outside of academic circles, that, unlike the writing religions, shamanism opened an access to elementary religious experiences. In this connection, then, it typically occurs that the designation of 'shamanism' is often applied to those religious conceptualizations and practices whose historical origins, in the absence of written sources, were lost in a 'dark prehistory.' The designation of 'shamanism' therefore also finds application to what would be more appositely designated 'local religion.' Hence, adopted without the benefit of much scientific reflection, Korean shamanism, for instance, can be ascribed the rank of a national religion in the Republic of Korea.

Elements of Shamanism

3. a) In this delineation, which many see as succeeding in its intent to do justice to shamanism as the all but worldwide phenomenon that it is, the following elements could apply. At the midpoint of shamanism stand healing, → prophecy, and the escort of the dead. The attainment of any of these rests on the notion that the world of human beings is circled by spirits (including, potentially, the dead), among which the maleficent must be barred from the human world, and the good must be invoked for assistance. Shamans are marked vis-à-vis other persons by the fact that they are able to control and overpower the spirits. The activity of a shaman, then, presupposes that shamans are open to the world of the spirits. They must undertake soul-journeys regarded as onerous, or even dangerous, into a beyond ('ecstasy'), or, as it were, allow spirits to enter them ('possession'). They demonstrate their suitability for shamanism by first subduing some life-crisis of their own, marked by sickness or physical disturbances. But only those persons are accounted shamans, who, having endured some life crisis of this kind ('shaman's sickness'), are acknowledged as such by their social environment. To this acknowledgment attaches the expectation that they will exercise their capacities for the good of their milieu. Shamans wear special apparel during their activity, and make use of particular musical instruments, especially drums and bells.

b) It is not possible, out of the complex of characteristics above described, to emphasize a few traits, or even some single earmark, and declare it the basic or indispensable one, without placing the range and span of the concept at risk, or without a blurring of the boundaries between shamanism and other religious practices. One or the other occurs when ecstasy, and only this 'extraordinary state of consciousness,' is specified as the indispensable element of shamanism. By taking this step, the observer excludes, on the one hand, from the area of shamanism, practices that otherwise would surely be designated as shamanic, such as, for example, certain rituals of Korea. On the other hand, shamanism is shifted into an adjacency to practices—for example, Christian mysticism—that indeed know ecstasy, but that usually no one would designate as shamanic.

Instead, it would be possible, as well as meaningful, to exclude the above-described complex from attention to the extent that the only capacity that would remain as characteristic of shamanism would be that of reaching and surviving the extraordinary states of consciousness named above, but then of bringing out this ability as an individual disposition of the shaman, as J. A. MacCulloch has already done. Then the determinative element of the concept of shamanism would be the ability 'contained' in the individual to assume contact with a reality grasped as the world of spirits, and likewise the obligation to exercise this ability. Thus, a person would not be a shaman who would take up healing or another shamanic activity only because or when he or she had learned them from someone else. Just so, a person would not be a shaman who practiced a 'shamanic activity' because shamanism was hereditary in her or his family—when, then, someone would attempt to act as a shaman without having undergone a personal crisis and come in touch with the world of the spirits.

An emphasis on the shaman's individual disposition would assist in the abandonment of a circumscription of shamanism, such as the one described above, which is unsatisfactory because it lacks some necessary intrinsic connection. For it is not reasonable to see the shamanic as depending on social acknowledgment of any shamanic abilities, nor is it apparent in what sense the latter would necessarily have anything to do with a particular dress. Emphasis on the individual disposition would also allow a whole series of identifying notes to be seen correctly as utterly insignificant—notes that, in earlier scholarship had often been introduced as shamanism's typical conditions, and that even today are still occasionally cited, although the view of shamanism as a worldwide phenomenon has long since rendered them obsolete: shamanism is an early stage in the religious development of humanity; shamanism as the 'arctic hysteria' resulting as a physiological consequence of a certain slender nutritional base, and of a lack of daylight; shamanism as the religion ordered to certain economic and social contours.

Familiar Commerce with the Spirits

Above all, an appeal to the individual disposition to shamanism would endow a certain quality of shamanism with the rank that it doubtless deserves, but which, in many determinations of the concept, is cited only peripherally: the intimacy of the shamanic. This intimacy is evinced, for one thing, as an image element in ritual; shamans maintain, with a particular spirit, or with several particular spirits, a closer relationship than with others. As a rule, the nearer spirits are those that have 'stood by' a shaman during the 'shaman sickness,' or those that he has rendered docile during this crisis. Thus, they have become his helping spirits, or personal patrons. Intimacy is evinced, for another thing, in the social; shamans must have comprehensive, and at the same time precise, knowledge of the life conditions of every member of their clientele, in order to be able to be successful in their occupation. Hence, the clientele must always be relatively small.

Current Views on Shamanism

4. Inasmuch as shamanism is currently surrounded by a series of different views, of which many are apposite only in a limited way, a critical commentary on such views may contribute to an understanding of shamanism on a deeper level.

Essence of the World

a) Shamanism is an independent religious teaching, and from this point of view, on an equal level with other religious doctrines. Shamans definitely preserve conceptions of the essence of the world. In no shaman, however, have such conceptualizations been reduced to any kind of comprehensive, somewhat closed, image, as is the case with other religions. Additionally, shamanic notions are not spread worldwide—as the name 'shaman' itself is familiar worldwide—or binding to the extent that they are in other religions.

Instead, shamanic conceptualizations are frequently recognizable only as something standing in close connection with surrounding religions. As such, worldwide, it is first and foremost Christian confessions, along with forms of Buddhism, that are at issue. Further, certain conceptualizations are found in shamanism, which play a role in a multiplicity of religions, and not only in those that immediately surround the shamanism of one region or another.

Soul

The concepts of the soul in the shamanism of a large number of Siberian populations are unambiguously influenced by Christian notions of the → soul, which must be ascribed to the activity of Christian missionaries. This sort of concept intersects, again, with other traditions. For shamans, it is not only human beings who have souls, but → animals, plants, mountains, rocks, rivers, and, finally, everything that, in the context of Judeo-Christian piety, is regarded as being inanimate, as many of these things are even ascribed consciousness (→ Animism). This platform supports the thought, so important for shamanism, that all of these things can also be the temporary domicile of the soul of another person. Naturally, this animistic concept of the soul also has to do with the notion that human beings have no triumphal position vis-à-vis other beings and things.

Concerning the notion of a comprehensive animation, shamanism participates in traditions that reach far beyond individual religions. This ubiquity holds even for the shamanic ideas concerning the causes of disease. Diseases erupt either because maleficent spirits penetrate the body, or because the soul has left the body and wanders about, or because it has been abducted from the body.

Cosmology

Not simply to bring other religions in connection with shamanism, we must note that the latter comports an apparently widespread rudimentary → cosmology. Along with the human world, there is often another world, usually thought of lying spatially beneath it, that, among other things, is a stopping place for the souls of the dead (→ Death and Dying), and a world above, as home of the souls ready for their return to the human world. There are, besides, more or less clear ideas about places of the exit or entrance, and the ways in which those souls, including the shamans, find their passage between worlds (→ Orientation).

Sources

Our picture of shamanism is almost completely limited to a shamanism connected with other religious traditions, which is an outcome of the limitation of sources. The reason why shamanism is accessible to us exclusively in its relations to other religions is that 'pure' shamanism—surely conceivable—is not provided by any sources that would permit what is shown or said there to be interpreted unambiguously as shamanic. Neither, then, does discourse upon a shamanism submitted to these connections encourage us to attempt the reconstruction of an original one, so that we might deduce conceptualizations and practices that would apply only to shamanism. Inasmuch as relationships between shamanism and other, more widespread, traditions cannot be explained by migration, the assumption would in any case be plausible that shamanism shares an elementary, primitive religiosity (without thereby qualifying to be ranked as such a religion itself).

Broadening One's Awareness

b) Shamanism broadens our consciousness. This view is typically to be met and implemented in circles of industrial societies ('Neo-Shamanism').

An exclusive, or nearly exclusive, attachment to the notion of consciousness-broadening, of course, will likely occasion a bypass of the fact that shamans perform no individual 'consciousness raising' themselves: instead, one possibility is that they take their position in the course of the 'shamanic illness's' extraordinary states of awareness, without the persons of the clientele endeavoring to attain them. These persons, then, are not visited by extraordinary perceptions, and they experience this transitus as anything from a threat to a torture. The other possibility is that this manner of perception is indeed the aim of shamans, by reason of their professional practice, and that shamans expose themselves to it (only) because it is necessary for the preservation of their shamanic abilities, and thus for winning their own sustenance. Shamans who follow a calling, and earnestly pursue their profession, are not getting themselves on a 'trip.'

Female Capacity

c) Shamanism is called a female thing—a regard that often comports the notion that there is, as it were, a natural connection between shamanism and femaleness, so that shamanism has come to enjoy a certain attention and sympathy in feminist circles. Indeed, it is actually the case in many societies—such as, for example, in those of Eastern Asia—that a shamanic clientele, as well as the overwhelming proportion of the shamans themselves, have, in recent times, been of the female gender. Accordingly, female concerns also play an outstanding role in the rituals, and female shamans are then, so to speak, the natural allies of women in their everyday needs (→ Gender Stereotypes; Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism).

In many societies, shamanic rituals, performed by women or men, occasionally express an affinity for the opposite sex. In critical points in a ritual, female shamans at times embody deified military leaders—the eminently male figure. The embodiment may serve as a demonstration that, in their true strength, women do not stand behind men, and bring to expression a 'counter image,' as it were, to the repression of women as found in daily life. Or, vice-versa, male shamans may behave as women, as they do merely in wearing women's apparel. For some authors, ritual sex change is the remnant of an ancient, matriarchal shamanism (→ Matriarchy/Patriarchy).

Sex Change

The latter interpretation appears rather questionable, if we recall that we cannot really know anything about ancient shamanism, nor therefore, anything about a 'primordial matriarchal shamanism.' Only the general assumption may be reasonable that female shamanism itself is only, once more, a historical phenomenon. It might also be a valid conclusion that, in certain societies, at a certain point in time, a discrimination against women is introduced, and that this then goes hand in hand with a diminishment in the phenomenon of shamanism. At all events, one encounters female shamanism only in societies in which both forms of diminishment (marginalization) are indeed at hand.

Psychic Instability?

d) Shamans are characterized as psychically unstable persons, if not out and out mentally ill (→ Psychopathology). This feature is part of the intrinsic character of shamanism: shamans, before they become such, undergo a phase of psychic and even physical instability, the 'shaman's illness.' The acknowledgment of shamans as such depends precisely on the persons in question defeating their diseases and disturbances. Only persons, who are able to mobilize the patron spirits and, with their help, regain their health, are trusted, precisely in virtue of this, to become active for others. Psychic instability is often accompanied by physical and intellectual debility. But activity as a shaman, which often can continue for days without interruption, calls for the opposite, namely, an extraordinarily high measure of physical and psychic endurance, with intellectual strength as well. Finally, a shaman must be in control of a repertory of ritual acts, songs, and formulae that may well be one of the most comprehensive and exacting demanded in any religion. The pretensions of the repertory lie not only in its sheer extent, but also in the demand that it be memorizable—not to mention the requirement of a constant, lightning-like adaptation to unforeseeable situations, and consequently, the ability to improvise a suitable choice of elements from such a great repertory. All told, over and above their capabilities as ritual celebrants, shamans are often, as well, teachers, counselors, and confidants, and this with good reason. As a result they are personalities held in high regard.

Material Advantage

e) Shamans are said to be interested only in their material advantage, so they exploit the gullibility of their fellow human beings. This is the 'argument' so often encountered in the declarations of politicians, administrators, and intellectuals, whose ambition, in their societies, is to foster 'the modern.' Shamans do, of course, have this in common with other professionals, that there are among them the less competent, who are therefore inclined to awaken unfounded hopes in their clientele, as also to avail themselves of dishonorable means.

Clientele

It is to be observed, however that shamans have but few opportunities to abandon their nearly always spare clientele and find another. A high measure of risk therefore attaches to shamanic activity, that its practitioners may lose the basis of their life support. Prudence, therefore, enjoins shamans to awaken in their clientele no expectations that they may not be able to satisfy in some measure. It would likewise be imprudent of them to exaggerate their material demands. Shamans generally stand in competition with other religions. In addition, it is difficult for them to calculate the amount of their income in advance, if only because opportunities to practice shamanism are only conditionally foreseeable in a given space of time.

Gathered into one, all of these circumstances entail the fact that only a few shamans can live exclusively on their shamanic activity. But they must be available, whenever an opportunity for shamanic activity presents itself; thus, it is almost never possible regularly to pursue another activity, by which they could save some of their income. Consequently, by and large, there exist no prosperous or, especially, wealthy shamans. An exception in this regard occurs when an altogether special opportunity presents itself (such as in contemporary Korea; → China/Japan/Korea): in the wake of an establishment of a 'national identity,' shamans may see their activity and status increase in value—or even, in special cases, have themselves placed on the market as media stars.

Literature

Diószegi, Vilmos/Hoppál, Mihály (eds.), Shamanism in Siberia, Budapest 1978; Eliade, Mircea, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, London 1964 (French original 1951); Flaherty, Gloria, Shamanism and the Eighteenth Century, Princeton 1992 (shamanism in European intellectual discourse); Francfort, Henri-Paul/Hamayon, Roberte N. (eds.), The Concept of Shamanism: Uses and Abuses, Budapest 2001 (on the applicability of 'traditional' shamanism to modern phenomena and Stone-age art); Hoppál, Mihály

(ed.), Shamanism in Eurasia, 2 parts, Göttingen 1984; Hoppál, Mihály/Howard, Keith D. (eds.), Shamans and Cultures, Budapest/Los Angeles 1993; Hutton, Ronald, Shamans: Siberian Spirituality and the Western Imagination, London/New York 2001 (critical assessment of research into shamanism); Kendall, Laurel, Shamans, Housewives, and Other Restless Spirits: Women in Korean Ritual Life, Honolulu 1985 (report and analysis of 'female shamanism'); Lindquist, Galina, Shamanic Performances on the Urban Scene: Neo-Shamanism in Contemporary Sweden, Stockholm 1997 (on modern Western shamanism in 'New Age' contexts); MacCulloch, J. A.: "Shamanism," in: Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics 1 (1920), repr. 1974, 441-446; Noel, Daniel C.: The Soul of Shamanism: Western Fantasies, Imaginal Realities, New York 1997 (on Eliade's influence in particular); von Stuckrad, Kocku, Schamanismus und Esoterik. Kultur- und wissenschaftsgeschichtliche Betrachtungen, Leuven 2003 (neo-shamanism and Western intellectual history); Znamenski, Andrei A. (ed.), Shamanism (Critical Concepts in Sociology), 3 vols., London/New York 2004 (the most extensive anthology available today).

→ Ancestors, Animism, Body, China/Japan/Korea, Ecstasy, Enthusiasm, Illness/Health, New Age, North America (Traditional Religions), Northern Eurasia/Circumpolar Region, Possession, Psyche, Psychopathology, Soul

Dieter Eikemeier

Shintô

1. The word-sign Shintô (Jap., 'Way of the Divinities') consists of the signs for 'divinity/ies' (Sino-Jap., shin; Jap., kami) and 'way' (Sino-Jap., tô/dô; Chin., tao/dao; Jap., michi; → Daoism; Road/Path/Journey; Martial Arts), and designates the native religion of Japan, which, however, must not be regarded as a unitary religious system (→ China/Japan/Korea). Originally, only local cults existed, independent from one another. After the introduction of Buddhism in the sixth century, the designation Shintô was conceived as a counter-concept to butsudô, 'Way of the Buddha.' Shintô embraces religious practices and functions that are very different from one another, and which can be ordered in four large groups: (1) state Shintô (the Shintô of the Imperial House), (2) sect Shintô, (3) shrine Shintô, and (4) folk Shintô. Shintô has no founder, no official sacred scriptures, no monolithic instructional system, no established system of instruction, and no religious profession in the Christian sense of a confession of belief. At the center of religious practice stands the kami veneration. Kami stands for female and male divine beings, for ancestors, spirits (e.g., house, forest, and water spirits), forces of nature (force of life, fertility), and extraordinary nature phenomena (sun, moon, volcanoes, rock formations, aged trees). Belief in the animation (ensoulment) of nature is central to Shintô (→ Animism). Very diverse usages, festivals, and legends exist locally. By contact with continental traditions (cult of ancestors, Chinese mythology, → Daoism, → Buddhism), Shintô altered its shape and self-image.

Mythology

2. Along with shamanic practices (→ Shamanism), which were performed by women in antiquity, the most ancient religious expressions of Japan took the form of local and tribal cults, whose historical basis was the clan (uji) system. At the focus of religious veneration stood the ancestor-divinity of the clan. The superior of the clan was at once the political leader and the high priest of the cult. In the fourth century, the Tennô clan attained supremacy,

Schoolgirls rinse their hands and mouths at a stone basin in the entrance area of a Shintô shrine. → Purity and cleanliness are key concerns of Shintô. The basin is earmarked as sacred space by its enclosure with consecrated straw ropes (shimenawa), to which white strips of paper (shide), cut out in zigzag shapes, have been attached. Shide are symbolic sacrificial offerings. Straw ropes with white paper strips often adorn the shrine structure itself, as well as annexed cult and offering spaces, and sacred trees and stones in the temple area. In the background of the stone basin are large vessels for rice wine, bestowed by firms and private contributors, and set out in a roofed wooden structure. The script on the vessels declares the name and its mythology of Sun Goddess Amaterasu Omikami gained in influence. The main notion of these myths is the divine descent of the Tennô clan. On this ideological basis, the oldest written documents of Japan appeared: Kojiki ("Record of Ancient Happenings," 712 CE) and Nihongi ("Annals of Japan," 720). Together with mythic texts, they contain prayers and ritual texts that are applied in ceremonies even today. The myths begin with reports of the emergence of the Japanese islands, and plot the cosmological image of a three-dimensional universe: high fields of the sky, world of phenomena, and tomblike underworld. The primal pair, Izanagi and Izanami, stand on the bridge of the sky, and dip a spear into the brine. Drops of water flow to form an island. In the midst thereof, the couple erect a pillar reaching to the sky. Here they conceive and bear all of the things of the world. The most important offspring are Sun Goddess Amateresu, Moon God Tsukiyomi, and Storm God Susanoo. They divide the power of the universe among themselves. At the birth of the God of Fire, Izanami dies, and becomes Goddess of the Dead, in the 'Realm of Darkness' (yomi no kumi). Amaterasu installs her great-grandson, Ninigi, as first Regent of Yamato (designating ancient Japan), and confers on him the insignia of the crown: mirror, sword, and 'bowed jewels.'

3. Ninigi's grandson is the first legendary emperor, Jimmu. The third regent, Suinin (first century), has a permanent shrine built for the Sun Goddess, in Ise (principal island of Honshu, Prefecture of Mie), which is still today the central Shintô sanctuary. From ancient Shintô to the Shintô of today, a long road lies, along which, by way of external influences, the shape and contour of this tradition have been powerfully transformed. Even imperial decrees of the seventh century emphasized the function of Shintô as national cult. In state-organized Shintô, cultic acts were institutionalized, piety lost its spontaneity, and woman her significant position in the cultic action. Under the influence of the Chinese juridical system, the “Office for the Shrine System” arose, which controlled state ceremonies and local shrines. Buddhist influences brought about the emergence of syncretistic forms (e.g., Ryôbu Shintô, from the thirteenth to the fourteenth century), according to whose teaching the kami are local manifestations of buddhas and bodhisattvas.

4. a) The influence of Neo-Confucianism, and the revival of Shintô by the ‘National School’ (Kokujako), led to new developments in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The National School called for an orientation to antiquity, and to its writings, in the context of a clear ideological political target: veneration of the Shintô deities, acknowledgment of the Tennô as descendant of the Sun Goddess, and thereby the political and religious leader of Japan. Since mid-nineteenth century, the Tenno institution had deliberately produced a mythic aura that characterized the Emperor as a godlike being. The leaders of the Meiji restoration wanted a centralized state, after the pattern of a ‘family ideology.’ The Emperor, as the father-figure of this state (according to the Constitution of 1889), who had been proclaimed divine, officially held the entire power of the state in his hands and strove for the legitimization of the claim to the absolute power of a thoroughly authoritarian system. State Shintô, defined as a supra- or civil-religious cult of state ethics and patriotism (→ Civil Religion), obliged the members of all religions to observe the cult of the Emperor. By its means, the Meiji government (1868–1912) sought to provide the sense of a national and cultural identity with dense roots. After the military defeat of 1945, and the bankruptcy of the authoritarian national military regime, the then Emperor Hirohito, under pressure on the part of the American occupation, publicly and formally renounced his claim to supreme power, as well as the godlike position of the imperial office. According to the Constitution of 1947, the Tennô today ranks only as a “symbol of Japan, and of the unity of the Japanese people.” He is no longer actively involved in politics. His appearances in public are limited to representative functions. Only his sacred functions as superior of Shintô, and the rites celebrated for the veneration of the Imperial Ancestors, remain his direct responsibility. For years, national and international criticism has opposed the unconstitutional, solemn visit of the Japanese Minister President, as well as of high-ranking political leaders, to the Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo, where the Japanese war victims are honored; in particular, because since 1978 the names of the seven war criminals executed after 1945 have been included on the shrine’s sacred roster. Before the war, the Yasukuni Shrine was the focal point of Japan’s nationalistic movement. In 1945, on the heels of the sharp separation of politics and religion, it surrendered its position as Sanctuary of the Japanese State, and was privatized. Since as early as the 1950s, however, Japanese with nationalistic inclinations have fought for the reinstatement of the shrine under state jurisdiction.

b) Sect Shintô emerged against the background of state Shintô. The designation served officially to divide state Shintô from the newly arisen messianic movements in popular religion, which frequently absorb elements of various religions or spiritual traditions, and are considered a consequence of the ‘culture shock’ that Japan underwent after opening to the West. Between of the donor. Rice wine (sake), rice kernels and plants are the most important sacred offerings in Shintô. Sake is used in many religious ceremonies (e.g., at the marriage ritual) as an offering of food, and distributed, for sacred draughts, as a gift to the community or the priests.

According to the classic Shintô understanding, behind 'impurity' (kegare) or 'guilt' (tsumi) lurks a blemish of an external kind, in blood (e.g., at the birth of a child, in menstruation), disease, death, or cultic impurity incurred in disobedience to a commandment or in the violation of a taboo (incest, sodomy). Impurity provokes the gods' displeasure, and results in the ostracism or temporary exclusion of an individual from the social community. There is no moral concept of impurity, nor is there one of sin, whose cause will have to be sought in the inner recesses of each human being. Thus, guilt, or 'evil,' can be eliminated through purification ceremonies. A distinction is made between a rite of purification by washing with water (omisogi), and the rite of ôharai, in which the Shintô priest pronounces prayers and waves a sacred ceremonial staff, hung with strips of paper and cloth, over the believer, or object, in order to sweep away its blemish, and to bless the person or thing. In the illustration, this is being done by a Shintô priest in traditional attire on the occasion of the blessing of an automobile in the entrance area of a Shintô shrine. His purpose is to ban the new car from evil influences (spirits), to purify it, and to bless it. On the right, in a meditative posture, is the car's owner. Similar ceremonies of purification and blessing take place on various occasions: at the purchase of a piece of land or the building of a house, in agrarian contexts, with illnesses. Twice a year,

1882 and 1908, the government recognized thirteen Shintô sects (e.g., Shinrikyô, Tenrikyô), and their number constantly rose. They are forerunners of Japan's → 'new religions.'

c) At the focus of shrine Shintô stand both cultic acts at shrines of the gods, and faith content conveyed by the shrines' priesthood. The Shintô community takes part in traditional rites and festivals of the year and the life cycle, such as the New Year's Festival (shôgatsu), semi-annual rites of purification (harai), wedding ceremonies, and ceremonies of maturity and socialization.

d) Popular Shintô, finally, is a designation for the multiplicity of the forms of popular religion, local rites, practices, and tales outside of organized forms of Shintô, the art of the oracle, use of → amulets, agrarian rites of the rural population, beliefs in spirits and demons.

5. The deities of the Shintô myths produce the Japanese islands, natural powers, elements, and plants; however, they are not understood as preexistent, almighty gods, or as creators in the Christian sense. They themselves have emerged from the heart of the world, and are seen as the powers through which life in the world is generated, and grows. Thus, their veneration often stands in the context of fertility ceremonies (→ Regeneration/Fertility). The Japanese kami exist and function in this world. For Shintôists, then, the quest for a transcendent world is obviated. The present world is affirmed, and human participation in the preservation and promotion of life corresponds to the will of the deities. The beyond is conceived as a dark, tomblike sphere, freighted with filth and corruption. Shintô has not developed clear concepts of the beyond, or a cult of the dead. Nor have doctrines of redemption, or basic concepts of an ethics, materialized. Buddhism filled this vacuum. The key concepts of → purity (sei) and guilt (tsumi), in Shintô, should not be interpreted against a background of ethical or moral conceptualizations. Impurity arises through contact with blood, death, or corruption, and can be eliminated by rites of purification (harai, misogi). There is no concept of guilt or sin in the moral sense. Acts are not good or evil in themselves: their appraisal depends on circumstances. Evil, then, is not to be found within us, but rests on outside influences. It can be dissolved by means of ceremonies of purification.

6. The ancient Shintô of the agrarian societies knew no institutionalized forms. Cultic acts were performed in the forest, on the fields, or along the coast. The cultic space was a quadrangular, consecrated surface on the soil, with the branch of a sacred tree in the center (himorogi). It was separated from unconsecrated ground by a straw rope (shimenawa). Gradually, temporary structures were added, and finally, permanent buildings—lasting dwellings of the deities, to facilitate veneration. The cultic places of today betray conditions of the ancient agrarian society in an astonishing way. Even in postmodern Japan, cultic areas are separated from unconsecrated places by straw ropes. Attached to the sanctuary, with the symbol of the divinity (shintai), are a prayer hall, an area for sacrificial gifts, a stage for sacred dance (kagura), and various administrative buildings. In Shintô, there are no weekly ceremonies or cultic actions. Believers themselves decide the frequency and duration of their visits to shrines. Frequently, they turn to the deities with personal requests—for children, for passing an exam, for protection from illness.

at the end of the sixth and twelfth months, at many shrines, elaborate, collective purification ceremonies (ôharai) for the people are held.

Religious practice in the community is marked by participation in annual, traditional usages, in rites and festivals (matsuri), in the framework of a local shrine. As a rule, a matsuri consists of a ritual, and a part with free celebration. The cultic act proper, conducted by the priesthood, includes the invocation of the divinities, recitation of prayers (norito), presentation of sacrificial gifts (e.g., rice, sake, salt, dried seafood, sakaki branches), and consumption of the offerings. The collective component, which actively includes the community, frequently features a → procession, at which the kami are brought forth in portable shrines (mikoshi) by celebrants in historical array, with traditional presentations of theater and dance, contests, kiosks at which items of devotion (fortune lots, amulets) are sold, and common eating and drinking. All of this, of course, underscores the folk character of the festivals. In Japanese popular belief, the kami have a function similar to that of patron saints in Catholicism. They are venerated in cult, borne in processions, and appealed to for counsel and aid in daily needs. In traditional families, along with the Buddhist home altar, there is a Shintô home shrine or wall shelf for the veneration of ancestors (kamidana), with framed pictures of deceased family members.

7. One cannot become a Shintoist. In Japan, one is a Shintoist by birth. Most Japanese are at the same time Shintoists and Buddhists. Today the two religions exist side by side, in an amicable manner; they demand no exclusive confession, and complement one another. One is born as a Shintoist. As a rule, the rites of the → life cycle (e.g., birth, maturity, marriage) are Shintoist; funeral ceremonies, nevertheless, are Buddhist. In the West, some people speak of Japanese 'cafeteria religion' with annoyance. Behind the manner in which the Japanese deal with religious traditions, however, another understanding of religion is at work than prevails in Christianized Western culture. Religion is not first and foremost profession of faith. Religions and their practices are paths of living, paths of comprehension, but not truth in itself. The believer makes use of these paths, without absolutizing and without exclusion. The Eastern watchword is "This, and also that." And this approach may impart pragmatic inspiration.

Literature

Breen, John/Teeuwen, Mark (eds.), Shinto in History: Ways of the Kami, Richmond 2000; Creemers, Wilhelmus H., Shrine Shintô after World War II, Leiden 1968; Kato, Genichi, A Historical Study of the Religious Development of Shintô, Tokyo 1973; Littleton, C. Scott, Shinto: Origins, Rituals, Festivals, Spirits, Sacred Places, Oxford 2002; Nelson, John K., A Year in the Life of a Shintô Shrine, Seattle 1996; Idem, Enduring Identities: The Guise of Shinto in Contemporary Japan, Honolulu 2000; Nobutaka, Inoue (ed.), Shinto: A Short History, London 2003; Picken, Stuart D. B., Historical Dictionary of Shinto, Lanham 2002; Plutschow, Herbert, Matsuri: The Festivals of Japan, Richmond 1996; Schwade, Arcadio, Shintô-Bibliography in Western Languages, Leiden 1986.

→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic, Ancestors, China/Japan/Korea, Hereafter, Kyôto, Local Devotion, Marriage/Divorce, Nativism, Shamanism, Soul, Theocracy, Zen Buddhism

Sabine Beyreuther

Shoah

1. Ever since the 1940s, the Hebrew word shoah ('catastrophe'), which is of biblical origin (Isa 10:3), has designated the persecution and murder of some six million European Jews carried out by German National Socialism. Connected to the article ha- (ha-shoah), it has come to epitomize the catastrophe of Jewish history. The choice of the term 'Shoah' implies a distancing from the expression prevailing since the end of the 1970s, 'Holocaust.'[1] Nevertheless, 'Shoah' and 'Holocaust' are becoming once more synonymous, the former predominating in the Hebraic linguistic areas, the latter in the anglophone ones.

In dealing with the historical experience of the Shoah, one seeks a connection with traditional religion. The modes of reflection on the Shoah therefore frequently contain elements of a religious dimension, these being differentiated in terms of the respective 'subjects' of the same, whether victims, perpetrators, or onlookers.

2. a) Jewish theological reflection on the Shoah begins in the 1960s, with its center of gravity in the United States.[2] In connection with the commemorative character of Judaism, which bears on the relation between faith and history, the various approaches seek an answer to the question of theodicy posed by Auschwitz. Extremely orthodox voices range the Shoah in the long Jewish history of martyrdom, as divine punitive judgment for sins committed (as Joel Titelbaum). Others see, in the Shoah, a time of the absence of God, followed, once more—with the founding of the State of Israel in 1948—by a time of God's benevolent presence (Eliezer Berkowicz). A more radical interpretation of the Shoah has been offered by Richard Rubenstein, who grasps it as proof of the death of God, and therewith as the destruction of traditional Jewish belief. Emil Fackenheim, on the other hand, sees, in a similar self-sacrifice on the part of Judaism, the posthumous victory of Hitler, and concludes to the imperative to hold fast, precisely now, to Jewish belief. Other positions interpret the experience of the Shoah in the light of a motif of a (co-)suffering God, either in congruency with Jewish tradition (Abraham Heschel), or in conscious departure from the biblical, almighty God (Hans Jonas). Doubt of the possibility of interpreting the Shoah in traditional theological patterns is especially strong in Arthur A. Cohen, for whom the 'Tremendum' of the death camps poses primarily the question of human responsibility.

In Israel

b) In the State of Israel, the Shoah is dealt with primarily on the levels of politics and → civil religion.[3] The Israeli Declaration of Independence of 1948 asserts, in the founding of the State of Israel, and thereby in the purposes of Zionism, a liberating response to the Shoah. Still, in the years after the founding of the State, the Shoah was generally avoided as an object of observation: the image of the suffering and the passivity of the victims of the Nazis contradicted the ideal of the Israeli pioneer and hero in battle. With the laws for the establishment of the annual memorial day (Yom ha-Shoah), of 1951 or 1959, as well as of the memorial site (Yad va-Shem, "Monument and Name"; cf. Isa 56:5) of 1953, an attempt was made to achieve a balance: the national Memorial of the Shoah was charged with the motif of courage and valor, as Jews had shown in a battle of resistance. Correspondingly, for Yom ha-Shoah, the 27th of Nissan was selected, between Passover and Independence Day, since it had been in the month of Nissan, 1943, that the Warsaw → Ghetto uprising had taken place. In this fashion, commemoration of the Shoah was not bound to an already existing religious memorial day, such as, for example, the 9th of Av, which integrates into the Jewish faith the commemoration of various assaults of fate in Jewish history, such as the destruction of the Temple, in 70 CE. With the Eichmann trial of 1961, Israeli society made a transition to a phase dominated by enlightenment and information concerning the Shoah. The theme of National Socialist persecution now found entry into the curricula of the educational system. After the wars of 1967 and 1973, and the coming to power of the Likud in 1977—as well as after the switch of generations among the survivors of the Shoah—the Israeli attitude toward the Shoah got into a "phase of mythologization," in which the Shoah emerged "more and more as the raison d'être of Zionism and the State of Israel."[4] The state visit of high-ranking foreign guests at Yad va-Shem was established as a national ritual. Since 1980, the Shoah has been an obligatory subject for all pupils, and democratic, patriotic, and moral teachings are drawn from it. True, critics see an instrumentalization here, as well as an immunization. In the 1990s, it is observable that the Shoah is generally increasing in a capacity to bestow identity. This precipitates in its developments in literature, film, and historiography, as well as an incipient reception of theological reflection on the Shoah in the United States.

Jewish-Christian Dialogue

3. Christian reflection on the Shoah was originally sparked by recognition of the guilty involvement of church and theology in National Socialist anti-Semitism. This reaction can be comprised under the general heading of Jewish-Christian dialogue, which has been taking place in the United States and, since about the 1960s, in Germany, as well. It is earmarked first of all by its goal of attaining an attitude among Christians that would evaluate Judaism as an independent theological quantity, in order to foster an unprejudiced encounter of both theologies and faith traditions. The imperative defeat of theological anti-Judaism here—such as of the prejudice against Judaism to the effect that the latter is legalistic, or the teaching that, since Jesus Christ, divine salvation is no longer to be found in the synagogue, but now solely in the Church—ought be reached through a self-critical review of Christian dogmatics and biblical interpretation, as well as through a more

On September 19, 1941, Viktor Klemperer, discharged Dresden Professor of Romanistics, notes in his journal: “The wearing of the Jewish Star, black on yellow material, containing, in roman face designed to resemble Hebrew letters, Jude [Ger., ‘Jew’], on the left breast, the size of the palm of the hand, 10 penny, prescribed for us yesterday, beginning tomorrow, 9/19.” The introduction of the Jewish Star, by order of the police of September 1, 1941, which came into force simultaneously with other harassing decisions—such as the order for Jews in streetcars to use only the front platforms—was part of a perfidious strategy of exclusion and harassment on the part of National Socialist Germany. Citizens determined by the State to be Jewish were simultaneously discriminated against by constantly new means, excluded from societal life as stigmatized, marked as ‘a different kind,’ and, for instance, isolated in ‘Jew houses’—social death preceded murder in the Shoah. “Yesterday, as Eva [his wife] sewed on the Jewish Star, a frenzy of desperation shot through me” (Klemperer on September 20, 1941). The brand of the Jewish minority had a tradition in Christian Europe: At the Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215), in the 68th constitution, Pope profound knowledge of Judaism founded partly on the basis of a Jewish self-testimonial. Judaism is gaining in meaning and importance not only as the root of Christianity, but also as current equal partner with the Church in the belief in a common, one God. Mindfulness of the Shoah, then, is shown principally in the theological review of Christian positions of judgment and prejudice. The steps in this process since 1945 can be read in various church declarations.[5]

In Germany

4. To deal with the Shoah in Germany is for Germans to recognize that they, or their ancestors, are the persons responsible for the commission of Nazi crimes. At the same time, there is a question of remembering the victims. This ever more dynamic set of problems touches the most varied areas, such as historiography, literature, film, art, religion, and theology. The memory of the burden of the German past is extremely difficult, as it is a function of the enormity and complexity of the crimes that now stand, in a mode of self-criticism, before the eyes of the nation. Beginning in 1996, the anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camp at Auschwitz by Soviet troops (January 27) has been a national "memorial day of the victims of National Socialism." Programs are also presented in commemoration of the nocturnal pogrom of November 9, 1938. None of these commemorative rituals is universally accepted, however. Their function—definitely to be regarded as religious—is to indicate to society the meaning and importance of the Shoah for the present. But attitudes here swing between the 'case closed' mentality, which would like to forget the Shoah, or regards it as irrelevant for the present, and the effort to preserve a suitable recall of the Shoah and its victims in the cultural memory. German postwar history here is to be described rather as the consequence of a public dispute, rather coincidentally provoked. As stages in the discourse, the following might be cited as examples. R. Hochhuth's drama Der Stellvertreter (Ger., "The Deputy"), 1963; the book by A. and M. Mitscherlich, Die Unfähigkeit zu trauern, 1967 (Engl. as "The Inability to Mourn: Principles of Collective Behavior"; 1978); the American film series "Holocaust" (1979); Claude Lanzmann's documentary film "Shoah," 1985, and Steven Spielberg's feature film, "Schindler's List," 1994; the "historians' dispute," 1986–1988; the debate over Daniel J. Goldhagen's "Hitlers' Willing Executioners" (1996); and the Walser-Bubis debate (1998). Doubtless the lengthiest, and perhaps the most important, confrontation is the one being waged since 1989 over the 'Holocaust Memorial' in Berlin, right in front of the Reichstag (Parliament). On June 25, 1999, the German Bundestag (lower house of parliament) decided in favor of architect Peter Eisenman's design: a field of memorial pillars. Here it is clear that the → memory (historically without analogy) of the Shoah in Germany is faced with the challenge to maintain "a memory that undermines [Germany's] very identity" (A. Assmann). German identity here need not be disavowed by a 'shame memorial,' but ought, in its brokenness, maintain itself in a constant awareness, by a memorial to the victims of the Shoah, that will be at the same time a place of respect and reverence for them (→ Monument/Memorial Places).

Innocent III decreed the external marking of Jews and 'Saracens' (Muslims). With Charles V's Imperial Police Order, a yellow ring, indicating that the wearer was a Jew, was obligatory until the end of the eighteenth century. At the end of the sixteenth century, the 'Star of David' (correctly, 'Shield of David'; in Heb., Magen David) came into use as an emblem of Jewish identity, and was adopted by Zionism, until it was forcibly imposed, for the first time, in Poland, in October 1939 by order of the National Socialists, as a stigma. 'Macabre' is the word used by the Catholic Press Agency about this picture that shows the sale of the erstwhile sign of stigmatization. But ought the verdict not rather be against those who put such signs in the world, and force it upon their fellow citizens? (Hubert Mohr)

1. Münz 1995, 100-110.
2. Brocke/Jochum 1993; Münz 1995.
3. Liebmann/Don-Yehiya 1983.
4. Zimmermann, Moshe, "Die Folgen des Holocaust für die israelische Gesellschaft," in: Aus Politik und Zeitgeschichte 1-2 (1992), 33-43, p. 34.
5. Rendtorff/Henrix 1989.

Literature

Arad, Yitzhak et al. (eds.), Documents on the Holocaust: Selected Sources on the Destruction of the Jews for Germany and Austria, Poland, and the Soviet Union, Jerusalem 1981; Brocke, Michael/Jochum, Herbert (eds.), Wolkensäule und Feuerschein. Jüdische Theologie des Holocaust, Gütersloh 1993 ([1]1982); Gutman, Yisrael (ed.), Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, 4 vols., New York 1990; Jonas, Hans, Mortality and Morality: A Search for the Good after Auschwitz, Evanston 1996; Laqueur, Walter (ed.), The Holocaust Encyclopedia, New Haven 2001; Liebman, Charles S./Don-Yehiya, Eliezer, Civil Religion in Israel: Traditional Judaism and Political Culture in the Jewish State, Berkeley 1983; Michman, Dan (ed.), Remembering the Holocaust in Germany, 1945–2000: German Strategies and Jewish Responses, New York 2002; Morgan, Michael L., Beyond Auschwitz:

Post-Holocaust Jewish Thought in America, New York 2001; Münz, Christoph, Der Welt ein Gedächnis geben. Geschichtstheologisches Denken im Judentum nach Auschwitz, Gütersloh 1995; Novick, Peter, The Holocaust and Collective Memory: The American Experience, London 2000; Rendtorff, Rolf/Henrix, Hans Hermann (eds.), Die Kirchen und das Judentum. Dokumente von 1945–1985, Paderborn [2]1989; Wiedmer, Caroline A., The Claims of Memory: Representations of the Holocaust in Contemporary Germany and France, Ithaca 1999; Young, James E., The Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials and Meaning, New Haven 1993.

→ Anti-Semitism, Conflict/Violence, Memory, National Socialism

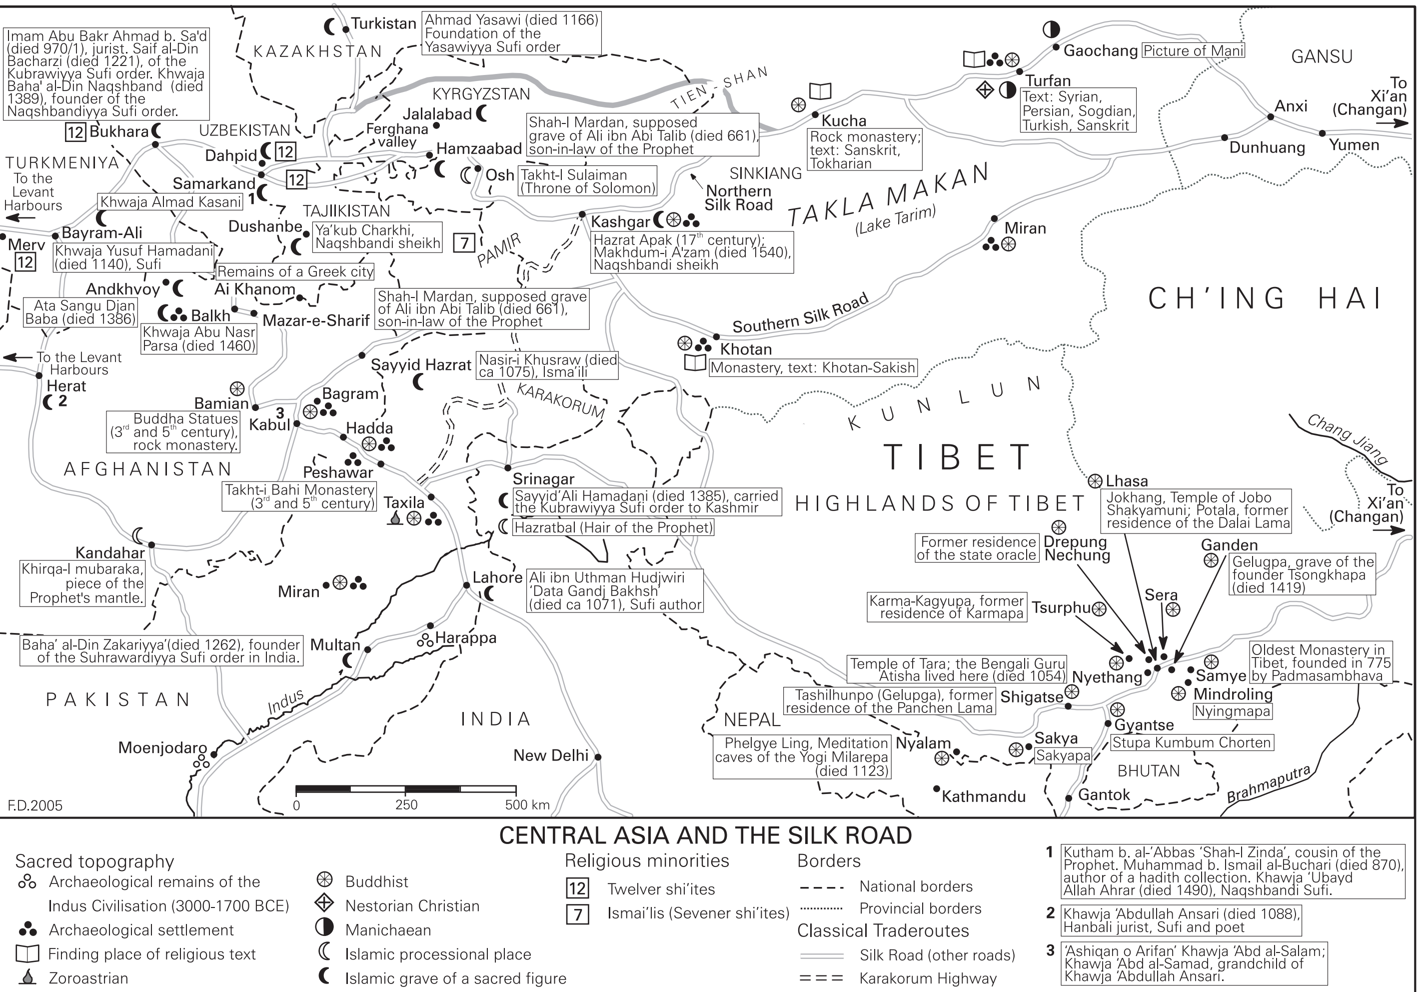
Evelina Volkmann

Silk Road



The Region

1. The silk Road was a network of trade routes, reaching from → China, through Turkistan and → Iran, to the Eastern Mediterranean Sea, and first peaked in the first century CE. Chinese silk-ware and ironware, as well as Indian ivory, were merchandise much sought after in Rome. The silk route served not only as a trade connection, but also as a cultural bridge. Although in the easterly direction woolen goods, Alexandrian glass, coral, silver, and gold were transported, more important was the cultural influence of the great world religions that reached Central Asia and China along this route. The merchants who traveled the various parts of the route functioned as missionaries and spread → Buddhism, → Manichaeism, Nestorian Christianity, and → Islam. With the discovery of the sea route to Asia, in the late fifteenth century, the importance of the land routes gradually dwindled, and in the following centuries, Central Asia grew politically and culturally isolated. In the nineteenth century, the region fell into the area of Chinese and Russian power interests. In 1884, East Turkistan (the basin of the Tarim) became a Chinese province, under the name Xinjiang, 'New Frontier,' and since 1949 has been part of the People's Republic of China. The West Turkistani protectorate of Buchara and Chiva was incorporated into the Soviet Union as part of the Socialist Republic of Uzbekistan. Since the disintegration of the Soviet Union in December 1991, the opportunity once more exists for the Muslim population of newly independent Republics of Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, and Turkmenistan, to enter into regular trade with other parts of the Islamic world.

A large part of the silk route ran through desert areas. The Tarim basin, through which ran all trade routes from China to the West, is enclosed by a ring formed by the Tien-Shan, Pamir, Karakorum, and Kun-Lun ranges, and receives extremely little rainfall. Further west, the landscape is characterized by the Iranian-Turanic wasteland. Between inhospitable wastelands and high mountains, the cultural life of the region took place in the oasis cities along the trade routes. The existence of Turfan (Turpan), the most important archaeological finding in East Turkistan, demonstrates the centuries-long coexistence of the Buddhist, Manichean, and Nestorian religions.

Development in Religious History

2. In West Turkistan, Bukhara and Samarkand developed into important urban centers. As in East Turkistan, here as well, art and culture were first decisively marked by Buddhism, which was favored by the Kushan dynasty,

CENTRAL ASIA AND THE SILK ROAD
Sacred topography
Archaeological remains of the Indus Civilisation (3000-1700 BCE)
Archaeological settlement
Finding place of religious text
Zoroastrian Buddhist Nestorian Christian
Manichaean
Islamic processional place
Islamic grave of a sacred figure
Religious minorities
Twelver shi'ites
Isma'ilis (Sevener shi'ites)
Borders
National borders
Provincial borders
Classical Traderoutes
Silk Road (other roads)
Karakorum Highway
1 Kutham b. al-'Abbas 'Shah-I Zinda', cousin of the Prophet. Muhammad b. Ismail al-Buchari (died 870), author of a hadith collection. Khawja 'Ubayd Allah Ahrar (died 1490), Naqshbandi Sufi.
2 Khawja 'Abdullah Ansari (died 1088), Hanbali jurist, Sufi and poet
3 'Ashiqan o Arifan' Khawja 'Abd al-Salam; Khawja 'Abd al-Samad, grandchild of Khawja 'Abdullah Ansari.
0
250
500 km
F.D.2005
KAZAKHSTAN
UZBEKISTAN
TURKMENIYA
KYRGYZSTAN
TAJIIKISTAN
AFGHANISTAN
PAKISTAN
INDIA
NEPAL
BHUTAN
TIBET
HIGHLANDS OF TIBET
KUN LUN
CH'ING HAI GANSU
SINKIANG
TAKLA MAKAN
(Lake Tarim)
TIEN - SHAN
PAMIR
KARAKORUM
Indus
Brahmaputra
Chang Jiang
Imam Abu Bakr Ahmad b. Sa'd (died 970/1), jurist. Saif al-Din Bacharzi (died 1221), of the Kubrawiyya Sufi order. Khwaja Baha' al-Din Naqshband (died 1389), founder of the Naqshbandiyya Sufi order.
Khwaja Almad Kasani
Khwaja Yusuf Hamadani (died 1140), Sufi
Ata Sangu Djan Baba (died 1386)
Khwaja Abu Nasr Parsa (died 1460)
Remains of a Greek city
Ya'kub Charkhi, Naqshbandi sheikh
Ahmad Yasawi (died 1166) Foundation of the Yasawiyya Sufi order
Shah-I Mardan, supposed grave of Ali ibn Abi Talib (died 661), son-in-law of the Prophet
Takht-I Sulaiman (Throne of Solomon)
Hazrat Apak (17th century); Makhdum-i A'zam (died 1540), Naqshbandi sheikh
Shah-I Mardan, supposed grave of Ali ibn Abi Talib (died 661), son-in-law of the Prophet
Nasir-i Khusraw (died ca 1075), Isma'ili
Buddha Statues (3rd and 5th century), rock monastery.
Takht-i Bahi Monastery (3rd and 5th century)
Khirqa-I mubaraka, piece of the Prophet's mantle.
Baha' al-Din Zakariyya' (died 1262), founder of the Suhrawardiyya Sufi order in India.
Sayyid'Ali Hamadani (died 1385), carried the Kubrawiyya Sufi order to Kashmir
Hazratbal (Hair of the Prophet)
Ali ibn Uthman Hudjwiri 'Data Gandj Bakhsh' (died ca 1071), Sufi author
Rock monastery; text: Sanskrit, Tokharian
Monastery, text: Khotan-Sakish
Text: Syrian, Persian, Sogdian, Turkish, Sanskrit
Picture of Mani
Phelgye Ling, Meditation caves of the Yogi Milarepa (died 1123)
Tashilhunpo (Gelupga), former residence of the Panchen Lama
Temple of Tara; the Bengali Guru Atisha lived here (died 1054)
Karma-Kagyupa, former residence of Karmapa
Former residence of the state oracle
Jokhang, Temple of Jobo Shakyamuni; Potala, former residence of the Dalai Lama
Gelugpa, grave of the founder Tsongkhapa (died 1419)
Oldest Monastery in Tibet, founded in 775 by Padmasambhava
Nyingmapa
Stupa Kumbum Chorten
Sakyapa
Northern Silk Road
Southern Silk Road
To the Levant Harbours
To the Levant Harbours
To Xi'an (Changan)
To Xi'an (Changan)
Merv
Bayram-Ali
Bukhara
Samarkand
Dahpid
Dushanbe
Andkhvoy
Ai Khanom
Balkh
Mazar-e-Sharif
Herat
Kandahar
Bamian
Kabul Bagram
Hadda
Peshawar
Taxila
Sayyid Hazrat
Turkistan
Jalalabad
Ferghana valley
Hamzaabad
Osh
Kashgar
Srinagar
Lahore
Harappa
Multan
Miran
Moenjodaro
New Delhi
Kucha
Khotan
Miran
Turfan
Gaochang
Dunhuang
Anxi
Yumen Lhasa Drepung
Nechung
Tsurphu
Sera Ganden
Samye
Mindroling
Nyethang
Gyantse
Shigatse
Sakya
Nyalam
Kathmandu
Gantok

and which spread, from the first century CE onward, from Northwest India, through today's Afghanistan, to Central Asia. Thus, it is assumed that the name of today's city of Bukhara derives from vihara (vahara), 'Buddhist monastery.' This institution is said also to have influenced the installation of the Islamic madrasa, the 'theological school.' In addition, the existence of Manichean, Nestorian, and Zoroastrian communities in Bukhara and Samarkand is documented. After the death (276 BCE) of their founder, Mani, the Manicheans were persecuted in Sassanid Iran; thus, in the third century, they removed their activities to Central Asia. Nestorian Christianity, which appealed to Patriarch Nestorius of Constantinople (c. 381–451)—who had strictly separated the divine and human nature of Jesus, and was therefore condemned as heretic (431)—reached Merv and Herat in the early fifth century. Shortly thereafter, an episcopal see appeared in Samarkand, becoming a metropolitan see in the eighth century. In the seventh century, → Zoroastrianism began to compete with Buddhism in this region.

Islamization

The Arabic capture of Bukhara and Samarkand, between 709 and 712, signaled the beginning of the Islamization of West Turkistan. In 751, the Arabs defeated the Chinese in the Battle of Talas, and thereby became undisputed rulers of the region, with Arabic campaigns resulting in the destruction of Buddhist sanctuaries. Subsequently, however, the new religion prevailed more pacifically, and relatively slowly.

Brotherhoods and Foundations

Islam established new opportunities for merchants and traders especially. The consolidation of the Mediterranean and Asian economic regions in Arab hands caused a growth in the rate of trade, lasting until the eleventh century. Besides traders, the mystical → Sufi brotherhoods were important vehicles of religion. The Qādirīyyah orders, founded in the twelfth century in Baghdad, played a significant role in Central Asia as well. At the end of the same century, the Kubrawīyyah order appeared in Chiwa. The Naqšbandīyyah order had its beginning in Bukhara, and was closely bound to commerce. Its founder, Bahā' al-Dīn Naqšband (1318–1389) is venerated as the patron saint of Bukhara even today.

Of great significance for religious life were → endowments or foundations, by which mosques, theological schools, and benevolent institutions were maintained. Up until the eighteenth century, Bukhara was a renowned seat of scholarship, and its numerous madrasas attracted well-nigh 30,000 students, from Russia to India.

Under Russian and Soviet Supremacy

3. Russian colonization began in the nineteenth century. First, Tashkent (1865) and Samarkand (1868) were conquered. Bukhara became a Russian protectorate. Shortly thereafter, Chiwa (1873), Choqand (1876), and Merv (1884) fell. Muslim resistance against Russia took shape in the fertile Ferghana Valley, today divided among Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan. In 1869, 1885, and 1898, rebellions erupted in the city of Andishan (see map), inspired by the mystical brotherhoods and brutally crushed by Russian troops. The conservative religious Basmačī uprisings by the Bolsheviks, between 1918 and 1922, likewise found their beginnings in the Ferghana Valley. Other Muslims joined the Pan-Turkish reform movement (Panturanism), which was willing to cooperate with the new regime. Inspired by the Krimtatar Ismail Bei Gasprinski (1851–1914), the Jadīdists (from Ar., jadīd, 'new'), beginning in the nineteenth century, strove for a reform of the school system, as well as for the development of a common literary language for all Turkic peoples. While the Jadīdists from Samarkand had rebelled against Russian domination as late as 1916, in 1920 a large part of this movement joined the Communist Party; nevertheless, these persons and their movement fell victim to the Stalinist mass cleansings of 1930.

The opposition of the Basmačī at first led the new Soviet power to a switch in policy. The foundation lands taken in 1919 were returned in 1922/23. Madrasas and Islamic courts of justice were reopened. Shortly thereafter, however, a frontal assault was mounted on Islam's institutions and culture. In 1927, the Islamic courts definitively lost their capacity to function. In the same year, in the name of the equality of women, the veil was done away with, a measure that even local communists opposed. There followed a systematic persecution of the Muslim clergy, as well as of the Naqšbandī Brotherhood. In 1930, Stalin nationalized all foundation land. Thousands of mosques and madrasas were closed. Between 1959 and 1964, other mosques fell victim to Khrushchev's anti-Islamic offensive. Of 33,000 mosques in the Russian Empire and the Protectorates of Buchara and Chiva in 1912, in 1958 only 1,500 were left. By 1968, their number had shrunk to fewer than 500.

The Soviet regime took pains to control all areas of religious practice. To this end, Muslim 'directorates' were established, the most important of these being the Directorate for Central Asia and Kazakhstan, with its headquarters in Tashkent. The only two madrasas in the Soviet Union were subjected to them, and thereby the formation of the clergy as well. Here the only Islamic publications—a newspaper, limited editions of the Qur'an, and religious calendars—were published. Religious life was placed within narrow limits. The pilgrimage to Mecca was reserved to a handful of chosen delegates. Fasting during the Islamic month of Ramadan was suppressed, for fear of a decline in productivity. Although the ritual slaughter of animals was forbidden, celebration of the sacrificial festivals of 'Īd al-Fiṭr and 'Īd al-Aḍḥā was not entirely prohibited. Besides, the formation of the Muslim identity of the population continued to be determined by Islam. Women played an especially important role in the preservation of religious traditions, such as fasting and visiting local shrines. Just so, the rites accompanying birth, circumcision, marriage, and death continued to be governed according to traditional, and therefore religious, patterns.

Situation Today

4. Even before the collapse of the Soviet Union, a revival of Islam manifested itself in the erection of unofficial houses of prayer, and study circles that passed their knowledge on to the new generation. The numerous tombs of saints as well, that had always been a magnet for the believing population, and on which the activities of the mystical brotherhoods were concentrated, took on the function of substitutes for the mosques that had been shut up. In certain parts of Central Asia, the collapse of the Soviet Union led to a reinforcement of political Islam, which governments had classified as fundamentalism and suppressed. The Ferghana Valley is today the center of the Uzbek branch of the Islamic Revival Party, which has been banned since 1991. Even the building of mosques or other architecture, or the paying of stipends, on the basis of Saudi Arabian sources, was not regarded with a benevolent eye. Instead, the Uzbek government precisely took pains to present itself as the depository of official Islam, and to bind the clergy more tightly into the apparatus of state.

Religious life is determined by Sufi tendencies (→ Sufism). The Naqšbandīyyah and Qādirīyyah orders enjoy the greatest influence throughout Central Asia and Afghanistan. The Kubrawīyyah order is popular among the Turkmen and Karakalpak of Uzbekistan. The center of the Yasawīyyah order lies in Southern Kazakhstan and Northern Uzbekistan. A hundred thousand Twelfer Shiites are to be found among the urban population. A hundred thousand Ismaelites live on Mount Badakshan, in Southeastern Tadzhikistan. In 1992, Tajikistan became the scene of a civil war between members of the old order and an opposition mounted by Islamists and democrats, supported by Iran. Turkey's attempt, in the name of Panturanism, to gain influence in Central Asia, failed, for reason of, among other things, the length of the trade routes. For Turkmenistan and Southern Uzbekistan, the most direct access to the sea leads through Iran. The other states would be served by the dismantling of trade relations with Pakistan; this route, however, is blocked by the persistent war in Afghanistan.

Literature

Bennigsen, Alexandre/Wimbush, S. Enders, Muslims of the Soviet Empire, London 1985; Elisseeff, Vadime (ed.), The Silk Roads: Highways of Culture and Commerce, New York 2000; Franck, Irene M./Brownstone, David M., The Silk Road: A History, New York 1986; Linduff, Katheryn (ed.), Silk Road Exchange in China, Philadelphia 2004; Rashid, Ahmed, The Resurgence of Central Asia: Islam Or Nationalism?, London 1995; Robinson, Francis, Atlas of the Islamic World Since 1500, New York 1982; Whitfield, Susan, Life along the Silk Road, London 1999; Eadem (ed.), The Silk Road: Trade, Travel, War and Faith, Chicago 2004.

→ Buddhism, China/Japan/Korea, Islam, Manichaeism, Order/Brotherhoods, Sufism, Zoroastrianism

Christine Nölle

Sin

The Concept-Symbol

1. From the religious viewpoint, sin designates the manifold forms of deviation from juridical, social, moral, and intra-religious norms. Connected with the conceptual address of sin, then, is the religious discourse upon the normative, the ritual, juridical, moral, and social construction of order and disorder. Interpretational work on the concept-symbol sin is bound up with ritual practices and procedures for the re-production of the social order and the religious salvific order, in the form of sanction and punishment, sacrifice and gift, confession, repentance and penance, judgment and re-socialization, remorse, pardon, grace, and therapy.

The discourse upon order and disorder belongs to the thematic spectrum of all religions. The specific concept 'sin' (in Lat., peccatum), of course, emerges only in the historical field of emanation of the biblical writings, and of the development of concepts in ancient Christianity and the construction of its dogmatics. A special form is the teaching of primordial or Original Sin.

Original Sin

2. In the writings and theological concepts of the Hebrew Bible, the story of the lost paradise in Gen 3 plays no particularly significant role for the question of sin and its origin. Only in the period of time between the first century BCE and the first century CE does a religious literature form concerning the first human being—who, in the figure of Adam, becomes the theme of the origin and consequence of sin in its meaning for the conceptualization of the whole of humanity as corrupted by sin.

In this context, and in that of the emanations of the religious speculation of his time where Adam is concerned, stands Paul. Paul fixes Adam's role within the innermost core of Christian teaching on sin and salvation. Paul seeks to expound, for young Christianity, the meaning of Christ through an analogy, and antithesis, between the old Adam, and the second, new Adam, Christ. With the interpretational pattern conceived by Paul of the Adam-Christ typology, as in Rom 5, the role and meaning of Adam for the development and future elaboration of the Christian dogmatic mythology of sin is inscribed for history.

→ Augustine toughens the Pauline image of Adam, the first human being, in his self-assured exegesis of Paul on the concept, and fashions the concept of Original Sin. Adam is at once an individual person and a collective one, inasmuch as the whole of humanity, on the basis of Adam's disobedience, is gathered up in one single 'mass of sin' (massa perditionis), and stands before God in guilt. Now Adam's fall, caused by the combination of pride (superbia) and self-love (amor sui), is connected with the condition of subsequent humanity, produced by the construction of a sexual biological mechanism of transmission. The effect of the first sin consists in the awakening of the sexual appetite (concupiscentia), and the revolt of the flesh against the order of God. It is the body then, conceived in the lust of the flesh, which becomes the vehicle of sin for Augustine. Sin engenders sin. From the moment that the Augustinian doctrine of Original Sin shifts into the center of Western Christian dogmatics, sexuality becomes the medium of sin par excellence. If one wishes to know what sin is, one must observe sexuality. According to Augustine, superbia and concupiscentia are the central sins of every human being, without exception. Lust and original sin are manifested and reflected in each other indissolubly (→ Sexuality). For the inner religious dimension of Christianity's cultural history, it is crucial that 'the forgiveness of sins' be realized in the sacramental rites (especially those of baptism and confession) and/or in the responsiveness of faith (sola fide).

3. Throughout modernity, Western discourse upon freedom and evil, guilt and fate, power and helplessness, the craving and subjectivity of the self, transgression, perversion and corruption, sickness and health, or salvation, has been programmed by way of the Christian dogmatic concept of sin. These discourses, networked through the doctrine of sin, like the phenomenology of (mortal) sin that takes its orientation in the psychology of morality, enjoy cultural success and dominant influence.

In the trivial moralisms of the Western world, the patterns of interpretation of the concept-symbol of sin, previously grasped in religious fashion, live on in their own fashion (→ Secularization).

Literature

Gross, J., Geschichte des Erbsündendogmas, 4 vols., Munich 1960–1972; Reid, J. S., "Sin," in: Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics 11 (1920), 528-570; Rigby, Paul, Original Sin in Augustine's Confessions, Ottawa 1987; Thomson, Oliver, A History of Sin, Edinburgh 1993; Wiley, Tatha, Original Sin: Origins, Developments, Contemporary Meanings, New York 2002.

→ Body, Conscience, Devil, Eroticism, Ethics/Morals, Guilt, Sexuality, Will (Free)

Joachim von Soosten

Singing / Song

Concept

1. Singing is a form of → communication belonging to many highly developed species, including the human being. Extending the concept somewhat, and thus including melodic articulations such as crying out, cheering, a soothing murmur, and the like, it seems altogether plausible that the more abstractly codifying communication of → language has arisen precisely from these 'song' forms. While language must be passed on culturally, the voice ranks as the immediate—non-arbitrary if possible—expression of a person's physical and psychic disposition. It is a multidimensional, differentiated instrument, conveying information and feelings through pitch, color (overtones, undertones), volume, and so on. Its timbre is channeled in singing, in which its aesthetics and meaning are culturally conditioned and learned.

2. Singing is an important phenomenon in all cultures. Many persons judge that singing can produce a communication in intimate areas, scarcely comprehensible through language, in sensory fashion. (After all, the content of language is more frankly cognitive and intellectual.) Included in these areas are religious moods and dispositions. By means of religious powers or elements, singing serves communication, and the 'information' of the members of a religious community. Singing is summons, prayer, blessing, veneration, and offering or sacrifice. In addition, singing is sometimes ascribed the meaningful and important capacity to articulate parts of a given religious reality, to share it with others, to bring oneself in harmony or connection with that reality, indeed, to create or generate it in a magical sense. The power of singing or sound (and this especially in many oral cultures, with their appraisal of the value of the word or the name) stands at the center of many processes of such creation or transformation when reported in myths, or ritually produced. It can embody knowledge, spirit, power, life, order, beauty, and cosmic harmony. It can offer protection, and can heal. With the Pygmies of the Central African rainforest, for example, singing stands at the center of their practice of religion. In singing, they stand in permanent contact with the personified rainforest and its powers. The forest is awakened, summoned, lured—and opened when it closes by reason of evil conduct. Many North American Indians regard the medicine songs, received from their protective spirits in visions, as their most precious possession (→ North America [Traditional Religions]). Many religions ascribe certain meanings even to vibrations, as also to vocally interesting overtones and undertones in their singing, as practiced, for instance, in Central Asia (→ Shamanism), or in modern → New Age music.

3. Religions that do not posit a crisp dichotomy between the spheres of the sacred and the profane, frequently ascribe an intrinsic effect to music,

Qawwali is a popular musical style in Islamic Sufi-currents on the Indian subcontinent. A standard ensemble consists of one or more soloists, a line of choral singers (who also clap), tambourines, and concertina-like instruments. The rousing antiphonal songs, with virtuosic improvisations, can rise all the way to ecstasy, but are outwardly almost expressionlessly presented and heard. They are a service to inward surrender, the personal quest for God, and group communication. Texts from the classic Sufi poets are sung (→ Sufism), as well as spontaneous portrayals of a personal experience of God. These (like the sometimes excessive lifestyle of the musicians) can take on forms rejected by orthodoxy as heretical. In Pakistan, great Qawwali singers are superstars, who are reverenced by their followers as saints. Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan even made the leap to international cult-star, and made Qawwali known in the West. The picture shows the regular Thursday Qawwali session in the shrine of the Sufi saint from Farid, Ganj-i Shakar, in Pakpattan, Pakistan.

as if it were altogether obvious that they should do so. Furthermore, hymns connect singing with → language. Their texts are part of oral or written tradition, and can convey an explicit message. Many world religions, which are less interested in music as an art form, than as a medium for a linguistic, cognitive, 'spiritual' message, take a rather ambivalent position vis-à-vis its sensory or aesthetic qualities.

The Christian churches demonize singing far less often than they do → dance or musical instruments. Singing also connects well with intellectualization and mission. Its potential for proclaiming the faith was used by Luther, for example. The Reformation, and hymns in the form of intellectualizing, didactic and confessional song, promoted each other. Singing lends ideal content and value conceptualizations a sensible presence, renders present the unseizable transcendent, guides → feelings and expresses them, effects the materialization of community, and mobilizes masses. It enjoys the advantage over instrumental music that all of the faithful, without training or educational background, can have an active share in it. In 1524, Luther's first hymnal appeared: the Achtliederbuch (Ger., "Book of Eight Songs"), followed over the course of the century by various regional

At the services of an Afro-American congregation in Savannah, Georgia (here photographed in 1996), gospel music stands front and center. One by one, Father Green invites members to step up front and present their songs and dances, in this thoroughly musical service. Gospel, as one of the most important forms of Afro-American music, has its roots in the 'spirituals'—sacred songs of European Americans that were adopted and transformed by the black slaves in the wake of their Christianization. The 'spirituals' retained formal and harmonic structures of the European popular and church music: to this was added Afro-American elements in melodic ductus ('blue notes,' the neutral playing or singing of the third and the seventh) and rhythm ('off-beat,' hymnals. Subsequently, the confrontation over the 'correct' hymnal all but made the battleground for the struggle over Christian views of faith.

In many oral cultures, singing is understood only as a different, more elevated type of speech. The singing voice, however, purposes more dynamics, tone embrace, capacity for modulation, and range, than does the speaking voice, whose physiology is basically different. The mixed mode—'recitative,' speech with the singing voice, and in singing form—connects the opportunities for a good textual understanding with those of the range and aesthetics of singing. In Hindu and Buddhist rituals, such recitations acquire key importance. In the European Middle Ages, recitative was generally used in Gregorian chorales and the mystery plays, although, to be sure, it was then understood as a particular kind of speech, while we today perceive it as singing.

4. Only with the Renaissance was music discovered as an emotional language for subjective expression, and spiritual art-music developed, which with Palestrina was still mainly choral music, and the hymn sung by the congregation. Next, theological schemata presented song as a symbol of the transcendent, and as human reflex. In the practical exercise of religion, however, the functional incorporation of song into the framework of the liturgy, as an enhanced form of common adoration, takes precedence. Singing in the congregation, the church choir, the Gospel group, or even new religious movements, founds community, guides feelings, and conveys messages. But it is precisely in esoteric and → New Age milieus that singing can also become an art form, or theology-in-sound in itself, as, for example, J.-E. Berendt's popular Nada Brahma make evident.

5. In many ways, pop culture plays with religious forms and feelings. Singers especially take up religious elements as cultic thematizers of the stage- or media event, and shape from them, consciously or ironically, a kind of musical → civil religion.

Literature

Berendt, Joachim-Ernst, The World Is Sound: Nada Brahma. Music and the Landscape of Consciousness, Rochester 1991; Box, Reginald, Make Music to Our God: How We Sing the Psalms, London 1996; Calame, Claude, Choruses of Young Women in Ancient Greece: Their Morphology, Religious Role, and Social Functions, rev. ed., Lanham 2001; Grossman, Maxine L., "Jesus, Mama, and the Constraints of Salvific Love in Contemporary Country Music," in: Journal of the American Academy of Religion 70,1 (2002), 83-115; Joncas, Jan Michael, From Sacred Song to Ritual Music: Twentieth-Century Understandings of Roman Catholic Worship Music, Collegeville 1997; Pinn, Anthony B. (ed.), Noise and Spirit: The Religious and Spiritual Sensibilities of Rap Music, New York 2003; Reagon, Bernice Johnson, If You Don't Go, Don't Hinder Me: The African American Sacred Song Tradition, Lincoln 2001; Reck, David, Music of the Whole Earth, New York 1977; Sullivan, Lawrence E. (ed.), Enchanting Powers: Music in the World's Religions, Cambridge 1997; Turner, Steve, Amazing Grace: The Story of America's Most Beloved Song, New York 2002.

→ Communication, Dance, Language, Music, Oral Tradition, Perception, Ritual

Dietmar Neitzke

along with clapping for rhythmic accentuation). The exchange between soloist and choir is tense, rich, and typical of Afro-American folk music. A question-and-answer pattern occurs in the preaching, as well, when the congregation, with responding cries, confirms and extends what the preacher says. In the musical history of the twentieth century, Afro-American church music (gospel) and 'secular music' (jazz and blues) have exercised a mutual influence. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Sinti / Roma

1. The Sinti and Roma were originally part of the population of India. In the time following the Sassanid conquests, they emigrated to the West from the region of the upper valley of the Indus. Some migrated to the northern coast of Africa, and to Europe, as far as Spain and Portugal. Others crossed the Black Sea region, and settled, for a considerable time, in Greece. From there, around 1300, they moved in family bands to Central Europe, and as far as Russia and Scandinavia. Byzantines and Europeans, ignorant of the immigrants' Indian origin, inserted them into their Christian image of the world as pilgrims, or penitents. Pope Martin V (1417–1431) issued them appropriate letters of protection and safe conduct. The land of their origin was thought to be Egypt, or Little Egypt (a region in Greece); so they were called 'kings from Egypt' (cf. 'gypsies'). The etymology of their designation 'Athinganoi,' (in Lat., Adsingani), from which later evolved the word Zigeuner (Ger., Dutch; in French, tsigan), usually translated 'gypsy,' refers to the fact that, in Greece, on account of their complicated, Indian-like prescriptions of purity (see below, § 3), they were called 'untouchables,' and were connected in the European mind with the gnostic sect of the Simonians. Sinti and Roma brought new cultural elements to Europe: Flamenco, Tarot, and storytelling contests. The original 'gypsy tarot' still betrays an Indian iconography.

Christian respect died away. The history of the Sinti and Roma in Europe is one of persecution. At the Imperial Diet of 1489, on grounds of suspicion of espionage for the Turks, the Sinti and Roma were expelled from the German Empire. Under Enlightenment absolutism, the policy of compelled assimilation began: Frederick the Great and Empress Maria Theresia issued decrees under which the Roma could be compelled to settle, children could be taken from their parents and placed in foster families. An attempt was made to prohibit marriage among Roma, a practice that remained partly in force in Switzerland until 1973.

The National Socialist Persecution

This undertaking, launched for reason of the concerns of an absolutist state, did not, however, reach the proportions of the German National Socialist persecution of 1933–1945. In France, Poland, Italy, Romania, Russia, and Germany, Sinti and Roma were interned in concentration camps, by authority of the racist legislation dictated by the 'Nuremberg laws,'[1] by men of the SS and SD, supported by the work of academic 'race scholars.' From the concentration camps, Sinti and Roma were transported to the death camps of Auschwitz-Birkenau (where the Germans had built a separate 'Gypsy family-camp') and subsequently murdered. The so-called 'extermination through work' was an objective of the persecution, as well. During the National Socialist rule approximately 500,000 Sinti and Roma were killed.

2. In Europe today there are some eight million Sinti and Roma, in Germany 100,000.[2] Organized in national unions, they strive for recognition as an ethnic minority, and as citizens with equal rights under reference to the UN Charter. Most Sinti and Roma today have a stable residence. The common language is Rómanes, which is most closely akin to Hindi, and can be traced back to the ancient Indian Sanskrit: the name 'Sinti,' for example, has been traced etymologically to the Sanskrit Sindhu, 'Indus' (or Saindhava, 'Dweller on the Indus'). Roma, the plural of u rom ('Rómanes,' 'person belonging to the people of the Roma [pl.]'), is a designation possibly connected with the adjective Romaka, in the Mahabharata. Its more exact meaning, however, is unknown. The Sinti and Roma no longer officially accept the foreign designation 'gypsy,' on account of its derogatory connotation. But there are a large number of designations for individual ethnic groups, distinct regionally, as in their traditions, language groups, and ethnic bonds: Sinti live preponderantly in German-speaking countries, the Benelux states, and Northern Italy; Manush in France; Roma in Eastern Europe and in the Balkans; Kale in Southern France and in Spain; Ciganos in Portugal; Romanischals in Great Britain. An especially frequently described sub-group of the Roma are the Romanian Kalderash (Romanian, caldare, 'copper kettle').

The Religion of the Sinti and Roma

3. Just as in the societal area, the Sinti and Roma have a 'multi-class identity' (K. Reemtsma) in that of the religious as well. They usually belong to the religion of the majority, but with indigenous religious conceptions and beliefs. Most Sinti, for example, belong to the Roman Catholic Church. The next most important confession is the Evangelical Church, especially the Pentecostal movement, an Evangelical faith-orientation. In Muslim regions, the Roma belong to Islam.

Faith Practice

Social life, in function of each ethnic group, centers on the (extended) family or the kinship group (clan). Faith practice is therefore determined by its common value-oriented behavior, as well as by the festivals and rituals of the → life cycle, and (especially among Catholics) by collective pilgrimages.

Prescriptions of Purity

Among the norms of the Sinti and Roma are a series of prescriptions and restrictions with regard to purity (→ Taboo; Purity), which control a great number of social relations. These differ from 'tribe' to 'tribe' (e.g., especially among the Romanian Kalderash), but can possibly be traced all the way back to concepts from Indian religion. With regard to the content of the question, who or what is 'pure' or 'unclean,' as well as with regard to other commands and prohibitions, the counsel of the oldest men is determinative. Transgression against the rules effects 'impurity.' Woman's intimate sphere is especially protected. To be sure, the destruction of a large number of social structures in the National Socialist persecution, as well as adaptation to today's fashion, have caused some things to change, for example clothing conventions.

Rites of the Life Cycle

Birth, marriage, and burial are great festivals for the Sinti. Social life in common is seen as an important component of culture. Thus, they prefer to keep the elderly within the circle of the family, rather than place them in nursing homes. Funerals (pampanas) last several days. Women and men loudly wail at the death of their loved ones. After the funeral, a banquet is held.

Pilgrimages and Marian Piety

Many Christian usages maintained in Sinti villages were lost, however, because of the National Socialist persecution. The Marian piety of the Sinti is remarkable (→ Mary; see illus.). Pilgrimages are traditional, undertaken or led by the Sinti, with flower-adorned crosses and statues of Mary. A pilgrimage destination especially dear to the Sinti is Lourdes. Since the nineteenth century, the custom has been cultivated of meeting once a year, May 23–26, at Sainte Marie de la Mer, in Provençe, to honor Saint Sara, Egyptian servant of Mary Salome, and other legendary Marian figures.

Content of Belief

Conceptualizations of faith are not committed to writing, but are transmitted orally in myths and folk tales. Images and narratives may serve as documentation of the content of belief. Parents and the elderly recount stories to the children, as parables of particular principles of human life. In many groups, belief in spirits of the dead (mulo) is of importance.

Between Attempts at Integration and Social Exclusion

The attitude of the great Christian churches toward Sinti and Roma is ambivalent even today, and often powerfully influenced by social prejudices. On the Catholic side, a 'gypsy and nomad ministry' to the Sinti is performed in Cologne. Of course, there are constant tensions, owing to discriminatory pronouncements. At the German Evangelical Church Convention, the Central Council of the Sinti and Roma was represented from 1979 to 1991. Even at divine service, the status of 'exotics' has not yet been revised to 'normal.' The behavior of clergy and parishioners often deters Sinti from attendance at Mass. Polls revealed that Sinti were stared at 'as if they had escaped from the zoo,' and that their exclusion was effected in the most varied of manners.[3]

Reception and Stereotypes

Hostile Images vs. Information

4. Where observers of Sinti and Roma have known nothing of their culture, they have often sought to fill these gaps with the construction of stereotypes, and hostile images, that have not corresponded with reality. The image alternates between romanticizing desires that look for license, autonomy, and female eroticism, and social derogation as thieves and beggars. Until very recently, (quasi-) religious perceptions on the part of conventional religion were limited to those of 'gypsy fortune-tellers,' with crystal balls, tarot cards,

A Sintiza places a lamp before a statue of Mary. Various locations in which Mary is venerated, especially Lourdes, are favorite pilgrimage places of the Sinti and Roma. The relation of these people to the Catholic Church, however, has been criticized, and they have been discriminated against by the 'nomad ministry' particularly for their Marian devotion.

and palmistry. By way of a circulus vitiosus, the piety of the Sinti was criticized, while a lack of interest in religion was also alleged. These accusations can only be described as attempts to upwardly evaluate the accuser's own identity at other persons' cost, a phenomenon repeatedly encountered in history: the 'scapegoat motif.' Here a collection of traditional stereotypes is appealed to, rather similar to those applied vis-à-vis the Jews. On the basis of Christian legends like one of the refusal to lodge the Holy Family in Egypt, or of the production of the manufacture of the nails of the crucifixion—a pseudo-biblical scenario in which a kind of legendary 'original guilt' notion occurred—the incriminations began to allege a collective sinfulness. It also began to be a matter of pre-modern, inquisitorial varieties of the battle against superstition (according to Himmler's decree of November 20, 1939, women under 'suspicion of fortune-telling' were deported to concentration camps); or of the hostile images of social myths, as that of 'restiveness,' and abduction of children. Finally, the 'scientific findings' of modern racial ideologies ensued ('racially conditioned' criminality, categorization as 'pathologically asocial'). Here the frequently interwoven → hostile images of → anti-Semitism and 'anti-gypsy-ism' reinforced each other. Even today, scientific investigation of the religion of the Sinti and Roma, which ought to be able to provide an objective picture, is yet to be developed: it is still burdened with the bigotries of the past, nor is it yet free of ethno-romanticism.

Still, through the attempt to be accepted as fellow human beings and citizens, without having to be utterly adapted to the majority, the Sinti have supported Western society in a learning process. It is ever more vigorously accepted that equality need not be accompanied by identity, and that what remains strange to the observer need not at once be classified as negative or dangerous. Granted, another backlash like that of the post-1990 discrimination against the Roma cannot be ruled out.

1. Cf. Circular Decree of the "Reichs- und Preußischer Minister des Innern, über das Verbot von Rassenmischehen" (Ger., Decree of the "Reich and Prussian Minister of the Interior on the Prohibition of Interracial Marriages") of November 26, 1935.
2. Sources: Declarations of Delegates to the Convention of European Council / OSCE / Office for Democratic Institutions, 1994, held at Rome; Legeois, Jean Pierre, Gypsies and Travellers, Paris 1994, 16.
3. Cf. Seidler, Gerhard, Die christliche Gemeinde und die Angst vor Fremden. Aufgewiesen am Beispiel der Sinti und Roma, Frankfurt/M. 1989.

Literature

Achim, Viorel, The Roma in Romanian History, Budapest 2004 (Rom. [1]1998); Barany, Zoltan, The East European Gypsies: Regime Change, Marginality, and Ethnopolitics, Cambridge 2002; Belton, Brian A., Gypsy and Traveller Ethnicity: The Social Generation of an Ethnic Phenomenon, London 2005; Charnon-Deutsch, Lou, The Spanish Gypsy: The History of a European Obsession, University Park 2004; Guy, Will (ed.), Between Past and Future: The Roma of Central and Eastern Europe, Hatfield 2001; Kenrick, Donald, Gypsies: From the Ganges to the Thames, Hatfield 2004 ([1]1993); Kenrick, Donald/Clark, Colin, Moving On: The Gypsies and Travellers of Britain, Hatfield 1999; Malvinni, David, The Gypsy Caravan: From Real Roma to Imaginary Gypsies in Western Music and Film, New York 2004; Margalit, Gilad, Germany and Its Gypsies: A Post-Auschwitz Ordeal, Madison 2002; Mayall, David, Gypsy Identities, 1500–2000: From Egypcyans and Moon-Men to the Ethnic Romany, London 2004; State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau (ed.), Memorial Book: The Gypsies at Auschwitz-Birkenau, 2 vols., Munich 1993; Tebbutt, Susan (ed.), Sinti and Roma: Gypsies in German-Speaking Society and Literature, New York 1998; van der Stoel, Max, Report on the Situation of Roma and Sinti in the OSCE Area, The Hague 2000; Williams, Patrick, Gypsy World: The Silence of the Living and the Voices of the Dead, Chicago 2003.

Journal: Journal of Gypsy Lore (founded 1988, gathers fairytales and oral traditions in Rómanes, with English translations).

→ Collective Representations, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Hinduism, Indian Subcontinent, Minorities, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Purity

Esther Kraus

Social Myths and Fantasy Images

The Rumor of Orleans

1. On May 10, 1969, in the lovely French city of Orleans, a shop for women's clothing opened. Its name was provocative: Aux Oubliettes—Fr., "In the Dungeons." The management had thought up something quite special that was certainly expected to stimulate attention: the changing cubicles were outfitted after the fashion of a medieval dungeon. This idea did not remain without consequence. A scant month later, a number of shops and city-centers began to display the motto: "Don't buy from Jews. They traffic in girls." What had happened? Beginning in Catholic girls' schools, the rumor had spread, first among companions, then with parents and teachers as well, that in the changing booths young women were stunned with injections, abducted, and, at night, by means of, for example, submarines, shipped to oriental bordellos. It took two weeks for civil authorities and the local bishop to bring the situation under control.

The occurrence is so instructive because it unveils the unconscious and pre-conscious dynamics of social acts, and like a lightening bolt—the steering these dynamics by a repertory of collective models and violent images, and their interweaving and establishment by way of narrative. The point of departure for the scenario is a violent historical image that—not only for teenagers—conjures up the torture chambers of the Inquisitors and the witch-hunters. Thereafter, the thought is observable in its manufacture: in 'compelling' conclusion, the horrible medieval panorama is coupled, associatively, with two other tales: first, that of the oriental harem (→ Orientalism/Exotism), and second, anti-Jewish myths of child-abduction and ritual murder—as well as that of the 'Jewish businessmen' (→ Anti-Semitism). The medium is everyday conversation, gossip, and chatter, on the sidewalk, in the school, in the office, with negative facets. The collective 'spirit of the people,' mixed with residual stories of all kinds, 'mini-yarns' or anecdotes (H.-J. Neubauer), stereotypes, hostile images, bigotries, stirs up a scenario, a 'wild rumor,' whose 'fable-spinning poesie' (Morin: poésie fabuleuse) 'mythically doubles' (Neubauer) the reality and its protagonists. Now the process culminates in a fictive role-stereotype of one's neighbors or acquaintances: 'the Jew,' or 'the → witches' (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes).

Social Myths

2. If one considers the → collective representations, the thought processes, and the feelings of a community, these divide primarily into three forms of phenomena: stereotypes, fantasies and models, as well as narratives (collective and socio-mythic). Stereotypes, as the smallest units, are found in both other forms.

Imaginaires—Models and Fantasy-Images

a) Collective conceptual images, as to how society, world, sky, and earth, look, or could have looked, are found since antiquity: the 'Golden Age,' or, in the Middle Ages, the image of a class state divided into warriors, farmers, and priests. In both examples, the scintillating quality of this sort of picture can be easily shown. It is a matter of collectively obligatory and effective discoveries of images—of social fantasies, therefore—that have taken on ideological functions for the legitimization of government, and in societal sketches prevailing into the modern age. At the same time, they possess a fantasy-generating potential that has found its reflection in art and literature, and popular printed graphics, as well as in sermons and in philosophical treatises. It is especially in the French research into social history conducted by the École des Annales (Fr., "School of Annales"), that the first approaches of a 'social history of the imaginaires [fantasy images]' has been worked out, to include dreams as well as literary production, iconography, and emblematics (→ Emblem)—the 'symbolical structures' (G. Duby) of society across the board.

The 'Great Stories'

b) Every society has its 'great stories.' For the ancient Greeks, these were the Trojan War and Odysseus's wanderings, in the version of Homer. The ancient Israelites, and the Jews of today, enjoy the stories of Abraham, Joseph, and Esther. The life and death of Jesus is the original Christian story; the late Middle Ages, and modernity, attached Dante's journey to hell and heaven, the tragic inventiveness of Don Quixote, researcher Faust, or the narrative of the Happy Isles (→ Utopia). Stories of a thousand-year reign of peace have been influential (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm). There are stories that nearly everyone in a given religion or culture knows 'somehow,' 'from somewhere,' that circulate in fragments, variations, and quotations, and are re-told, in ever new versions, without losing their arrangement and contours; that are read between the cover of a book, just as they are seen and heard in the theater or in films. They are distinguished from the 'normal' stories and myths by their social spectrum, and longue durée (Fr., 'long duration') through the centuries. They can be designated as 'macro-myths,' or 'grand narratives,' then. Religious myths (narratives of the gods, etc.), accordingly, are frequently special cases of social myths.

Structures of the Unconscious

To what extent are collective myths and imaginaires components of the social unconscious?

a) They possess structures of longue durée, distinguish themselves by their durability, and continue to find communicative confirmation.

b) They function as mythic metaphors in historical reality, as powerful historical images, and stories à clée (with a hint buried relatively early within them for the solution of a mystery being presented), that busy the collective fantasy and direct it to 'targets.'

c) They convey life sketches, exemplars, and life goals, but also idologemes, and fragments of a → civil religion whose theology is political.

d) As with many → fairytales, they identify the 'polyphony of process': even government needs the endorsement of the public, and thus needs the extension of the myth or other commanding image through further narrative or sketching. There arises a mesh of myths and anti-myths, of narrative fragments ('splinters'; Neubauer 1998) and mini-yarns, from which group members can withdraw only with difficulty.

e) Social myths and imaginaires carry 'implicit knowledge' (Michael Polanyi), antecedent understandings, that, as long as they are stored in the cultural memory, are always latently at hand, and are thus ever open to summons ('latency of collective knowledge': Neubauer).

The Hidden Dynamics of Religion

In correlating religion to the material of these considerations, a good part of the religious dynamism of such 'concealed' rules of interpretation could appear: explanation of the world (→ Myth/Mythology), the engendering of 'mythical doubles' (Neubauer), witches, and stigmatizing runs not only openly by way of laws and dogmas, but also covertly, by way of the 'informal stock of signs,' narratives, and images. These hidden signifiers lead out into the broad field of religious mentalities.

Literature

Cohn, Norman, The Pursuit of the Millennium: Revolutionary Millenarians and Mystical Anarchists of the Middle Ages, London [2]1970 ([1]1957); Duby, Georges, The Three Orders: Feudal Society Imagined, Chicago 1980 (French [1]1978); Le Goff, Jacques, The Medieval Imagination, Chicago 1988 (French [1]1985); Neubauer, Hans-Joachim, The Rumour: A Cultural History, London/New York 1999 (Ger. [1]1998); Patlagean, Evelyne, "L'histoire de l'imaginaire," in: Le Goff, Jacques et al. (eds.), La nouvelle histoire, Paris 1978, 249-269.

→ Collective Representations, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Hubert Mohr

Socialism I: Christian

1. Socialism, as a social and political movement, and as it developed in the nineteenth century, was nurtured by diverse sources, religious one among them. In the first half of the nineteenth century, social critics emerged who connected religious consciousness with the demand for a renewal of society. Claude Henri de Saint-Simon (1760–1825) represented (Le Nouveau Christianisme, Fr., "The New Christianity"; 1825) a humanization of entrepreneur-led industrialism. Wilhelm Weitling (1808–1871) aimed at a social equality, on the basis of Jesus's teaching, that would climax in the abolition of private ownership, inheritance, money, and punishment (Das Evangelium eines armen Sünders, Ger., "The Gospel of a Poor Sinner"; 1845). Among the diverse conceptions of socialism, the Marxist variant (Karl Marx, 1818–1883) emerged as the apparently dominant one in Germany (→ Marxism). Middle-class propaganda began with the cliché of 'social democrats against religion.'

With Christoph Blumhardt (1842–1919), a prophetic personality, a member of the Württemberg awakening-Christianity, oppressed workers had a socialist option; Blumhardt entered the Württemberg Land Chamber as a deputy of the Socialist Democratic Party (SPD). In his widely noticed Sie müssen! (Ger., "They/You Must!"), Zurich Pastor Hermann Kutter (1863–1931) announced that the Social Democrats had actually appeared in the environment as an instrument of God, for the 'shaking and waking' of a failing Christian society. The religio-social movement that spread in Switzerland had its leading figure in Leonhard Ragaz (1865–1945), whose abiding friendship bound him to Jewish Martin Buber (1878–1963). For Ragaz, 'religious socialism' found its leading model in an idealized Israel. In such a perspective, the Israeli kibbutzim could stand as an exemplary realization of religious socialism (→ Zionism).

2. After 1918, Germany saw a multiplicity of group formations, whose ideological variegation can nevertheless be categorized, rather vaguely, under the concept of 'religious socialism.' A belligerent nature such as that of Mannheim Pastor Erwin Eckert (1893–1972) was needed to create, in the Union of Religious Socialists of Germany, a politically effective 'battle organization.' The ecclesio-political intent to wrest the Church from the middle class, so that it could serve the interests of the proletariat, was achieved only to a modest point (if at all). Marburg social ethicist Georg Wünsch (1887–1964) may be regarded as the movement's normative theoretician.

In the intellectual milieu of the time of the Weimar republic, the Berlin circle around Paul Tillich (1886–1965), Carl Mennicke (1887–1959), and Eduard Heimann (1889–1967), had Tillich for its 'head,' and Mennicke (an important social psychologist and social pedagogue) as the 'heart' of the circle. Heimann developed an important 'social theory of capitalism,' that contains concrete approaches to a social policy and politics of reform.

The spectrum of religious socialism may be reduced to the three positions of Wünsch, Paul Tillich, and—at the end of the twentieth century—Dorothee Sölle. Wünsch, in his Evangelische Wirtschaftsethik (Ger., "Evangelical Economic Ethics"; 1927) derives a political decision for socialism from factual necessities, but at the same time sees in socialism a "re-producing of the meaning of God's creation, whose meaning is love." Tillich develops a theory of time, understood as an existential situation of alienation. In the proletarian revolution, there dawns, instead, a 'theonomy' ('rule of the divine law')—an event that Tillich linked with the Greek concept of kairós, in the sense of 'fulfilled time.' Sölle writes her Mystik und Widerstand (Ger., "Mysticism and Resistance"; 1997) after the collapse of real socialism in the Eastern bloc and in Nicaragua. Like Erich Fromm (who expounds Marx humanistically), she opposes to capitalistic 'Hab-sucht' ('lust/addiction to "have"') the mystical ideal of 'Ledigwerden' ('becoming unencumbered'), in which the question, already arisen in the religio-socialist "Heppenheimer Conference" of 1928, of a 'socialistic shaping of one's life' in the renunciation of the 'have-mentality,' shifted front and center.

3. A new eruption occurred (for many, partly spurred on by the Vietnam War being waged by the United States) in solidarism with the poor in the 'Third World.' Base communities in Latin America had developed a → 'liberation theology' that adopted Marxist tenets. The revolutionary meaning of the Bible's prophetical proclamation was rediscovered—partly in conscious linkage with Blumhardt and Ragaz—by Christians for Socialism, as well as by a new generation in the old "Union of Religious Socialists."

4. The sum-total of the religio-socialist heritage can be contoured in four 'socialisms': a prophetical one (Blumhardt, Kutter), a doctrinaire (Eckart, and, to an extent, Ragaz), a rigoristic (the "Brotherly Courts" around Eberhard Arnold, 1883–1935; Eckert in the transition to the German Communist Party), and a biophilic. The biophilic type is represented by E. Fromm and D. Sölle, and has influenced parts of the ecology movement (→ Environmentalism). In its global comprehension and extension, biophilia, whose impetus is in the direction of new social shapes and forms, runs against every kind of situation of oppression: especially, the economic exploitation of the 'Third' and the 'Fourth' Worlds, woman's oppression, and the desecration of nature. It is not to be doubted that the battle against social injustice, as the legacy of the prophets of Israel and the 'church of the poor' will retain its currency and urgency.

Literature

Barnes, Kenneth C., Nazism, Liberalism, and Christianity: Protestant Social Thought in Germany and Great Britain, 1925–1937, Lexington 1991; Cort, John C., Christian Socialism: An Informal History, Maryknoll 1988; Deresch, Wolfgang (ed.), Der Glaube der religiösen Sozialisten, Hamburg 1972; Heimann, Siegfried/Walter, Franz, Religiöse Sozialisten und Freidenker in der Weimarer Republik, Bonn 1993; Norman, Edward, The Victorian Christian Socialists, Cambridge 1987; Pfeifer, Arnold (ed.), Religiöse Sozialisten, Olten 1976.

→ Capitalism, Charitable Organizations, Industrial Society, Liberation Theology, Marxism, Socialism II

Arnold Pfeiffer

Socialism II: Islamic

History

1. Intellectuals of the Islamic Middle East came in contact with socialist thought at the close of the nineteenth century, while studying in France and England. Beginning in 1908, and influenced by French models and anti-imperialist convictions, socialist notions stamped the Turkish National Movement under Ziya Gökalp. The first socialist party in Turkey was founded in 1910, shortly after the Young Turks' Revolution of 1908, but dissolved three months later. In 1912 it formed anew, for one year. The term ishtirāk-e emwāl ('redistribution of wealth') at a time when neologisms reflected the new socio-cultural, economic, and political ideas adopted from Western Europe, became the basis of the term ishtirākči ('[a] socialist') and ishtirāki ('socialistic'). Soon, however, the terms sosyalist ('[a] socialist') and sosyalism ('socialism') came into use in Turkish and Persian.

Arabic Countries and Socialistic Movements

In 1912, Copt Salama Musa published the first book in Arabic with the title al-Ishtirākiyya ("The Socialism"). It gave information about Fabian socialism, of British coinage. Egyptian reformer Shiblī Shumayyil, of Syrian Christian origin, and Ismā'īl Maẓhar carried on debates in their writings in the 1920s, on socialist ideas with an eye to reforms that would effect more social justice and state welfare. In Alexandria, surely in consequence of the Russian October Revolution of 1917, a socialist party was founded in 1920, and a communist party in 1921. Influences of → National Socialism, as well as of Fascism of German and Italian coinage, appeared in Egypt, as well as in Iraq (Rashīd 'Alī al-Kīlānī) in 1941, partly conditioned by opposition to British colonial policy. After national independence, in the 1950s, regimes came to power in several Arab countries propagating socialist theory, usually depending on a unity party, and retaining Islam as the state religion. This occurred in Egypt under Nasser, in Syria and Iraq with the support of the Baath parties (ba'ṯ, 'national reawakening')—which, however, would soon fall victim to internal strife—in Tunisia under Bourguiba, and in Libya in 1969 under Ghaddafi.

Fundamental Ideas

2. In contrast with socialism of a Marxist stamp, which strives for internationalism and rigorous atheism, Islamic socialism carries nationalistic traits, and appeals to the → Qur'an, and to the commandments there formulated for right action (e.g., sura 5:8). It appeals especially to the 'poor tax' (zakāt) as one of the five 'pillars of Islam'— as the responsibility of every Muslim. These emphases did lead to agrarian and industrial reforms, for example in Egypt in the 1950s, that were bound up with the privatization of large landholdings and large industry, but did not, principally—unlike → Marxism—demand the dismantling of private ownership of means of production. Rather, representatives of Islamic socialism have always appealed to the social conscience premised by Islam, and the social responsibility of the well-to-do. They frequently cite the Ḥadīth, the second-most important source of Islamic law and the Muslim's conduct: the Prophet Muhammad has enjoined solidarity of community on every Muslim. "Every one of you is a guardian (defender), and each of you is responsible": that is, especially, the well-off are responsible for the poor.

Effectiveness in Social and Political Reality

3. Taking one's point of departure in the economic situation of a less developed industry—therefore, of a numerically weak industrial proletariat—representatives of an Islamic socialism see their social basis as stronger among the rural proletariat than in the working class. They generally seek a class harmony, as God-given human kinship, and not class struggle (as Marxism). The leaders of Islamic socialism, in their various molds, have always been intellectuals. In the Eastern-bloc countries, as well as among Near Eastern Communists, their independence vis-à-vis Marxism occasioned their reputation as inconsistent, 'petit bourgeois' socialists. This indictment did not, however, prevent good foreign and economic relations between Eastern-bloc countries and countries, even parties, of the Middle East, that have striven for an Islamic socialism. For diplomatic reasons, Eastern-bloc governments silently tolerated a persecution of Communists, for example in Nasser's Egypt, or Baathist Iraq, or Baathist Syria. In Eastern-bloc countries, communist immigrants received asylum, but had to postpone their party activities. For example, Iraqi Communists in the German Democratic Republic held their party conferences in West Berlin.

Current Developments

Since the collapse of the Eastern bloc, Middle Eastern socialists of a more frankly secular orientation have begun to rethink their positions. These reflections have taken various directions. Even the representatives of different currents of Islamic → fundamentalism—beginning with the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt after 1928, and Syria since 1935, then with Lebanon and Palestine, later, and into the present, with Afghanistan, today the FIS (Front Islamique du Salut, Fr. "Islamic Salvation Front") in Algeria, and the fundamentalist Shia clergy in Iran since 1979—all of these are turning mainly to the economically and socially frustrated urban and rural middle and lower class. In confrontation with Christianity, on the one hand, and Communism on the other, they interpret and propagate Islam first and foremost as the pragmatic religion—of comprehensive social justice, social responsibility, and the equality of all persons, in all of the values of these—a religion of freedom (including that of conscience) and human dignity from the outset. This had been reality already, in an (idealized) early Islam. According to Sayyid Quṭb (normative ideologue of the Muslim Brotherhood), it must now be the reality of political power once more. After all, Islam must seek to be—as it already is, according to the will of God—the comprehensive and determinative religion (that is, as political ideology) of nature, as well as of human life across the board. Practice in actually existing Islamic states does deviate from theory. By way of an important example: in → Iran (ruled since 1979 by Shia fundamentalist clergy), erstwhile pragmatic clergy (often as large landholders), along with the "Guardian Council," successfully opposed the demand of a counter-wing of the Mullahs for 'socialist' economic reforms, including a land reform and the nationalization of foreign trade.

Literature

Delanque, G., "al-Ikhwān al-muslimīn," in: Encyclopedia of Islam², vol. III, (1986), 1068-1071; Harris, G. S./Vatikiotis, P. J., Ishtirākiyya," in: Encyclopedia of Islam², vol. IV (1990), 123-126; Kutb, Syed, Social Justice in Islam, Washington 1958; Lia, Brynjar, The Society of the Muslim Brothers, London 1998; Said, Abdel Moghny, Arab Socialism, London 1972.

→ Fundamentalism, Industrial Society, Islam, Marxism, Socialism I

Wiebke Walther

Socialization / Upbringing

Even if one's point of departure is the premise that the human being is by nature predisposed to religion (cf., Lat.: homo naturaliter religiosus; homo religiosus)—to a certain extent recent cognitive approaches to the study of religion present a resurgence of that view—it still remains to be explained how, ideally, a helpless nursling becomes a competent member or competent client of a given religion. From generation to generation, religions must be creatively reproduced. 'Socialization,' and 'upbringing,' 'education,' or 'rearing,' denote attempts to bring to the concept a simultaneous (1) continuity, that spans the generations, and (2) emergence of a religious competency and religious individuality on the part of the members of a religion. Furthermore, questions of socio-religious control and power are at stake. Socialization here describes a more comprehensive event than does 'upbringing.' As a rule, what is understood by socialization is a manifold interplay of individual persons with various dimensions of their respective environment, while 'upbringing' refers to an intended influence on the ones being brought up (as a rule, persons developing and growing) by the educator (as a rule, adults). 'Upbringing,' then, is a subset of incidents of socialization.

Multidimensionality of Incidents of Socialization

Older theoretical approaches understood socialization as a kind of 'making social.' Newer approaches see socialization as the 'becoming social' of an individual, whose own active attainments are more strongly emphasized. In recent scholarship, the insight has been increasingly acknowledged that processes of socialization last from birth until death. In other words: socialization is far from being completed with attendance at school or the university. Ecological approaches, furthermore, indicate that every individual is involved in several contexts of socialization at once. Here the spectrum spans from 'closer' environmental regions, interlocked and intermingled in various ways (family, friends, neighborhood, association, groups of workers), to 'more remote' environmental regions (transportation system, mass media, politics), to comprehensive environmental areas that provide a frame of reference for several regions of socialization (fundamental cultural value-systems).

'Religion,' in this context, should not be understood simply as a separate, partial area of the respective society or culture, but to a greater or lesser extent permeates all of these dimensions of socialization. 'Religious socialization,' then, is, on the one hand, an implicit component of a 'normal socialization' in the corresponding culture; but, on the other hand, it can be explicitly furthered or hindered through particular techniques and institutions. Religions contribute to the development of cultural systems, without being completely absorbed in them. Hence, various cultures dominated by the same religion can exhibit considerable differences; and religions, in various forms, or historical or cultural contexts, can legitimize different values.

Learning

Socialization and upbringing are instances of learning. 'Learning' generally denotes permanent changes in the behavior or capabilities of a person that are instigated by specific exercises and experiences. Religious socialization contains a whole series of learning processes. Learning from or in religions can occur continuously or discontinuously, for example through daily religious acts, or through intensive religious experiences ('illuminations'; → Light/Enlightenment). The learning events can run according to plan, or not, e.g., through purposive memorizing of religious texts (→ Oral Tradition), or through the unexpected appearance of missionaries or preachers. Learning bears not only on cognitive events: besides religious knowledge, for example, one must learn how and when to apply the texts that have been committed to memory, or when and how to move at the proper moments (for instance, the attitude of the hands, gross positions of the body as one kneels or stands, direction of the eyes upward or downward, etc.). Learning particular positions of the body, gestures, movements, and bodily functions, is a key component not only of meditation techniques, as in Zen or Yoga, but of most ritualized acts (→ Prayer/Curse). Feelings and emotions need to be learned as well: cultures and religions (as segments of cultures) offer determinate 'emotional stereotypes,' which pre-structure the experience. For example, emotional expectations are frequently attached to religious festivals. Further, one must learn how and in what social contexts to lend expression to one's feelings (for instance, the presentation of mourning) and how emotions are named. 'Meanings,' as soon as they are regarded as relevant, can be learned and remembered in no time, while skills (e.g. the performance of a ritual) are usually inculcated over a long period. Learning can occur in institutions especially provided for it (schools), or simply 'in passing' (as in the family). Some religious authorities insist that, rather than ritual skills or the intellectual absorption of theological teachings, what is actually important is their practical translation, their 'inner,' 'spiritual,' or 'mystical' content. One does not necessarily learn a religious doctrine, but one learns to act in specific contexts. Thus, by participation in cult, one does not necessarily learn (about) the teachings of the respective religion, but one learns to be a part of the community. Learning is not first and foremost the result of purposive instruction, but occurs preponderantly as imitation and identification ('learning by model'). These models can arise out of altogether distinct contexts, and are medially transmitted in different ways. There are various motives for imitation. Frequently, a person is chosen who is chosen or assigned as a representative model by reason of their behavior. In recent times, the mass media (television, but also literature) are acquiring more importance in constructing such models.

Cognitive Processes and Stages

Since Jean Piaget (1896–1980), researchers have accepted the insight that cognitive processes are connected with certain stages of structural mental development. Piaget distinguishes four stages. At each stage, reality is constructed corresponding to the mental potential of the respective stage: the environment is 'assimilated' to the mental apparatus. If the attainment of these assimilations fails over a long period of time, the respective cognitive structures can be basically altered and of adapted to the new demands ('assimilating'), in order to attain a condition of balance ('equilibrating'). The sequence of the developmental stages, which Piaget traces from the 'sensorimotor' stage to the stage of 'formal operations,' is irreversible. Each stage integrates the preceding, and none can be 'hurdled.' Piaget's model of cognitive development was later transferred to other areas, such as the development of gender socialization, social understanding, or the ability to make moral judgments. Efforts in the development of the last cited were applied by some American and German theologians to religious development. The sequence of the steps is unalterable in this case as well, but not every person necessarily traverses all stages (e.g., one can 'hold' at stage two).

The 'structural genetic' model of religious development (Oser and Gmünder) sketches five stages: (1) an orientation to absolute heteronomy (rules are determined from without), wherein the instance of what is ultimately valid (for example, God) actively intervenes in the world, while the human being merely reacts; (2) an orientation to the principle of reciprocity (do ut des, Lat., "I give that you may give"), whereby the ultimate instance is presented as open to influence; (3) an orientation to absolute autonomy ('deism'), wherein the human being is seen as self-responsible, while the instance of the ultimately valid no longer intervenes in worldly events; (4) a recognition and acknowledgment of the limits of the subject's autonomy, wherein the instance of the ultimate stipulates a kind of 'salvation plan'; and (5) a direct relationship of the human being to the instance of the ultimately valid, for instance in mysticism. Another model (Fowler) is laid out more in multiple layers, and at the same time more fuzzy. Here it is a matter of the development of 'faith' in six steps (1) Intuitive-Projective faith; (2) Mythic-Literal faith; (3) Synthetic-Conventional faith; (4) Individuative-Reflective faith; (5) Conjunctive faith; (6) Universalizing faith (exceedingly rare).

Unquestionably, developmental stages of religious biography can be found in all cultures and religions. But the theories proposed up until now are valid principally for Western and Christian cultures, and they are clearly informed by a normative (albeit liberal) Christian understanding of religion. Comparative studies of religious development of religious development processes are still lacking. Here, 'indigenous' models of religious development, specific to each religion, must be taken into account.

Roles

Religions present a network of various roles. On the one side, there are specifically religious roles (priest, guru, shaman, monk, saint); on the other, non-specifically religious roles can be 'religiously fraught' or charged (as with the partners to a 'Christian marriage'). Connected with the respective roles are different rights, duties, and expectations, the fulfillment of which, as a rule, is connected with recognition and reward, while their disregard is met with disapproval and sanctions. The transmission and assimilation of certain role-complexes are important aspects of religious socialization and upbringing. These processes occur during the entire lifetime. The learning and assimilation of roles is connected with the acquisition of certain value-orientations, and progresses in several stages. Roles, for one thing, are structured, and, for another, are 'negotiated' among the respective participants, and are individually modified. The fundamental 'mastering' of roles implies the capacity to endure even unsatisfactory role-implementations, to gain control of ambiguous situations, and, if need be, to take a calculated distance from role stipulations. While certain roles occupy all of one's person ('total roles,' e.g., monks or nuns), the normal case will be that a number of roles, or diverse roles, are called for, in different situations and in varying degrees of intensity. This scenario can occasion conflicts between various role requirements. In certain ritual contexts, roles can be reversed (→ Carnival). The roles never involve only the respective 'players', but also their partners in interaction. The guru presents himself in terms of the guru role, and his pupils present themselves vis-à-vis the guru otherwise than they do toward their other fellow human beings. Roles change in different historical and geographical contexts. Some roles lose their attractiveness, or even vanish entirely, while others are created anew. The creation of new roles is an important aspect of innovations in religious history, and frequently accompanies fundamental conceptual and ideological changes. Examples have been the emergence of the roles of the prophet and the philosopher in Israelite or Greek religious history, respectively.

The role repertoire of the religions, of course, relates not only to the area of relations among human beings. In rituals, persons 'play' or 'perform' the role of gods, spirits, or religious founders, 'imitate' religious exemplars (e.g., Christ, Francis, Ali, Hussein, the Buddha), and even the extra-human communications partners (demons, angels, spirits, gods), generally act in a framework of calculable role patterns, which must be learned by those who 'use' religious systems. Employing the pre-structured repertoire of roles makes religious communication possible.

Religious Socialization in the Family

An instance of religious socialization that is presumably primary in all cultures is the family. By observation and imitation of the religious practices of family members, children familiarize themselves with religious realities. Children imitate the posture of family members while praying, and accompany them to the celebration of rituals. At home, they hear myths and legends. The concrete reality of families is culturally and historically variable, of course. Accordingly, the religious socialization ensured by families will vary, as well. Some examples: owing to a growing fulltime employment of women, membership and collaboration of women in religious organizations (e.g., parishes) in the United States has markedly declined in recent decades, and fathers play a more important role in children's religious upbringing.[2] A recent study from The Netherlands[3] draws attention to the concurrence of episodes of socialization within families and outside: the success of religious upbringing achieved by schools, or the mass media, seems to depend not least of all on the religious atmosphere in the family. Church membership, or a positive attitude-in principle of parents, of course, does not guarantee any 'successful' Christian socialization. More important for children, evidently, are the practical results that parents derive from their Christian profession.

Families are 'religious centers,' associated in various ways with their religious environments. In ancient Mesopotamia and Syria, for example, a rather unproblematic relationship prevailed between 'family' and 'state' forms of religion. But in Israel, a situation of competition developed, and a change in 'family religion.' On the one hand, the cult of the ancestors and the veneration of local deities were extensively suppressed: at the same time, certain feasts of the 'national religion' such as Passover were celebrated as family affairs.[4]

Individual and Group Relationships

Religious upbringing often runs its course in individual relationships. Here, religious authorities are, e.g., the master, guru, dervish, hermit, tutor, best friend, master of initiation, father confessor, baptismal sponsor, religious educator, or spiritual companion. Another, non-school type of pedagogy is effected in → groups: e.g., clubs, ritual communities, orders, guilds, associations, school-age groups, youth groups.

Schools

In various historical and cultural contexts, various forms of religious education in schools have developed. The history of the Indian 'forest schools' extends from the Vedic time into the twentieth century. Buddhism replaced this system with monastic training centers, including the famous 'university' of Nalanda. In China private schools were often integrated into families instead. In Greco-Roman antiquity, there was no formal religious education. The same is true for the Christian schools of the time of the Roman Empire. In the Middle Ages, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam developed structurally similar theological schools of higher education. The characteristics of a school that we take for granted—a government controlled, public, obligatory school system, a curriculum, a separate faculty, classes, subjects, periods—are earmarks of the modern school, which, since the nineteenth century, has spread throughout the world. The initiation and form of religious education varies from country to country.

Even modern schools aim not only at transmitting knowledge, but also at the comprehensive 'disciplining' of the pupil. Many traditions value emotive and affective learning more highly than cognitive learning (as in → Sufism, → yoga, or → Zen Buddhism). Accordingly, corporeal affective processes play a stronger pedagogical role.

Conversion as Re-Socialization

The need to learn religions is key in the transition to other religions. This process may require an individual to make conscious connections with earlier socialization experiences, or to emphatically rescind them. The Talmud explicitly likens a convert to a newborn child (bYevamot 22a, bBekharot 47a). As an example from the present, we may adduce a study of Swiss women, who, one or two years after their marriage with Muslims from Arab countries, have adopted Islam.[4] They are confronted with a code of behavior that is at first foreign to them, which they assimilate more or less slowly, not without difficulties, whereby they may discover, in their new religion, familiar, 'Swiss' values such as punctuality, precision, and cleanliness. In the process of learning their new religion, already-converted Muslims may function as exemplars. The new socialization may proceed with a change of given name: Christina becomes Zainab. Prayers are learned in a foreign language (Arabic). The corresponding postures and times must be assiduously interiorized. Fasting, as well, is new territory, and can occasion irritation in the workplace, just as can prayer made at particular times. Food taboos lead to a relearning of habits of shopping, cooking, and eating (without pork and alcohol). The most serious changes have to do with gender roles: Muslim women must learn the observance of Islamic prescriptions concerning menstruation, and to behave reservedly toward the other sex (e.g., avoid eye-contact). The latter corresponds to the adoption of a new, anti-erotic style of dress, including the wearing of the headscarf, with which they also publicly display the role of believing Muslim women in the sight of others. This display can occasion depreciative and derisive reactions. To be sure, many basic components of previous experiences of socialization remain untouched, of course, and flow into their new religious identity: the Islam of Swiss Muslim women is more democratic and 'feminist' than that of many 'Islamic' countries.

The association of conversion and socialization is often stressed, with critical intent, by the religious establishment. Thus, one repeatedly hears that membership in new religious movements or communities (→ New Religions) is the result of a disturbed 'normal socialization.' Of course, this can be empirically established only in exceptional cases. Rigid patterns of religious socialization and learning in some groups are at times stigmatized as 'brain-washing.'

Stories, Myths, and Rituals

One of the key media of religious upbringing is storytelling. Religious experts even consciously adopt this strategy: Zen and Sufi masters, Buddhist monks, Hindu → sadhus and → gurus, Hassidic rabbis (→ Hasidism), Afro-American preachers, and African prophets assimilate the technique of using stories to 'latch on' to everyday experience and at the same time to transcend it. Nor is the importance of → singing to be underestimated. Furthermore, → myths can discharge a special role in religious socialization processes: they can be seen as differing from → fairytales, sagas, or legends in their pragmatic relevance for the creation of worlds, or an orientation in worlds already created. In its reference to exemplary patterns, the application of myths releases spaces of experience and agency. Thus, the handing on of myths gives the members of 'myth communities' the advantage of patterns (and roles!), with the help of which they gain access to new worlds. Socialization through myths, then, is not simply a reproduction, but, likewise, a construction of worlds of experience and actions.

The same holds true for → rituals, which contribute to religious socialization and upbringing on a number of levels. This function comes to its most striking expression in rituals containing verbal instructions, such as sermons (for example in Buddhism, Christianity, or Islam). Rituals of transition frequently contain entire learning programs, which, in a kind of compact seminar, transmit to the candidates both basic and secret cultural knowledge. Even simple rituals must be learned. The regular celebration of simple rituals, such as that of the Buddhist flower-gift (placing flowers before a statue of the Buddha), the most basic of all Buddhist rituals, can—for example in conformity with a given stage of religious development—be provided with a rich repertory of meanings. For example, the ritual may embody the relationship of the Buddha to those who honor him, it may express dedication to, or trust in, the Buddha, it may be held to emphasize the purification of the senses as a meditative exercise, or it may be seen to contain the ritual actor's profession of the insight into the transience of all life (that eventually will lead to redemption).[6] Ritual centers are often centers of doctrine, as well, such as monasteries, mosques, or temples. The design and layout, the construction, and the adornment of cult sites often unfold many-layered programs of formation. Such is the case with the medieval cathedral, the Hindu temple, or the Buddhist stupa. The celebration of certain rituals is reserved to certain functionaries, who must qualify for this duty by submitting to a specific training. By contributing to the socialization of the body and the feelings rituals are moreover bound up with episodes of 'ordinary' socialization.

Behavior with Children—Conception of the Hereafter

A number of studies[7] have tried to establish a connection between forms of interaction with children in a culture, and systems of religious symbols there. Some studies reinforce the assumption that severe comportment with children encourages faith in a strict, even aggressive, spiritual world. Another study reports that societies for which leniency with children is the order of the day, less frequently fear the apparition of spirits at funerals. According to another study, however, forbearing deportment vis-à-vis children leads to the assumption that the gods can be influenced through rituals. Still other research attests that where children are treated somewhat cruelly, gods are to an extent also presented as cruel. This sort of seemingly empirically corroborated analysis is, of course, problematic in several respects. It sees biography as the purely passive product of parental influence, and rests on a questionable theory of religion. The naivety of this kind of study demonstrates the complicated connection among religion, culture, and socialization/upbringing. For example, is faith in severe or indulgent gods necessarily the consequence of a severe or lenient interaction with children, rather than its premise?

The connection between religions and cultures cannot be reduced to an unambiguous causal relationship. In various cultural and religious contexts, one encounters different goals of upbringing, theories of upbringing, and apprehensions of the nature of the child and of the meaning of life. Some recent studies distinguish between individualistic cultures and those whose orientation is social. In the former, then, such as those of Germany or Switzerland, a more aggressive attitude is said to prevail among the children than in the latter, such as those of Japan or Bali. However, the importance of religious orientation in the fundamental value system and its application is hard to determine here.

Pluralism and Socialization

The ideal type of the classic theory of socialization takes its implicit point of departure in the notion that the individual is socialized into a homogeneous world. This picture corresponds to fundamentalist fancy, but not to the reality of differentiated religions and pluralistic societies, in which individuals must assert their identities vis-à-vis contradictory requirements of socialization and different contexts of socialization (→ Pluralism; Secularization). The transmission of cultural competencies in dealing with religions and religious orientations is, therefore, a demand of modern socialization and education.

Socialization of the Religious Scholars

For religious studies, socialization, upbringing, and related areas of life are not only objects of study, for students of religion themselves pass through socialization processes specific to their culture, religion, class, and gender. These specificities, in turn, have an impact on the academic work of the scholars. An intensive religious socialization in childhood can either favor or impair an understanding of certain phenomena. An academic socialization as theologian, sociologist, physician, lawyer, or anthropologist will affect the subject's sensibility with respect to the questions to be addressed and the manner in which they ought to be addressed. Most scholars of religion, furthermore, have matured with an understanding of reality specific to a particular culture and religion, and this understanding occasions the emergence of 'religion' as an independent category and informs certain basic rules to scholarship. It is to be hoped, then, that, in future more scholars with different backgrounds in their own history of socialization may enrich the scholarly discourse about religion.

1. Müller-Rohr, Brigitta, "Das Paradies liegt unter den Füssen der Frau. Eine qualitative Studie über Schweizerinnen, die zum Islam übergetreten sind, dissertation, Zurich 1966.
2. Hertel, Bradley R., "Work, Family, and Faith: Recent Trends," in: Ammermann, Nancy T./Roof, Wade C., Work, Family, and Religion in Contemporary Society, New York 1995, 81-121.
3. De Hart, Joep, "Impact of Religious Socialization in the Family," in: Journal of Empirical Theology 3 (1990), 59-78.
4. Cf. van der Toorn, Karel, Family Religion in Babylonia, Syria and Israel: Continuity and Change in the Forms of Religious Life, Leiden 1996.

6. Cf. Schalk, Peter, "Hur barn lär sig att uföra den buddhistiska riten 'blomstergåvan,'" in: Årsbok Föreningen lärare i religionskunskap 27 (1995), 85-108.
7. Cf., e.g., Kornadt, in: Trommsdorff 1989, 82-83.

Literature

Drijvers, Jan W./MacDonald, Alasdair A. (eds.), Centres of Learning: Learning and Location in Pre-Modern Europe and the Near East, Leiden 1995; Fowler, James W., Stages of Faith: The Psychology of Human Development and the Quest for Meaning, San Francisco 1981; Holm, Nils G. (ed.), The Familiar and the Unfamiliar in the World Religions: Challenges for Religious Education Today, Åbo 1997; Hurrelmann, Klaus/ Ulrich, Dieter, Handbuch der Sozialisationsforschung, Weinheim [5]1998 ([1]1991); Lang, Bernhard, "Rolle," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 4 (1998), 460-476; Sherkat, Darren E., "Religious Socialization," in: Dillon, Michele (ed.), Handbook of the Sociology of Religion, Cambridge 2003, 151-163; Thomas, R. M., "Religious Education," in: The International Encyclopedia of Education 9 ([2]1994), 4995-5008; Trommsdorff, Gisela (ed.), Sozialisation im Kulturvergleich, Stuttgart 1989.

→ Child/Childhood, Emotions/Feelings, Family, Initiation, Life Cycle, Master/Pupil, Rites of Passage, Sexuality

Michael Stausberg

Society

Definition and Overview

1. 'Society' denotes a comprehensive social connection, a holistic system of human life in common, signed by extensive autarchy. As a concept, society is never independent of the concrete historical framework-conditions in which it is being developed. Historically, it is a new concept that became possible only as the unity of state and society—and their close connection with religion—lost its self-evidence: a development that begins to materialize in Europe only with the beginning of the modern age. Today's understanding of society is marked by the conception of the 'middle-class society' arising in the eighteenth century.

According to Max → Weber, society is distinguished from community on the basis of its cohesion being not of an emotive nature, but of a rational goal-directedness. This distinction means that a society 'functions' independently of whether persons are emotionally close to one another or not: as a rule, societies are too large to make personal relations among all of its members possible, but they nevertheless live 'together,' in a certain sense, since this facilitates the organization of daily life, and of the circumstances of life.

As a further development, American sociologist Talcott Parsons (1902–1979) defined society as a social system that combines in itself all the functions needed for its continuation. Parsons takes his point of departure in four key functions that every society must realize: adaptation, goal attainment, integration, and pattern-maintenance. His functionalistic approach could be summarized as follows.

- 'Adaptation' means an accommodation to the physical environment. That is, every society must deal in a rational way with the resources standing at its disposition (raw materials, environmental conditions, labor power, etc.), and thereby regulate its economic requirements.

Even the great churches seek to broaden their appeal: highway churches, 'rave' services, or, as in this photograph, a 'biker' service. At a memorial service, motorcyclists pray for their comrades who have been killed in traffic accidents.

- 'Goal attainment' designates the task of realizing important goals of a society. Thus, in the broadest sense, what is at issue is the development and adjustment of political tasks.
- Even in societies characterized by little differentiation, it can frequently be discerned which roles a person must implement. The more complex a society, the more important it becomes to integrate individual roles into a comprehensive system. Without role 'integration,' a society eventually collapses.
- Lest behavior in concrete inter-human relations be governed solely by the immediate personal advantage or disadvantage, societies must develop cultural norms ('pattern maintenance').

The following material will be concerned with a brief historical survey of models for the description of society.

Unless explicitly stated otherwise, the material of the present entry will pertain to the societies of Western Europe. Taken basically, 'society' as a whole is necessarily a diffuse concept. Only by way of concentration on individual aspects (politics, → economy, degree of institutionalization, etc.) does it become intelligible and empirically manageable. Nevertheless, we shall here make the attempt to follow certain approaches being used in the current discussion in the social sciences—approaches to the task of rendering conceptually manageable the fundamental characteristics of modern society across the board.

Societal Forms and Structures: Historical Survey

2. Societies can be distinguished in terms of the degree of their inner differentiation, in terms of the number and quality of the societal sub-groups (status, classes, ranks), in terms of the degree of a society's openness to without, as well as that of individual groups reciprocally, and—closely bound up with the latter—in terms of the opportunities for mobility on the part of individuals (among and within the various generations).

Status—Class—Rank

a) From the society of status to modern industrial society: In Europe, to simplifly greatly, four systems or structures of social order can be distinguished in the course of history from the Middle Ages until today, as follows: (1) pre-industrial society of status, (2) early industrial society's class structure, (3) the system of stratification in later industrial society, and (4) advanced industrial society. Each of these societal forms identifies itself by way of a particular form of inner hierarchical differentiation.

Up until the beginning of industrialization, society was divided into social states or conditions, clearly distinguishable from one another, and closed in upon themselves. The order of the conditions was legitimized through religious value concepts, membership in a status or condition was determined by birth, and mobility from one status to another was possible only in the rarest of cases.

Industrialization replaced the rigid order of status with the somewhat less rigid class society. The position of an individual in the social structure was then normally determined by ownership or deprivation of the goods of production. Mobility from one class to the next was indeed possible in principle, but, owing to economic barriers, was seldom the case.

In the course of the twentieth century, a hierarchy of profession or occupation developed, in which, by way of example, the situation of a supervisor and that of a cleaning woman would be far apart. For ever more persons, it was now no longer ownership, nor even origin, but the position of one's profession that was the most important determinant of one's living condition. The social system continued to be open to description only inadequately, through reciprocally antagonistic classes now designated by the more neutral term status. The systems based on social status overlay the systems of class and condition, without, it is true, either of the latter being fully superseded. Despite societal and social barriers as present as ever, individual status became pervious to social mobility. In the framework of this more and more sharply differentiated society, the notion of a society of achievement began to prevail. This development was reinforced by an explosion of prosperity, felt at all levels (the 1950s and 1960s), which provided large parts of the population with consumer and luxury goods to an extent previously unknown. In a situation of a collective economic climb, the idea was infectious that all, in proportion to their individual efforts, have the opportunity for success (measurable in economic dimensions).

This societal formation, experienced as new, was designated with various catchwords, like 'class society in a melting pot,' or 'leveled-out middle class.' Entrenched as ever, structures of inequality died away in persons' consciousness—as a rule, not only in broad parts of the population, but also among leading social scientists. In the presence of this euphoria of progress, religion (at least in central Europe) seemed to have been deprived of its power to function as a force for social integration and the maintenance of norms.

What now began to prevail could perhaps best be called a unitary petty bourgeois lifestyle. As for the Church, it made a certain minimal appeal to a sense of duty, but the real character of obligation was missing. People attended services now only on special feast days and contacted the Church only as a 'service undertaking,' one of setting up certain procedures in matters of life cycle (baptism, marriage, funeral). By and large, interest in religious topics had very much faded into the background.

Having, Being, Enjoying

b) In the progressive industrial society of the close of the twentieth century: The development described up to this point can be denoted a process of increasing modernization. The degree of modernization can be read in the degree of distribution of labor, bureaucratization, social differentiation, and growing technologization and 'rationalization.' What for a certain time appeared as progress that could not be halted, was, at the close of the 1960s and the beginning of the 1970s, at the latest, called into question not only by historical development, but on the theoretical and political level, as well. Western industrial societies collided with the 'frontiers of growth' (Report to the Club of Rome, 1972). The cruelty of the Vietnam War raised doubts in an entire generation as to the correctness of prevailing political and social discourse. Now the modern age was followed by the apparently vague concept of → postmodernity.

The analytical division of classes in terms of an objective social situation (overwhelmingly economically determined) seemed less and less reliable as a means for the adequate description of society. Thus, in the 1980s, especially for investigation of the market, youth, and the electorate, the Sinus Institute developed the concept of 'social milieu.' Milieus were defined in terms of subjective criteria. These combine persons whose concept and manner of life is similar, and who therefore form a cultural unit in society.

Milieus were determined whose members are distinct in value orientation and life goals, in their attitude toward work, free time, and consumption, toward family and partnership. Furthermore, they differ in their perspectives on the future, in basic political convictions, and in lifestyles. But not even this model escapes vertical differentiation, into lower, middle, and upper class: and here, by way of a second (horizontal) set of coordinates, a distinction of milieus was introduced according to their orientation along the spectrum between conservative/traditional values and value transformation. In the milieu models of the 1980s, the pole of 'value transformation' still seems still clear as monolithically post-materialistic—'being,' in contradistinction from a (petty) bourgeois 'having,' an ascription that for the 1990s, at the latest, is no longer valid.

Each of the idealized, typical, milieus has its typical age structure. Persons of the 'petty bourgeois milieu,' on the average, are noticeably older than in the 'hedonistic milieu,' and have their typical free-time habits and cultural preferences. To be sure, these elements are secondary for the concept of milieu, and variable. The decisive factors for legitimate ascription to a milieu are fundamental value-orientations (education and upbringing, money, social relations, etc.) and life goals (e.g., success, or self-realization). Based on these fundamental attitudes toward life, on a lower level of abstraction, a whole series of temporary and sub-cultural units are to be found, formed along new axes, such as sports, music, cult films, or certain vacation forms. Various immigrant cultures (Turkish, Italian, etc.) possess and enduring character; unfortunately, the concept of milieus does not sufficiently take these cultures into account.

With regard to religion, religiosity, and spirituality, in most Western European countries 'ecclesiality' as an indicator is more strongly marked only in the area of the conservative and lower-middle-class milieu. But if we adduce the broader indicator 'religiosity / interest in religious themes,' then this is a dimension describable in nearly all milieus (exception: a traditional and tradition-less worker milieu), although in varying quality. Thus, in the hedonistic milieu, the number of regular churchgoers is scarcely worth citing: on the other hand, 'alternative' offers on the part of the religious market (→ New Age) are definitely taken into account with interest. Close connections to religious groups are seldom the result. Rather, in the framework of a structure of opportunity, individual offers are chosen. An exact analysis, in terms of social science, of the religious orientations and 'consumer habits' in the individual milieus is still pending, but this analysis could probably yield instructive results vis-à-vis the structure of religiosity in today's society. And, to stay with the picture of the religious 'market': even the agents of the offers of religion (including the established churches) take account of the varying 'consumer habits' of their clients. The offer grows broader, seeks sub-cultural niches, and adapts to modish trends ('rave' service; see ill.).

Modern Concepts of Society

3. It has already been mentioned above that postmodernity is a vague concept. On this account, recent scientific efforts seek to develop the characteristics that reflect Western service-societies or industrial societies. What follows, then, is a compendious description of some of the most current concepts of society that have prevailed in recent decades.

a) Ulrich Beck caused a furor in 1986 with his postulate of a 'risk society' (→ Security). Without attempting to deny the inequalities that have so stubbornly prevailed, he emphasizes that the risks of a highly technologized society know no class boundaries: in other words, a threatened environment (→ Environmentalism), a nuclear menace, or even mass unemployment, have a tendency to be able to find and affect everyone. In Beck's appraisal, these risks characterize living conditions more prominently than do differences in material sustenance. Simultaneously, traditional associations dissolve (family traditions) and give each individual the freedom to decide what forms and arrangements her or his own life will have, thus taking on the risk of having to answer for the consequences of his or her own activity. One result of this trend to individualization is that it is now no longer automatically fixed whether and how persons may arrange their religious life: they may switch religious communities, choose one or more of the offers of various groups and institutions, or simply ignore all offers. For Peter Berger, this priority of personal decision constitutes 'the heretical imperative.'

b) Society grows ever more complex and specialized. Nearly every area of life is bureaucratized and technologized. Thus, it becomes important for individuals to gain access to the corresponding knowledge, and have it available; and this produces important social changes. And so, American sociologist Daniel Bell can speak, with some justice, of a 'knowledge society.' The conveyance of knowledge by the media is no longer worldwide; the media spread it to divide it. Modern → media provide access to information in colossal density and assortment. This novel quality and quantity has prompted scientists to speak in generalizing terms of an 'information' and 'media society.' No attention is given here to the fact that interpretation and manner of utilization are never independent of a society's social and political conditions. It is always important, for example, to know whether the quality and plurality of mass media are regulated by conditions of a juridical framework, and what the particular nature and identity of that framework is. For all religious communities, the conditions of the framework have fundamentally changed, owing to the sources of information available to nearly all. These communities must themselves be present in the media. Those who are not, find it difficult even to be noticed as existing. On this account, it is no longer unusual, to cite one example, for the Catholic Church to offer financial support for films in which clergy emerge as sympathiques. Of even more importance, however, is the constant situation of competition among the religious communities, arising from the fact that, in principle, all users of the media have information available concerning many different religions. For most persons, → television plays a vital role: it is present everywhere, and simple to receive. Televised presentations confer certain advantages on religions: their content is altogether open to visualization, and their cult creates strong visible impressions.

c) For most persons in progressive industrial societies, the working week and life is so shaped that a great deal of time remains for—more or less arranged—free time. Here, many persons have frankly more opportunities to select how to distribute their time than in the framework of their breadwinning activities. Thus, it is obvious that the form and arrangement of free time becomes an important means to the opening out of one's personality, and therefore to self-realization, and the development of one's own self-image. The catchy phrase, 'leisure society,' has been coined to do justice to the meaning of the field of free time in one's life. Gerhard Schulz's 'event society' is a specific elaboration of this concept. Schulz emphasizes the fact that many persons (as long as they have economic means) not only mold their lives according to the standard of their elementary needs, but also pursue the goal of making an 'event' out of almost every act. Whether this need is a natural one, or one induced by 'advertisement,' is open to question. The need to arrange one's own life corresponding to the desired event-intensity is of course far from being an equally strong facet of all of the milieus cited above. It is not only in the classic area of consumership that the need for an event-intensive arrangement of free time represents an important market; persons who offer propositions along the entire spectrum of the shaping of religion and life find an important clientele here. Courses of meditation in Santorin, or trance-dancing weeks on Lanzarote, have just as much a business cycle as do introductions to Zen Buddhism in adult evening classes. Whole → tourism enterprises live on the 'folkloristic' presentation of native piety. Visits to the Aborigines in Australia, or to the Indian reservations of North America, not only enjoy great popularity, but actually change the consumed 'reality.' There are Indian Sun Dances now performed only for tourists. Whole festal calendars are rearranged to conform to typical tourist seasons and expectations.

d) Most modern societies are, de jure or de facto, pluralistic (→ Pluralism). In the Federal Republic of Germany, for instance, religious and cultural pluralism are guaranteed in the Fundamental Law by the Right to Liberty of Action (art. 2) and the Mandate of Equality (art. 3). The extent to which this is implemented, and whether one may speak of a generally accepted multicultural society, is not readily determinable. The political discussion is governed by a fatal identification of ethnic origin or extraction with religion and culture. It is easily overlooked that, in Germany, even without immigration, membership in one of the two great Christian churches is no longer self-evident. Some one-third of the population does not belong to them, and nearly twenty million belong to no religious community. In political discourse, however, it is customary to treat 'German' and 'Christian' synonymously, since those who are not themselves Christian have nevertheless 'at least' been 'Christianly socialized,' which is regarded as sufficient for a verbal consensus. Conversely, anyone not of German extraction, and especially anyone not a Christian, is said to be a 'part of the problem' (→ Ethnicity; Migration).

Globalization

All but a very few progressive industrial societies have to do battle with the 'dissolving' of their unity in terms of a national state identity. Markets, currents of merchandise and finances, migration of labor power, and even cultural 'products' such as religion, have long since ceased to be restricted to particular countries. We have a world economy, and, in the cultural area, a strong American/Western dominance is perceptible worldwide. A centuries-long colonization enabled the Catholic and Protestant churches to create a presence in nearly all of the regions of the earth, meeting a counter-balance only in countries of a strong Islamic domination. On the international level, for instance with the discussion, in a framework of the United Nations, of how human rights are to be defined, Christian conceptualizations have overwhelmingly prevailed.

None of this has as yet occasioned the generation of a 'global society.' The social (!) connection among world citizens is only rudimentary. Most persons do not feel themselves to be 'citizens of the world.' What happens in Africa, for example, is meaningless for the majority in Europe. In view of the extreme inequality of world distribution of goods and culture, it is not surprising that few things can operate as a force for integration. Ideologically, the poorest countries have little to oppose to the defensive strategies of the wealthy countries (superiority of Western/Christian democratic culture, the 'principle of achievement'). Only on the level of the 'threshold countries' have counter-movements formed in the last decades (liberation theology, political Islamism). Following Samuel Huntington in this connection, a 'clash of civilizations' is readily invoked, without any consideration of what integrative potential is at hand (for an emerging world society?).

Résumé

4. Up until a few years ago, theses on the development of the social structure were characterized by optimistic fundamental appraisals. The point of departure was an increasing unification/standardization of living conditions, an ever more differentiated set of social conditions, and the hope that purely material differences would lose in importance in favor of 'horizontal' inequalities. The individualizing of living milieus, lifestyles, and life situations is leading to the dissolution of class-typical subcultures, indeed to a 'destratification' of the world of living across the board. Class membership is no longer the object of conscious identification. Instead, what arises is a pluralization of lines of conflict. Everyone, of either gender, can choose amongst an endless multiplicity of opportunities, whether in the arrangement of the parlor, in the choice of school, of life-partner, of occupation, of religious community, of friends, and so on. In practice, however, decisions are never actually free: as a rule, we make 'typical' decisions. We seek our partners in a typical social environment, we often decide in favor of the religious community in which we were socialized, and in the selection of living-room furniture, something of our biography can be read. Thus, 'alternative' modes of living (such as living-communities, unmarried partnerships), are factually limited to a biographical 'experimental phase' (mostly between the ages of twenty and thirty), are also accepted as such socially, and are most often in statistical conformity with established forms (marriage and family). Nevertheless, it is 'normal' to try out shamanic trance rituals or Buddhist meditation, and then marry in the village church.

In other words, from a theoretical liberty of selection, no endless multiplicity can be deduced of decisions actually faced. Norms, expectations, and traditions have become more multiple and flexible; but they still exist, as they always have.

Literature

Adam, Barbara et al. (eds.), The Risk Society and Beyond: Critical Issues for Social Theory, London 2000; Aldridge, Alan, Religion in the Contemporary World: A Sociological Introduction, Cambridge 2000; Beck, Ulrich, World Risk Society, Cambridge 1999; Bell, Daniel, The Coming of Post-Industrial Society: A Venture in Social Forecasting, New York [2]1976; Berger, Peter L., The Heretical Imperative: Contemporary Possibilities of Religious Affirmation, Garden City 1979; Borgotta, Edgar F. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Sociology, 5 vols., New York [2]2000; Cipriani, Roberto, Sociology of Religion: An Historical Introduction, New York 2000; McGuire, Meredith, Religion: The Social Context, Belmont 1997; Parsons, Talcott, Essays in Sociological Theory, rev. ed., Glencoe 1949; Ritzer, George (ed.), Encyclopedia of Social Theory, 2 vols., Thousand Oaks 2005; Schulze, Gerhard, Die Erlebnisgesellschaft. Kultursoziologie der Gegenwart, Frankfurt/M. 1992; Swatos, Jr., William H. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religion and Society, Walnut Creek 1998.

→ Charitable Organizations, Civil Religion, Economy, Everyday Life, Minorities, Political Religion, Popular Culture, Publicity, Religion, Utopia, Weber

Claudia Haydt

Son / Daughter

A Piece of Me

1. Unlike that of 'child,' the concepts 'son' and 'daughter' have a special value in terms of parents' feelings. They are a piece of the parent that receives the opportunity to live life over again, and better—to continue life and work 'a step ahead' of the parent. When the corporeal daughter and son shake off these bonds to seek their own life, the parent's projection of self can transfer to other young persons: the junior partner in the business, the daughter-in-law. And then the concepts are applied metaphorically. However, the Western, Christian-formed limitation of the extension of the concept of family, and the compulsions of the 'flexible person' of the so-called third industrialization, generate altogether different associations from those of a culture in which kinship determines the key social position. Both the emotional and the juridical association can be intended in these metaphors. Indeed, many cultures apply them without knowing the concept of 'metaphor' itself.

Heir and Successor

2. a) In the Semitic languages, the word ben means 'son,' denoting a membership in, or a belonging to, a family, slaves included; appurtenance to an office, whose designated successor is called 'son'; membership in a people, with a fictitious tribal father, like 'the children of Israel'; a belonging to a class or type. The Arabic expression bin adam ('son of Adam'), for instance, means 'human being.' This fictitious and mythological manner of speaking has an orientation to the real relation of kinship.

b) In Mesopotamia, kings called themselves 'sons of gods and goddesses,' to legitimate the claim to power made by their dynasty. In this case, what is stressed is the juridical relation between son and elders: the 'parents' have transferred power to their 'son,' and the king is the legitimate heir of the monarchy. The 'parents,' being gods, are obligated to afford their 'son' succor and assistance. In the Hebrew Bible, as well, steeped in the ancient Eastern conceptual world, the relationship between the king and YHWH is described as that between a son and father (Ps 2:89).

'Son of Man' / 'Son of God'

c) 'Son' has a special significance in the expression, 'son of man.' Here, 'man' (in the sense of 'human being,' not 'male human being'), while singular in number, represents a collectivity. The most ancient locus is Dan 7:13, where (in either of the likely readings of the text—'man' or 'son of man') the expression denotes the people of Israel in the End Time, and is clearly applied metaphorically. In the apocalyptic literature after Daniel, the meaning has changed to that of the title for the Messiah. This word was taken over by early Christian communities as a title for Jesus; possibly Jesus had already spoken of himself in this way. This word indicates both Jesus's high position as Messiah, and his lowliness, and position as slave, vis-à-vis the human being. However, the expression 'son of man' was still not understood literally. It is otherwise with the concept 'Son of God' in Christianity. The concept is found in the apocryphal literature of the Hebrew Bible, but there it denotes Israel, or the human being, in general. The Christians referred this expression to Jesus, without understanding it in the biological sense. In the Roman Empire, Christ came into cultic competition with the emperors, among whom Augustus was to have been miraculously conceived by the god Apollo. The Semitic chosen delegate of God became the biological divine son. In the ancient councils, embittered battles were waged over the correct understanding of this phrase.

Daughter

d) In a patriarchal society, the figurative application of 'daughter' far less accentuated as that of the 'son.' In Hebrew, we encounter the expression, 'daughter [of] Zion' (as in Isa 1:8; Lam 1:6; 2:1) for the city of Jerusalem. That use of 'daughter' in this instance is grounded on the fact that the grammatical gender of the place name is feminine. 'Daughter,' in the Bible, unlike 'Son,' actually has no theological meaning of its own.

3. The concepts 'son' and 'daughter' are known in the religious sense apart from Judaism and Christianity, as well. Thus, in Buddhism, monks and nuns are called sons and daughters of the Buddha. Granted, the Buddha is never called 'Father.' After all, the metaphor can also be so understood that—at least 'ideologically'—monks and nuns stand equally placed vis-à-vis each other, like sons and daughters respectively, and in the teaching of the Buddha have a common goal. However, the Buddha's daughters were subordinated to his sons, just as daughters were subordinated in the actual relation of brother and sister in India and East Asia.

In Christianity, the concept of 'son' has a special position, founded in the notion that Jesus is the Son of God. Christianity is unique in this respect; and it is of course also due to the central theological meaning of Christology that 'son' and 'daughter' are by no means applied metaphorically. But neither in the goddess movement is 'daughter' ever applied to denote the relation of a follower to any of the goddesses. Rather, an identification is made with the goddess. For us modern persons, the metaphors of 'son' and 'daughter' probably connote a dependency that is not pleasing to us.

Literature

Burkett, Delbert, The Son of Man Debate: A History and Evaluation, Cambridge 1999; Hahn, Ferdinand, Christologische Hoheitstitel, Göttingen [5]1994; Hengel, Martin, Der Sohn Gottes. Die Entstehung der Christologie und die jüdisch-hellenistische Religionsgeschichte, Tübingen 1975; Schlisske, Werner, Gottessöhne und Gottessohn im Alten Testament, Stuttgart 1974; Sennett, Richard, The Corrosion of Character: The Personal Consequences of Work in the New Capitalism, New York 1998.

→ Child/Childhood, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Gender Stereotypes, Matriarchy/Patriarchy, Socialization/Upbringing

Leo Tepper

Soul

Multiplicity of Souls

1. After the idea of God, the idea that a human person has one or more souls became a widespread driving force of religious orientation and cultic instruction books. By way of extremely different conceptualizations, the soul is bound up with, especially, the whole history of religion, but without being exhausted in the area of religion. In view of the broad spectrum of cultural constructions, different demands and needs present themselves by way of notions of the soul. Conceptions of bone souls, breath souls, organ- and body-souls have their point of departure in concrete physiological experiences, and transfer this aspect of life into concepts of an afterlife, or at least of a continued existence. After death, persons might continue to exist 'in' their last breath, as a 'breath soul,' or through their bones, which "will be again clothed in flesh" (cf. Ezek 37). Other aspects place the division of the soul from the body in the foreground—during its life as a free spirit, a soul of fate, or a special instance of the alter ego, after its death as a shadow-soul, or as a breath- or picture-soul. All of these religious patterns transform reflections into concrete conceptualizations, whose orientation is to questions such as "What is left over, when someone dies?"; "How do ancestors and rulers continue to operate after death?"; "What temporarily disappears, when a person falls into a faint, a trance, or an ecstasy?"

The One Soul

2. In view of the various cultures and different eras, it can be maintained that in an earlier period a multiplicity of souls existed side-by-side in persons' conceptions. Ancient Egypt and Homeric Greece may serve as examples of the Mediterranean course of European history of religion.

The notion that a person possesses 'only' one soul, and that this soul represents the person in her or his totality, is first found in European tradition with Heraclitus. There is more here than a simple combination of life-principle with a spirit of the dead. It is the decisive 'psychological turning point' in European history of religion. Heraclitus is one of the Pre-Socratic philosophers, who, from Anaximenes onward, equated 'soul substance' with the 'fundamental material' of the world (arché), thus guaranteeing the soul a special rank in their cosmologies. On still another count Heraclitus introduces a turning point: with him, the soul is characterized above all by its capacity for cognition. According to the archaic cognitive principle that like can be cognized or known only by like, the fiery soul (→ psyché) is the component of the person that is predestined to know the world represented in fire.

Independence of Soul from Body

3. The notion that the soul can be released from the body, a common component of the notion of a soul, opens up certain new possibilities. The soul comes to spaces that have been inaccessible to the body (journey to the sky, journey in the beyond), retains its knowledge after death, also improves its form of existence after death—or, indeed, precisely by death. As a professionalized practice of commerce with the soul (according to M. → Eliade, the shaman is the great 'specialist' of the human soul; only shamans 'see' it, for they know its 'shape' or formation, and its destiny; → Shamanism.) Without a doubt, shamanism has essential elements to contribute to the tradition of the soul, and to its integration into complex societies. The 'autonomy of the soul' and a professional interaction with it become constitutive elements of religious groups (Pythagoras) and mystery cults (→ Mysteries).

In this historical and cultural framework, in the seventh and sixth centuries before the common era, conditions developed in Greece that turned the notion of soul into the religious concept that—together with the notion of God—determined European history of religion in the transition between ancient and Christian history. It is in the Socratic 'concern for the soul' (epiméleia tes psychés) that the cathartic anticipation of the Mysteries culminates: the soul of the human being that has come from the gods and that has accompanied a person throughout life, and outlasts death as his and her own self, must be constantly preserved from 'blemishes.' The limited cathartic of the general practice of cult is thus transformed into a constant claim on a 'pure life.' Under pressure of a "Puritanical psychology" (E. R. Dodds), the methodology developed of a lifestyle that presented a basically new pattern of religious orientation. With the 'latent historicization of the soul'—the idea that the soul has a history of its own, and a history of guilt, ordered to it—the religious premises of psychiatry are given.

Stranger in the World

4. With concepts of a soul independent of the body, and against the various cultural horizons, 'soul' became the preferred medium of an integration into various contexts: as soul of the ancestors, it comes among them, and guarantees collective norms; as 'soul divine,' it returns to the region of the gods; as soul charged with fire, it climbs to the sphere of the ether; as soul redeemed, it is with God. Finally, with the conclusion that it is not in its proper place, → gnosticism shaped it into a 'twin alienation': thus, anthropologies and soteriologies, with their pedagogical and political drafts, at the same time are shot through with the concept of soul. With his three parts of the soul (the logistikón, the thymoeidés, the epithymetikón), not only has Plato sketched out a fundamental pattern for Western psychology to live by, but has pointed to the pregnant connection between psychology and politics (→ Platonism). For Plato, structure of the soul and structure of the state, parts of the soul and social ranks, must be brought into a harmonious correlation determined by justice, if the state is to endure. In Platonism, the state's claim on the human soul has found a theoretical foundation, one of whose consequences is the state's 'maintaining imperative' with respect to the 'salvation of the soul' of the citizen. Only human rights and freedom of religion have sundered this nexus from 'uniformity.'

An Endless History?

3. However the linguistic equivalents for the concept of 'soul' (e.g., Fr. âme, Ger. Seele) may be determined in non-European languages, they belong to those religious conception-complexes that are characterized by a longue durée (Fr., 'long duration'), over epochs and cultural boundaries. For the European tradition, this durability means that the Platonic and Neo-Pythagorean concepts of the soul, developed in a Mediterranean polytheistic context, has survived in (or against) a monotheistic, industrial, and post-industrial environment. The foundations of this long-term plausibility for a concept of the soul can be seen in its postulation that a part of the person potentially withdraws from the "pressure of reality" (S. Freud), from even that of a hereafter or a later incarnation. Closely connected, here, are the conceptions that posit the destiny of the soul as independent of that of the individual incarnation, so that the soul has its own history of culpability and ascent. In this fashion, under certain conditions, the soul becomes the preferred object of 'self-help,' of control and discipline (leading or guiding the soul). It can also replace or redefine the older techniques to be applied to the → body (catharsis, disciplining, asceticism). The other foundation for the trans-cultural plausibility of a concept of the soul probably lies in the fact that the soul is capable not only of achieving an integration of the person into the society of persons, but also of connecting him or her to the environment, from plants to the world as a whole. To ascribe plants, animals, and human beings a soul (or a common soul-part) is to order the 'animate' environment, the beings having life, to an 'anthropological' schema. To ascribe the whole world a world-soul, integrates the individual human soul into a cosmic scenario.

Literature

Baumgarten, A. I. et al. (eds.), Self, Soul and Body in Religious Experience, Leiden 1998; Bos, Jacques, Reading the Soul: The Transformation of the Classical Discourse on Character, 1550–1750, dissertation Leiden 2003; Bremmer, Jan, The Early Greek Concept of the Soul, Princeton 1983; Idem, The Rise and Fall of the Afterlife, London/New York 2002; Dodds, Eric Robertson, The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley 1951; Gehlen, Arnold, Man in the Age of Technology, New York 1980 (Ger. [1]1957); Gladigow, Burkhard, " 'Tiefe der Seele' und 'inner space'. Zur Geschichte eines Topos von Heraklit bis zur Science Fiction," in: Assmann, Jan (ed.), Die Erfindung des inneren Menschen, Gütersloh 1993, 114-132; Jüttemann, Gerd et al. (eds.), Die Seele. Ihre Geschichte im Abendland, Weinheim 1991; Kirschner, Susanne R., The Religious and Romantic Origins of Psychoanalysis, Cambridge 1996; MacDonald, Paul S., History of the Concept of Mind: Speculations about Soul, Mind and Spirit from Homer to Hume, Aldershot 2003; Otto, Walter F., Die Manen oder von den Urformen des Totenglaubens, Darmstadt 1963 ([1]1923); Spranger, Eduard, Magie der Seele, Tübingen 1947.

→ Animism, Aristotelianism, Gnosticism, Immortality, Platonism, Psyche, Psychoanalysis, Shamanism

Burkhard Gladigow

South America

The Holy Mountain of the Zenú

1. Some few years ago, in Colombia, the Zenú undertook their traditional Easter pilgrimage to a cave on Mt. Sierrachiquita, abode of the mythical Kazike, Mohana. The white proprietor of the mountain paralyzed the 'pagan' cultic system by having the cave filled. As his punishment—so the Zenú believe—Mohana blinded him. At the same time, a firm from Barranquilla consolidated the mountain, the nature sanctuary, the reservoir for medicinal herbs, and the place for shamanic rituals, with the purpose of mining street-gravel. But since the mountain, as a Caiman, supports the earth, the Indians now fear the end of the world, through the flooding of their area by the sea beneath the world.

Indio-American Identity

2. For Indio-American cultures and religions such as those of the Zenú, 'Latin American identity' is: adjacency of Christian usage and the ancient gods and myths; Western economic imperialism and unlawful settlement of the land and territory; an urban slum-existence and exploitation of raw materials, in these regions, the remotest of the world. Basically, the Indio-American cultures are considered to be those that embrace the indigenous peoples of South and → Central America, as far as Honduras (to a line drawn between San Pedro Sulla and the Gulf of de Fonseca). The first Indians emigrated to America 14,000 years ago, hunters and gatherers from Northeast Asia, and settled the subcontinent all the way to Tierra del Fuego. Today they inhabit the three major anthropo-geographical regions 'Caribbean—Pacific—Andes' (they are the descendants of, among others, the Aymará and the Inca) and dwell in the tropical rainforest (Amazon, East Brazil), as well as in the Gran Chaco, all the way to Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego. Owing to the sometimes early mix with European immigrants ('mestization'), as well as to a vague assignment of land and water to fishing and farming populations (Caboclos of the Amazon, peasants), with their indigenous high-cultural inheritance, and owing to newly awakened Indian consciousness, statistical data on the Indians now living are unreliable. At present, demographers suppose populations totaling over 15 million (among others, eleven million Andeans and one million Amazons) for South American Indians. Aside from Peru and Bolivia, where Indians make up the lion's share of the population, and 'white' Argentina, the numerically largest group in South America is comprised of mestizos. South America displays an extraordinary cultural, ethnic, and linguistic diversity. More than one hundred and

The feasts of the saints, as here in San Andrés de Sotavento, on the Colombian coast of the Caribbean, exhibit the motif called the 'world upside-down.' Carnivalesque celebrations are ritualized rebellions, mounted by the socially and economically repressed Indians and Indo-Mestizos: even the 'whites' lionize Indian San Simón, who, as a mythical Cazike, defended the Indians against the whites, and they offer him contributions of maize beer (chichi) or money. In the orgiastic, powerful acts of the feasts, 'heated' society periodically 'cools off.'

twenty indigenous peoples live in Brazil alone: there are hunters (the Aché, Paraguay), planters (the Shuar, Ecuador), the Quaechua-speaking rural population of Peru (descendants of the Inca), Indians in remote areas (Kogi, Colombia), and 'acculturated' Indian farmers (Zenú, Colombia), besides the broad spectrum of the mestizo cultures. Despite numerous local types and divisions, religious world-images and cultic practices are bound by similar concepts, and these govern the thinking and acting of indigenous or Indio-Mestizo groups of South America. Hence it is possible to speak of a unitary 'Indio-American religion.'[1]

Today, millions of Indians are nominally Christians. Shortly after the 'discovery' of America (1492), European colonization and missionary activity began. The political and economic interests of the conquerors (read, greed for gold) received the religious stamp of approval as a 'Crusade' through papal bulls, especially since the Indians were said to be practicing → cannibalism, unbridled sexual activity, and devil worship. For the native inhabitants, 'discovery' meant physical annihilation, enslavement, forced Christianization, and the prohibition of their 'demoniacal' religious practice. The missionaries' cunning, with which they built churches on ravaged sites of indigenous worship, supplied the Indians with the opportunity to practice their 'heathenism' in thenceforth 'syncretist garb.' In this fashion, many Indian Christians continued to practice their respective Indian religions, as they always had.

Indio-American Worldview

3. The Indio-American cosmos consists of several layers, held together by a 'world axis': regions of the sky, then the earth, then the ocean of the lower world, upon which the earth rests. The 'life force' (in Span., espíritu) of sun or moon, of the wild, or of a lower world of 'living waters' (in Andean thought, source of the cyclical course of water), nourishes the cosmos. The vertical distinction is the outcome of destructions of the world having occurred in primeval time, through world flood and conflagration. The lower world is the domain of mighty water beasts (anaconda, caiman), heaven is the powerful realm of the robber birds (king vulture, harpy eagle), and the South America is strewn and studded with places of mythic qualities. Every waterhole, every mountain, every lake, every site along a river, may have the potential meaning and importance of a sacred place. Every people, then, every village, has its sacred places—the places of its mythical origin—as the symbolic cultural basis of its relations. The cartographical survey here shows that an Indio-American pilgrimage, as a collective mass-presentation, is fittingly regarded as the phenomenon of a 'high culture.' There is a mingling, on Colombian territory, of Incan and Aymarán tradition, and in Colombian territory, of pre-Spanish elements with Christendom. In the case of these cultures, even pre-Spanish pilgrimages are attested. Thus, these maps include only important cultic centers and meaningful pre-Colombian sites.

HONDURAS
NICARAGUA
WAYÚ / GUAJIRO
Kalus, rock fortification of the spirits, CUNA
Serrania del Darién
KOGI
Sorte
Caracas
Tacarigua Trinidad
WARAO
PANAMA
ZENÚ
CUNA
COLOMBIA
TUNEBO / CUNDIBOYACENSES
VENEZUELA
WARAO
Cerro Manoa
Karoshimo, world mountain of the WARAO
COSTA RICA
PAEZ
COYAIMA
NATAGAIMA
WAHARI
Tepui
GUYANA SURINAM
FRENCH GUIANA
YECUANA
Bogota
COCONUCO
YANACONA
Serra Parima
Hekula nature spirits of the Yanomami
Tispinapi
YAÑOMAMI
Grave of Venâncio Kamiko Christu, shaman and prophet of the BANIWA/ WAKUÉNAI around 1850
Batuque, Indo-African synthesis. Surrounding 'enchanted' lakes as habitations of the 'Water Mothers'; underground spirit palaces
TUKANO
MAKÚ
Myths of the Caboclos: mother of the fish, Kurupira - forest spirit
Quito
Cotopaxi
Belem
ECUADOR
Chimborazo
Itapiranga
Parintins
São Luis
TUKUNA
Temple Casa das Minas and Casa Nago
JÍVARO
Cachoeira Bela Vista
'Enchanted' habitation of spirits
Ayabaca
Huancabamba
Region of 'enchanted' high mountain lakes, in which water spirits live; initiations and healing rituals of the curanderismo
MUNDURUCÚ
CANELA
QUECHUA (INKA)
SHIPIBO CONIBO
CAYAPÓ
Rio Branco
Ayahuasca religion
B R A Z I L
Xango Recife
P E R U
CAMPA
Quyllur Rit'i (Quechua: snow glittering like the stars), pilgrimage in the honour of the mountain god Ausangate
Lima Pachacamac
Machu Picchu
MATSIGENKA
Paucartambo
XINGUANOS
Salvador de Bahia
Sun temple of Viracocha, central sanctuary of the INCAS
Coricancha
NAMBICUARA
SIRIONÓ
BORORO
XAVANTE
Candomblé
QUECHUA (INKA)
Titicaca See
Nazca-Desert
Capacabana
Tihuanaco
Worship of Mary and Pachamama
Brasilia
Janelão
Rock paintings of the Bororo
AYMARA
B O L I V I A
Gigantic geometric figures of the NAZCA culture, constellations, astronomic calendar for indigenous agriculture
MATACO
GUARANÍ
Christ statue on the Sugar Loaf Mountain
Umbanda
PARAGUAY
Rio de Janeiro
Llullailaco
Asunción
Sãn Paulo
Umbanda
CHILI
ACHÉ
PACIFIC OCEAN
Porto Alegre
Laguna del Cobre
ATLANTIC OCEAN
URUGUAY
Santiago
Buenos Aires
Montevideo
ARGENTINA
MAPUCHE
Volcanic snake mountains Tren Tren and mountains of the 'Mistress of the sea' Kai Kai in the myths of the MAPUCHE
Temuco
PATAGONIANS
SOUTH AMERICA
Sacred topography
Sacred mountain
Sacred lake, river, waterfall
Myth of the Gigantic Serpents
Myth of the Dolphin Spirit
Pre-Colombian sanctuary
Catholic and popular religion
María Lionza religion
Afro-American religions
TUKUNA
WAHARI
Indian cultures
0 500
1000 km
F.D.2005

The village of Charazani celebrates the Feast of Todos Santos (Sp., 'All Saints'). Here, the Christian feasts of All Saints and All Souls, November 1 and 2, are connected with pre-Christian conceptualizations of the return of the dead (cf. → Death and Dying). In this region, loved ones return after their deaths as almas nuevas (Sp., 'new souls') for three feasts of All Saints, and visit the cabins in which they have lived. On November 2, the villagers go out to the cemetery, accompanied by music groups, whose flutes and drums have played uninterruptedly since the day before. Families with a 'new soul' bring gifts along. Days before, sugar-cane poles have been constructed, in their cabin, hung with breads and fruits, and standing on a richly draped table. Nor must bottles of whiskey be lacking. Many of the celebrants are already tipsy, since, after Mass on November 1, they have entered the homes in which the 'new souls' have paid a visit, spoken prayers, and conversed all night long, drinking alcohol. At the cemetery, the gifts are supposed to be placed at the graves. In what one might call the Quechua catechism, the position taken by the Catholic Church with regard to the usages of Todos Santos becomes ambivalent. Nevertheless, in the everyday ritual of the Bolivian Andes in the area of the usages pertaining to the dead, a contiguity of Christian and non-Christian religious elements is feasible. (Kirsten Holzapfel, following Ina Rösing) forest supports the jaguar. In some instances, these sorts of animals are also supernatural beings, even with their human traits—after all, an incarnation or 'ensocietization' of the universe will generate a 'mythic familiarity' with it, preserving, naturally, its often menacing ambivalence. Regions of the sky and underworld harbor mythical primitive beings, and souls of the dead. The horizontal perspective is ethnocentric: the region of one's own we-group, human culture, is ensconced in the center of space, and separated from the 'without': from the wild, with its spirits, and other unfamiliar beings.

The Wild

A sacred geography marks the inhabited areas of indigenous peoples, makes territorial claims visible in battles over land, forms places of pilgrimage, and constitutes an identity in the ethnicity of cultures. The key orientation pattern is the uncontrollable wild, with its life and power, so different from the zone of culture. The wild (watering places, caves) is the gate to the lower world, and as cultic 'border region,' the place of shamanic initiation. Water, medicinal plants, and wild beasts are tentative gifts of the universe; they have spiritual masters and mothers (Lord of the Animals, plant spirits, Water Mother). With the utilization of these nature-resources (mythically: 'life force,' espíritu), the human being must observe a complicated network of rules of reciprocal relations ('principle of reciprocity'). He must kill only the number of animals that he receives as 'gifts,' granted by the guardian spirits in exchange for souls of the dead or sacrificial offerings (tobacco, coca). Uncontrolled contact with the wild entails the risk of losing one's own life power. The spirits punish greedy persons, like the Colombian mountain-owner mentioned above, with bad hunting or illness. In a context of the indigenous "philosophy of dynamic equilibrium" (G. Reichel-Dolmatoff), the prohibitions connected with the use ('taming') of the wilderness or with hunting are mechanisms of ecological control that are frequently misunderstood as the wisdom of Indian 'Eco-saints' in a Western, mystifying interpretation (→ Orientalism/Exotism; Environmentalism).

The Two Worlds

"There are two ways of seeing things." When the Kogi proclaim their thought, they speak of aluna—'spirit,' 'thought,' 'essence of things,' 'concealed true reality.' 'Everyday reality' is illusion. The polarity between the visible and the invisible world explains the importance and meaning of ritual drug-consumption (e.g., of Yagé, or Quechua ayahuasca, 'soul liana'—a brew of jungle liana, Banisteriopsis sp.; → Trance), the importance and meaning of shamanic ecstasy and vision. The two worlds entirely interpenetrate; the invisible world can turn on human beings; shamans are the defenders of their own community, since they have at their disposition mighty spirits of defense and assistance (e.g., the jaguar); through these spirits, they are able to regulate relations between human beings and spirit beings. The power of the shamans rests not least of all on their knowledge (legitimized in ecstasy), on their seeing 'true' reality in visions, and on their deliberately seeking out this reality, in which they are then able to act. Their tasks, then, are: healing, weather control, interpretation of presages and dreams, provision of hunting animals, handling (socialization) of fare, escort of the souls of the dead to the region of their cosmic destination, and execution of the rituals.

Hot and Cold—a Dynamic Equilibrium

Dialectically complementary polarities (not → dualisms!) are characteristic of Indio-American thought. The principle that everything in the world possesses a certain measure of espíritu or calor ('heat'), determines the 'religious everyday.' Objects or events in the espíritu world are 'hot,' espíritu-poor ones are 'cold,' the human being attains wellness and serenity only when s/he maintains a dynamic equilibrium among factors separately containing a 'too much' or a 'too little' of espíritu. By periodic 'coolings,' festivals prevent too great a 'heating' of society and cosmos. Violent activity, and wild drinking bouts, are the expression of the creator's craving for destruction, and serve for the maintenance or renewal of the world order.[2] Thus, at Andean festivals, the male (ira) and female (arka) principles crash into each other, in a bloody, frequently deadly, ritual battle, and are dialectically reconciled in the tinku, the dynamic equilibrium of complementary opposites.

Illness and Healing—the Curandero

Healing from culturally specific, spiritual illness is the affair of the shaman (curandero, Sp., 'healer'), in situations such as when, in ecstasy, he seeks out the cosmic regions and brings back the sufferer's soul. A diagnosis is possible only through the shaman's clairvoyance, for instance, through the recognition of infectious spirits in the patient's urine. The Indian medico-religious complex testifies to uninterrupted vitality: the Sibundoy Indians (Southwestern Colombia) practice their trade in remedial plants as far as Costa Rica, and shamans are active in the big cities of Latin American 'whites.' The spirituality of the shamans, mediators of the conflictive relationships among the classes, cultures, and ethnic groups, becomes a coveted commodity: one buys spirit for money. The socioeconomic impetus to acculturation, sharpened by international technology and globalization, is balanced out by indigenous 'magic,' and charms meant to harm (sometimes as a weapon in the battle of the classes!).

The Indio-American Religions Today

6. Even five hundred years after Columbus, massive Christian attempts to missionize and repress Indio-Americans achieve only partial outcomes. In 'syncretistic piety,' usually the result of 'quiet' cultural resistance on the part of the defeated, not infrequently the Indian underlay shines through a Christian veneer. Thus, Catholic saints have been incorporated as a 'foreign word' into the indigenous 'religious grammar.' For a successful harvest, the descendants of the Incas in Peru and Bolivia make offerings to the Blessed Virgin Mary, who has fused with the earth mother Pachamama. Curanderos work with saints and angels, their 'shamanic' succoring spirits. For Indio-mestizos, Jesus is the Sun, traversing the sky with his medicine bag, resting at noon and chewing coca. Indio-Americans make pilgrimages to the ancestors' sacred mountains, in whose caves the mythical gold caiman and Catholic saints peacefully coexist.

Charismatic Movements and Messianic Hopes

However, the picture of peaceful coexistence can be deceiving. On the heels of a newly awakened Indian awareness and movements of revitalization, Indian saints—charismatically gifted Indians, reverenced as saints after their death—and miraculous sacred images discovered by Indians in the wild are set up over against the 'dead' saints of the whites. The operations of fundamentalist, evangelical sects from the United States, such as the Pentecostalists, or the Summer Institute of Linguistics in Northwestern Amazonia, were frequently the prelude of later economic exploitation of resources (mineral oil, etc.) in Indian regions, and hence had more of a destructive than an enhancing effect on Indian cultures. To be sure, a mixture of indigenous religion and Anglican Protestantism are leading to syncretistic revival movements ('Hallelujah religion'): shamanic prophets among the Akawaio Guayanas announced the falsification of the salvific message by white missionaries who sought to dissuade the Indians from entertaining any hope of material riches (→ Charismatic Movement).[3] In the future-vision of the descendants of the Incas, the rule of the Christian God is at an end when Inkarrí, the mythic personification of the Inca ruler murdered by Spaniards, and leader of rebellions, rises up once more from his dismembered body: 'blood flow,' and 'blood sun,' then mark the 'world turner' (pachacuti), the end of the 'white' world, and the beginning of a new, Indian world-age. The sources of Inca mythology nourished the early-colonial, religio-political possession cult of the taqui oncoy ("Song/Dance of the Pleiades"; c. 1560), just as did, finally, the 'liberation ideology' of the Peruvian guerrilla movement "Shining Path" (Sendero Luminoso). Eschatological hopes also nourished Andean popular theater, which presented the colonial trauma—the Spanish invasion—experienced as a cosmic catastrophe, from the 'standpoint of the defeated,' and thereby overcame it. Messianic movements are attested even in pre-Spanish Indio-America—phenomena intensified, it is true, by a social situation of contact with the 'whites'—as with the religious migrations of the Tupí-Guarani (Brazil, Paraguay) in quest of the 'land without evil.'

In the modern metropolises of Latin America as well, Indian life is by no means characterized by adaptation alone. Guajiro women (Venezuela/Colombia) react to the 'Wilderness' Macaraibos with "their longing to shamanize,"[4] the Andean rural population who have migrated to the cities contribute their earnings (from taxis and shops) to Pachamama, along with their traditional drink offerings (ch'alla). City cults of healing, based on the Indian drug Yagé, transcend all classes and ethnic groups: in Brazil, Peru, and Bolivia, there has appeared the Ayahuasca religion that propagates the drinking of the 'sacramental drug' (especially for salvific purposes), under the direction of a shaman or spiritist.[5] In the common life of the cultures, forms are mixed together, such as the Indio-African Batuque religion (Northern Brazil), or the Indio-African-European synthesis of Venezuela's Maria Lionza religion. The region of the dead of Cuna (Panama), overflowing with Western consumer goods, the rocky places of the spirits with the golden skyscrapers, parades, and telephones, all testify to the ability of Indian culture to rework influences of modern times without surrendering their own culture.

1. Hofer, Florian, Der "heiße" Strom des "kalten" Wassers, Munich 1995; Faust, Franz, Totgeschwiegene indianische Welten. Eine Reise in die Philosophie der Nordanden, Gehren 1998.
2. Cf. Sullivan 1988, 195ff.
3. Münzel, Mark, Die Indianer, vol. 2: Mittel- und Südamerika, Munich 1985, 234f.
4. Perrin, in: Langdon/Baer 1992, 117ff.
5. Taussig 1987; Ramirez/Pinzón, in: Langdon/Baer 1992, 287ff. (Colombia); Luna, Luis Eduardo, Vegetalismo. Shamanism among the Mestizo Population of the Peruvian Amazon, Stockholm 1986; Fichte, Hubert, Lazarus und die Waschmaschine, Frankfurt/M. 1985 (pp. 187-203; "Blue Castle," in Rio Branco, Brazil).

Literature

Gossen, Gary H. (ed.), South and Meso-American Native Spirituality: From the Cult of the Feathered Serpent to the Theology of Liberation, New York 1993; Griffiths, Nicholas, The Cross and the Serpent: Religious Repression and Resurgence in Colonial Peru, Norman 1996; Langdon, Jean/Baer, Gerhard (eds.), Portals of Power: Shamanism in South America, Albuquerque 1992; MacCormack, Sabine, Religion in the Andes: Vision and Imagination in Early Colonial Peru, Princeton 1991; McDowell, John Holmes, Sayings of the Ancestors: The Spiritual Life of the Sibundoy Indians, Lexington 1989; Perrin, Michel, The Way of the Dead Indians: Guajir Myths and Symbols, Austin 1987; Reichel-Dolmatoff, Gerardo, The People of Aritama, London 1961; Idem, The Forest Within: The World-View of the Tukano Amazonian Indians, Totnes 1996; Sullivan, Lawrence, Icanchu's Drum: An Orientation to Meaning in South American Religions, New York 1985; Taussig, Michael, Shamanism, Colonialism and the Wild Man: A Study in Terror and Healing, Chicago 1987; Idem, Mimesis and Alterity: A Particular History of the Senses, New York 1993.

→ Afro-American Religions, Animal, Central America, Colonialism, Cosmology/Cosmogony, Liberation Theology, Mission, North America (Traditional Religions), Shamanism

Josef Drexler

Southeast Asia

The Region

1. a) Southeast Asia comprises (Islamic) Malaysia and the (primarily Buddhist) states of Burma (Myanmar), Thailand, Laos, Kampuchea, and Vietnam.

Wars and Crises without End?

b) Imperialism, first that of the British and French, then of the United States in the Vietnam War, inflicted deep wounds. The Khmer Rouge reign of terror shocked and stunned the entire region. Even after the withdrawal of soldiers, however, cultures collided once more. Armies were succeeded by economy and tourism, both sometimes viewed as another kind of imperialism. Millions of persons work for subsistence wages, many earn their money in the dangerous sex market for years, and then pay dearly with their misery. Alarming modernizations in the cities, and retardation on the countryside, plunge the region into crisis after crisis. The West perceives China and Communism as heavily tinting the region's independence, but (especially Theravada) Buddhism from India shapes an older class identity affecting these countries. Buddhist monks, in their own way, repeatedly struggled with the foreign conquerors.

c) In the second century BCE, North Vietnam fell under a roughly one-thousand-year Chinese hegemony. With the occupation, there arrived in the region not only the teachings of Chinese → Daoism and → Confucianism, but later various schools of Mahayana Buddhism as well, that had developed in China. In the course of time, these currents were mixed with an indigenous veneration of → ancestors, and there arose a variegated popular religion.

Beginning in the third century, Indian traders brought philosophical and religious ideas from their homeland into today's Burma (Myanmar), and in post-Christian times, all the way to Vietnam by sea. In Middle Vietnam and Kampuchea, the Hindu-influenced realms of Champa and Angkor materialized. Rather at the same time, Buddhist-influenced dominions formed in Burma and Thailand. In the twelfth century, in Burma, Theravada Buddhism was elevated to the status of state religion. The contemporary rulers

On a street in the inner city of Rangoon, Burma (Myanmar), in the afternoon of the November full moon, a kathina festival is held. The Buddha himself was the originator of the direction that fully ordained members of orders should stop at one place during the four-month rainy season (vassa), between the months of savanna (July/August) and kattika (October/November). The obligation of residence lasts three months. Vassa is an opportunity for the lay members to express their veneration, and to gain merit by supplying the orders with necessities. When the rainy season is at an end, the kathina period begins, lasting until the next full moon. The kathina period extends the gift-giving time to the month of phagunna (February/March). The most important event of Thailand, Laos, and Kampuchea followed this example. Beginning in the fifteenth century, the kings of the lands of Southeast Asia reinforced their positions of power vis-à-vis Buddhist order-communities (sangha). The clergy of these countries is even today controlled by the state.

With the exception of Vietnam and Malaysia, the writing systems of the countries of Southeast Asia developed from the writing systems of India. The cultic language of the lands of Theravada Buddhism is Pali.

2. The practice of religion is possible even in the Socialist states of Laos and Vietnam, and the number of monks and novices—in Vietnam also nuns—is great. In Theravada countries, women are fully ordained only in exceptional cases, and, as a rule, do not enjoy the great respect accorded by believers to the monks.

In popular conceptualizations, it is important for the laity to acquire merit in order to achieve a favorable rebirth. Monks provide them with the opportunity to do so, by accepting meals from them, for example. Merit can also be acquired through contributions of money or goods to monasteries. On all important occasions in the life of a person (birth, marriage, death), monks are invited into the houses of the laity to conduct ceremonies. In many difficulties, those in search of counsel turn to the clergy. The monasteries also offer the laity instruction in Buddhist teaching.

a) As a rule, believers do not visit temples on a daily basis, but only on religious or personal festival days, or on pilgrimage. Early in the morning, a ritual takes place before the home altar. Before personal meditation, one offers flowers, incense sticks, vegetables, or the like, to the statue of the Buddha.

b) In Southeast Asia, various 'religious levels' are superimposed that have existed there even before Buddhism, and that play a role alongside Buddhism even today. It is particularly in Theravada Buddhism that the Buddha stands for a path of salvation without a divine function attaching to him. Persons turn to the gods of → Hinduism for the fulfillment of their desires, or avail themselves of → amulets for protection against all manner of iniquity and insult. Before weighty decisions in life, before a marriage, for example, or a long journey, men and women are summoned to consult as astrologers or prophets, or advice is sought from oracles. Monks are not actually supposed to turn to these practices, but they tolerate them, and are usually present at them when popular religious rites are performed that are regarded as subordinate to Buddhism.

Belief in spirits long preceded the arrival of Buddhism in Southeast Asia. Only certain persons could enter into contact with this special world: the mediums or the shamans. Even in Southeast Asia's modern cities, little spirit-houses in front of homes testify to belief in this old tradition. In order to placate the potential hostility of the spirit upon whose territory human persons have come, a Brahmin or an astrologer must perform a ceremony of consecration. The house spirit is thenceforward to be nourished with daily sacrifices of food and drink. Even the spirits of trees, mountains, and waters must be dealt with, as well as with that of an unnatural death. Magical powers are visibly attributed, especially to high, old trees, through the many variegated wish-ribbons around their trunks. Notions of the spirits have kept pace with changes: repeatedly, one sees on the rear-view mirror of an automobile, or on the bow of a boat, fresh garlands—for the spirits who are to watch over one's journeying. Among the important family celebrations (naming of a child, marriage, important journeys, the New Year, but not a funeral), the Baci ceremony is included, presided over by a respected member of the family or neighborhood. Here as well, monks may be present, but do not take part in the ritual. The reconciliation of human beings with one another, and of the world of human beings and spirits, takes place here, around the Baci Tree. Reciprocal good wishes are wrapped around the wrist in the form of a cotton ribbon, an act intended at the same time to ward off evil spirits.

c) According to Buddhist notions, death is but a way station along the route to a new rebirth. Still, in many countries of Southeast Asia, families commemorate their dead on the anniversary of the day of their death. Especially in Vietnam, but also among Thais of Chinese extraction, the veneration of ancestors takes place according to the Chinese model.

The countries of Southeast Asia are home to a multiplicity of ethnic minorities, partly immigrants of recent centuries, partly the early rulers of the region, such as the minority of the Cham in Vietnam and Kampuchea, who today belong to Islam. Most ethnic groups have heir own (tribal) religions and cults, influenced little, if at all, by Buddhism.

is the bestowal of the kathina garments to the community of the order. The robes are further distributed among the individual monks who have spent the rainy season in the monastery in question. The donations may consist simply of material for sewing, or of finished robes—the latter being more customary in Rangoon. At the bestowal, the veneration of the Buddha, and the triple 'flight' formula is recited ("I flee to the Buddha …"). Then a lay member, holding a pile of robes in both hands, says: "Revered ones, modestly bring we forth these kathina robes, and other gifts of the community." The monks respond, "Sadhu" ("Good"), and recite verses, such as "Merit is the flight of all beings in the next world." There is also a custom of holding weaving contests in large pagodas during the November full moon. Young women vie with one another to weave a robe that, subsequently, is usually draped over a figure of the Buddha. Usually, families (including those of the neighborhood) invite the monks to come before their houses. Electric amplification assures that, at least acoustically, the whole street participates in the festival. (T. Fessel and M. Petrich)

Religion and Politics

The Buddhism of Southeast Asia has repeatedly had to adapt to new circumstances in the course of its history.

With entry into a monastery, monks renounce secular life, and therewith politics as well. However, it has repeatedly occurred that, in times of crisis, the clergy has surrendered its neutral position, and monks have always, to a greater or lesser extent, been active in political actions. We can see this clearly in Burma (Myanmar) during the colonial period, and still today. The West has observed the resistance emerging from the monasteries in the fiery self-immolation of Buddhist monks during the Vietnam War.

Subjects discussed today in the countries of Southeast Asia are, among

CHINA
Tran-Quoc Temple (oldest temple); Quan-Tanh Temple with the patron god of the north; Ngoc-Son Temple of the national hero Tran Hung Dao
Ho Chi Minh Mausoleum
Van Mieu, Temple of Literature, 11th century
Joseph Cathedral, 1886
HANOI
Old Capitals
Amarapura, Ava
Pindaya
Mandalay
Last capital of Burmese Kingdom; Kuthodaw Pagoda, 729 stone stelae with texts of the Pali canon, Arakan pagoda with a Mahamuni Buddha statue
Mount Popa
Nat cult center (nature spirits)
Pagan (Bagan)
Old capital with over 2,000 sacred ruins
Chiang Rai
Pak Nam Ou MYANMAR
Wat Phra Keo, formerly housed the Phra Keo Buddha (today in Bangkok)
Luang Prabang
LAOS
Prabang Buddha, museum; Wat Xieng Thong, former royal temple, Wat Aham, early seat of the supreme head of the Buddhist orders of Laos
Chiang Mai
1
That Luang, reliquary building; Wat Si Saket, former royal temple Ho Phra Keo, today a museum
VIENTIANE
Shwemawda pagoda with hair relic of the Buddha; Buddha of Shwethalyaung at the entrance to Nirvana
Place of pilgrimage; the rock is said to be held up by one hair of the Buddha
Pegu (Bago)
Golden Rock
(Kyaik-Tiyu)
Si Satchanalai
12/13th century
2
Place of pilgrimage for Thai and Laotians, reliquary in Laotian style
Phu-Cam and Notre Dame Cathedral
Thien Mu Pagoda, 17th cent., prophecy of a great dynasty
RANGOON (YANGOON)
Sukothai
Phitsanulok
Wat Mahathat, Buddha as triumphant king
That Phanom
Hué
Temple in Marble Mountains
Kampheng Phet
12/13th century
THAILAND
Danang
Hoi An
Shwedagon Pagoda (Golden Temple), main sanctuary of the country; International Meditation Center; Mahasi Meditation Center
Phimai,Phanom Rung
Wat Muang Tam
Khmer
Wat Nong Paa Pong
Wat Paa Nanachat
Bung Wai
Uban Ratchathani
Myson, Dong Duong, Tra Khieu
Cham
Former royal Temple Wat Phra Si Sanpeth; Wat Phra Buddha Hadh, track of Buddha Vat Phu
Khmer
Ayuthia
Phra Pathom Chedi, largest reliquary of the country
Nakhon Pathon
Wat Khao Phra Vihar
Khmer
Temple of Chinese traders in the settlements of Chinese immigrants
BANGKOK
Angkor
Khmer
CAMBODIA
VIETNAM
Wat Phra Keo (Royal Temple) with the 'Emerald Buddha' Wat Chethupon with Buddha at the entrance to Nirvana; Wat Benchamabopit (Marble Temple), Seat of the highest abbot of the country; International Buddhist Meditation Center; Wat Mahathat Fellowship of Buddhism
Pattaya
Boonkanjaram Meditation Center
Cathedral, built in 1930s; Domaine-de-Marie convent, Nunnery; Protestant church Hoa Lai
Cham
Dalat
Silver pagoda Wat Phnom Don Penh (Royal Temple from which the city takes its name); Wat Qunalom, Seat of the Head of the Buddhist orders of Cambodia
PHNOM PENH
Thay Ninh
Tu-Lam-Tu, Principal Temple
INDIAN OCEAN
Ho Chi Minh City
Notre Dame, 19th century
Tuol-Sleng Museum, torture place of the Khmer Rouge; Choeng Ek, "Killing Fields", mass graves and bone pagoda to the victims of the Khmer Rouge
Chaya
Wat Suan Mok
Thien-Hau pagoda to the goddess of seafarers; Giac-Lam pagoda (oldest of the city); Giac-Vien Temple with gilded Buddha statues
Phuket
Nakhon Si Thammarat
Vegetarian festival of Chinese immigrants
Wat Phra Mahathat, reliquary and Phra Sihing Buddha
1 Chiang Mai
To Chiang Mai (North Thailand) Pilgrimage center Wat Phra That Doi Suthep; Wat Phra Singh mit Phra-Sihin Buddha and convent school; Wat Chiang Mai with two Buddha statues to bring rain, the oldest temple of the city; Wat Chedi Luang, Chedi ruin, shrine to the patron spirit of the city; Wat Suan Dok, modern Buddha with rice sheaf; Wat Chet Yot, replica of the Maha-Bodhi temple of Bodh Gaya, 8th Buddhist Council 1477; Meditation Center Wat Tapotaram
SOUTH CHINA SEA
2 Sukothai (North Thailand)
Old capital of the Thai; Wat Mahathat, Wat Sra Sri, Wat MALĀYSIA
INDONESIA
F.D.2005
SOUTHEAST ASIA
Preponderant Religious Membership
Theravāda Buddhism
Mahāyāna Buddhism / Confucianism / Daoism
Tribal religions
Islam
Religious Minorities
Christians
Muslims
Hoa Hao
Sacred Topography
Buddhist sanctuary
Buddhist meditation center
Hindu
Popular religion; Mahāyāna Buddhism
Confucian
Christian
Cao Dai
Archaeological sites (sacred ruins)
National memorial site
Sacred mountain
Cultic caves
0 250
500 km

others, a democratization of the hierarchy of the order, engagement for peace, dialogue with other religions, and the introduction of women's ordination. Opportunities for meditation, which attract more travelers from the West each year, have been developed recently in various monasteries of the region.

In Vietnam in the twentieth century, two very syncretistic religious movements have developed: the Hoa Hao, which emphasizes the simplicity of a cult of a Buddhist hue, and the community of the Cao Dai, so striking, among other reasons, for the colorful attractiveness of their sacred installations and their cult.

Tourism

The countries of Southeast Asia are favorite destinations for travelers. The negative effects on those whose lands the tourists visit are often emphasized. However, → tourism has positive aspects, as well. Among them belong, for instance, restorations of historical and religious sites, and the study of their own culture and religion by indigenous groups who work in tourism, often attracted by dialogue with travelers from other cultural circles. Travelers gain insight into religious traditions, standing in parallel or merged, and into another style of everyday life, in which religion obviously belongs. And they learn tolerance toward foreigners, not only in the religious area, but in personal contact, as well—experiences that can contribute to a better understanding of foreign cultures.

Literature

Boyes, Jonathan, Tiger-Men and Tofu Dolls: Tribal Spirits in Northern Thailand, Chiang Mai 1997; Bunnag, Jane, Buddhist Monk, Buddhist Layman, Cambridge 1973; Mendelson, E. Michael, Sangha and State in Burma, Ithaca 1975; Terwiel, Barend Jan, Monks and Magic: An Analysis of Religious Ceremonies in Central Thailand, Bangkok [3]1994; Vietnam Buddhist Research Institute, Vietnam Buddhism and Its Activities for Peace, Ho Chi Minh City 1990.

→ Amulet, Ancestors, Buddhism, China/Japan/Korea, Confucianism, Daoism, Hinduism, Islam, Shamanism, Tourism

Brigitte Heusel

Southeast Asia: Time Chart

Era 1: Migratory movements

from 3000 BCE	Immigration from North to South	Peoples unwilling to subject themselves to a China now expanding southward, emigrate to Southeast Asia, partially dislodging the original population. They dispose of better tools and farming methods than do the natives there.

c. 300 BCE	Dong Son culture	Sacred bronze drums have been found throughout Southeast Asia. Their decorations break open notions of the other world, and to shamanic rituals of the time in question.
208 BCE	The first empire in Southeast Asia	Nam Viet (today's South China and North Vietnam) is established in the tangles and disorders of the end of the first Empire of China as an independent state—the first realm that can be historically indicated in Southeast Asia.
2nd cent. BCE	Expansion of China	The trade route from China westward leads through today's Myanmar (Burma). The realm of Nam Viet will be a colony of China for a thousand years (111 BCE to 938 CE).
Era 2: Influences from India and China
first centuries CE	Indian and Chinese traders in Southeast Asia	With the rise of maritime commerce, the mainland and the islands of China constitute an important objective for Indian merchant ships. It is not only wares, but ideas as well, that reach Southeast Asia with the ships.

	First "Indisized" Empires: Funan (today's Kampuchea), Langkasuka and Tambralinga (today's Malaysia). Oc Eo an important harbor city	The empires will organize on Indian models. Hinduism marks the elite of Funan. In both realms of Malaysia, it is especially Buddhism that spreads. The written language is adopted from India. Tribute to China is required.
4th–8th cent.	Broader extent of Hinduism and Buddhism	Indian influences reach from Arakan (today's Myanmar) to the island world. Further "Indisized" realms are founded, whose rulers are oriented toward Buddhism (Mon realms) or Hinduism (Champa). Flourishing cultures arise, with a tendency toward the architecture and art of India. Maritime commerce with farm products, precious metals and stones, precious cloth and spices, flourishes between the Mediterranean region and the Far East. Prosperity finds its expression in the construction of sacred installations, e.g., Borobodur.
9th–13th cent.	God-kings: The Realm of Angkor	'Revolution' in rice farming. A network of irrigation canals spreads through the Kambodjan plain, supporting three harvests annually. The superabundance of rice is the foundation of the Khmer Realm.

		It becomes possible to support many types of labor and craft. Kings are seen as the progeny of Indian gods (especially of Shiva), and have absolute power. An expression of this power is constituted by the sacred installations created by hordes of workers at once, as, e.g., Angkor Vat (mid-twelfth century).
11th cent.	Buddhist realm of Bagan (Pagan)	With the assistance of monks from Sri Lanka, the King of Bagan introduces pure Theravada into his country, as the high religion of the country, while the veneration of Nat (spirits) continues. Close contacts with Sri Lanka.
12th–15th cent.	Flowering and end of the Hindu kingdoms of Southeast Asia: Theravada Buddhism on the march	Wars between the two Hindu Realms, Champa and Angkor, weaken the power of both. In the thirteenth century, there is more immigration to deal with, at the advance of the Mongols. In mid-thirteenth century, realms of the Thai materialize: c. 1250 Sukothai, Ayutthaya in 1350, and Lan Chang (1354).
Era 3: The influence of Islam from the 7th cent.	New Order in maritime trading	With maritime mercantile supremacy in Arab hands, Islam arrives in Southeast Asia by the sea trade. Missionaries do not enter with fire and sword, but little by little the natives adopt the new faith, as had been the case with India.

13th–15th cent.	First Islamic realms in Southeast Asia: Sumatra, Malacca	Dynasties of Islamic coloring and tone replace the Indian system of government. Followers of Islamic mysticism are often teachers of a native elite.
Era 4: Christianity comes
1511	Portuguese conquer Malacca	With the capture of Malacca, and the continued Portuguese advance, the old mercantile order in Southeast Asia is destroyed. In 1493, the Pope divides the (then known) world into Spanish and Portuguese spheres of authority for mission and trade.
16th–19th cent.	Beginning of the colonization of Southeast Asia	Unlike that of the sailors from India and Near Asia, the appearance of the Europeans is no example for the population (i.e., Christianity is not voluntarily adopted).
19th cent.	Division of Southeast Asia among Holland, Great Britain, and France	A reconsideration of the individual cultures and religions. In Thailand, King Rama IV introduces a reforming structure into Theravada Buddhism (Thammayut). In Burma, the fifth Buddhist Council (1871).

Era 5: Independence
early 20th cent.	Reconsideration and New Order	A reconsideration of the native religions, and, where necessary, their reform, reinforces a resistance to the colonial lords.
from 1945	Colonies become independent states	To an extent, independence is followed by civil wars, and renewed assaults from the West (Vietnam). Sixth Buddhist Council (1956), in Rangoon (Yangoon, Burma/Myanmar). The attempt at a Buddhist socialism fails.
1966–1973	Vietnam War	Buddhist monks and nuns burn themselves alive, in protest against the role of the United States and the South Vietnamese government.
from 1975	In quest of the paradises	The religions of Southeast Asia, especially Buddhism, awaken the interest of searchers for meaning from Western countries.
2001	New conflicts	After bloody battles, East Timor (Christian) becomes an independent state. Reforms in the socialist states of Southeast Asia (Laos, Vietnam) proceed in the same direction, and enable a freer religious practice. In the South Philippines and Indonesia, further tensions between Islamic minorities and the (Catholic) majority.

Brigitte Heusel

South Sea / Australia

The Area

'South Sea' is an old name for the Pacific Ocean. Today it means the part of the Pacific comprising the Islands of Oceania. This is an area of ca. 70 million square kilometers, all surrounding 7,500 Pacific islands between America, the Philippines, and Australia. Oceania can be divided into Melanesia, Micronesia, and Polynesia. New Zealand in the South, and Papua-New Guinea in the West, are also numbered among the states of the South Sea, while Australia, as a continent by itself, no longer belongs to it geographically. The islands of Hawaii and Easter Island, lying along the northern and eastern perimeter, do indeed spread into the region of Oceania, but are territories either of the United States (Hawaii) or of Chile (Easter Island). Considering their extensive political and economic dependency on, and the transformation of the values of their social culture by the states possessing them, they will need no further mention in the following consideration.

The South Sea has always been a fascinating destination for travelers of every bent and purpose. Soldiers, researchers, painters, and missionaries have traversed the islands, atolls, and coral reefs of the Pacific Ocean ever since their discovery. The native population were seldom taken into consideration. A recent example was the French atom-bomb experiments in the Moruroa Atoll (French Polynesia), in 1995. Just as earlier, with the Americans on the atolls of Bikini and Eniwetok (Marshall Islands), or the British on Christmas Island (Kiribati), so neither does the French colonial power exercise any consideration for inhabitants and environment, but, just as always before, asserts its right to make any determination whatsoever over the native population's life and goods. This disregard has always had multiple societal effects, not least of all upon the religion of the South Sea Islanders. What missionaries have not managed to finish, soldiers and politicians have finished by force. Thus, Polynesians in Tahiti (French Polynesia), persons ruled by French and economically controlled by Chinese, feel like tolerated foreigners in their own country. Although Oceania was divided up into an extensively postcolonial society by independent states, the old economic and political dependencies remain.

CHINA
TAIPEH
OKINAWA
(Japan) Taiwan
MIDWAY ISLANDS
Tropic of Cancer
HONOLULU
HAWAII
NORTHERN MARIANAS
WAKE (USA)
PHILIPPINE SEA PHILIPPINES
MANILA
Guam (USA)
PACIFIC OCEAN
MARSHALL ISLANDS
ENIWETOK ATOL
BIKINI ATOL
MICRONESIA
POLYNESIA
Palau KOROR
KAROLINE ISLANDS
KOLONIA
DALAP-ULIGA-DARRIT
FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF MICRONESIA
MELANESIA
BARIKI
YAREN
Equator
Nauru Kiribati
(GILBERT ISLANDS)
PHOENIX ISLANDS
PAPUA NEW GUINEA
SOLOMON ISLANDS
TOKELAU ISLANDS
(New Zealand)
Tuvalu
INDONESIA
EAST TIMOR
DILI
VAIAKU
MARQUESAS ISLANDS
PORT MORESBY
HONIARA
TROBRIAND ISLANDS
WEST SAMOA
AMERICAN SAMOA
FRENCH POLYNESIA
Darwin
WALLIS AND FUTUNA
(France)
APIA
COOK ISLANDS
(New Zealand)
VANUATU
(NEW HEBRIDES)
TUAMOTU ISLANDS
NORTHERN TERRITORY
CORAL SEA
PORT VILA
SUVA Tonga
Niue
(New Zealand)
Tahiti
NEW CALEDONIA
(Kanaky)
(France)
Fidschi
NUKU'ALOFA
TUBUAI ISLANDS
MORUROA-ATOL
PITCAIRN ISLANDS
(Great Britain)
AUSTRALIA
Alice Springs
Tropic of Capricorn
QUEENSLAND
WEST AUSTRALIA
Uluru (Ayers Rock)
Brisbane
EASTER ISLAND
(Chile)
SOUTHERN AUSTRALIA
Perth
NEW SOUTH WALES
TASMANIAN SEA
Sydney
Adelaide
CANBERRA
VICTORIA
Melbourne
Auckland
NEW ZEALAND
TASMANIA
WELLINGTON
INDIAN OCEAN
Hobart
SOUTH SEA AND AUSTRALIA
Religious Communities (Central foci)
Indigenous religions
Cargo cults
Anglicans
Catholics
Protestants (various churches)
Adventists
Mormons
Hindus
Muslims
Daoists
Buddhists
Sacred Topography
Sacred Mountain / Rock
(In Australia) State-recognized Aboriginal land

2. Considering the religious landscape of Oceania today, it is first notable that the current religions of Oceania are determined by their colonial Christian legacy. The original, indigenous religions, cults, magic, and myths of the islands of Oceania either were overwhelmed culturally, or perished in social upheavals and in the annihilation of traditional forms of subsistence (fishing, → Exchange/Gift).

Polynesia

a) To the Polynesian group of islands, over a surface of about 50 million square kilometers, belong the independent states of Tuvalu (former Ellice Islands, population c. 10,000 inhabitants), Tonga (c. 110,000), West Samoa (c. 215,000), and New Zealand (c. 3.5 million). In addition, there are regions figuring as dependent colonies, including, under New Zealander administration, the Cook Islands (c. 20,000 inhabitants), American Samoa (c. 60,000), and French Polynesia (c. 220,000). Polynesia is thus the region most dependent on the erstwhile colonial powers in Oceania. This dependency has effects in all areas of life, and, after two hundred years of Western influence, traditional culture in Polynesia has dissolved. Societies and religions of Polynesia have very extensively conformed to Western culture.

Christian Mission and the Fall of the Ancient Religions

The systematic missionizing of the South Sea began at the end of the eighteenth century. In the wake of the discoveries by Englishman James Cook (1729–1779), missionary ships, especially from Great Britain and America at first, began to cross the South Sea. In particular, the London Mission Society, Methodists and Presbyterians, were at work in the South Sea from this time on, which explains the extensive spread of Protestantism. By the end of the nineteenth century, the missionizing of Polynesia was already complete, and independent churches had arisen. The reason for the surprisingly rapid Christianizing of Polynesia, and the almost total extinction of the ancient religions (which anthropologist of religion Nevermann once described as “the most mature and best reasoned thing […] that nature peoples have produced”)[1] may have lain not least of all in these religions themselves. For one thing, there already was, in the polytheistic pantheon, a supreme God, who, as creator, had created heaven and earth. For another thing, the aristocratically organized traditional societies of Polynesia had developed specialized priestly classes that were responsible for cult. Thus, there were two essential preconditions for a rapid adoption of Christianity. Strict cultic restrictions (‘→ taboo rules,’ from the Polynesian tápu) were imposed on priests and chieftains, which, far from being understood as prohibitions, were counted on for the protection of their fellow human beings. An extraordinary ‘power of activity’ (in Polynesian, mana) resided in political and religious leaders, as in the gods. It could vary in strength, but for ordinary persons, it was accounted very dangerous. Accordingly, dealings with vehicles or vessels of mana needed to be regulated by prescriptions of tápu. It is true that the tápu system was reinforced and became a kind of ritual system of compulsion, so that even the accidental touching of a single hair of a bearer of mana could be a capital transgression. This circumstance may have likewise contributed to Polynesians’ ready acceptance of Christianity, which brought them a substantial reduction in the weight of ritual procedure: as a result of the plenitude of the taboo prescriptions, no one had any longer been able to be sure that she or he had not unwittingly violated one of them.[2] Finally—and this factor contributing to the rapid spread of Christianity as well—missionaries had recognized the importance of native assistants, and soon found eager Polynesian collaborators, who moved the missionizing of Oceania forward.

Tápu and Mana

Today, in Polynesia (without New Zealand), the Protestants, with all of their subgroups (Lutherans, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Congregationalists), and almost 70% of the population as members, constitute the largest confessional group. Catholics come second, with 24.2%. Catholicism is represented especially in the regions governed by France. The high proportion of the Chinese population in French Polynesia (12%) corresponds with the high proportion of other religions. On the little island of Niue, Mormons are 10%. On Tuvalu—Christianized by the London Mission Society since the mid-nineteenth century, and a British protectorate since 1892—nearly the whole population are Congregationalists, of the Church of Tuvalu. In addition, under the ever-powerful societal influence of that community, traditional usages, along with belief in the presence of spirits, still thrive. With their Cook Islands Christian Church, virtually all inhabitants of those islands are Protestant. Here again, missioners of the London Mission Society were active. These latter, along with Methodist missionaries, were active early on Samoa as well (from the beginning of the nineteenth century), and have left behind the largest Congregationalist Church in Oceania, with 50% of the inhabitants. The Adventists, a particularly 'mission-minded' sect, with their faith entirely concentrated on hopes in the eschaton, are represented in a higher proportion than in their ratio world-wide, and have convinced all fifty-six of the inhabitants of Pitcairn, descendants of the Bounty mutineers.

Micronesia

Micronesia includes, especially, the Federal Republic of Micronesia, Kribati (formerly Gilbert Islands), the Marshall Islands, Northern Mariana, Guam, and Palau. In this gigantic region, with more than 3,000 islands, on c. 8 million square kilometers, approximately one-half million people live. In the time of the Japanese occupation, between the two World Wars, Japanese missionaries failed in their attempt to convert the Micronesians to Buddhism or to Shintô, and the Christian mission was fundamental. Nearly 65% of the Micronesians (on Guam, 98%) are Catholic today, which goes back to the early discovery of the Marianas by the Spaniards. Discovered in 1565, occupied and missionized since 1668, the Marianas were the first Islands in the Pacific to be expressly Christianized. The societal systems of Micronesia, with their hierarchically partitioned classes and an inherited status of chieftain, as well as of cultic systems orientated to the veneration of ancestors, were soon things of the past. Surviving in Western museums, there are occasional material witnesses of these cultures, such as the architectonically spectacular men's clubhouses from Palau, with their picture stories on gable ends and beams telling of mythical or historical events. The islands of Micronesia were relatively uninteresting for the colonial powers, but had great importance geo-strategically. During and after the Second World War, on the basis of the financial and material wealth of American troops, the 'Americanization' of Micronesia's island world proceeded apace (the atolls of the Marshall Islands suffered under American testing of atomic bombs), and, for want of goods and services, government moneys flowed there from the islands purely for the intent of 'welfare.' The dependency of the islanders that was produced in this fashion accelerated the cultural, religious, and social breakdown of many Micronesian societies, whose orientation today is entirely to Western values and concepts.

Melanesia

c) Up to borders of the French Transoceanic Territory of New Caledonia (c. 190,000 inhabitants), Melanesia is independent. Papua New Guinea (c. 4,400,000), Fiji (c. 78,000), Solomon Islands (c. 410,000), and Vanatu (formerly New Hebrides, c. 180,000), comprise the four distinct states of Melanesia. As in the remainder of South Sea, missionaries naturally have worked in Melanesia, and regarded superficially, were successful here as well. Protestantism accounts for 38% of all Melanesians, and 21.1% are Catholics. In French New Caledonia, Catholics number 60%, to be explained by the fact that here nearly 40% of the population are Europeans, especially French. The original inhabitants (Kanakes), likewise with 40%, have become a minority in their own country. Six-and-one-half percent of Melanesians belong to the Anglican Church (in the Solomon Islands, with 34%, they are the largest confessional group). While Anglicans in Micronesia and Polynesia are simply nonexistent, in Melanesia the geographical proximity to the large regions of the Anglican Religion of Australia (26.1%) and New Zealand (34%) becomes visible. In Vanatu (6%), and in the Solomon Islands (10%), Adventists are stronger than anywhere else in South Sea. Fiji, the most populous island state of Oceania, became 46% Indian, this population having been recruited during the British colonial time. There is a correspondingly high proportion of Hindus among the Fiji Islanders (38%). Eight percent of the total population of Fiji are Muslim; the majority (51%) are Christian, of whom 43% are Protestant. It is striking that Melanesia has a high proportion of members of indigenous religions, a datum otherwise scarcely to be verified in Oceania. Besides Vanatu (7.6%) and Solomon Islands (4%), this holds especially true on the—still scarcely accessible—Papua New Guinea (34%). Almost no Europeans live in these three states, so that the proportion of Melanesians here is well over 90%.

Papua New Guinea

Upon a more precise consideration of the religious orientation of the Melanesians of Papua New Guinea, it becomes clear that, while many of them have indeed converted to Christian confessions, this has frequently been a mere formality. Christianity and traditional belief lie adjacent to one another. In the Church, the Christian religion is practiced, but in daily life, indigenous rites, magic, and myths play the determining religious role as much as they ever did. The reason is that the missionaries, who had settled primarily in the coastal regions, did not visit Papua New Guinea's huge backcountry, with its wild, all but impenetrable nature. Furthermore, the population density there is very slight, and the over seven hundred different languages and dialects of the individual, widely separated tribal groups make it difficult to gather information of any kind. This dispersion is the cause of great cultural and religious diversity. Usually only a few hundred persons live in the small, separated, traditional settlement entities, without a hierarchical, social structure ('segmentary social form'). There is no inherited chieftain or priestly office (such as in Polynesia and Micronesia), or, therefore, central structures that could multiply the effects of the missionaries' efforts. On the other hand, the Melanesian 'big men' have since become stereotyped figures in anthropology.[3] It is their → prestige, which rests on economic and military success, and not their extraction or provenance, that establishes their reputation. They possess special mana: they have many adherents and great ceremonial influence. The most important foundation of traditional belief was the veneration of → ancestors. In secret male organizations, connections were struck with the ancestors. Like the totem forebears of the Australian → Aborigines, the Melanesian ancestors were the antecedents and creators of the world, and both mystical primordial beings, and souls existing in the present. Men's houses, along with → masks, are the renowned material outcropping of this religion. In particular, Melanesian cult-masks are today snatched from their ritual and mythic connection, to become 'art without context,' and are classified in the Western museum culture in their particular form as 'aesthetic objects.' They stand as examples of the social and religious paradigm-swap of the Oceanic cultures: the de-consecration of religious tradition to art, to theater, to a spectacle for tourists.

From Cult to Artistic Cultivation

Cargo Cults

A reaction to the pressure of modernity is demonstrated by the cargo cults. In Vanatu and the Solomons, and especially in Papua New Guinea, the mighty shattering of religious and social life, launched by the confrontation with the 'whites,' constitutes a special form of the acceptance and rejection of the new and the foreign. At first held to be ancestors, the whites were soon recognized as persons who, of course, possessed unimaginable riches. Confrontation with the unexplainable goods of the whites, their 'cargo' that had landed, whose production the Melanesians could not understand or duplicate, led only to the conclusion that these goods originated in the land of the ancestors, and had been stolen by the whites. But the ancestors would wreak vengeance, would return, would expel the whites, would restore social order, and would hand over firearms, automobiles, and aircraft to the Melanesians. In expectation of this event, not only were moorings, wharfs, and high masts set up for divine radio signals, but plantings were destroyed, animals slain, and houses burned. A sense of the end of the world, and hope in the future, culminated in this pre-modern catastrophe. Up until the present, the existence of more than two hundred individual cargo cults, separated in time and space—in the meantime acknowledged and understood as precursors of nationalistic movements—has been demonstrated. There are early reports of the cargo movement in 1893, on Milne Bay, in British New Guinea. This movement reached a first climax in the 1920s and 1930s, in Melanesia, especially in New Hebrides and the Solomons. The years between 1946 and 1954 witnessed a second cargo-cult spurt in Melanesia, although some of these instances were transformed into social movements.

Australia and New Zealand

3. In Australia, about 90% of the some 18,000,000 inhabitants are of British descent. The original inhabitants of Australia, the → Aborigines, today make up only one percent of the population. The statistical proportion of traditional religions is correspondingly slender, inasmuch as either the immigrants and their churches have absorbed the natives, or the latter no longer appreciably tilt the balance. Ancient hunting rituals can no longer play a role in the big-city context. White Australians, descendants of European immigrants (Irish, English, Italian), belong, in rather equal proportion, to the Anglican (26.1%), the Catholic (26%), or the Protestant (24.3%) churches.

The situation is similar in New Zealand. Europeans of British extraction make up the majority (88%) of the population. New Zealanders are 28% Protestant, 24% Anglican, and 15% Catholic. It is true that the indigenous Maori, with nearly 9% of the population, still comprise a noteworthy share of the population of 3.5 million. However, they have been absorbed more and more into the urban population, and their traditional religious forms have not survived the modern age.

South Sea as Paradise—the Exotic Fantasy

3. Erotic wishes, and images of free sexuality and nature-connected primitivity on lonely beaches, a Robinsonade on variegated coral reefs in turquoise water, an existence under palms swaying in the wind and casting cool shadows, are imprinted in the South Sea dreams of the modern city-dweller to the present day—the South Sea as the Paradise afar—projected to its apex in the American film, Randal Kleiser's "The Blue Lagoon" (1980) with the scantily clad yet ever chaste, unthreatening Brooke Shields. However, Gauguin's wild romanticism of a paradise in the South Sea at the turn of the twentieth century, had soon to be exchanged for the sobering reality of a colonial deformation of Polynesian society. Today, as well, little has survived—aside from an inspiring landscape—of the enticing dream of the South Sea paradise (→ Garden/Paradise). Traditional cultures of the South Sea have extensively given way to the powerful cultural pressure of Western civilization, and are now mostly marketed as mere tourist spectacles.

1. Nevermann 1968, 62.
2. Ibid., 17.
3. Schultz, Hermann, Stammesreligionen. Zur Kreativität des kulturellen Bewußtseins, Stuttgart 1993, 93.

Literature

Classic Anthropological Studies: Firth, Raymond W., We, the Tikopia: A Sociological Study of Kinship in Primitive Polynesia, London 1957; Malinowski, Bronislaw, Coral Gardens and Their Magic: A Study of the Methods of Tilling the Soil and of Agricultural Rites in the Trobriand Islands, 2 vols., London 1935; Mead, Margaret, Sex and Temperament in Three Primitive Societies, New York 1950 ([1]1935).

General Literature: Goldman, Irving, Ancient Polynesian Society, Chicago 1970; Kramer, Fritz, Verkehrte Welten. Zur imaginären Ethnographie des 19. Jahrhunderts, Frankfurt/M. 1981; Nevermann, Hans, "Die Religionen der Südsee," in: Nevermann, Hans et al. (eds.), Die Religionen der Südsee und Australiens, Stuttgart 1968, 1-123; Parmentier, Richard J., The Sacred Remains: Myth, History, and Polity in Belau, Chicago 1987; Sahlins, Marshall D., Social Stratification in Polynesia, Seattle 1958.

Cargo Cults: Lawrence, Peter, Road belong Cargo: A Study of the Cargo Movement in the Southern Madang District, New Guinea 1964; Worsley, Peter, The Trumpet Shall Sound: A Study of "Cargo" Cults in Melanesia, New York [2]1968.

→ Aborigines, Colonialism

Gerhard Schlatter

Specialists, Religious

1. a) The concept of religious specialist can denote the results of a permanent division of labor within a religion. The individual members of a religious → group possess distinct competencies when it comes to practicing religion and its acts. In many religions, those who lead religious acts are those who occupy a leading position of honor and power, such as the Young female rabbis, in prayer shawls, and wearing kippas, during a service on the occasion of the First European Convention of female rabbis, cantors, and Jews (of both genders) with training or interest in rabbinical matters, in Berlin, May 1999. Some 120 female specialists in matters of Judaism, including seven active rabbis, met in the New Synagogue, in Berlin, to join together in the battle for the acceptance of female cultic personnel in the worldwide Jewish community. Up until now, it has only been Reform Judaism that has admitted female rabbis: in Germany, at present, there is only one. The Berlin center for studies Bet Debora, "House of Debora," named for the biblical judge and military leader against the Canaanites, and deliberately connected with the liberal tradition of Berlin, was where Regina Jonas (born in Berlin in 1902, murdered at Auschwitz in 1944) was the first woman to be ordained to the rabbinate (December 27, 1935). Although there were several women in America who had completed a rabbinical course of studies at the same time, it was only in 1972, with Sally Priesand, that the first American female rabbi took office. Just as in the area of the Christian churches with the acceptance of women as clerical ministers, the admittance of women to the rabbinate has led to tensions with conservative and orthodox groups in the Jewish community. With the help of historical research, then, an attempt is being made to find legitimizing exemplars in the past. (R. Deines) chiefs of an enterprise, or of the state. But religious specialists can be spoken of meaningfully only where a specific competency in religious acts and knowledge must be actually acquired. The sociological concept affords the possibility of a description. Concepts like 'priest,' 'prophet,' or 'shaman' originate in particular religious traditions, and are frequently understood polemically. Should we seek to apply, for example, 'priest' trans-culturally, it will obscure differences in cultic activity, personal holiness, lengthy formation, and full professional dedication. Even a seemingly general determination such as 'intermediary (of salvation)' becomes highly problematic: this designation is a product of the Protestant polemic that no intermediary can be employed between human beings and their God.

b) The division of labor in question can be described under two aspects. (1) The relationship between specialists and non-specialists is a connection of varying degrees of proximity (social density). Thus, this relationship more or less determines how often believers seek out a specialist. As for the degrees existing in the relationship of authority—discipleship (→ Disciples), or → master-pupil relations—this measure may be grounded in personal → charisma. (2) It may also be a matter of a stable relation between a spiritual 'official' and a community, or the services of a specialist may be sought only in 'critical' situations, such as prophecy or fortune-telling (astrology, card-reading), or rituals of the → life cycle (such as funeral preachers, marriage priests). Stores of knowledge (of ritual, of theology) have to be preserved and elaborated through monopolization, or at least close control, and corresponding specialists have to be relieved of other activities. Staffs of administrators, then (cashiers, recording secretaries, registrars), and assisting personnel (slaughterer for sacrificial rituals, musicians, attendants), can be distinguished into cultic specialists and theologians. The formation or 'training' of religious specialists has been of special meaning and importance for European history of religion, and for Christianity. These specialists would be persons whose tasks were to attend exclusively to reflection on, and systematization of, stores of knowledge, assume responsibility for doctrines, and interpret and apply the generalizations thus achieved (→ Theology) to new situations (and texts). Special training, proper rules of lifestyle, and hierarchical control, were necessary in order to assure the inner coherency of such an organization. Certain instances of specialization form religious 'virtuosi'—as, for example, ascetics, who live religion especially intensively, and, for that purpose, organize into closed groups, in → monasticism—or else they build systems of two-degree membership, of general members and of the 'perfected,' as did the medieval Cathari.

Federico Llaves is a Callawaya, a healer from the Bolivian province of Bautista Saavedra, in the Department of La Paz. In the villages of the Apolobama, and of Muneca Cordillere, in the Andes, live traveling medicine men, who also work their farms. They function in the area of herbal medicine, as well as in that of symbolical healing. For eighteen-year-old Irene Ramos Vila, who has lost her first child, he here performs a night ritual, the "Banishment of Grief." After all, as he says, "grief is still in the house" after a death. "And so a purification is always performed, lest the unwholesome continue to pursue us." In the course of the night, he prepares one white and one mourning mesa (Span., 'sacrificial gift,' lit. 'table'), for the 'white healing' and for the repulse of evil and harm. All have removed their hats, as the ritual gets under way. In its course, a moment occurs when—as pictured here—the healer places an embroidered stole, from the sacristy of the church, around Irene's shoulders, and blesses her with a white q'into of sacrificial offerings (wool, coca leaves, lama suet, and alcohol, in a white towel), and his iron cross, in the name of the Trinity. Mountain peaks, Mother Earth (Pachamama), and the wind, are summoned as well. Between parts of the ceremony, there is sometimes time for talking, eating, smoking, chewing coca, and drinking alcohol. Federico Llaves practices in the Callawaya tradition, integrating Catholic elements into the ceremony, and lending the event his own personal style. His participation, his ritual capacities, and his competency in interpreting death and grief, help survivors in this difficult time of transition. (Kirsten Holzapfel, after Ina Rösing)

Antiquity

2. a) It was characteristic of the ancient urban religions of the Greco-Roman world to display minimal organization. They usually consisted of priesthoods that recruited their membership among the (usually male) members of the upper class, or even only among certain families. Here it was a matter of 'leisure-time priests,' who had often delegated their routine cult to slaves or personal assistants, and who were 'professional priests' only in particular cases, then living on the income of their temple installations (except in Egypt). 'Full-time priests' (such as the Roman Vestal Virgins) were rare. Of course, there were purveyors of religious services, in healing-cults and oracles, who seemed to live on their activity, as well as itinerant experts who seemed to do the same. In the Judaism of the Diaspora, we see a high percentage of members of synagogues in honorary offices, while professional scholars were rare. The very early Christian system of cultic, social, or theological specialists comes as a surprise, then, and it soon led to efforts to finance an independent 'clergy,' as well as to array it with privileges, as political leaders gradually promoted the new religion. Along with the ever more closely intertwined offices that, in Christianity, as well, developed into careers, independently operating specialists (such as teachers, exorcists), still had importance and meaning at first.

Christianity

b) For further European history of religion, the institutionalization of the Christian Church, and especially that of Rome, with its functionaries, played an important role. On the one hand, ever-higher formation was demanded of priests, and greater personal holiness, which fostered the 'sacralization' of the organization (such as with Gregory VII's reform in the High Middle Ages). At the same time, however, such measures encouraged criticism. The sense and meaning of the prevailing religious division of labor came more and more into question—after all, salvation is to be available to all persons equally. Thus, in the Reformation, the doctrine emerged of a 'universal priesthood of all of the faithful.' The organizational power of even the medieval Church, and the lack of competition on the part of state organizations, resulted in tasks of formation devolving upon the competency of religious specialists in Latin schools and universities, throughout broad expanses of European history.

Extra-European Cultures

3. The organizational and differentiating patterns just described are observable in extra-European cultures as well. Outside of urban societies, the village priest, with his far-reaching and little differentiated religious authority, and the various, and often crisply differentiated, ranks of temple priests—became the most important forms of religious specialization. The extreme case of regulated priestly states (theocracies) is to be observed alike in the monastic republic of the Greek Athos, and in Buddhist Tibet before the Chinese occupation. Special types of religious authority, such as that of the → guru or healer, are exported to Europe even today.

Current Discussions

4. Current discussions on religious specialization are—at least in the West—strikingly restricted to the problems of the status of Christian priests. On the one hand, the role represents a fully transmitted professional activity, possessing all of the indications of a 'profession' in the most cogent sense. On the other hand, the loss of public respect, and the increase of role diversification in the area of the common priesthood of all Christian confessions, has led to insecurity with regard to status, and tendencies to de-professionalization. Or, in the public area, in connection with the confrontation concerning Islamic religious education in public schools, there is discussion of how religious specialists are legitimated, and how representative they are for such religions with looser organization.

Literature

Beard, Mary/North, John (eds.), Pagan Priests: Religion and Power in the Ancient World, London 1990; Dykema, Peter A./Oberman, Heiko A. (eds.), Anticlericalism in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe, Leiden 1993; Fuller, C. J., Servants of the Goddess: The Priests of a South Indian Temple, Cambridge 1984; Grabbe, Lester L., Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages: A Socio-Historical Study of Religious Specialists in Ancient Israel, Valley Forge 1995; Idem (ed.), The Priests in the Prophets: The Portrayal of Priests, Prophets and Other Religious Specialists in the Latter Prophets, London 2004; Guyot, Jean (ed.), Études sur le sacrement de l'ordre, Paris 1961; James, E. O., The Nature and Function of Priesthood, London 1955; Kieckhefer, Richard/Bond, George D. (eds.), Sainthood: Its Manifestations in World Religions, Berkeley 1988; McEwan, Gilbert J. P., Priest and Temple in Hellenistic Babylonia, Wiesbaden 1981; McGuire, Meredith B., Ritual Healing in Suburban America, New Brunswick 1988; Ranson, Stewart et al., Clergy, Ministers and Priests, London 1977; Rüpke, Jörg, Fasti Sacerdotum, 3 vols., Stuttgart 2005; Sabourin, Leopold: Priesthood: A Comparative Study, Leiden 1973; Straube, Helmut, Die Stellung des Regenmachers und verwandter Funktionäre in akephalen Gesellschaften des Süd-Sudans, Munich 1984; Voss, Klaus Peter, Der Gedanke des allgemeinen Priester- und Prophetentums: Seine gemeindetheologische Aktualisierung in der Reformationszeit, Wuppertal 1990.

→ European History of Religion, Group, Guru, Monasticism, Priest/Priestess, Weber

Jörg Rüpke

Sphinx

1. The (male!) sphinx, in Egypt, consists of a recumbent lion with the head of a Pharaoh (androsphinx). The lion has been the royal beast since time immemorial, so that, in the sphinx, the brute strength of the mighty predator is linked with the wisdom of the human governor, as a phenomenal image of royalty, and beyond this, as a divine → composite being. In the sphinxes watching at the entrances of temples or necropolises, the power of the Pharaoh is mightily displayed as guardian and defender of his sanctuary. Granted, in Egypt the sphinx is usually male, but female potentates, as well, used that symbol of majestic power, so that, even in Egypt, if only rarely, the female sphinx does occur.

It is the Great Sphinx of Giza (Fourth Dynasty) that is world-renowned. With its length of some 73.5m, and its height of 20m, it may be the most powerful construction of a mythical beast in existence. Its monumental figure symbolizes the sacred royalty of the Old Kingdom at the height of its power. It lies along the path to the Pyramid of Chefren, and it was believed that it pictured the Pharaoh of that name. New material, however, indicates his father Cheops (c. 2604/2554–2581/2531 BCE) as its builder. Through the connection of aspects of the sun cult and the royal cult, the Sphinx of Giza was venerated in the New Kingdom as 'Horus on the Horizon' (in Greek, Harmachis), and thereby regarded as a form of the apparition of the Sun God, Re. Thus, Amun-Re also became a new King of the Gods, as well as the Sun God, and the figure of the sphinx featured Amun's typical ram's head ("Kriosphinx").

2. In Greek mythology, the unambiguously female sphinx was depicted as the Demon of Death, a winged lion with the head of a woman. The sphinx became the synonym for the enigmatic, a development owed to the famous myth of the Theban Sphinx, who slew all who failed to solve her riddle. → Oedipus, however, found the correct solution, whereupon the sphinx plunged into the depths. Despite the gender alternation, the sphinx was probably adopted in Greece from the ancient East.

3. In Europe, beginning in the Renaissance, the figure of the sphinx experienced a 'rebirth,' in architecture, sculpture, painting, and literature, and this in both its Egyptian and its Greek phenomenal forms. In the sometimes monumental sculptures of sphinxes in park and palace installations, from the Baroque until the twentieth century, these guardian figures served the representational needs of state and nobility or upper class. In art, the sphinx was increasingly eroticized. In the Symbolism and Décadence of the close of the nineteenth century, in Felicien Rops and Fernand Khnopff, in the lyricism of Oscar Wilde (The Sphinx, 1894), she became a male fantasy of the femme fatale, the timeless cipher of the enigmatic, perilous eros of woman.

Literature

Demisch, Heinz, Die Sphinx. Geschichte ihrer Darstellung von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, Stuttgart 1977; Edmunds, Lowell, The Sphinx in the Oedipus Legend, Königstein 1981; Lehner, Marc, "Reconstructing the Sphinx," in: Cambridge Archaeological Journal 2 (1992), 1-26; Mode, Heinz, Fabeltiere und Dämonen in der Kunst, Stuttgart

1974 (illustrations); Zivie-Coche, Christiane, Sphinx: History of a Monument, Ithaca 2002 (French [1]1997).

→ Composite Beings, Egypt, Gender Stereotypes, Monarchy/Royalty, Oedipus, Reception

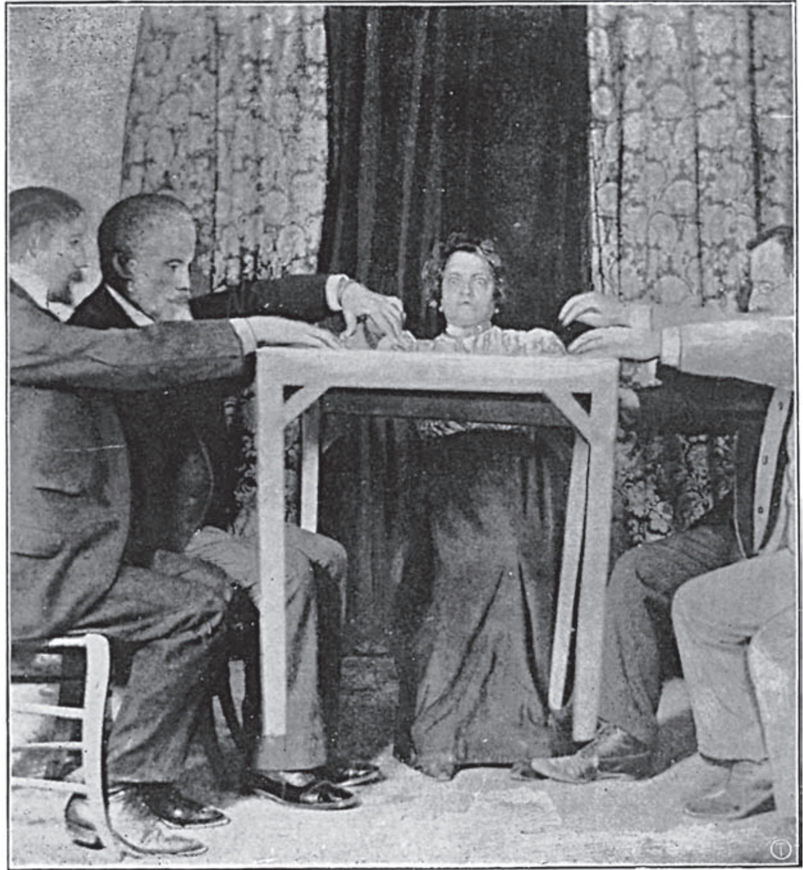
Edmund Hermsen

Spiritism



1. Spiritism or Spiritualism (from Lat. spiritus, 'soul,' 'spirit') is to be understood here not simply as belief in spirits, but as belief in the continued life of the soul in a beyond, and the possibility of communicating with the spirits of the departed. Often in the spiritistic literature, the designation 'spiritualism' is used instead. Spiritism is one of the important international new religions of the nineteenth century. It came from the United States and seized Europe in the latter half of the nineteenth century. After the First World War, original spiritism quickly lost its importance in the Old World. But in Brazil, for example, its significance grew, and there, for instance in the Umbanda religion, even adopted Afro-American cultic elements.

The Forerunners: Mesmerism and Swedenborgians

2. Although the lay religion of spiritism appeared only in the middle of the nineteenth century, there are many movements that could be cited by way of precedent. Besides centuries-old popular traditions still appearing in 'popular spiritism,' like belief in ghosts and spirits, necromancy (conjuring the dead), and fortune telling, there were also spiritistic currents that were attacked by Enlightenment authors. The latter included especially the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), which sought to open the view of a higher world of spirits, and even more, Mesmerism, the 'animal magnetism' of Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), a kind of hypnotic technique ('magnetic sleep'), which Mesmer and his pupils preferred to apply by occasioning 'somnambulism,' (from Lat. 'sleepwalker'), in order to interrogate things from the world of the supernatural as well (→ Power; Occultism; Electricity; Energy).

History and Varieties

3. The actual starting point of spiritistic mass religion may be taken to be the 'tappings' detected or, more precisely, generated by children of the Fox family in the United States, and their interpretation as means of communication used by the deceased. These perceptions may or may not have been a direct religious reaction to the installation of the first Morse telegraph line, between Washington and Baltimore, in 1883/84, and to its 'democratic' character (being publicly accessible and privately owned). There was then talk, in the United States, about a 'spiritual telegraphy' between the living and the dead. Within a few years, 'table tipping' had become a fashionable game, as well as a means employed by a cult of piety on both sides of the Atlantic. Contact with spirits took place during private séances (Fr., 'sessions'). Under the direction of an accomplished 'medium,' in the framework of a 'circle,' a few persons would assemble, usually around a table (see illus.). The trance 'mediums,' the → specialists in this telecommunication with the beyond, played the traditional role of the Christian prophetesses and prophets, just as that of the → witches and healers, but in addition showed some of the traits of modern entertainment stars. Soon certain (especially female) mediums attained an international reputation. The entertainment value of their religious 'shows' came from the levitations (objects wafting freely in the air, in seeming contravention of the laws of gravity), apports (mustering of objects without human hands), and materializations ('embodiments' of, especially, the dead) that they were able to produce. The production of voices, tones, apparitions, and disturbances in the air accompanying the presentations appealed to the senses in a certain synaesthetic manner, and together with the half-light of the scene and the tingling proximity of the other gender, contributed to the appeal of these cultic presentations. Supported in particular by messages from the beyond that the mediums could impart (by speaking in trances, through 'automatic' notation of reports, by 'talking tables,' etc.), a spiritistic world image was promptly produced.

This photograph of an experimental levitation shows the famous medium, Eusapia Paladino (1854–1920), at a table-raising. The course of the séance, according to the eyewitness account (slightly blurred by male fantasies) of a celebrated Italian criminologist, was as follows. "The persons sitting around the table lay their hands on it, forming a chain. Each of the medium's hands is held by the nearest hand of each of her two nearest neighbors, and each of the medium's feet is lying beneath that of her neighbor, who also presses his knee against that of the medium." Then the table "usually rises ten to twenty centimeters. [. . .] At times, it remains in the air several seconds, making irregular motions. [. . .] In these attempts, the medium's face becomes distorted, her fists clench, she moans, and seems to be suffering" (Lombroso, Cesare, Hypnotische und spiritistische Forschungen, Stuttgart, no date [1909], 68f.).

Further organization appeared as well, among middle-class 'scientific' spiritists in associations, as among 'religious' spiritists in 'churches.' Educated spiritists rejected religious spiritism as 'revelation spiritism,' and the Christian churches rejected spiritism in its entirety, on account of its concepts of self-redemption. Spiritists' attitude toward authorities and government varied. Besides an affirmative spiritism maintained by the respectable citizenry and nobility, there even emerged, in England and France, with its origin in America, a liberal social-reform direction (Andrew Jackson Davis, 1826–1910). This phenomenon led the heritage of a utopian socialism (Fourier, Saint-Simon, Owen; → Commune) even further. The politically failed notions of equality and liberty were then projected into the world beyond of a paradisaic 'summerland.' These ideas included equal rights for women and 'free love.'

Spiritism in Europe took on entirely national characteristics, not least of all on grounds of the countries' respective religious colorations. In France, it was determined more in a Catholic hue (Allan Kardec, 1804–1869), in Germany more in a Protestant tone. In Germany, unlike France and England, the petit bourgeois, authoritarian 'popular' (Volk-) spiritism of Josef Weissenberg (1855–1941) carried the day, with a membership in the tens of thousands ("Evangelical-Joannine Church") after the First World War. Davis's "harmonial philosophy," paired with a Christian spiritist piety, found German support only during the era of Bismarck, especially among textile workers and miners in Saxony.[1]

Taken as a whole, the spiritism of the nineteenth century can be understood as an attempt to afford a scientific guarantee of components of traditional Christian religion regarded as indispensable. This effort would oppose the age of materialism and science. Included among these components were, especially, belief in the immortality of the soul, and a continued life in the beyond, after death ('everlasting life'). The methods employed to offer this guarantee would be empirically verifiable. Then the guarantee would be reconciled with the secular Zeitgeist, the 'spirit' signed by individualism and a belief in progress. By way of the 'spiritist method,' those who took part in the séances and circles could defeat death, by extending the existence of their intimate community of devoted 'siblings' and friends in a 'revolt against mourning.'

External Effects and Reception

4. The 'outside effects' of spiritism are meaningful and important. The mediums and their 'spirit-' manifestations became a favorite field of studies in the 1880s, for new "societies for psychical research"—research entities interested in 'experimental psychology.' This early research in → 'parapsychology' contributed decisively to a popularization of the concept and doctrine of the unconscious. True, the sketches created by German spiritists of an experimental-'transcendental' doctrine of the soul regarded that doctrine as a mere transitional phenomenon. The ultimate goal was an experimental psychology of the sub-/unconscious that would be delivered from metaphysics. At the same time, spiritism was a great attraction for the arts. Authors such as Victor Hugo were fascinated by the recently opened look at mental border regions. Modern sculpture, in particular, received powerful impulses from the spiritist unlocking of the unconscious and the supra-sensory, for example with Wassily Kandinsky. Further, with its preponderantly female mediums, spiritism played a role in the historical movement for women's liberation (→ Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism).

Spiritism Today

5. In Europe and North America, spiritism as a mass phenomenon, as well as in its quality as a world-view has 'closed down' since the First World War—by contrast with Brazil especially, where it has been transformed, and integrated into the Umbanda cult. Here, spiritism has become a national religion. Its spirit-healing fascinates Europeans as well, in their quest for new forms of therapy (→ Afro-American Religions). In Europe and North America, spiritism lives on solely its techniques for receiving 'messages from beyond.' It persists as a 'secularized' form of social interplay, as well as a spiritual practice of listening to audiotapes and voices on the radio, or of glass-moving (in 'youth occultism'). Transmitted in part by theosophy, spiritism has continued to have its effects, in the → New Age movement and in modern → esotericism, by way of concern with death and dying (thanatology), or through reception of mediated messages (→ Channeling).

1. LINSE, Ulrich, "Das Buch der Wunder und Geheimwissenschaften. Der spiritistische Verlag Oswald Mutze in Leipzig im Rahmen der spiritistischen Bewegung Sachsens," in: LEHMSTEDT, Mark/HERZOG, Andreas, Das Bewegte Buch, Wiesbaden 1999, 219-244.

Literature

Source: KARDEC, Allan (ps. Hippolyte Léon Denizard Rivail), Le livre des esprits, Paris 1857 (many translations in various languages).

Secondary Literature: BARROW, Logie, Independent Spirits: Spiritualism and English Plebeians, 1850–1910, London 1986; BRANDON, Ruth, The Spiritualists: The Passion for the Occult in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, New York 1983; BRAUDE, Ann, "News from the Spirit World: A Checklist of American Spiritualist Periodicals," in: Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society 99 (1989), 399-462; Eadem, Radical Spirits: Spiritualism and Women's Rights in Nineteenth-Century America, Boston 1989; GOLDSMITH, Barbara, Other Powers, New York 1998; HAZELGROVE, Jenny, Spiritualism and British Society between the Wars, Manchester/New York 2000; HESS, David J., Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil, New York 1994; LINSE, Ulrich, Geisterseher und Wunderwirker, Frankfurt/M. 1996; MOORE, R. Laurence, In Search of White Crows: Spiritualism, Parapsychology, and American Culture, New York 1977; NELSON, Geoffrey K., Spiritualism and Society, London 1969; OPPENHEIM, Janet, The Other World: Spiritualism and Psychical Research in England, 1850–1914, Cambridge 1985; OWEN, Alex, The Darkened Room: Women, Power and Spiritualism in Late Victorian England, Philadelphia 1990; PODMORE, Frank, Mediums of the Nineteenth Century, 2 vols., New Hyde Park 1963; SAWICKI, Diethard, Leben mit den Toten. Geisterglauben und die Entstehung des Spiritismus in Deutschland 1770–1900, Paderborn 2002.

→ Afro-American Religions, Channeling, Communication, Death and Dying, Esotericism, Occultism, Parapsychology, Psyche, Soul, Specialists (Religious), Spirits/Ghosts/Revenants, Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society

Ulrich Linse

Spirits / Ghosts / Revenants

1. Spirits are supernatural beings of neither unambiguously human nor divine origin. It is difficult to distinguish spirits, ghosts, and → demons, and their concepts are usually employed synonymously. The concept of spirit has a broad spectrum of meaning. Under the concept of 'spirits,' for instance, fall super-sensory beings and departed persons who tarry yet in the world of the living. A related notion is that of the 'revenant' (Fr., 'coming back'), which names a person who has died an unjust, wicked death, and is now attempting to return (→ Soul). The word 'ghost' (from Old English, orig. 'spirit' or 'demon') is a synonym for spirit, but with a more 'threatening' connotation.

European Conceptualizations of the 'Spirit'

2. The development of the European conceptualizations of the 'spirit' demonstrates how apparitions of spirits are variously deduced and explained. Classical Greeks expressed fear of the souls of the dead, especially when a death had been early or unnatural. Reports have been handed down of spirits that imparted counsel to the living, or reproached them. As in other ancient reports of spirits, they were concerned for their memorial, and begged for appropriate rituals of transition.

Christian Europe adopted many of the ancient conceptions of spirits that inform, instruct, and persecute, appearing in aspect fearful or terrible, or else in a form similar to that of their life on earth. Christian teachers cite them, in order to afford the saints an opportunity to demonstrate their supernatural capacities vis-à-vis the malevolent spirits of the dead. Accounts of wandering spirits, who complain that they have not been buried according to Christian funeral rites, reinforce the reality of purgatory, and the value of prayers and offerings for the dead. Thus, the reports that give us information on the notions of spirits are not simply the expression of a 'folk mentality' but come from the pens of educated clerics, who are seeking to instruct persons, and to convince them of the truth of Christian teaching. Spirits of the dead appear in many types: veiled in white garments, as an animal, or as an orb of light. Frequently they draw attention to themselves by knocking, shuffling, or scratching ('poltergeists'). Often, their wounds and mutilations offer testimonial of their sojourn in purgatory. Especially the spirits of those who have been executed or have fallen in battle, or of women dying in childbirth, awaken the sympathies of the living, in part because the resurrection of those dying in such ways is placed in question, in part because their terrible, cruel death both frightens and fascinates. Spirits are frequently encountered at cemeteries, gallows hills, and crossroads. Reports tell of spirits who beg forgiveness, or who seek justice. A story may tell of a dying knight who asks a relative to give his mount and his other possessions to the poor; but out of greed, the latter keeps the horse. On the eighth day, the spirit of the knight appears, protesting that this transgression is postponing his deliverance from purgatory, and demanding that the miscreant be punished. On the next day, the evil-doer dies in unnatural circumstances. This story illustrates the fact that conceptualizations of spirits reinforce social norms of behavior.

Since the Reformation, many Protestants have rejected the idea of wandering spirits of the dead, and hold the apparitions in question to be manifestations of the Devil. Despite theological confrontations over the nature of apparitions, faith in spirits, phantoms, and ghosts remains active. In the seventeenth century, European spirits had a stronger orientation to the 'here' than they did to the 'hereafter,' and behaved in a more human fashion. Thus, they no longer came through the wall, but politely knocked. In the eighteenth century, skepticism grew concerning the idea of spirits as the wandering dead. In the nineteenth century, spirits won new followers in 'black Romanticism,' along the field of tension between reason and faith, especially in → spiritism. With the help of mediums, or certain technological apparatus, the spiritist movement attempted to come in contact with the spirits.

Spirits in Asia

3. Kindred notions of spirits, in our sense, are found in all cultures. In Asian traditions, the spirit of the fox appears in popular lore. Japanese sources speak of the departed who have had no offspring, and thus no one to perform the correct obsequies for them, so that they wander unredeemed through the world of the living and inflict injury on them. Unredeemed spirits of the dead are held to be capable of taking → possession of living persons; in the contrary direction, religious → specialists conduct rituals of expulsion (→ Exorcism). Ideas concerning apparitions of the dead have produced images of succoring, protective spirits, as well as of spirits that play practical jokes.

Psychological Interpretations

4. → Parapsychology often holds spirit apparitions to be real, and researches them with scientific methods. On the contrary, → Freud deems the creation of spirits to be human beings' first theoretical achievement. Freud explains them as projections of the living upon the dead, in which contradictory feelings like dread and awe come to expression. Aside from the question of the reality of spirits, the latter do express something about the feelings and fantasies of the person to whom they appear. Thus, fear of spirits can be interpreted as a bad conscience, and their appearance as the expression of a powerful wish.

The merry 'creepiness' of a ghost train, the materialization of spirits in films like "Ghostbusters" or "Poltergeist," serves for more than entertainment. In the present, spirits come into play, once more, in → occultism and → channeling, working as assistant decision-makers and guides through life. In a modern society of information and media, from which all good spirits are expelled, the quest for spirits seems endless.

Literature

Finucane, Ronald C., Appearances of the Dead: A Cultural History of Ghosts, London 1982; Fowkes, Katherine A., Giving Up the Ghost: Spirits, Ghosts, and Angels in Mainstream Comedy Films, Detroit 1998; Freed, Ruth S./Freed, Stanley A., Ghosts: Life and Death in North India, Seattle 1993; Guiley, Rosemary Ellen, The Encyclopedia of Ghosts and Spirits, New York 1992; Iwasaka, Michiko/Toelken, Barre, Ghosts and the Japanese: Cultural Experience in Japanese Death Legends, Logan 1994; Joynes, Andrew (ed.), Medieval Ghost Stories: An Anthology of Miracles, Marvels and Prodigies, Woodbridge 2001; MacGregor, Alasdair Alpin, The Ghost Book: Strange Hauntings in Britain, London 1955; Nickell, Joe, Entities: Angels, Spirits, Demons, and Other Alien Beings, Amherst 1995; Rose, Carol, Spirits, Fairies, Gnomes, and Goblins: An Encyclopedia of the Little People, Santa Barbara 1996; Schmitt, Jean-Claude, Ghosts in the Middle Ages: The Living and the Dead in Medieval Society, Chicago 1998.

→ Ancestors, Channeling, Death and Dying, Fantasy, Funeral/Burial, Hereafter, Magic, Occultism, Possession, Shamanism, Spiritism, Veneration of the Saints, Voodoo

Inken Prohl

Spirituality

'Spirituality' is a fashionable word, used in contemporary religious discourse for a spiritual attitude toward life, a style of piety. It occurs in the Christian and the non-Christian areas alike. This diffuse application is connected with a twin history. From the French (spiritualité), the word has been taken over into other languages, especially so since the 1960s, by Catholic theologians, who wished to describe certain forms of piety actively lived: from a contemplative monastic life (for laity, as well, who occasionally share this life, and integrate it into their daily lives), to a political and social engagement from Christian motives, for example in the 'spirituality of liberation' (G. Gutiérrez; → Liberation Theology). Behind all of this stands the Latin adjective spiritualis, which in the Middle Ages meant 'pertaining to monasticism.' In this sense, then, spirituality is a modern form of active Christian piety that applies itself in the direction contrary to that by which religion withdraws from the world, and/or holds contemplative elements to be important. Similarly, the category has been adopted in the Evangelical area as well.

From Anglo-Saxon linguistic space comes a second, independent line of tradition. As early as the close of the nineteenth century, 'spirituality' began to denote a free-spirited attitude that appealed to inner experience in religious things, by contrast with Christian tradition's 'blind belief in dogma.' Unitarians and other free religious movements molded the word in this sense. Others transferred it to non-Christian religions, as for example, at the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893, Swami Vivekananda applied it to Hinduism. In this application, it denotes a 'mystical' nucleus of potentially any religion, which—unlike its theological or dogmatic formations—is experienced preponderantly, or only, in the individual, private religious practice of the 'God-seeker.' In the West, the → New Age movement has been among the agents propagating this meaning, adopting it as a self-description of 'unchurched religiosity,' 'nature-based spirituality,' etc.

Literature

Bochinger, Christoph, "New Age" und moderne Religion, Gütersloh [2]1995, 377-398; Fuller, Robert C., Spiritual, But Not Religious: Understanding Unchurched America, Oxford 2001.

→ Emotions/Feelings, Esalen Institute, Mysticism, New Age, Private Religion

Christoph Bochinger

Sports

Sports as Pleasure and Contest

1. Since the nineteenth century, the term 'sports' (from 'disport'; 'to amuse oneself.' 'to frolic')—to busy the body by play, and in pleasure, but, at the same time, in fair competition, and according to strict rules—has become an umbrella concept for all kinds of corporeal motion and playing (with or without the character of a competition). In the connection of the two components, a normative meaning resonates, influencing the ordering and acknowledgment of sports in modern society.

The origin of all sports activity on the part of the human being is the natural impulse to movement. 'Bodily exercises' have served for the configuration of physical potentials such as speed, strength, agility, or endurance, of which that body stands in need in order to dominate the original conditions of life: running made hunting easier. The intentional training of these abilities awakened joy in the control of the body, independently of the original purpose. A new pleasure came to expression in physical comparison

How difficult it is, especially in the modern age, to distinguish religious characteristics from profane, entertainment from bestowal of meaning! This similarity is seen in many examples from today's team sports. The rituals of the opening and closing ceremonies of great presentations such as the → Olympic Games, or world championships, provide productive material. At the kickoff celebration of the world soccer championships in France, on June 9, 1998, four twenty-meter-tall "ethnofuturistic giants" (German Press Association dpa) float in a star march to Place de la Concorde in Paris, intended to symbolize the (soccer) cultures of Asia, Africa, Latin America, and Europe. The figures were escorted to their destination by balloon figures of (in order) musicians, dancers, in-line skaters, and speaking soccer-players. Hundreds of thousands of attendees lined the processional route. The closing ceremonies, to be seen here, remind those reared as Christians, of the 'dance around the golden calf' (the stylized soccer-ball goblet in the middle). A less critical sort can identify the spectacle with the motto Seid umschlungen, Millionen! (Ger., "Embrace, ye millions!"—Schiller, in the "Ode to Joy" of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony). That the scene is not simply to be divided into 'sacred' and 'profane,' but that it presents a multi-layered civic ritual, is suggested by a glance at the giants: they stand in the tradition of Baroque continent-allegories, as well as in the folkloristic magical festive custom of over-sized dolls, the mannequins (for example, in the Tarascon in Southern France). Third and finally, they can be ascribed among the figures of a modern hero-cult—after all, the ritual exaltation of sports stars into superhuman demigods is known from Greek antiquity. But does this now make them 'soccer gods'— → idols of a 'religion of the masses'? (Hubert Mohr) with others. The physical competition to be observed in nature peoples is a sportiveness that behavioral scientists interpret as the expression of a natural drive to play. Bodily and sportive playing was integrated into the respective traditions of cultic rituals among the various peoples (especially nature and seasonal festivals, celebrations of the dead, fertility cults).

Sports in Antiquity

2. a) European antiquity, which, from the perspective of sporting history, reaches from the first → Olympic Games (presumably in 776 BCE) to their prohibition in 394, is characterized by two continuous sporting motifs. For one, sports served for the training of the body in its military abilities. We may take Sparta as an example. Here, sportive upbringing was a collective military upbringing. With the consolidation of the ancient community, education aimed less at the military function than at complex moral and behavioral upbringing. Over and above positive corporeal experience, sportive upbringing (gymnasium) was necessarily completed by a spiritual education aiming at individual perfection. A concept of competition was added (agón). Now the 'Olympic Games' had become a sporting event. Independently of any ideal functional ascription, such events made sports popular with audiences.

Middle Ages

b) This situation remained in the European Middle Ages, a period marked, vis-à-vis the sportive, both by a Christian skepticism and by a (pagan) openness to enjoyment of the body and sensory activity. Human desire for play scarcely contested the latter. Thus, for example, entire villages took part in ball play, which was subject to no temporal or ordinal limitations, and became out-and-out 'fun,' hosting a drive almost in the spirit of a public festival. In their ritualized form, the chivalric tourneys of medieval society were more theater, or even cult, than they were sport. In form (costuming, ornament, and scenery), and course of events, the actual tourney was part of a drama of latent eros, in whose course the 'sportive' knight adopted a ritualized role in a rapturous chivalric drama of romantic love (J. Huizinga).

English Sporting Movement

As early as the sixteenth century, England had horse racing, foot racing, wrestling, and boxing, for the leisure-time occupation of 'sportsmen' (the nobility). Part of the ideal of this 'disport' was that the contests be held according to rules of fairness, and in that spirit. This understanding of sports harmonized with the norms of the industrial society forming from the beginning of the eighteenth century onward. Formally equal chances, competition, achievement, and comparison were tested in sports. Sports became a messenger of modern industrial society. As 'schools of Christian character,' typically English sporting games were transplanted to the colonies. Here, indeed, they attained unanticipated 'success': the new 'sports' became veritably identifying 'national sports' (e.g., hockey in India).

Tourney Movement and Workers' Sporting Movement

As soon as these collective effects entered the scene—if not, indeed, before—they made sports available for appropriation in the interest of sociopolitical goals (ideologization). In Germany, this led to a doughty struggle between the middle-class tourneys and the workers' sporting movement. Beginning with Guthsmuth's 1793 Gymnastik für die Jugend (Ger., "Gymnastics for Youth"), German gymnastics, called to life by Ludwig Jahn (Turnvater Jahn—"Gymnastics-Father Jahn"), bodily training was understood as improvement of the Volkskörper ("people's/nation's body"). This regimen meant purely and simply a universal pre-military training under nationalistic auspices. By contrast, the workers' sporting movement formulated the task of sports and games as part of a discovery of identity in the class struggle. Both movements kept their distance from the spirit of the individualistic contests of the English sporting movement.

Cult of the Body in National Socialism

c) The anthropological aspect, as well as the cultural side, indicates the original universality of sports. A European or Hellenocentric view, however, shaped an idealized, goal-free understanding of competition, after the Greek model ('agonal attitude'—Jacob Burckhardt), from which the modern Olympic movement was able to extract and further a new universality of sports. But Hellenocentrism actually belittled foreign sporting traditions as 'unagonal.' This pattern of limitation configured bigotries that, in the Nazis' anti-Semitic propaganda, ultimately occasioned the cliché of the nonsportive, 'physically debilitated' Jew. Conversely, it installed the ideal of a sportive striving for success, achievement, and bodily presence: the powerful (naked) → hero.

Differentiation—Sports as 'Event'

4. Under such auspices, and still in high tones, the connection between sports and personality development (ethical, or moral, and social) is easy to emphasize. But actually, structures that dominated societies, and whose effects are lasting, such as, for example, male groups, then become marginalized. In sports, 'successful' virtues, such as strength, endurance, speed, achievement, and competition are first and foremost masculine virtues, the gaining of which becomes a modern initiation rite into maleness.

To be sure, acknowledgments of this kind remain vague, as long as their point of reference is still a comprehensive, unitary understanding of sports. Actually, sports today are more and more differentiated according to motive and use. Everyone defines her and his 'own' sport. While, for some, it is a kind of identifying 'substitute religion,' which they, for instance, practice as fans of a soccer team, for others it is spare-time 'fun'—something 'on the side.' If sports for school and health oblige one to pursue educational or therapeutic purposes, in high-achievement sports the motive that dominates is that of promoting and enhancing the commercial value of products for the market (e.g., Basketball Kids). If on the one hand, by way of differentiation, sports participation withdraws one from appropriation by ideologies, on the other hand this 'gain in autonomy' has a tendency to ground respective particular normative systems, which occasionally are frankly corrupt (performance-enhancing drugs).

Referred to itself, for individual self-perfection, sport does offer its own promises of happiness. Physical fitness is elevated to the norm. But a new external appropriation threatens sports. A world fixated on media and advertising already dominates the symbols accounted as hallmarks of self-perfection. There is no jogging without the right outfit. In the uniformity of the 'body cult,' the erstwhile sports practitioner becomes a lonely figure.

Literature

Blanchard, Kendall/Cheska, Alyce Taylor, The Anthropology of Sport: An Introduction, Westport 1995; Brailsford, Dennis, Sport, Time, and Society: The British at Play,

London 1991; Chidester, David, "The Church of Baseball, the Fetish of Coca-Cola, and the Potlatch of Rock 'n' Roll," in: Forbes, Bruce David/Mahan, Jeffrey H. (eds.), Religion and Popular Culture in America, Berkeley etc. 2000, 219-238; Craig, Steve, Sports and Games of the Ancients, Westport 2002; Evans, Christopher H./Herzog II, William R. (eds.), The Faith of Fifty Million: Baseball, Religion, and American Culture, Louisville 2002; Fleming, Scott/Tomlinson, Alan, Ethics, Sport and Leisure: Crises and Critiques, Aachen 1997; Guttmann, Allen, From Ritual to Record: The Nature of Modern Sports, New York 1978; Guttmann, Allen et al. (eds.), Essays on Sport History and Sport Mythology, College Station 1990; Huizinga, Johan, Homo Ludens: A Study of the Play Element in Culture, London 1970; MacClancy, Jeremy, Sport, Identity and Ethnicity, Oxford 1996; Prebish, Charles S., Religion and Sport: The Meeting of Sacred and Profane, Westport 1993; Price, Joseph L. (ed.), From Season to Season: Sports as American Religion, Macon 2001; Putney, Clifford, Muscular Christianity: Manhood and Sports in Protestant America, 1880–1920, Cambridge/London 2001; Riordan, James/Krüger, Arnd, The International Politics of Sport in the 20th Century, London/New York 1999; Wilkins, Sally, Sports and Games of Medieval Cultures, Westport 2002.

→ Body, Hero/Heroism, Luck/Happiness, Olympic Games, Popular Culture, Publicity

H. Georg Lützenkirchen

Stigmata / Stigmatics

'Stigma' (Gk., 'brand,' 'tattoo'), generally denotes a mark artificially made on the body as ornament, proprietary sign (slaves, animals), or mark of criminality. In antiquity, slaves who attempted escape or theft were 'branded,' usually with a mark on the forehead.

The phenomenon of stigmatization became important as a corporeal concomitant of Christian → mysticism. What is meant is the spontaneous, usually periodic, emergence of the bleeding wounds of Jesus crucified—on the palms of the hands, on the feet, and on the breast ('wound of his heart,' or of his 'side')—on the bodies of living persons without organic cause. In connection with stigmatization, other corporeal phenomena usually appear as well, such as a bloody sweat, tears of blood, living without nourishment, blindness, and → ecstasy. The first and most famous stigmatic is → Francis of Assisi (1181/82–1226). In his succession, we have descriptions of the wounds of some hundreds of persons. Remarkably, despite the male identification figures of Jesus and Francis, stigmatization appears preponderantly with women. The cause, here, is ordinarily of a psychopathological nature, often attributable to a dissociative disturbance. An extreme intensity in the veneration of the Passion of Christ, as practiced in the Christian mystique of suffering, can, by way of auto- or external suggestion, lead to the psychosomatic emergence of the wounds. Self-wounding and simulation have also been evidenced in many cases. An example that concerned the public for decades may be cited in Therese Neumann of Konnersreuth (1898–1962; see illus.). After various illnesses, and supposed cures, it was in 1926 that the wounds first appeared on her body. From this time forward, she is supposed to have lived—in the tradition of medieval female mystics—entirely without food or drink. Her stigmatization appeared regularly on Fridays, the day of Christ's death on the cross, and entailed ecstasies, during which she re-lived that salvific event. A number of medical testimonials refer to her 'severe hysteria.' Therese Neumann was the object of extensive veneration in her very lifetime, on the part of a great multitude of devotees, whose expectations she declined to disappoint, so that, alongside the documented psychosomatic reactions, simulation (especially with her 'no food or drink' regimen) has also been cited.

Therese Neumann is shown during one of her so-called 'passion ecstasies,' around 1950. Her body bears the Five Wounds of Christ, and she weeps blood. This phenomenon, occurring mainly on Fridays, and in the Passion Weeks, regularly drew hundreds of the faithful and the curious to Konnersreuth. Despite the large number of visitors, no one ever observed the onset of the stigmatization. Neumann always declined an examination. A sober observation must come to the conclusion that Therese Neumann maneuvered herself into a situation in which her piety, combined with expectations from without, were the components permitting her intentional simulation.

Clear parallels to Konnersreuth are to be observed in the case of the most celebrated male stigmatic since Francis, Padre Pio, of Pietralcina in Apulia (1887–1968). The Capuchin father had surrendered to the mysticism of suffering, and, beginning in 1918, bore the wounds of Christ, which, in a wondrous manner, disappeared after his death in 1968. Church authorities most energetically collected 'evidence' of a deceitful behavior on Pio's part. Only Pope John Paul II disallowed the doubts of his predecessors, and in May 1999, in the presence of 300,000 of his devotees, pronounced the beatification of the Padre.

Literature

Batacandolo, Dennis L., The Stigmatine Spirituality for the New Millennium: A Philippine Perspective, dissertation Rome 2001; Bouflet, Joachim, Les stigmatisés, Paris 1996; Graef, Hilda C., The Case of Therese Neumann, Cork 1950; Lhermitte, Jean, Mystiques et faux mystiques, Paris 1952; Thurston, Herbert, The Physical Phenomena of Mysticism, London 1952; Yarom, Nitza, Body, Blood, and Sexuality: A Psychological Study of St. Francis' Stigmata and Their Historical Context, New York 1992.

→ Body, Ecstasy, Mysticism, Pain, Psychopathology, Suffering, Tattoo

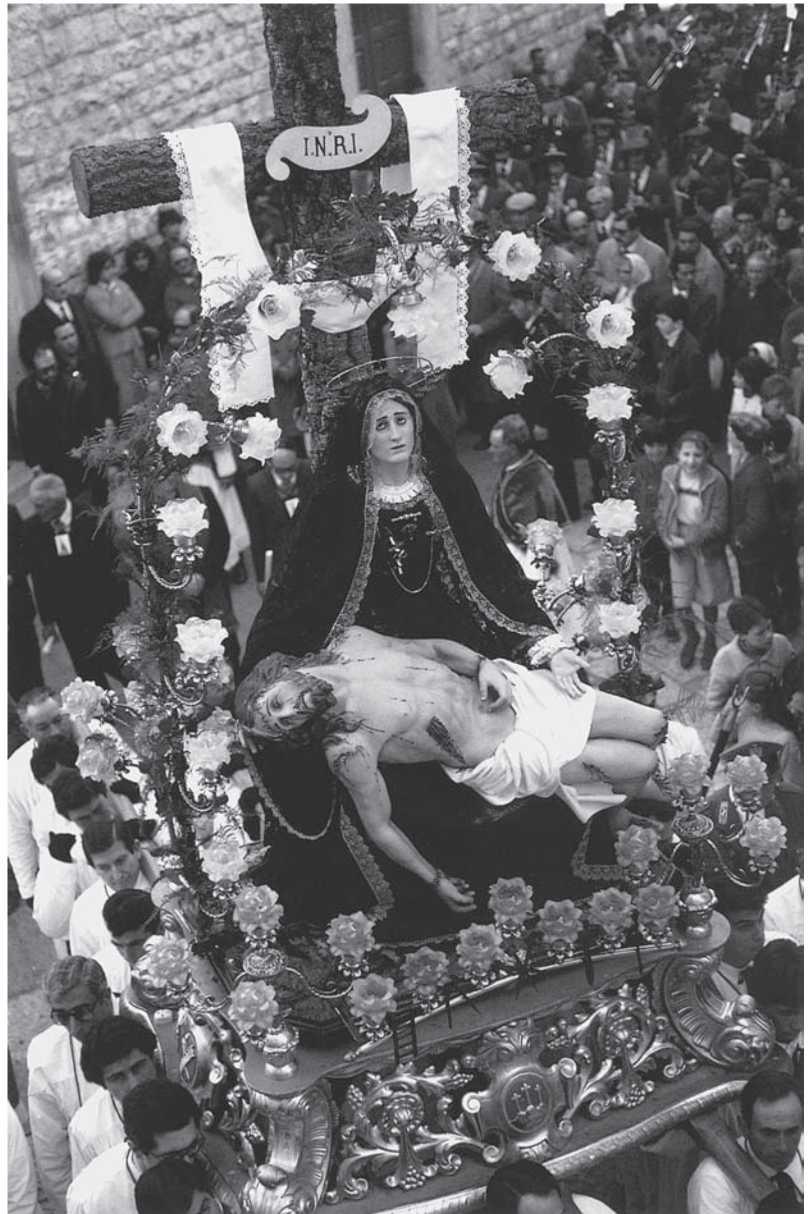
Guido Schmid

Suffering

Basic Human Experience

1. a) Suffering can be defined as the experience of situations interpreted and felt psychically, physically, and/or socially (e.g., poverty) as painful. Frequently, these longer or shorter periods are accompanied by the conscious and/or unconscious perception of loss, frustration, fear, sadness, and vulnerability. As with pain, suffering as well has both a physical and a psychic dimension. Only the entity of suffering, however, broadens the preponderantly individual character of pain, and binds individuals with their fellows, in a more or less highly developed capacity for empathy.

b) Grief represents a universally present phenomenon, even apart from the human species. Suffering, however, ranks as a typically human experience. Thus, suffering is a key theme in the religions, although not necessarily the central theme, as it is, for example, in Buddhism. Suffering is primarily a personal experience, but is also a social phenomenon: sharing suffering unburdens the individual, and can strengthen the community. The religions offer rituals to channel the 'working through' of personal experiences and community crises.



On the level of the understanding and interpretation of suffering, which is experienced as negative, the representatives of religion, philosophy, politics, as well as the sciences, have two complexes of questions to confront: Why is there suffering, what causes suffering, does suffering make sense—have meaning (cf. § 2)? And: can individuals and/or the community avert suffering? If so, then how (cf. § 3)?

Sense of Suffering?

2. Why is there suffering, what causes suffering, does suffering make sense? a) Suffering is a fact. It is experienced every day, although not at every time by everyone. Monotheistic religions have the problem of theodicy: why does God allow this (injustice)? That suffering is a punishment for personal transgressions or violation of norms obviously does not always hold true. For an explanation of the suffering of the 'innocent,' a sense must be attributed to suffering, for example suffering as purification, suffering as asceticism, suffering as desire, suffering as imitation of the passion of Christ, suffering as a consequence of the Fall. The classic image is in the biblical character of the pious Job, to whom the devil had God's leave to send the heaviest suffering, in order to test whether he would remain loyal to God. Or else the question of meaning is given up, and suffering is interpreted and accepted as the opaque will of a higher power. It is precisely the question of theodicy that challenges criticism of religion, especially of the monotheistic religions.

Deliverance from Suffering

b) Buddha the reformer elevated the question of the causes of suffering to the status of a major theme, attempting thus to transcend the Brahmanism of his time. The Four Noble Truths have always constituted the foundations of Buddhism, from its origin until this very day. To express them in abbreviated fashion: (1) there is no life without suffering (in Pali: dukkha); (2) the cause of suffering is avidity and desire (literally: 'thirst'); (3) suffering is removed through the annihilation of avidity; (4) the annihilation of avidity is reached by traversing the noble eightfold path. Suffering, in Buddhism, counts as a natural part of life, conditioned by transgressions committed in previous incarnations: the idea of karma. By following determinate rules, it is possible, usually through several rebirths, to release oneself from the

At the focus of the Christian religion stands the death of a human being: the execution of Jesus of Nazareth on the → cross. The grief that it has aroused occasions an ecstatic mystique of suffering, and has led to the creation of crucifixes and the Pietà. The body hanging on the cross, and the man on his mother's lap for whom that mother weeps, are profound 'pathos formulae' (Aby Warburg) of religious mentality. The liturgical occasions of such emphatic presentation of suffering include the processions of Holy Week in the Roman Catholic Mediterranean region, as here in Ruvo di Puglia in Apulia, Italy. This procession is held on Holy Saturday, and is organized by a special fraternity, the Confraternità di S. Maria del Suffragio; it is an honor for the bearers to carry the heavy burden of the "Image of Suffering" (Mistero), an honor often handed down from generation to generation. The images themselves are from the seventeenth century, and were created by sculptor Giuseppe Manzo, of Lecce. The 'compassion' (in Ital., pietà) of a mother for her dead son belongs to those basic human moments that are valid even beyond the purview of the religious; but it is in the religious framework that it has its mighty social place. (Hubert Mohr) cycle of living and dying (samsara)—and thereby release oneself from suffering—and effect nirvana.

c) Although the basic orientation of Christianity and Buddhism vis-à-vis life could not be more opposed (the name here: everlasting life; there: extinction), the capacity for compassion ('empathy') is of great importance in both. Doubtless the expressions of this compassion can be different: compassion, 'co-suffering,' is looked upon as a Christian virtue, and thereby as pleasing to God—and so, not altogether selfless; Buddhist teaching counsels the cultivation of benevolence and sympathy, but not 'co-suffering.' Because suffering is a most profound, universal human experience, monotheistic and non-theistic 'religions' like Christianity and Buddhism invoke the succor of beings placed at one's side, who, as capable of pity, can bring alleviation to earthly suffering: in Christianity, the angels and saints, in (especially Mahayana) Buddhism the Bodhisattvas. However, in both religions, human beings are invoked for assistance, summoned to the active practice of mercy. In this context, Christian pastoral activity can be interpreted as a spiritual (sacred) assistance, to be bestowed upon living human beings—human beings such as, through this concrete experiencing of suffering, now respond to their previous understanding of God with increasing skepticism, or turn away from belief or faith in the good.

Consequently, we have numerous examples in Christianity of suffering actually being sought, whether by martyrs or ascetics or flagellants. Altogether plausibly, a 'craving for suffering' can be explained neuro-physiologically as a 'craving for pain' that, in certain circumstances, can be addictive. In Buddhism, the meaning of suffering is generally limited to the development of the consciousness that what is life is also suffering.

d) Meaning attaches to suffering in an atheistic system of meanings, as well, although here it is the social cause of suffering that is seen, and, in Marxism its defeat is the goal of the system. In his Capital, Marx discusses the cause of the suffering of the working class, which, first and foremost, is 'alienation.' But ultimately it is a craving (for profit) on the part of individuals. Thus, suffering can even be defined mathematically, in a comparison: the amount of 'surplus value' is proportional to the degree of the exploitation that correlates directly with the suffering (and pressure of suffering) of the exploited.

Coping with Suffering

e) Since Descartes, and certainly since Darwin, discussion on the concept of 'suffering' in the sciences has been dominated by a (genetic) pragmatism. Suffering is 'pain as the phenomenon of a conscious or unconscious perception,' and constitutes a natural part of life. Anything beyond the perception of pain is deemed subjective interpretation—influenced by environment and genetics—of neurological processes. Various psychoanalytic and psychotherapeutic approaches ascribe a necessary function to the experience known as suffering. At present, suffering is gradually shifting into focus in the field of medical ethics, as demonstrated by intensified interdisciplinary dialogue. (Headings of this dialogue: intensive therapy, active/passive → euthanasia, → genetic engineering, → abortion.)

Soul/Body

3. For the purpose of resistance to suffering, of the individual as of the community, Christianity and Buddhism each have their 'ways.' 'Right activity' can afford redemption (heaven or nirvana). Differences in the way to that redemption can be identified. The Christian is the object of the grace and the will of God; the Buddhist, instead, is subject to his or her own capacity for knowledge. In Christianity, pastoral activity is ascribed an important function in the alleviation of suffering; indeed, together with medicine and psychology, pastoral work can show routes to a better handling of suffering.

Marx insisted that the suffering human being should recognize the fact of her or his suffering, analyze its causes, and actively alter the status quo. It is not only in the hereafter that everything should take a turn for the better. Joining the battle (revolution) is a 'preliminary,' not only to the diminution, but—depending on the phase of the battle—also to the increase of suffering.

In the sciences—and here in a special way in contemporary medicine, which is certainly more than merely scientific—the prevention and reduction of suffering assumes one of the major roles (if indeed not the major role): the lessening of, especially, physical (psychological, as well, however) pain that can be attained through various procedures, ranging from drugs to behavioral therapy. Also, living 'healthily' is sure to minimize suffering. Particularly with terminal or life-threatening diseases, a rapprochement of medicine and religion can be attained.

Literature

Christianity and Judaism: Glucklich, Ariel, Sacred Pain: Hurting the Body for the Sake of the Soul, Oxford 2001; Mazzoni, Cristina, Saint Hysteria: Neurosis, Mysticism, and Gender in European Culture, Ithaca 1996; Perkins, Judith, The Suffering Self: Pain and Narrative Representation in the Early Christian Era, London 1995; Brand, Paul/Yancey, Philip, Pain: the Gift Nobody Wants, New York 1993; Spaemann, Robert, Happiness and Benevolence, Edinburgh 2000.—Buddhism: Tin Lien, T. N./Bhikkhuni, T. N., Concepts of Dhamma in Dhammapada, Columbia 1996; Verdu, Alfonso, Early Buddhist Philosophy in the Light of the Four Noble Times, Delhi 1985.—Marxism: Bowker, John, Problems of Suffering in Religions of the World, Cambridge 1970.—Medicine and Ethology: Eibl-Eibesfeldt, Irenäus, Ethology, the Biology of Behavior, New York 1970; Morris, David B., The Culture of Pain, Berkeley 1991; Good, Mary-Jo D. et al. (eds.), Pain as Human Experience: An Anthropological Perspective, Berkeley 1992.

→ Atheism, Charitable Organizations, Criticism of Religion, Feelings/Emotions, Flagellants, Illness/Health, God/Gods/The Sacred, Mysticism, Pain, Stigmata/Stigmatics

Peter Kaiser

Sufism

Sufism and 'Mysticism'

In traditional scholarship as well as in conventional usage, Sufism is commonly referred to as the 'mystical tradition of Islam' (→ Mysticism). This ascription is problematic for three reasons. First, it divides → Islam artificially into two traditions presumably separable from each other; secondly, not all manifestations of Sufism are 'mystical';[1] and thirdly, the idea of a universally valid category of Mysticism manifesting itself in particular interpretations of different 'world religions' is itself increasingly disputed.[2]

Orientalist scholarship coined the term 'Sufism' in the late eighteenth century within the context of European → colonialism. Particular to the early European conceptualizations of Sufism was the attempt to describe it as a phenomenon distinct or only superficially attached to Islam. In this view, the deep personal spirituality discovered among the 'Sufis' was incompatible with the prevalent stereotypes of a legalist and spiritually superficial Islam. Rather, it fit into the romantic category of Mysticism that was understood—and still is—as essentially transgressing the boundaries of religion.[3]

The Concept

The Arabic epithet as-Sūfī appears already in the eighth century. It is most likely a derivative of sūf, 'wool,' a reference to the woolen garb these early Sufis used to wear. They were pious ascetics, like Hasan al-Basrī (d. 728), and Ibrāhīm Ibn Adham (d. 770?), fiercely criticizing immersion in the false splendors of 'the world' (dunya). The first Sufis were vigorous reformers, urging a return to the pure faith of the Qur'an, which they perceived as having been lost in the context of the territorial and material gains of the Umayyad Caliphate (661–750).

The Muslim term for Sufism is tasawwuf, literally meaning 'becoming a Sufi.' Soon it became a common name for the practice and philosophy of the Sufi movement. Abstinence of worldly pleasures was the remedy they prescribed, and it was achieved through practices of prayer, meditation, fasting, seclusion, and sleep deprivation. Sufis themselves sometimes prefer to derive tasawwuf from safā, 'purity.' This etymology would render tasawwuf 'the process of becoming pure,' and the Sufi would accordingly be the one embarked on this process—an interpretation very much in line with the initial character of the Sufi movement and Sufi self-understanding.

Early History of Sufism

While otherworldly orientation and asceticism remained important features of Sufism until today, they were tempered and sometimes countered with more positive attitudes towards the creation and especially the creator. Still in the tradition of the ascetic movement that regarded the world as mere illusion, Rābia al-Adawīya (d. 801) is the woman credited for introducing the theme of mystical love into Sufism. For her, absolute devotion to the Beloved (a Sufi metaphor for God) was the means to achieve a state of mystical union with God. In fact, the poems ascribed to Rābia make for some of the earliest examples of 'mystical' themes within the Sufi movement. For the first two Muslim centuries it is, however, very difficult to limit mystical interpretations of Islam—which can be found from early on, arguably already in the Qur'an—to a distinguishable social group within the Muslim community.[4]

A gradual institutionalization of Sufism occurred from the ninth century onwards. It found its expression in Dhū al-Nūn al-Misrī's (d. 859) attempt to systematize the nature of the Sufi path (tarīqa), conceptualized as a sequence of stages of mystical maturity (maqām, pl. maqāmāt) to which particular psychological states (hāl, pl. ahwāl) were attributed. This basic categorization became a cornerstone of Sufi discourse, subsequently refined by later Sufi authors, who developed sophisticated roadmaps of the mystical path—mostly divided into the four maqāmāt sharīa, tarīqa, marīfa ('esoteric knowledge'; → Esotericism), and haqīqa ('truth'). Advancing from stage to stage, the seeker (murīd) has to confront and gradually overcome his lower soul, or ego-self (nafs) that binds him to the world, in order to eventually achieve its annihilation (fanā). The ultimate goal of the path is to achieve unity with the Divine in the realization of absolute truth (haqīqa), sometimes also referred to as baqā, i.e. 'abiding' (in union with God).

Systematization and Growth

The systematization of Sufi thought and practice went along with Sufism's growth as a social movement, a first expression of which was the development of master-disciple relationships. Early examples of small circles around eminent Sufi teachers can be dated back to the eighth century. These informal circles used to dissolve with the master's passing. The earliest examples of Sufi manuals, small guidebooks designed for the core exercise of conscience examination for Sufi novices, date from the ninth century. From the twelfth century onwards, Sufi circles began to transform into traditions; revolving around the personalities and teachings of venerated past Sufi masters, distinct Sufi orders (tarīqa, pl. turuq) emerged, led by Sheikhs (Ar., shaykh; Pers., pīr) believed to carry the spiritual knowledge and authority of a unbroken chain of holy men reaching back to the prophet → Muhammad himself. This sacred chain (silsila) embodies the legitimacy of a Sufi master (→ Master/Pupil). The Sufi orders spread quickly, and established their branches virtually everywhere Muslims lived.

In its earlier stages, Sufism had been the domain of a religious elite, i.e. ascetic, poetic, and philosophical virtuosi. Some of the greatest masters of Sufi poetry such as Farīduddīn Attār (d. 1131?) and Mawlānā Jalāluddīn Rūmī (d. 1273), and major theoreticians of Sufism such as Ibn Arabī (d. 1240) were not initiated into Sufi orders.[5] The emergence and rapid development of the Sufi order as a new Muslim institution, and the Sufi lodges and convents (Ar., zawīya; Pers., khānqā, dergāh; Turk., tekke) as new Muslim spaces, contributed to a popularization of Sufism, which then became accessible to a much broader audience. Different degrees of → initiation and different levels of sophistication in the study of the Sufi path allowed for more or less commitment. Organized hierarchically—ideally in accordance with the individual stages of spiritual maturity—Sufi orders became efficient socio-religious networks with often considerable political influence. They distinguish themselves from each other mainly through their lineages, the religious rules they subscribe to, and the practices they follow.

Dhikr and the "Whirling Dervishes"

The practice most characteristic of Sufism is the dhikr, literally 'remembrance' (of God). Dhikr is a meditation on the names of God and selected Qur'anic sequences, often inducing ecstatic states (wajd). It can be done individually or in community, silently or aloud; which formulas are used for the invocation, as well as the outer form a dhikr, differs from order to order. Audible dhikr often involves particular breathing techniques, and rhythmic body movements. Some Sufi orders have their dhikr accompanied by music and/or dance ceremonies such as e.g. the Turkish Mevlevis, widely known as the order of the 'Whirling Dervishes.'

Sufism and Modernity

Until the nineteenth century, the Sufi orders were in almost all Muslim societies well accredited institutions with often considerable social, political, and economic powers.[6] Since then, however, Sufism became increasingly marginalized within Muslim discourse, and sometimes even declared un-Islamic. In the last two centuries, secular nationalists and Westernist modernizers (such as e.g. Kemal Ataturk from Turkey) have targeted Sufism as a major obstacle for modernization and rationalization. They regarded Sufism as a seed of irrationality and superstition, and thus as an obstacle on the road to modernity; they mistrusted the networks and authority structures of the Sufi orders, which were based on close personal allegiances, as a potential threat to the centralizing measures a nation state required.[7] Today, anti-Sufi sentiments are mostly fed by revivalist movements (such as the Wahhābiyya and the Salafiyya), which aim to restore an idealized pure form of Islam by cleansing it from all traditions and customs not sanctioned by → Qur'an or hadīth (authorized collections of the sayings and deeds of Muhammad).

Both secular and religious propaganda have contributed to the declining significance of Sufism as a major form of social organization in Muslim societies, even if there are still some orders with considerable social and political influence (e.g. the Muridiyya in Senegal). Artistic manifestations of Sufism, however, especially the amazing beauty and diversity of Sufi poetry and → music, are still an integral part of Muslim culture. With capitalism's discovery of → 'new age' and 'well-being,' Sufi commodities also entered the West European and North American markets, where Sufi poetry, music, and practices are advertised and sold under the labels of esoteric globalization such as 'Eastern spirituality,' 'world music,' 'world literature,' and 'Islamic Mysticism.' This market sometimes overlaps, but mostly contrasts, with the presence of Sufi Muslims in Western countries, where branches of many orders were established in the second half of the twentieth century.[8] As in most Muslim majority lands, these Sufi communities in the West lead a marginal existence at the edge of Muslim communities and are hardly noticed by the non-Muslim public. Nevertheless, they have proved to be in many instances very successful in the adaptation to new environments, often attracting considerable numbers of converts.

Sufism is today in a defensive position, often having to justify its very location within Muslim discourse. Nevertheless, the Sufi tradition within Islam is still very much alive, responding to needs for charismatic guidance and close personal relationships in small-sized communities, as well as strong religious experiences.

1. See Chittick, W. C., Faith and Practice of Islam: Three Thirteenth Century Sufi Texts, Albany 1992, 168-173.
2. Cf. King, R, Orientalism and Religion: Postcolonial Theory, India and 'The Mystic East,' London 1999, 7-34; Schmidt, L. E., "The Making of Modern 'Mysticism,'" in: Journal of the American Academy of Religion 71 (2003), 273-302.
3. The Orientalist interpretation of Sufism as a movement of freethinking ecstatic mystics had—and has—little to do with the average outlook and behavior of the Sufis, also called 'dervishes' (lit. 'poor ones'), who for the most part subscribe to the practical and legal prescriptions of Islam (sharīa). Libertarian and antinomian strands in Sufism certainly exist, but have always been in the minority. Cf. Ernst, C. W., The Shambhala Guide to Sufism, Boston 1997, 8-16.
4. In fact, the gradual objectification of both 'Sufism' and 'Islam' as signifying categories was not completed before the nineteenth century; ibid., XIVf.
5. For examples of their work see Chittick, W. C., The Sufi Path of Love: The Spiritual Teachings of Rumi, Albany 1983; Farīd al-Dīn Attār, The Conference of the Birds, trans. D. Davis et al., Harmondsworth et al. 1984; Chittick, W. C., The Self-Disclosure of God: Principles of Ibn al-'Arabī's Cosmology, Albany 1998.
6. For a closer look at some selected Sufi orders see Gaborieau, M. et al., Naqshbandis: cheminements et situation actuelle d'un ordre mystique musulman. Actes de la Table ronde de Sèvres (Varia Turcica 18), Istanbul et al. 1990; Popovic, A./Veinstein, G., Bektachiyya. Études sur l'ordre mystique des Bektachis et les groupes relevant de Hadji Bektach, Istanbul 1995; Popovic, A./Veinstein, G., Les voies d'Allah. Les ordres mystiques dans l'Islam des origines á aujourd'hui, [Paris] 1996.
7. A good example for a Sufi order becoming the organizational platform for a resistance movement against the secular nation state is the Sheykh Said uprising in Turkey (1925); see v Bruinessen, M., Agha, Shaikh and State: The Social and Political Structures of Kurdistan, London et al. 1992, esp. chapters 4-5.
8. See e.g. Hermansen, M., "Hybrid Identity Formations in Muslim America. The Case of American Sufi Movements," in: Muslim World 90 (2000), 158-197; Schlessmann, L., Sufismus in Deutschland. Deutsche auf dem Weg des mystischen Islam, Cologne etc. 2003.
9. For anthropological accounts of contemporary Sufism see e.g. Frembgen, J., Derwische. Gelebter Sufismus, wandernde Mystiker und Asketen im islamischen Orient, Cologne 1993; Gilsenan, M., Saint and Sufi in Modern Egypt: An Essay in the Sociology of Religion, Oxford 1973; Lings, M. A., Sufi Saint of the Twentieth Century: Shaikh Ahmad al-'Alawī. His Spiritual Heritage and Legacy, Cambridge 1993; Werbner, P./Basu, H. (eds.), Embodying Charisma: Modernity, Locality, and Performance of Emotion in Sufi Cults, London et al. 1998; Werbner, P., Pilgrims of Love: The Anthropology of a Global Sufi Cult, Bloomington 2003.

Literature

Awn, P. J., "Sufism," in: The Encyclopedia of Religion, ed. M. Eliade, New York, vol. 14, 1986, 104-123; Chittick, W. C., Sufism: A Short Introduction, Oxford 2000; Ernst, C. W., The Shambhala Guide to Sufism, Boston 1997; Farīd al-Dīn 'Attār, Muslim Saints and Mystics: Episodes from the Tadhkirat al-Auliya' ('Memorial of the Saints'), trans. A. J. Arberry, London etc. 1990; Gramlich, R., Die schiitischen Derwischorden Persiens, vol. II: Glaube und Lehre, Wiesbaden 1976; Karamustafa, A. T., God's Unruly Friends: Dervish Groups in the Islamic Later Middle Period 1200–1550, Salt Lake City 1994; Knysh, A. D., Islamic Mysticism: A Short History, Leiden etc. 2000; Lewisohn, L. (ed.), The Heritage of Sufism, 3 vols., Oxford etc. 1999; Massignon, L., The Passion of al-Hallāj: Mystic and Martyr of Islam (Bollingen series 98), 4 vols., Princeton 1982; Radtke, B./De Jong, F. (eds.), Islamic Mysticism Contested: Thirteen Centuries of Controversies and Polemics, Leiden etc. 1999; Schimmel, A., Mystical Dimensions of Islam, Chapel Hill 1992; Sells, M. A., Early Islamic Mysticism: Sufi, Qur'an, Mi'raj, Poetic and Theological Writings, New York 1996; Trimingham, J. S., The Sufi Orders in Islam, New York 1998.

→ Dance, Esotericism, Islam, Kabbalah, Monasticism, Music, Mysticism, Order/Brotherhoods, Orientalism/Exotism, Qur'an, Rhythm, Trance

Markus Dressler

Suicide

Concept

1. a) For the intentional termination of one's own life, there are a number of synonymous expressions in English: suicide, self-destruction, free death. Some of these expressions have been coined by religion, philosophy, and law, so that they are powerfully suggestive of moral value, often with the connotation of 'murder of oneself' (as in German Selbstmord, Dutch zelfmoord, etc.). Condemned by both religion and law, Latin sui cidium or sui caedere means 'killing of oneself'; 'suicide' was used for the first time in 1177.

Shrouding of Suicide

b) The problems to be associated with the statistics of suicide are of basic importance in all countries in which religion and law attach a strong moral (ethical) value to, and strong sanctions against, this act. With respect to the statistical data, it must be kept in mind that the killing of oneself—even with official data—is strongly influenced by the country's religious confession, and the penalization of the act of suicide. Thus, in Catholic countries (e.g., Italy, Spain, Brazil), the cause of death by suicide is frequently disguised, which conceals its actual numbers. On the other hand, in Protestant countries, such as in Sweden, Denmark, and Finland, the statistical estimate is likely to be more precise. Likewise questionable are the statistical findings in places with a conservative religious attitude, as in some states of the United States, in Northern Ireland, and in Scotland. However, in general, Protestants manifest a stronger tendency to suicide than do Catholics.

Theories

c) Among the theories of suicide most often cited are the following. (a) The sociological that was proposed by Émile Durkheim (1858–1917) in the year 1897, in his Le Suicide (Fr., "Suicide"), sees suicide rates as connected with the degree of the integration of individuals into society. Here, the condition that can be called rootlessness, and that involves the absence of norm or rule, plays an important role. (b) The psychoanalytic view is based on Sigmund → Freud's theory of aggression, according to which the aggressive drive takes an unconscious turn against the subject. (c) The psychiatric theories handle suicide in terms of a psychic illness (e.g., depression, or psychoses; → psychopathology).

Religious Perspectives

2. Of all human acts, suicide is the object of the most divergent assessments. For some, suicide is a transgression of the fifth commandment, a sacrilege or sin that is never forgiven, as it surely goes unrepented. For others, it means greatness of soul, contempt for death, or an act of human autonomy. Each varying position is the result of a particular culture, as seen in the mirror of its various standpoints on religion, ethics, Weltanschauung, and social relationships. Suicide is not a phenomenon of modern civilization only. It occurs—if less frequently—in other cultures and eras, as, for example, with the 'nature peoples,'[1] or with the Aztecs and Mayas, who actually had gods of suicide.

From the religious perspective, it can be said that most theistic religions take an expressly negative attitude toward suicide. This valuation could also be the reason for the complete refusal to handle the subject in relevant Christian theological dictionaries.

Christianity

In ancient Christianity, many believers sought to provoke their own martyrdom, as they saw it as a guarantee of their entry into Paradise. In the Bible itself, no explicit prohibition of suicide is to be found. Only with the Church Fathers, and in the conciliar decisions (Arles, 452; Orleans, 533; Prague, 563; Auxerre, 613; Toledo, 693; Nimes, 1184), and papal encyclicals (e.g., that of Pope Nicholas I, c. 860, in which suicide was declared mortally sinful), was suicide, or its attempt, negatively evaluated, and more and more severely punished. Writings that defend suicide went on the Index.

The medieval Christian Church battled suicide determinedly, especially under the terms of its denuncication by Thomas Aquinas (1225/6–1274), who, in his Summa Theologiae (II-II, q. 64, art. 5), sees it as a sin against the Creator, nature, and society. Thus, persons who commit suicide are condemned to eternal damnation as a spiritual punishment; the legal consequence is the confiscation of property (in England until 1873; and there, the unlawful quality of an attempt at suicide held until 1961). Suicidal persons were categorized as transgressors, and punishment was carried out on the corpse. Until the end of the nineteenth century, the Church refused suicidal persons church burial and determined that the place of burial must lie outside the cemetery, and that the burial times must be early morning, late evening, or night (and with the exclusion of the public).

Protestants very largely adopted the Catholic notions. But Martin → Luther modified the main focus: he condemned the act of suicide, but not the persons committing it, regarding suicide as a work of the devil (furor diabolicus—Lat., 'diabolical frenzy').

Judaism

Basing itself on the Talmud, Judaism takes an unambiguous position against suicide. In the case of one's own intentionally provoked death (and not the product of a confused spirit), there were no mourning prescriptions, until into the twentieth century. It is, however, for Jewish believers, a moral obligation to commit suicide as the only alternative to the commission of murder, incest, or idolatry (conceptualized as qiddush ha-shem, Heb. 'sanctification of the (divine) Name' vis-à-vis the medieval crusades).

At present, the Christian churches, as well as Judaism, interpret suicide as the act of a pathological state of mind on the part of the person committing it. Here they accept the medical interpretation of suicide as the product of an 'illness compelling one to choose death,' such as a profound depression. This explanation attenuates a negative moral evaluation, without prejudice to the churches' basic positions: suicides may now receive a religious burial, and survivors may be offered support. Nevertheless, to this very day, there is no immunity from punishment for attempted suicide in canonical Christian law.

Islam

Islam, too, rejects suicide. Some Muslims support this rejection with an appeal to the Qur'an (sura 4.29), although the pronouncement here is not unambiguous, and can be understood in the reciprocal sense. However, the prohibition of suicide in the oral tradition of the Prophet → Muhammad's messages (Hadith) is unambiguous. Here, we read: "Who kills himself, will suffer in the fires of hell [. . .] Everlastingly will he be shut out of heaven."[2] Muslims' worldview is scored with the premise that the course of life, as well as the manner and moment of death, is predetermined by God, and suicide in Islamic countries is rare. The special case of suicide bombers is a very recent phenomenon, and against the background of Islamic traditions it needs a network of spiritual authorities to legitimate this suicidal act—to turn the 'sin' of committing suicide into an act of 'martyrdom' (→ Martyr).

Hinduism and Buddhism

India has many forms of institutionalized suicide: they are recommended in the holy scriptures, and in the epics are presented as exemplary. Buddhism, like Hinduism, regards suicide as ethically neutral, although in Hinduism a divided attitude frequently prevails: according to the teaching of karma, the annihilation of the body does not mean the annihilation of one's karma. Accordingly, one cannot escape one's destiny through suicide. In Buddhism and Hinduism, suicide is accounted a negative influence on the prospects of one's next rebirth, since, through it, a living being is killed. Suicide, then, means an extension of the soul's wandering.

Special Social Forms

3. In addition to the self-sacrifice (martyrdom), special social forms of suicide include ritualized forms, such as those in sympathy with the dead, hara-kiri, suicide as a protest, or collective suicide.

Institutional religious suicide of women as a form of accompaniment of, or loyalty to, deceased men was practiced in, for example, the tradition of the Indian burning of widows (Sati) until well into the twentieth century. Here, the voluntary character of such acts of killing was usually only conditionally present, as religious and societal sanctions allowed women little room for other action.

The hara-kiri of the Japanese (that of men being called seppuku, that of women jigai) was historically celebrated, and intensely suffused with aesthetic and other motives. It was a prerogative of the Samurai—thus, originating with the military ethic—and had a profound religious meaning.[3]

Political and socially motivated suicide, which seeks to have its act and attitude accepted, and/or elucidated, is a form of social → protest. As an example, we may cite the suicide of Catholic Bishop John Joseph, who shot himself to death in a courtroom in Pakistan, in May 1998, to protest the capital sentence of a young Catholic.[4]

The tragic collective suicide in Guayana of members of the People's Temple, who had moved from the United States, in which 914 members of the community obeyed the command of their religious leader Jim Jones to kill themselves, as well as the suicide of members of the Solar Temple, in Canada, France, and Switzerland (74 cases in three years), seem to suggest that the level of the capacity for violence to be committed upon one's own person in the 'new religious movements' (→ New Religions) is sharply higher. Apocalyptic prophecies, longings for a blissful hereafter, aggression against an enemy before whom one believes oneself impotent, and the panic of a threat 'from without,' lead religious groups to commit violent deeds against their own members and themselves.

4. Currently, suicide is no longer to be found as a culturally obligatory institution, and even ritual suicide has become an infrequent individual case. But other occasions are developing, on the basis of new circumstances: the loneliness of, in particular, older persons favors the increase of 'suicide of the elderly,' while the growth of intolerable burdens even in early years, causes more and more children and youth to seek a 'final escape.' Religious persons often undertake corresponding preventive measures (even in the framework of the rite of confession) or institutions (telephone counseling, pastoral psychology, attention to and care for persons wearied of life). But the greatest obstacle to an efficient prophylaxis remains the taboo of and denial of the existence of the threat.

1. Stubbe, Hannes, "Suizidforschung im Kulturvergleich," in: Kölner Beiträge zur Ethnopsychologie & Transkulturellen Psychologie 1 (1995), 57-77; Rost, Hans, Bibliographie des Selbstmords (1927), Regensburg 1992; Pfeiffer, Wolfgang, Transkulturelle Psychiatrie, Stuttgart 1994.
2. Cf. Khoury, Adel Theodor, Der Koran, Gütersloh 1988, 297.
3. Cf. Pinguet 1993.
4. O Público, May 14, 1998, p. 11.

Literature

Anderson, Olive, Suicide in Victorian and Edwardian England, Oxford 1987; Crepet, P. et al. (eds.), Suicidal Behaviour in Europe—Recent Research Findings, Rome etc. 1992; Droge, Arthur J./Tabor, James D., A Noble Death: Suicide and Martyrdom among Christians and Jews in Antiquity, San Francisco 1992; Durkheim, E., Suicide: A Study in Sociology, New York 1951 (French [1]1897); Headley, Lee A. (ed.), Suicide in Asia and the Near East, Berkeley/London 1983; MacIntosh, John L., Research on Suicide: A Bibliography, Westport 1985; Minois, Georges, History of Suicide: Voluntary Death in Western Culture, Baltimore 1999 (French [1]1995); Perlin, Seymour (ed.), A Handbook for the Study of Suicide, New York 1975; Pinguet, Maurice, Voluntary Death in Japan, Cambridge 1993 (French [1]1984); Tseng, W.-S., Handbook of Cultural Psychiatry, San Diego 2001; van Hooff, A. I. L., From Autothanasia to Suicide: Self-Killing in Classical Antiquity, London 1990.

→ Ars Moriendi, Death and Dying, Ethics/Morals, Euthanasia/Assisted Suicide, Martyr, Psychopathology

Chirly dos Santos-Stubbe

Sunday / Sabbath

1. a) In most Western societies where Christianity has been the dominant religion for a long time, Sunday has a special place as a 'day off.' As a day of rest and pause from labor, however, Sunday is not very old. In societies defined by the sowing, cultivating, and reaping of nutrients, season and weather govern the rhythm of work and rest. Animals must always be cared for: feeding, milking, and carrying out the dung must be seen to. The farm family cannot take a 'day off.' The dyers had their 'blue Monday,' when they dried and oxidized the wool that had been steeped in dye on Sunday.

The Sabbath, a Day without Work

b) It was altogether unusual, then, to specify a day of God, which, with the Third Commandment (Exod 20:8-11) in Judaism became a basic rule. The mythological foundation was that God himself had made the world in six days, but rested (shabat) on the seventh (shebi'i), as in Gen 2:2, the day on which, later (Exod 40), the temple was used for the Sabbath divine service. In the Commandment, there is nothing about a divine service, but only about rest. Not only the people of God, but non-Jewish neighbors, or foreign slaves, even oxen were to rest. With the loss of political self-determination, and of a homeland, the observance of the Sabbath became especially important. Strictly speaking, nothing might be done that was not unconditionally necessary for the maintenance of God's creation, and therefore, for saving life. A literal interpretation, for example, of the proposition that no fire was to be lighted—lighted for cooking—means that, in today's Israel, air traffic is prohibited, since neither may a motor be 'lighted.'

c) The Jewish Shabbat begins on Friday evening—'as soon as three stars are to be seen'—with a supper in the family, often with guests. Candlelight, a blessing of the children, and the solemn drinking of wine makes it a holiday meal. In the morning, the family goes to synagogue, and eats cold cuts from what has been prepared the day before, or a soufflé. Sabbath ends when darkness falls. Beginning a holiday the evening of the previous day is also the usage in the Christian calendar, when Christmas begins with the Christmas Eve or Easter with the 'New Fire.' The reason for this practice is simply that the Genesis story says that "it became evening and morning—the second/third etc. day."

Sunday

2. a) The religious quality of the day of rest: In order to distinguish itself from the Jewish communities, Christians celebrated their 'Sabbath' on the following day, the first of the 'working' week. It became the Lord's Day (in Gk., Kyriaké; in Lat., [Dies] Dominica), since, according to the Gospels, it was the day on which Christ rose from the dead. Only when Christianity became the Roman religion did the Christian day of rest become exclusive—the Dies Solis, 'sun's day,' adopting the name of the Roman Sun God. Like the other days of the week, Sunday too bore the name of a planetary god—such as Lunae Dies, 'Moon's Day,' and Veneris Dies, 'Venus' Day,' (later 'Freya Day')—but the rising sun came to be explained as a symbol of the risen Christ. The Sabbath, on the other hand, can be explained as the anti-Christ day, the day on which, for example, the witches gather to celebrate their diabolical sacred service.

b) The Christian Sunday is the day of the common divine service, originally in the early morning, if not actually on the eve. Before or after, work was permitted. In the medieval Church, assistance at Mass in church, and not recreation, became the Sunday duty. The frequent reiteration of the rule shows the difficulty of imposing its regular observation. Only in the city could it be assured that Sunday, and as a rule only the morning thereof, was actually without work—particularly, without work being done by one's avaricious neighbors—and as well as just the evening of the holiday, or the time during which shops were closed. A work-free day is an economic disadvantage that one is happy to share with others.

c) In Germany for instance, only from 1878 onward was Sunday a general day of rest. Industry was loath to surrender the (half) workday, but workers became ever more rebellious, and sermons on obedience, suffering, and the order willed by God, kept recommending suggested improvement. This intent of the holiday bore no fruit, of course, and Emperor Wilhelm would have been glad to rescind it. Citizens were using Sunday-morning Mass time more and more for profane gatherings, or cultural meetings, instead of religious ones. Unions called meetings at which workers could be educated, and could come to know their political rights, right while the church bells were pealing.

Names

3. The Sundays in the calendar each have their own names and character (their proprium), grouped around Christmas, then around Easter. The names come from the particular psalms, gospels, or epistles read at Mass on these days, or are merely counted: Septuagesima Sunday means seventy days until Easter; Quasimodogeniti means 'As-just-born [infants']' Sunday (the first reading on the First Sunday after Easter, 1 Pet 2:2), when children are admitted to the Eucharist (to Confirmation on the following Sunday, Dominica in Albis, White-Vestment Sunday); Palm Sunday celebrates Jesus's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, as the citizens of that city strewed palm branches before him; Cantate (i.e., Domino, Lat., "Sing to the Lord"; Ps 98:1) Sunday is the 'choir's Sunday.'

Literature

Carson, Donald A. (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical, and Theological Investigation, Grand Rapids 1982; Duby, Georges, The Legend of Bouvines: War, Religion and Culture in the Middle Ages, Cambridge 1990 (Fr. [1]1973); Eskenazi, Tamara C. et al. (eds.), The Sabbath in Jewish and Christian Traditions, New York 1991; Laband, David N./Heinbuch, Deborah Hendry, Blue Laws: The History, Economics, and Politics of Sunday Closing Laws, Lexington 1987; MacCrossen, Alexis, Holy Day, Holiday: The American Sunday, Ithaca 2000; Odom, Robert L., Sabbath and Sunday in Early Christianity, Washington 1977; Solberg, Winton U., Redeem the Time: The Puritan Sabbath in Early America, Cambridge/London 1977; Webster, Hutton, Rest Days, New York 1916; Weiler, Rudolf (ed.), Der Tag des Herrn. Kulturgeschichte des Sonntags, Vienna 1998; Weiss, Herold, A Day of Gladness: The Sabbath among Jews and Christians in Antiquity, Columbia 2003.

→ Calendar, Feasts and Celebrations, Time

Christoph Auffarth

Superstition

The designation is a polemical one, connoting a distance taken from the acts of persons, other than oneself, which must be called religious, but which either seem exaggerated (*super*stition), or are forbidden by official religion. Pastors, especially, and (other) intellectuals use it to disparage the piety of the 'uneducated folk.' From an atheistic viewpoint, any religion can be called superstition.

→ Atheism, Polemics, Religion

Christoph Auffarth

Symbol / Sign / Gesture

Introduction

1. a) Religions are complex and culturally conditioned systems of interpretation, symbol, and communication, with varying stores of signs. Through signs, in their respective ways and manners, these systems interpret ('code') perceived reality. Here the potential repertory, and broad spectrum, of religious signs or symbols includes, besides 'audible' sounds, words, and propositions of → language, also all other forms of sensory → perception. These forms are, variously, spatially orienting, smell-(olfactory) or taste-specific, and visual signs, as well as 'haptic' or tactile 'signs of touch.' Thus, for example, the spatially ordering principles of breadth, height, and depth, as well as of proximity and distance, define the simplest coordinates of human environments, as well as more or less elaborate cosmographies and cosmologies. Examples of highly differentiated and unambiguously shaped forms of olfactory signing are found in antiquity, among other venues, where every sacrificial act was attended with a sequence of different odors. The particularly expansive palette of the visual elements of religious communication extends from objects, pictures, statues, and edifices, on to the most varied forms of conventionalized courses of bodily movement, among which, besides gestures, ritualized movements, too, and dances, are to be numbered. Religious acts, in this connection, can be defined as symbolical acting in a sign-determined field, by which individual signs or symbols, always occurring and interconnecting in chains, take their reference—and extract their foundation and existence—from their respective systems of meaning, interpretation, and belief.

b) The special accomplishment of systems of religious signs lies, above all, in the fact that they generate, steer and guide, and place in mutual relationship, the entire array of cognitive, emotional, normative, social, and cultural processes. Thus, for instance, → art can be assigned a function within religious communication, according to which, as in medieval Christianity, it is constrained to make the contents of belief and doctrine visible in symbolism. The differentiation of an independent sign-system of 'art,' already present in antiquity, came back to life within Europe in the → Renaissance, and can easily be followed by pursuing, among other choices, developments in the medium of the pictorial image. Unlike those who employ other systems of signs, users of a religious one never fail to refer the validity of their

Communication

A priestess in Bodhanilkanta, north of Katmandu, in Nepal, gives a pilgrim the tika after the Ceremony of Veneration. A mark is made on the forehead with sandalwood resin or cinnabar, to signal believers' participation in the divine service. The priest/priestess is remunerated with a contribution of money. For a woman to give the tika is unusual: the gesture of blessing indicates the high ritual rank and social status of the one bestowing it. Thus, a layperson receives the tika from a priest, a junior person from an elder, and, conventionally, a woman from a man. Believers who are clients of a lower-ranking priest impose the forehead marking themselves. In the case illustrated, the pilgrim receives the tika after he has offered his veneration to the statue of Vishnu of Bodhanilkanta. Here, Vishnu reposes on the serpent Ananta, in a pool symbolizing the primeval ocean. The King of Nepal need not visit Bodhanilkanta, as he is himself regarded as an incarnation of Vishnu. The King, in an annual celebration, receives the tika from a girl residing in the Kumari Bahai Temple in Katmandu as the living Virgin Goddess, and thus has his authority certified. (Benita von Behr / Kirsten Holzapfel) system of interpretation to certain structures of rule and principle. The rules and principles in question are indubitable, obligatory for the community, and authoritatively present. Structures of rules can, as in Christianity and Islam, be established by founding personalities, or be established by age and tradition. Foundational principles can be supported by narrative sign-codes, such as myths or symbolical acts (→ Sacrifice). In all of these cases, a supreme principle (God, Fate, the All-One) can serve as a communicative anchor. Just so can an all-embracing plenitude of signification of world and nature ("pansemiotic metaphysics"—Umberto Eco) get in solid communicative 'touch.' Again, a universal accord with a cosmic order can be a similar anchor, as can a 'world law,' or simply a proclaimed connection between doing and prospering, between conformity and success. In monotheistic religions, in this regard, the character of obligation attaching to the system of signs in question is usually fastened to another obligation—that of its content, as well as to the programmatic exclusion of other interpretational systems. Polytheistic religions, on the other hand, show that a systematic pluralism can be admitted, and can belong to the repertory of signs, and that a division of labor in terms of the cults is possible, at least as long as no fundamental social and political consensus seems to have gotten under way. Then, of course, a danger to 'sign identity' within the community may threaten. Then as well, as in the times of Plato, in the Greek city-states, it will be regarded as a crime to introduce new gods, and it will seem in order to prohibit private cults.

c) Another possibility for control over a religious sign-system consists in religious → specialists receiving a monopoly over interpretation. The establishment of religious signs as omen, or as signs or judgments of the gods (whether they rest on phenomena in nature, → dreams, → visions, monsters, or miraculous actions), then lies in the hands of priests, shamans, prophets, monks, nuns, preachers, singers, or storytellers. Control over correct interpretation likewise rests with these specialists. In their hands lie exposition, transmission of interpretation, and normative evaluation, and they separate 'coincidental' events or psychic experiences from 'messages' containing signs (presages and portents). As a rule, these specialists are elevated above the rest of the community even outwardly, by → clothing, → hair style, or → tattooing. In scriptural religions, such as Christianity or Judaism, collections of signs and their interpretations are stored, and the principles of their exposition fixed, in the medium of → writing (→ Text/ Textual Criticism; Exegesis; Hermeneutics). Thus, the question of how the sign (in Lat., signum) is connected with the 'signed' (signatum) was especially important in the Jewish and Christian tradition of belief—whether by participation (partial identity), by similarity (similitudo), or by analogy (substitution or representation, reflection). What is the relationship between God (the Emperor) and his statue (his → image)? Are they identical, does God only dwell in it, or is God's likeness a sensible sign of God's invisible power? What is the relationship between God the Father and his Son, the Redeemer? How ought one to conceive the relationship between bread, and the body of Christ? An explanation and classification of these matters, in terms of meaning and pattern of interpretation, is part of the (self-) interpretation undertaken by religious specialists, in the systematizing inner perspective of a religious system of meaning. Together with the forms of 'simple,' everyday ritual acts, and their logic, the theologies (→ Theology), canonical texts (→ Canon), and theological dogmatics (→ Dogma) arising in consequence of their discourse, constitute important elements, members, and building blocks of religious symbolic systems. Further, they must be ascribed a controlling function that will exclude other gods and patterns of interpretation (→ Polemics).

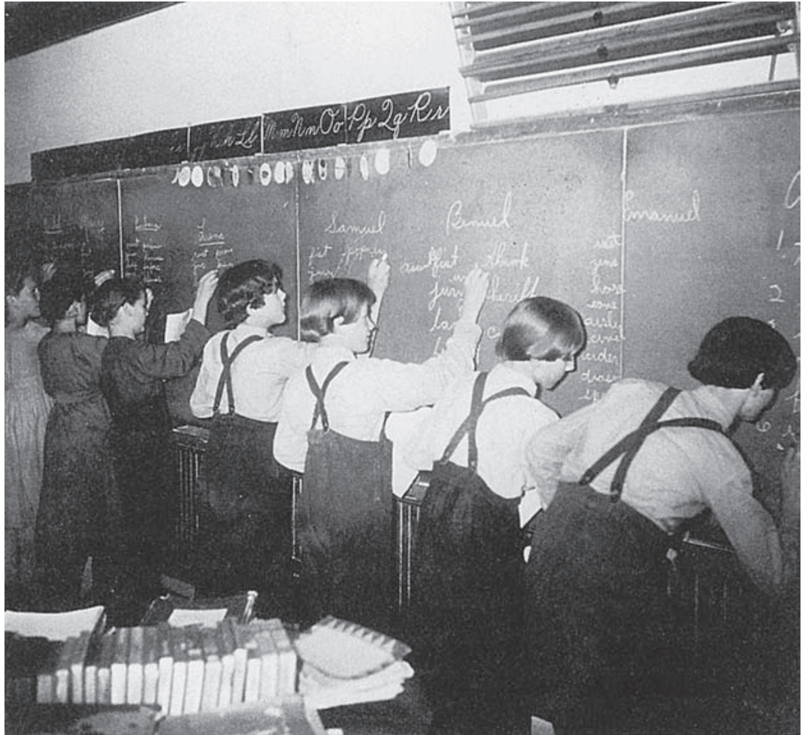
Emblems and Symbolics: The Emergence of the Christian Repertory of Signs

2. During its emergence, Christianity's religious system of meaning and interpretation found itself in a direct relation of competition with a series of other, already established, religious systems of sign and interpretation. There were the Greek and Roman cults, the Eastern religions, and not least of all, Judaism. Christian theologians like → Augustine assumed and absorbed numerous principles of order, and complexes of signs, especially after Christianity had entered a symbiosis with the political structures of domination after the 'Constantinian turn' of the fourth century, and had established itself as the dominant system of meaning (→ Late Antiquity). It was above all the imperial representations of supremacy, the court ceremonial, the Mysteries, and the system of norms for intercourse with clients, that were available to Christianity as primary systems of reference. They helped the young religious communities to produce and mold a sign-system of cultic actions, together with an independent repertory of group symbols, mythic images (Dionysian symbolism of the Bacchus sarcophagus), and theological representations. In the sequel, existing presentation modi were taken and applied: both of transcendence (Christus Pantocrator; → Epiphany), and of the religious specialists, the clergy, and the arsenal of representations of the Roman Emperor. In the Middle Ages, ritual adoption by the body of specialists, or by the ordained priestly class, once more imitated entry into the status of vassal. The universal revaluation of existing negative signs to group emblems representing bestowal of identity, such as the fish or the → cross, is a noteworthy process. Thus, for instance, the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth was reinterpreted by religious specialists, at high semantic expense, from stigma to sign of redemption, readiness for suffering, and capacity for the same. In the further course of things, there came an increasing accumulation, multiplication, and inflationary presence of Christian symbols: miracles, relics, sacramental signs, and cultic actions. In contrariety with



The Amish Brethren in the United States and Canada posit a sign with their clothing. Simple and old-fashioned, it is the expression of a collective delineation from the world, decisiveness, and the subordination of individual preferences to the group code. Uniform clothing, as the expression of a common duty, signifies the Amish twenty-four-hours-a-day service of God. With so many communalities, there are nevertheless fine differences, through which the individual denominations are distinguished. Each possesses its own forms of hat, shirt, stockings, and not least of all, suspenders. When suspenders came into style at the close of the seventeenth century, they were at first rejected by the Amish. Later, however, having become a symbol of awareness of rural traditions, they found their way into the catalogue of Amish clothing. Thus, in Pennsylvania, men of Lancaster County wear two suspenders, crossed in the back (in the form of an "X"), while members of the Renno Group in Mifflin County prefer to go without suspenders. The question, too, of whether the suspenders may be buttoned, is variously answered from group to group—and in any case, many Amish taboo belts as a sportive vanity. (Benita von Behr)

this process stands an increasing tendency to the reduction of signs, and to the theological construction of dogma, as, for example, the reduction of the number of the sacraments to the number of seven, and its fixation there (see under § 4).

3. a) The theological hierarchization of meanings—effected in the framework of a Christian establishment of signs, which framework is also that of the exegetical politics of sign—subordinates both the sign of gesture, and the material sign that is a component of cultic activity, to the primacy of the verbal sign. This sign finds its loftiest correspondence in the incarnation of the Logos, Christ, the Word Incarnate. In Christian faith then, in the field of tension between acoustical and visual media, the spoken word enjoys a privileged status vis-à-vis the gesture. That is also the reason why, with the help of sign language, the members of certain monastic orders that maintain a vow of silence (Trappists, Carthusians), can understand one another without violating the monastic rule of silence. During church history, the physical sign was repeatedly exposed to internal ecclesial criticism: it was said to go counter to the 'hierarchy' of meaning, and to 'switch,' or otherwise distort, the duties of the several parts of the body. The control of this theologically suspect sensory expression of the body was now undertaken by way of a process of assignment of meaning ('semantization'). The latter now divided temperate, chaste, and virtuous 'gesturing' (in Lat., gestus) from prolix, exaggerated, and wicked 'gesticulation' (gesticulatio). Bound to the ideal of a rigid, stationary, and curtailed spirit of celebration, 'gesturing' was positively evaluated. The theological ascription of meaning here was that of an ordering, healing effect on the soul. By contrast, 'wild, unbridled, and monstrous' gesticulating is ascribed a negative, harmful meaning. Here we see a 'puritanical' tendency in Christianity to place limits on corporeal gesture in cult, or in everyday religious practice. Convulsive, ecstatic motions or expressions of the body are interpreted either as demoniacal possession, calling for exorcism, or as a condition of mystical enthusiasm and excitement (in Lat., raptus; → Mysticism). In theological discourse, these are referred to as two distinct forms of 'border-crossing' (one to be prohibited and the other permitted). 'Tamed' gestures—the hand for blessing and prayer, kneeling, the carrying of cultic objects—of course, belong to the basic stock of Christian ritualism, and determined especially the cult of post-Reformation → Catholicism.

Cultic Dance Gesture I: Hawaii

b) Thus, Christianity, and its rules for signs, tamed, and precisely de-eroticized, the body as its 'sign-bearer.' In many religions, on the other hand, expressive bodily techniques enjoyed reception as means of expression in cult and ritual. The Christian procedure—until recent times, in scattered efforts—altogether excludes dance as a mode of religious communication, while Native American (East and West) or Circum-Pacific religions exhibit an extremely elaborate code for the same. In the religious symbolic system of the original Polynesian inhabitants of Hawaii, for example, the rhythmic types of bodily expression held an important place. One significant ritual expression of divine veneration was the Hula dance, in whose flowing movements myths and powers of nature were visibly presented, communicated, preserved, and transmitted adown the generations. In our own day, in Hawaii, dances expressing the mythical histories of the world's creation—cosmogonies—have been given an important place as a consciously perceived, intentionally introduced means to the raising of Hawaiians' awareness of their own identity. Simultaneously, the Hula also represents one of the most important tourist attractions of the region, a late example of the adaptation of the (secular) exotic, and of the exploitation of non-European religions (→ Orientalism/Exotism; South Sea/Australia; Tourism).

Cultic Dance Gesture II: India

c) Along with expressive gestures, many religions use sophisticated linguistic signs, as we have already mentioned in reference to certain Christian monastic orders. With the help of such signs, entire narratives, particularly myths, can be presented nonverbally. As an example of systems of religious interpretation that have produced an especially broad palette of symbolical gestures—hand and finger positions, as well as bodily postures—we may cite Hindu religions, likewise by contrast with Christian reticence with regard to signs. The Sanskrit word mudra ('seal,' 'mark') refers to a multiplicity of meaningful hand and finger positions—to which, among others, belong the gesture for teaching (dharmacakra mudra), the gesture for greeting and for compassion (varada mudra), the gesture for meditation (samadhi mudra), the gesture for fearlessness and renunciation (abbaya mudra), and the gesture for argumentation (vitarka mudra). The mudras are complemented by a wide variety of positions of the body, each having its own particular meaning.

Religious Signs in the Modern Age

4. a) The current situation with regard to religious systems of symbol or sign is well illustrated by the situation of the Roman Catholic Church. In the course of the twentieth century, the Catholic system of belief was characterized by an increasing loss of the connection between its own interpretation, and the understanding of its signs throughout broad parts of the Church. In other words, knowledge concerning the approach to and correct interpretation of religious signs—especially, interpretation of the Latin language—has become limited in increasing measure to specialists or members of the clergy. It was a matter of a development that harbored within itself the danger of a gradual routinization, petrification, and general endangerment of the individual symbols and their superordinate connections of meaning. The liturgical reform of the Second Council of the Vatican (1962–1965) therefore brought a long-awaited deliverance from the abundant Baroque and post-Baroque overgrowth of the old cultic store of the Roman Catholic confession. Many groups welcomed the Vatican II reforms with open arms. Fifteen years later, the periodical Concilium[1] observed a remarkable void and penury within modern Catholicism in its store of sensible appeals and attractions. Catholic development was said to stand in crass contradiction to the stormy advance of the audiovisual media in society. Cultural anthropologists corroborated this finding. In her study of the Irish Catholic community in London, and with respect to the 1967 dismantling of obligatory Friday abstinence from meat, Mary Douglas[2] saw in the Catholic episcopate a blindness to the meaning-content of nonverbal symbols. Thus, modern Western culture of information constantly creates new opportunities for modern rituals of interaction, and for 'sign worlds.' But, in the framework of religious communication and theological signing, what occurs is an intensifying curtailment, restriction, and "destruction of the sensory" (A. Lorenzer).

Using hindsight, this finding can be listed in the ever more firmly established tendency of European history of religion, in a 'process of civilization' (N. Elias), to regulate, and as far as possible to exclude, bodily excesses, extravagances, or any dismantling of boundaries. Only in the 'tumultuous plebeian forms' of corporeal expression, such as those of → carnival, do we still find any 'sensual anarchy' (disciplined, to be sure, in the spirit of the middle class). The 'de-sensualization' of religious communication at the present time, as we have briefly shown by the example of the Roman Catholic Church, marches on. Meanwhile, the task of the extreme appeal of the sensory organs, including that of an 'overload of attraction,' has been assumed by a multiplicity of other cultural institutions, and partial systems of society, such as the media and modern art (e.g., in performances of Hermann Nitsch's "Theater of Orgies and Mysteries"; → Blasphemy, with ill.).

Polyvalence

b) The marketing situation, plurality, and variety of choice constantly available in past and present, is especially great and well-defined in the modern 'society of information.' This appraisal is verified not only among various religious sign-systems (imprinted with meaning and culture) and their cults, but with individual ones, as well. Conflicts and competitions are fixed and delivered by way of individual religious symbols or signs, that, in the discourse of the media, are charged with still more meaning, and with numerous emotions. To cite two regional examples of such a 'battle over the symbols,' reference can be made to the display of the cross in Bavarian classrooms (→ Cross/Crucifixion), or the prohibition of Muslim girls' wearing headscarves in French schools (→ Laicism; Veil).

At the same time, the new, and secularized, meaning-systems of the post-modern present shape our perception and signs in the same manner and mode as did the 'old,' and religious, patterns of interpretation. What enters the scene here, in the theory of signs, is the characteristic of polyvalence. Signs, whether gestures, images, or words, possess several 'reference indicators' (indices): they can refer to several areas of meaning or object at once. Thus, for example, in the framework of an attribution of meaning whose orientation is ecological, any dying tree of the tropical rainforest, a hole in the ozone layer, or whaling, can be a symbol of a universal (apocalyptic) end time (→ Environmentalism). But these signs can indicate not only the ecological movement, but religious myths, as well (world-tree, animal peace, destruction of the world), and can be part of a political position, or of a system of interpretation in the sense of the destruction of the world. It is this polyvalence, in the sense of value, and thus ambivalence, of signs, that makes communication in today's societies so rich, but also so complex, and often ambiguous: religion is often but one more 'sign index' among so many others, multiplied and concealed in the snowstorm of images of the world and patterns of orientation.

1. Power, D., "Symbol and Art in Worship," in: Concilium, February 1980, 19-27.
2. Douglas 1973.

Literature

Aldrete, Gregory S., Gestures and Acclamations in Ancient Rome, Baltimore 1999; Bourdieu, Pierre, Language and Symbolic Power, Cambridge 1991 (Fr. [1]1982); Bremmer, Jan/Roodenburg, Herman (eds.), A Cultural History of Gesture, Ithaca 1992; Cassirer, Ernst, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, 3 vols., New Haven 1953 ([1]1923–1929); Corbeill, Anthony, Nature Embodied: Gesture in Ancient Rome, Princeton 2004; Davidson, Clifford (ed.), Gesture in Medieval Drama and Art, Kalamazoo 2001; Döbert, Rainer, Systemtheorie und die Entwicklung religiöser Deutungssysteme, Frankfurt/M. 1973; Douglas, Mary, Natural Symbols: Explorations in Cosmology, London [2]1973 ([1]1970); Eco, Umberto/Marmo, Costantino (eds.), On the Medieval Theory of Signs, Amsterdam 1989; Elias, Norbert, The Symbol Theory, London 1991; Emmorey, Karen/Reilly, Judy S.

(eds.), Language, Gesture, and Space, Hillsdale 1995; Fehler, Michael (ed.), Fragments for a History of the Human Body, New York 1989/1990; Geertz, Clifford, "Religion as a Cultural System," in: Banton, Michael (ed.), Anthropological Approaches to the Study of Religion, London 1966, 1-46; Goffman, Erving, Interaction Ritual: Essays on Face-to-Face Behavior, New York 1976; Hall, James, Illustrated Dictionary of Symbols in Eastern and Western Art, New York 1995; Kendon, Adam, Gesture: Visible Action as Utterance, Cambridge 2004; Leach, Edmund, Culture and Communication: The Logic by which Symbols Are Connected. An Introduction to the Use of Structuralist Analysis in Social Anthropology, Cambridge/New York 1976; Liungman, Carl G., Dictionary of Symbols, Santa Barbara 1991 (Swedish [1]1974); Luhmann, Niklas, Funktion der Religion, Frankfurt/M. [3]1992 ([1]1983); Messing, Lynn S./Campbell, Ruth (eds.), Gesture, Speech, and Sign, Oxford 1999; Saunders, E. Dale, Mudrā: A Study of Symbolic Gestures in Japanese Buddhist Sculpture, Princeton 1960; Schmitt, Jean-Claude, La raison des gestes dans l'occident medieval, Paris 1990; Idem (ed.), Gestures, Chur 1984; Skorupski, John, Symbol and Theory: A Philosophical Study of Theories of Religion in Social Anthropology, Cambridge 1976.

→ Body, Communication, Dance, Exegesis, Materiality, Media, Miracles, Oral Tradition, Perception, Polytheism, Proskynesis, Specialists (Religious), Veneration of Relics, Veneration of the Saints

Andrea Kaserer

Taboo

1. The word 'taboo' comes from the Polynesian tápu and denotes, on one hand, a prohibition by which an object is withdrawn from everyday use, and on the other, the object itself.

A taboo can pertain to gods, human beings, bodily parts, objects, types of relationship, words, areas or regions, or, for example, a tribe. Depending on who prescribes it—for example a chief or a transcendent power—the nature of the obligation, and in case of transgression the severity of the punishment, can oscillate. A taboo can also be removed.

2. At first, conceptions of the taboo were researched regionally in Polynesian cultures, as, for example, with the Maori. Then, by way of expansion and abstraction, a history developed that was particularly rich in its effects on the scientific study of religion. In the anthropological evolutionary theories of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, 'taboo,' alongside totemism and magic, became an embodiment of the 'primitive thought' of 'uncivilized peoples' (Frazer). Freud stands in this tradition, seeing taboo as a regulation of the drive-satisfaction. In terms of religious science, marriage regulations, the 'incest taboo,' and dietary prescriptions were investigated in particular.

In a very general sense today, 'taboo' designates anything which has its thematization in society suppressed by unwritten rules; thus, one can speak of a taboo on sexuality, death, or sometimes even religion.

Literature

Douglas, Mary, Natural Symbols: Explorations in Cosmology, London [2]1973 ([1]1970); Holden, Lynn, Encyclopedia of Taboos, Oxford 2000; Mills, Alice et al. (eds.), Utter Silence: Voicing the Unspeakable, New York 2001.

→ Religion, Holy, South Sea/Australia

Ansgar Jödicke

Talmud

The Talmud as a Compendium of Jewish Life and Teaching

1. "The Talmud and all of its expansions form the backbone of Jewish tradition."[1] The Talmud (Heb., talmud, 'study,' 'instruction,' 'doctrine') is appropriately described as the compendium of the life and teaching of Judaism since the end of ancient times. More narrowly, this is true only of the Babylonian Talmud, so called from the place of its emergence in the Jewish academies of Sura and Pumbedita in Babylonia, from the fifth to the early eighth century. This text is what "the Talmud" usually indicates. The Jerusalem, or Palestinian, Talmud (the Yerushalmi, as it is often called), received its final configuration from Jewish scholars in Tiberias, and has a much smaller popular function in the history of piety than the Babli, or Babylonian Talmud. Only the Jewish resettlement of Palestine, and the agriculture of the country of Israel, generated inquiries into religious law, for which only the Yerushalmi supplied the traditional historical material. This circumstance occasioned an upward religious evaluation in parts of Israeli Judaism.

Common to both Talmudim (the Hebrew plural form) is their character as commentaries on the Mishna, or 63-tractate compendium of religious law (or 'halachic' compendium)—more specifically, of the written and oral Torah in the form in which the latter was available at the beginning of the third century CE. The Yerushalmi includes thirty-nine tractates handed down as the Gemara, while the Babli has thirty-seven. The tractates of the Mishna are divided, according to content, into six 'Orders' (in Heb., seder; pl., sedarim), upon which the Talmudim, as well, are based. The Orders can be described in brief as follows.

The First Order (Zer'aim, "Seeds") consists of eleven tractates, in which especially the laws pertaining to agriculture are collected. The first tractate, the Berakhot ("Blessings"), which are hors série, contains the specifications for regular daily prayers, and has the laudations to be prayed for the consumption of particular foods, or in certain situations. Every single one of the remaining ten tractates bears on the religious taxes (the 'tithes') or on field specifications (Sabbath year). The harvest taxes are levied exhaustively only on harvests reaped in the country of Israel.

The Second Order (Mo'ed, "Festive Times"), in twelve tractates, deals with the feast days of Israel bidden in the Hebrew Bible. Somewhat hors série stand the Sheqalim ("Shekel") and Taanit tractates, concerned with the Temple taxes, or with the special fast days and their prayers.

The Third Order (Nashim, "Women"), in seven tractates, is devoted primarily to engagement, marriage contracts, marriages of duty, adultery, divorce, and remarriage. Two additional tractates are concerned with 'vows' (nedarim) in general, or (the Nazir tractate) with special 'Nazir' vows (cf. Num 6:1-21).

עין משפט נר מצוה | כה | הקורא עומד פרק שלישי מגילה | מסורת הש״ס

מתני׳ האומר יברכוך טובים הרי זו דרך המינות על קן צפור יגיעו רחמיך ועל טוב יזכר שמך מודים מודים משתקין אותו המכנה בעריות משתקין אותו האומר ומזרעך לא תתן להעביר למולך לא תתן לאעברא בארמיותא משתקין אותו בנזיפה:

גמ׳ בשלמא מודים מודים דמיחזי כשתי רשויות ועל טוב יזכר שמך נמי דמשמע על טוב אין ועל רע לא ותנן חייב אדם לברך על הרעה כשם שהוא מברך על הטובה אלא על קן צפור יגיעו רחמיך מ״ט (א) פליגי בה תרי אמוראי במערבא ר׳ יוסי בר אבין ור׳ יוסי בר זבידא חד אמר מפני שמטיל קנאה במעשה בראשית וחד אמר מפני שעושה מדותיו של הקב״ה רחמים ואינן אלא גזירות ההוא דנחית קמיה דרבה אמר אתה חסת על קן צפור אתה חוס ורחם עלינו (אתה חסת על אותו ואת בנו אתה חוס ורחם עלינו) אמר רבה כמה ידע האי מרבנן לרצויי למריה א״ל אביי והא משתקין אותו תנן ורבה לחדודי לאביי הוא דבעא ההוא דנחית קמיה דרבי חנינא אמר האל הגדול הגבור והנורא האדיר והחזק והאמיץ אמר ליה סיימתינהו לשבחיה דמרך השתא הני תלתא אי לאו דכתבינהו משה באורייתא ואתו (ג) אנשי כנסת הגדולה ותקנינהו אנן לא אמרינן להו ואת אמרת כולי האי משל לאדם שהיו לו אלפי אלפים דינרי זהב והיו מקלסין אותו (באלף) דינרי כסף לא גנאי הוא לו אמר רבי חנינא הכל בידי שמים חוץ מיראת שמים שנאמר ועתה ישראל מה ה׳ אלהיך שואל מעמך כי אם ליראה מכלל דיראה מילתא זוטרתי היא אין לגבי משה רבינו מילתא זוטרתי היא משל לאדם שמבקשין הימנו כלי גדול ויש לו דומה עליו ככלי קטן קטן ואין לו דומה עליו ככלי גדול אמר רבי זירא האומר שמע שמע כאומר מודים מודים דמי מיתיבי הקורא את שמע וכופלה הרי זה מגונה מגונה הוא דהוי שתוקי לא משתקינן ליה לא קשיא הא דאמר מילתא מילתא ותני לה הא דאמר פסוקא פסוקא ותני לה א״ל רב פפא לרבא ודלמא מעיקרא לא כיון דעתיה והשתא כיון דעתיה אמר ליה חברותא כלפי שמיא אי לא מכוין דעתיה מחינא ליה בארזפתא דנפחא עד דמכוין דעתיה: המכנה בעריות משתקין אותו: תנא רב יוסף קלון אביו וקלון אמו: האומר ומזרעך לא תתן להעביר וכו׳: תנא דבי רבי ישמעאל בישראל הבא על הכותית והוליד ממנה בן לע״ז הכתוב מדבר:

מתני׳ מעשה ראובן נקרא ולא מתרגם מעשה תמר נקרא ומתרגם מעשה העגל הראשון נקרא ומתרגם והשני נקרא ולא מתרגם ברכת כהנים מעשה דוד ואמנון (ג) נקראין ולא מתרגמין אין מפטירין במרכבה ורבי יהודה מתיר ר׳ אליעזר אומר אין מפטירין בהודע את ירושלם:

גמ׳ תנו רבנן יש נקרין ומתרגמין ויש נקרין ולא מתרגמין [א] ויש לא נקרין ולא מתרגמין אלו נקרין ומתרגמין ב״ל ת עק״ן גשפ״ה סימן: מעשה בראשית נקרא ומתרגם פשיטא מהו דתימא אתו לשיולי מה למעלה מה למטה ומה

אין מפטירין במרכבה ורבי יהודה מתיר · וקיימא לן כר׳ יהודה:

This layout of a traditional page of the Talmud is that of a page of the Bomberg edition, printed in Venice in 1520–1523. The format and pagination were adopted by nearly all later editions. The additions of a basic overview of the text and further commentaries and apparatus followed, between 1880 and 1886, in the edition of the Widow and Brothers Romm, in Vilnius. The commonly appearing editions are photomechanical reprints of this edition. The citation of the Talmud by tractate name and page (recto/verso = a/b), is made accordingly: the page represented would be cited as bMegilla 25a (b = Babylonian Talmud). A vocalized (pointed) edition—in which the traditional Rashi script (see below) is replaced by the conventional Hebrew 'square script,' and in which only a part of the usual commentaries (including Rashi) and apparatus are supplied—has been published by Adin Steinsaltz, beginning in 1967 (as the "Steinsaltz Edition," now a standard text; an English translation and a corresponding edition of the Jerusalem Talmud are also in preparation).

A. Aids to Orientation ('Paratext')

(1) Page number: Always in the upper left-hand corner of the recto of a leaf; in Hebrew letters (which are also numerals). On the verso, in the upper right, is the pagination in Roman numerals. The Hebrew letter indicates the leaf with recto (a) and verso (b), although the Roman numeral is always twice as tall as the Hebrew. Citations, however, are according to the Hebrew numeral.

(2) The page superscript/title consists of three parts: Right: chapter name, usually the first or first two words of the chapter (here: Ha-Qoreh omed, "The Reader stands"; Center: chapter number (here: Pereq shlishi, "Third chapter"); Left: name of the Mishna tractate presented (here: Megillah, "Scroll"; the scroll that is meant is the scroll of Esther, which is read on the festival of Purim); according to the usual numeration, it is a matter, in the text reproduced here, of the Mishna tractate Megillah, chapter 4, section 1, abbreviated as mMeg 4,1. Before printed editions, the citation was usually by chapter name.

B. (Main) Text: Mishna and Gemara (= the Talmud itself)

The actual text of the Talmud consists of the Mishna (3) as the text to be laid out (printed in its entirety) and the Gemara (4), which, to be sure, is far more than a simple layout. Associatively, or by aligning captions, Gemara incorporates traditional material that can adopt the form of anything from short excursuses to lengthier treatments.

(3) On the first 5½ lines of this page (side), the Mishna to be laid out is cited. The text reads, in translation: "If anyone says: 'Let the good praise you,' this is the way of heresy. [If anyone says:] 'Over the birds' nests your mercy stretches' [or] 'For good, praised be your name' [or] 'Thanks! Thanks!' let him be silenced [i.e., he may read [aloud] no further from the text of the Bible]. If anyone paraphrases the incest [prohibitions], let him be silenced. If anyone translates [the following verse of the Bible:] 'And of your progeny, you shall not accede [to their being] given over to the Moloch' [for example, in this fashion:] 'And of your progeny you shall not accede [to their being] given over to paganism,' let him be silenced with a rebuke."

In the seventh-to-last line below, the next Mishna citation begins.

(4) The Gemara (as a commentary of the first rank) supplies the explanation why the manners of expression cited in the Mishna are prohibited. They are in danger of being misinterpreted dualistically: "It is presumed [with the prohibition of] 'Thanks! Thanks!' that [the reader has] two powers in view, [and thereby a dualistic conceptualization of God]; and correspondingly, 'For good, praised be your name,' because it implies, 'For good, yes, [but] for evil, no.' But we have learned [= introductory formula for the transmittal of an older tradition]: a person is obligated to praise [God] concerning evil just as he praises him for good. But what is the basis for which 'Over the birds' nests your mercy stretches'? There is a difference of opinion concerning this with two Explainers in the West [in Palestine], [namely, between] Rabbi Jose ben Abin and Rabbi Jose ben Zebira. One says[, . . .]and the other says[, . . .]"

The Gemara for the second section of the Mishna on this page begins at the end of the fourth-last line, indicated by the two enlarged letters (see 5).

(5) Indicators in large type, referring to the Mishna or the Gemara: the abbreviation MTNJ stands for Matnitin, "Our Mishna," and introduces a citation from the Mishna; the abbreviation GM stands for Gemara.

(6) Indications for sections and sentences: A colon divides meaning-sections; while within a section, units are divided by a point. With the translation into English, further subdivisions are frequently necessary.

(7) Textual conjectures or variants: Parentheses enclose doubtful readings, and in the opinion or the editor, are to be omitted, or replaced by another reading, which often follows in brackets. Brackets indicate additions to the text according to other manuscripts or sources. They indicate a comparison, not of scholarly textual readings and criticism, but of different traditional readings.

C. Marginal Commentaries (commentaries of the Second and Third Order)

(8) The Commentary of Rashi is always in the inside margin, the margin at the gutter. According to A. J. Heschel (see Lit. for §3), the ascent of the Babli to the status of Jewish popular book can be ascribed to the short commentary on it, which R. Shlomo ben Jizhaki (1040–1105), called Rashi, had composed. It is printed in its own, semi-cursive, script, called the Rashi script.

This makes the distinction between commentary and layout a visual one, as well. The division of the commentary is by citation: the expression of the Mishna or Gemara to be explained is cited (the end of which is indicated as in the text; see above, 6); then follows the explanation. A raised point marks the division between the two parts. The explanations are not thorough, but are limited to the necessary, and to explanations of difficult elements. A colon indicates the end of each explanation. In the case of a few tractates, the text attributed to Rashi is not by himself, but by a pupil, or his son-in-law and grandchild.

On the page reproduced here, Rashi begins on the upper right, with the commentary on the Mishna: "'May the good praise you,' this is the manner of heresy" (is a citation of the text; then, by way of explanation:) "For the evil are not included there, that they should praise God, while the wise (i.e., rabbinical scholars), instead, taught [. . .]." (This typical introduction to a citation is followed, in parentheses, by the location of the citation that now follows: Keritot [another Talmud tractate], page 6): "The odor of galbanum [a plant] is unpleasant, and yet is it prescribed among the roots for the smoke offering, and its use is prescribed in order to indicate being in a community" [meaning: Even the wicked should praise God, for their wickedness is as little as the slight odor of the galbanum that the divine service excludes; the colon ends this explanation).

(9) The Tosafot ("Complements") to Rashi's commentary: thus, commentaries of the Third Order vis-à-vis the Mishna, usually by Rashi's pupils and successors (often designated Tosafists, 'complementers'). The Tosafot are set in the Rashi script, as is this one, and are always on the outside of the page (in the outside margin). They represent the Talmudic discussion in France (and, in part, in Germany) in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The separation of the text and commentary is likewise presented visually: the word printed in larger, square type is the first word of the Mishna or the Gemara that is laid out in what follows. A point and a colon are used as described under no. 8, above.

On the page before us, the commentary is limited to four short loci. The first explanation goes with: "'Let the good praise you': an explanation that extracts the workers of wickedness [as Rashi understood it] or [alternatively] because it looks as though there were two powers, that is, a God [only] for the good (the Gemara, then)."

(10) Commentary of the Rabbenu Hananel (990–1055). The author lived in North Africa, and is nearer than Rashi to the traditional Babylonian elucidation. Its indications are usually concerned with whole sections, and concentrate on the principal content. Its commentary here bears on a later passage in the text.

D. System of References (to biblical, intra-Talmudic, and other rabbinical parallel loci)

(11) Parenthetical observations in the text of Rashi and in the Tosafot: Reference to the parallel or supporting loci; not originally a part of the commentaries, but inserted by later redactors.

(12) Ayn Mishpat ("Source of Law"): a reference system, instituted in Italy by Rabbi Yehoshua Boaz, to the three classic compendia of religious law: Maimonides (1135–1204), Mishne Torah; Moshe von Coucy (13th cent.), Sefer Mizvot Gadol; and Yosef Karo (1488–1575), Shulkhan Arukh. In the actual text of the Talmud, superscript in square script serves to indicate this marginal commentary.

(13) Torah Or ("Light-Torah"): Reference system (as marginalia, on the right, next to the core text) to the biblical loci cited or mentioned in the text of the Talmud. Likewise begun by Jehoshua Boaz (see 12), and completed by later writers. A superscript circle (°) in the text indicates that the reference is to be found at the same height in the break between the text and Rashi. The locus cited in the Mishna is Leviticus 18 (verse 21; only chapter numbers are indicated).

(14) Masoret Ha-Schas (i.e. "Transmission [or Tradition] of the Six Orders" [meaning of the Mishna or Talmud]): Reference system, in the main text, to Talmudic parallels. Begun, as with 12 and 13, by Yehoshua Boaz, and repeatedly supplemented (supplements indicated with brackets). In the text of the Talmud, references are made to these propositions, which are to be found at the same line-height, at the innermost marginal split. The first reference is to the tractate Berakhot, leaf 34a. The abbreviation following means "See in that place," and indicates that further parallels are listed at the locus cited.

(15) Gilyon Ha-Shas ("Column of the Six Orders"): Reference system (outside left) to intra-Talmudic or other rabbinical parallels not given in 14; frequently, indications to material thematically akin are given, as well. The author is Aqiba Eger (1761–1837), celebrated as Rabbi of Posen. A superscript circle with a slash follows the indication.

E. Critical Apparatus (to Text): Critical indications and emendations (= Haggahot)

(16) Haggahot Ha-Bakh ("Emendations of Ha-Bakh" [acronym for Joel Sirqes]): Critical commentary (outside left) to the Gemara, Rashi, and the Tosafists, composed by Joel Sirqes, a Polish rabbi of the seventeenth century. In the text of the Talmud, a Hebrew letter in Rashi script (in parentheses) reads as a numeral. As to the first locus, it notes as a variant a reading that dissolves and does 'not' complete the abbreviation, i.e., it reads: "No difference of opinion [. . .]."

(17) Haggahot Ha-Gra (“Emendations of Ha-Gra” [acronym for the Vilnius Gaon]). The indication follows in the main text by way of a superscript Hebrew letter in square script, set in a single left-hand bracket, to make a distinction from 12.

Other than these standard commentaries and apparatus, further commentaries are found in individual tractates in the Vilnius edition, either in the margin, or as an appendix. They also span the time from the tenth to the nineteenth century.

Roland Deines

The Fourth Order, the Neziqin (“Injuries”): Of the ten tractates here, the first six are devoted to the laws of punishment, jurisdiction, and punitive decrees, as well as to oaths. The remaining four tractates are of a varying character: Eduyot (“Testimonies”) is a collection of one hundred instructional declarations on halachic pronunciations of earlier rabbis. In Aboda Zara (“Idolatry”), it is a matter, especially, of daily contact and commerce with non-Jews, as well as with dealing with pagan cults. Abot (“Fathers”) is doubtless the best-known tractate of the Mishna, a kind of spiritual vade mecum of ethics, which has also become part of the Prayer Book. It is the sole ‘haggadic’ (‘recounting’) tractate of the Mishna. The last tractate of the fourth order, Horayot (“Teachings/Decisions”) handles halachic decisions erroneously pronounced.

The Fifth Order, Qodashim (“Holy,” “Sacred”), in eleven tractates, takes up the various kinds of sacrifices. It also contains the order of further tractates connected with Temple worship and taxes. The tractate Keritot (the “Extirpating Punishment”) is a special case; with this notion, the rabbis described the transgressor’s premature death, decreed by God himself.

The Sixth Order (Toharot, “Purifications”), the most comprehensive Order of the Mishna, is divided into twelve tractates. It is concerned with the contamination of things and persons, and the various possibilities for the reconstitution of purity. Especially important are the tractates on the uncleanness of the dead, and on the impurity of women pursuant to menstruation, birthgiving, or diseases of the underbody (nidda, ‘uncleanness’).

The explanatory Gemara has always been far more ample than the text of the religious prescriptions (Mishna) itself. Approximately one-third of it consists of haggadic traditions, and it is of an encyclopedic character. Everything taught in the rabbinical schools and deemed worthy of preservation was included. Numerous Jewish legends, folklore, and narratives are transmitted here, besides scientific material from medicine, biology, mathematics, astronomy, and so on. The other two-thirds presents halachic discussions. There the positions of approximately 2,500 instructors are presented, and confronted with one another, without always concluding to a conformity of opinions. In the Middle Ages, the immensity of this material led to systematic presentations of religious law.

The Talmud in Christian Perception

2. Since the thirteenth century, there has been a Christian perception of and confrontation with the Talmud expressing itself in two contrasting manners of relationship: (a) opposition and extermination, or (b) use of the Talmud as a testimonial tool of Christian truth, and thereby as a means to mission. A late effect of the first approach is (c) the Talmud-baiting of racist anti-Semitism since the nineteenth century. Anti-Jewish stereotypes acquired their specious verisimilitude by way of the fact that, unlike the Bible, Talmud had not been translated into European languages until the modern age. Such translations would have been all the more desiderated by reason of the fact that the great composition was written in a difficult Middle Hebrew, or Babylonian Aramaic—expressed in a peculiar, frequently abbreviated diction, and obviously extending far beyond the scope of the Bible—whose linguistics therefore kindled defensive attitudes, calculated to stir up alarm and calumniation.

Opposition and Extermination

(a) From 1242 on, in Paris, at the instigation of the Church (usually in local form), Talmud burnings were held, on the basis of the notion that the Talmud was responsible for Jews' contempt of Christ and Christian teaching, and their refusal to acknowledge the truth of Christianity. Instigators were often Jewish converts, wishing to demonstrate their new faith by calling the attention of the church to the alleged threat posed by the Talmud. The designation 'Talmud' repeatedly stood, pars pro toto, for Judaism's entire rabbinical (and Kabbalistic) tradition, as it had taken form in various collections since the third century CE. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Moravian convert Johannes Pfefferkorn (1469–c. 1524) sought to mount a burning of the Talmud and the rabbinical writings in the German Empire, but he was foiled by the opposition of humanist Johannes Reuchlin (1455–1522). A consequence of this controversy was Pope Leo X's imprimatur for the Babylonian (1520) and Palestinian (1523) Talmud (which, however, was withdrawn by his successor, Julius III) The printings by Daniel Bomberg at that time in Venice are the first complete editions of the Talmud, and stand to present as the exemplar for the printing of the Talmud. Only two decades later, even Luther, in his late composition The Jews and Their Lies, in which the entire arsenal of popular-culture late-medieval anti-Jewish polemics was permeated with earnest theological ratiocination, recommended that the Jewish schools be burned, the rabbis be prohibited from teaching, and these latter be deprived of their prayer books and the Talmud. While the ruling princes did not convert Luther's suggestions into law in his time, there were Talmud burnings at papal behest, for example in 1553 in Rome, and in the cities of the ecclesiastical state. The last burning motivated by religious considerations took place in Poland in 1757. Likewise, in connection with the destruction of Jewish culture in broad parts of Europe by the Nazi government, on the basis of a racist ideology, in 1938–1945 numerous Jewish libraries were destroyed or misused as objects of spectacle and research in the National Socialist institutes for their fight against Judaism.

Instrumentalization

(b) Together with the battle against the Talmud, beginning in the thirteenth century there were also attempts to 'prove' the Christian truth to the Jews through appeal to the Talmud, and thus to gain them for the faith without the application of violence. A basic source for many authors into the eighteenth century was Dominican Raimundus Martini's Pugio Fidei (Lat., "Dagger of the Faith"), appearing in the second half of the thirteenth century (first printing in Paris, 1651). Protestant theologians' positions oscillated between hard polemics (Johann Benedikt Carpzov II, 1629–1699) and serious research (Johann Buxtorf the Elder and the Younger: Lexikon Chaldaicum, Talmudicum et Rabbinicum, Basel 1639). Here as well, two purposes predominated: the explanation of the New Testament on grounds of the Jewish, and that meant, especially, Talmudic sources; and a demonstration that the Christian messianic teaching is contained in the Jewish sources

(e.g., Christian Schöttgen, Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae in Theologiam Judaeorum Dogmaticam Antiquam et Orthodoxam de Messia; Lat., “Hebrew and Talmudic Instances against the Jews’ Ancient and Orthodox Dogmatic Theology of the Messiah”; 1742).

These studies were taken up once more in the second half of the nineteenth century in a context of the missionary work among the Jews. Here lie the beginnings of Christian Judaic studies, as it was established in the twentieth century, first in a framework of the Instituta Judaica, at individual Evangelical theology faculties in the German universities. Since the end of the nineteenth century, translations of the Talmud and related texts have appeared in the most important European languages. These have replaced the frequently very faulty and, to a certain extent, tendentious, partial translations of individual sections or tractates of the Talmud into Latin and numerous other languages—translations that, in consequence of the burnings of the Talmud at Paris, had appeared since the thirteenth century.

‘Talmudism’: The Anti-Semitic Polemics against the Talmud

(c) The extensive Christian ignorance with regard to the content of the Talmud, and to Jewish approaches to it (‘Jewish learning’), was fertile soil, in times of hostility toward Jews, for the most absurd suspicions (legends of ritual murder, profanation of the Host, exemption from law in contact with non-Jews, etc.; → Anti-Semitism). The same ignorance explains the phenomenon of ‘Talmud,’ ‘Talmudism,’ and ‘Talmudic Jew’ becoming anti-Jewish and anti-Semitic expressions since the nineteenth century. In the Talmud, non-Jews, and enemies of the Jews, saw (and see today, in extremist circles of the right) the source, as it were, of everything strange and foreign, everything offensive, and everything perilous about Judaism. Der Talmudjude. Zur Beherzigung für Juden und Christen aller Stände (Ger., “The Talmudic Jew: For Reflection on the Part of Jews and Christians of All Classes”), by Catholic Old Testament scholar August Rohling (1839–1931), a book first appearing in Münster in 1871, became an important source of the anti-Semitic reception of the Talmud. It came out in twenty-two editions in all, and was translated into several other languages. Rohling sought to offer a scholarly demonstration of the thesis that, by virtue of their religion, Jews have the capacity to corrupt, physically and morally, secretly or openly, those of other beliefs. This view was refuted in a number of juridical proceedings, and in numerous books and decrees by Jewish and Christian scholars,[2] but such refutations proved to be no hindrance to the wide popularity of the Rohling work. A source appealed to by Rohling (and by many of his imitators) was the older work of Heidelberg orientalist Johann Andreas Eisenmenger (1654–1704), Entdecktes Judentum (Ger., “Judaism Discovered”), 2 vols., 1st ed. 1700, 2nd ed. 1711. Also, in Handbuch der Judenfrage. Die wichtigsten Tatsachen zur Beurteilung des jüdischen Volkes (Ger., “Manual of the Jewish Question: Most Important Facts for an Assessment of the Jewish People”), which emerged from Theodor Fritsch’s (1852–1933) Antisemiten-Catechismus (Ger., “Catechism for Anti-Semites”; originally appearing in 1887); an extensive section was included containing relevant known citations of the Talmud, with calumniations. In the “Department for Research on the Jewish Question,” founded in Munich in 1936, the National Socialist regime attempted to supply these populist distortions with a scholarly legitimization. Here, the Talmud served, first and foremost, not as a source of religious history, but as an expression of the racist, distorted image of the essence of the Jew. Favorite loci were those that handle relationships with non-Jews in the area of business and commerce, or else the occasionally detailed descriptions of sexual episodes in the Talmud in a context of purity or of marriage law. Here the traditional clichés, and pictures of Jews as usurers or swindlers, or sexual perverts, were speciously 'evidenced' from their own sources. The results page for "Talmudism" in an Internet search engine is instructive with respect to how extreme rightist circles paint anew the specter of a Talmudic 'secret teaching.' One of the efforts of books like Talmud ohne Maske (Ger., "The Talmud without Disguise"), by Jürgen Graf, is the denial of the Shoah, and an explanation of why there can be no peace in the Middle East: the 'Talmud as the Zionist law book.'

The Talmud in Eastern Europe, and Jewish Dealing with the Talmud

3. Jewish religious philosopher Abraham Joshua Heschel (1907–1972), who came from Eastern European Judaism, called 'the democratization of Talmudic study' the most important achievement of the Judaism of that area.[3] The precondition had been the dissemination of the Talmud and related writings through the newly invented printing press, which Judaism pressed into the service of learning from the very beginning. Famous rabbis taught in numerous Talmudic schools in Poland, composing commentaries that, even today, as marginal commentaries, are a lasting component of traditional editions of the Talmud. This caused the appearance of different traditions in its presentation, depending on whether it was the Talmud itself, or the biblical tradition underlying it, that made for the point of departure.

Hasidism

By the dawn of the eighteenth century, the traditional Talmudic piety of rabbinical orthodox Jews had become a religiosity of the elite. Now it gained a contrary vector: a nonintellectual, interiorized faith practice gave Talmudic studies new impetus. At the center stood Lithuanian rabbi Elijahu ben Solomon Salman Kremer, better known under his honorific title, the Vilnius Gaon (1720–1797). His commentary is the most recent to have found a place as a marginal commentary. → Hasidism today has an important place in the United States and in Israel, having succeeded in joining traditional Talmudic scholarship with personal piety.

Talmudic Criticism at the Hands of Jewish Enlightenment

Beginning in the eighteenth century, a common intra-Judaic adversary flourished in both currents: the Jewish Enlightenment (Heb., Haskala), which itself waged a bitter battle against the Talmud. The maskalim ('Enlightenment persons') saw the 'ghetto walls' as the element preventing the Jews from becoming citizens, with equal rights, of the nations in which they lived. But the roots of the Enlightenment criticism of the Talmud reach further back. After the Careans' medieval criticism of Judaic tradition (→ Judaism), the Netherlands in the seventeenth century had been the scene of confrontations over the divine origin (and, thus, over the validity) of the rabbinical traditions, as these latter now found their reflection in the Talmud. Protagonists of this criticism had been Uriel da Costa (1585–1640) and Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677). These altercations still define Judaism today. In terms of organization, we see this in the fact, among others, that since the nineteenth century in all Jewish centers foundations have incorporated higher education—as alternatives to the classic Talmudic schools (Yeshivot)—including instructional institutions, seminaries, and universities in which the rabbinical documents are researched on fundamental principles of historical criticism. The contrast between Yeshiva and university abides. The confrontation in Israel is especially sharp, where orthodox and secular Judaism, especially, stand in opposition, without liberal or conservative Judaism functioning as a link between the extremes, as they do in the United States (and as they did in Germany before 1933). How important the Talmud is for Jewish self-understanding even in the universities, however, is illustrated by the fact that a course in the Talmud is obligatory for all Israelis studying for the degree of Bachelor of Arts at the Faculty for Sciences of Judaism. Popular, inexpensive editions of the Talmud (even, in some cases, in translation), with simple explanation, often based on Rashi, make up an important component of religious publishing in Israel even today. There is, besides, an entire series of editions on CD-Rom, intended to appeal to children and youth as well. In the public discussion, a particularly virulent question is how far the prescriptions of the Talmud, which so deeply concern private and public life, may be rendered binding for secular Jews, indeed for the state, by the rabbinate.

1. Thus KROCHMALNIK in his entry on → Judaism.
2. WIESE 1999, 88-99 and 112-123.
3. HESCHEL, Abraham Joshua, Die Erde ist des Herrn. Die innere Welt des Juden in Osteuropa, Neukirchen 1985, 33 (see HESCHEL 1978).

Literature

Sources: The first complete English edition of the Babylonian Talmud was edited by Isidore EPSTEIN: The Babylonian Talmud. Translated into English with notes, glosses and indices, 35 vols., London 1935–1952; the translation is further part of the bilingual Soncino-Edition: Hebrew-English Edition of the Babylonian Talmud, London 1989 (30 vols., 1984–1990); a new translation was edited and mainly made by Jacob NEUSNER: The Talmud of Babylonia: An American Translation (appeared since 1984 in Brown Judaic Series, starting with vol. 72, continued in: South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism). A helpful edition with the commentary of Rashi and other explanations is currently being published under the leadership of Adin STEINSALTZ: The Talmud: The Steinsaltz Edition (since 1989). An English translation of the Jerusalem Talmud was also organized by Jacob NEUSNER: The Talmud of the Land of Israel, 35 vols., Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism, 1982–1994. A new bilingual edition edited by Heinrich W. GUGGENHEIMER appeared since the year 2000: The Jerusalem Talmud: Edition, Translation and Commentary (Studia Judaica), Berlin/New York.

Secondary Literature to §§ 1 and 4: MACCOBY, Hyam, Early Rabbinic Writings, Cambridge 1988; PARRY, Aaron, The Complete Idiot's Guide to The Talmud, Indianapolis 2004; STEINSALTZ, Adin, The Talmud: The Steinsaltz Edition. A Reference Guide, New York 1989; Idem, The Essential Talmud, New York 1976 (many reprints); STRACK, Hermann L./ STEMBERGER, Günther, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, Edinburgh 1991.

To § 2: MOORE, George Foot, "Christian Writers on Judaism," in: Harvard Theological Review 14 (1921), 197-254; OBERMAN, Heiko A., The Roots of Antisemitism in the Age of Renaissance and Reformation, Philadelphia 1984; RUMMEL, Erika, The Case against Johann Reuchlin: Religious and Social Controversy in Sixteenth-Century Germany, Toronto 2002; WIESE, Christian, Wissenschaft des Judentums und protestantische Theologie im wilhelminischen Deutschland, Tübingen 1999.

To § 3: HESCHEL, Abraham Joshua, The Earth is the Lord's: The Inner World of the Jew in East Europe, New York 1978.

→ Bible, Book, Hermeneutics, Kabbalah, Judaism, Hasidism

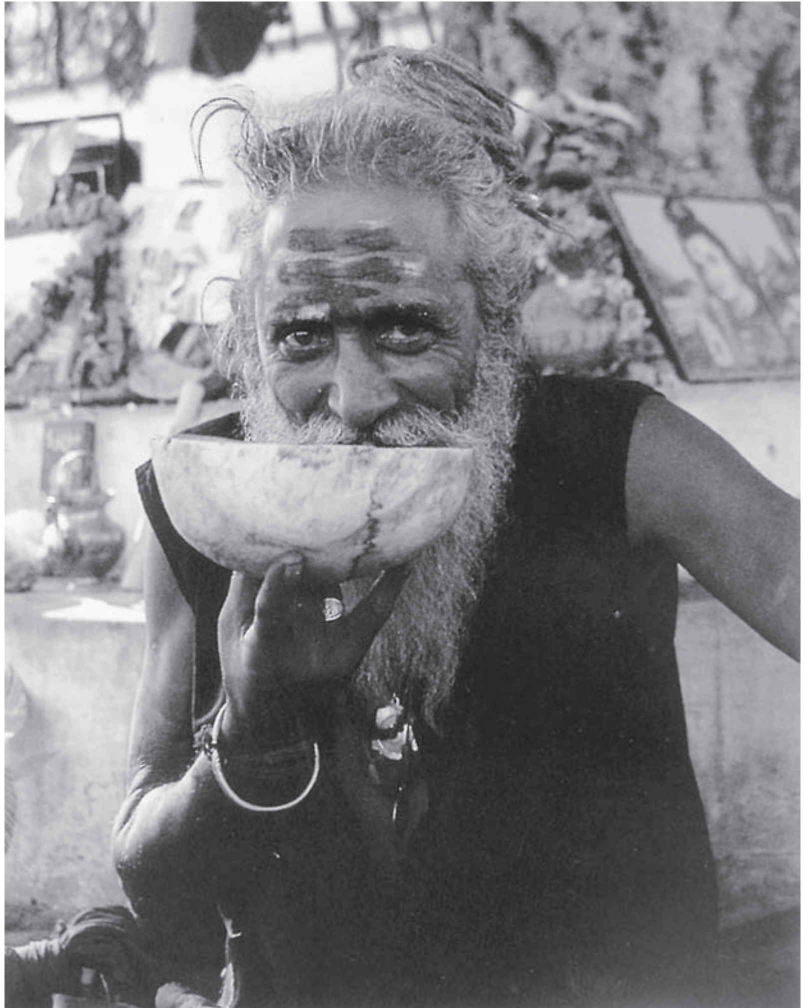
Roland Deines



Tantra I: Hindu

Concept

1. Tantra (Skt., 'woven chain,' 'web,' 'instruction book') denotes, in general, a pathway of practices along which ritual, corporeal, and mental techniques are applied, in order to obtain, in one's lifetime, extraordinary capacities (siddhi) or deliverance from all worldly conditions (mukti). Elements of the Tantra are found in various religions, as in the Hindu systems of Shivaism, Vishnuism, and Shaktism, as well as in → Buddhism (→ Tantra II). The Tantra, then, is not an independent religion, but an articulation, usually sectarian, of various religious symbolic systems. The origins of the Tantra lie in the Indian cultural sphere. There, Tantra means, first, a literary genre, which includes, along with instructional texts in religious philosophy, a literature of revelation. The revelation in question is that of particular instructional traditions. In the ritual context, the adjective 'Tantric' (tāntrika) serves, on the other hand, to establish a demarcation and distinction from 'Vedic' (vaidika) ritual schools (for 'Veda,' → Hinduism). However, there is no unitary metaphysics or philosophy of the Tantra. One of the things evincing this diversity is that Tantric systems have developed both within the Hindu tradition and in the Buddhist: in both varieties, elements of the classic philosophical systems are adopted, reinterpreted, and further developed in terms of each of these religious environments, each in reciprocal effect with ritual practice. But the relationships between Buddhist and Hindu Tantras have thus far been little researched.[1] The doctrines of the Hindu Tantras formed between approximately the sixth and eleventh centuries CE. The first Buddhist Tantras appeared around 400 CE. The heyday of Tantric Buddhism in Northern India was followed by its spread in Tibet and Mongolia (eighth, eleventh centuries, respectively). The current application of the designation 'Tantrism' has plainly been withdrawn from the original context. The horizon of meaning today was impacted by the Western reception of the Tantra in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Ritual Adoption and Esoteric Practice

2. Tantric teachings and rituals, in their Hindu and Buddhist configurations alike, are esoteric. The special traditions of each are the object of → secrecy. An essential mark of the Tantra is the ritual adoption and initiation (dīkṣā) into the respective religious tradition by a Tantric master (→ Guru), who incorporates a specific doctrinal succession. The ritual initiation is usually connected with the surrender of one's worldly name, a communication of specific Tantric mantras, and introduction into the secret teachings and ritual practices of the Tantric community in question. This → initiation is determinative of the religious identity of the competing Tantric groups. Depending on the context, the Tantric initiation can be performed as an appendix to initiation as a monk or nun, as admittance into a community of ascetics, or as a reception of lay followers into a religious community. Frequently, the esoteric character of the doctrines transmitted is emphasized by the use of a secret language, accessible only to the initiated. The particular way of salvation (sādhana), and ritual practice, are imprinted, among other things, by the application of ritual diagrams (yantra, → Mandala), finger gestures (mudrā, → Symbol/Sign/Gesture), and by the recitation of Tantric → mantras. The inscribing of mantras on the body (nyāsa), and the latter's cleansing and transformation, is often regarded as a prerequisite for the cultic veneration of a given deity.

A Shivaite ascetic, and member of the group of the Aghorīs, uses a human skull as a drinking bowl. This practice is part of the antinomian behavior of Tantric ascetics. Daubed with the unclean ashes of a crematorium, berating people in a mixture of unintelligible, insulting, and obscene language, with a preference for impure substances like alcohol, meat, and allegedly human flesh as well, the Aghorīs intentionally expose themselves to societal condemnation. But the heterodox Tantric practice is not exclusively, or even preferably, shaped by the individual. Rather, it is the product of a vow (vrata), and marks a stage on the ascetic's salvific path. Ascetics gain religious merit precisely on grounds of their rejection by the social order.

Anthropology and Speculative Psychophysiology

A feature of Tantric teaching is a sophisticated anthropology, especially speculations on the psychophysiology, and macrocosmic correspondences, of the body. The channels (nāḍī) peculiar to the body, the centers (cakra), energy currents (kuṇḍalini), and breathing and recitation techniques, all known from the Tantric → yoga, are important for the esoteric levels of Tantric ritual and yogic practice. The value attributed to the pleasure (bhukti) of the extraordinary capacities thus acquired, on the one side, and the effort for ultimate liberation during one's lifetime, on the other, differs greatly from tradition to tradition.

Feminine and Masculine Principles

In the Tantra, especially in Shaktism, the goddess, or female power and energy (shakti), has an important place. The reciprocity between the masculine, static principle and the feminine, dynamic one is reflected in Tantric traditions in many ways, through their psycho-physiological practices, visualizations, and iconography. The presentation of the sexual union of god and goddess is the sensory image of the cosmic act of creation. Heterodox practices, which, unlike the orthodox traditions, deny the duality of clean and unclean substances (advaitācāra), include ritual sexual intercourse. To be sure, Tantra teaches the equality of man and woman, but any textual perspective is almost exclusively masculine, so that there is no radical differentiation of woman in the Tantric milieu in which we might take our point of departure for an analysis of the principles of the feminine and the masculine.[2]

Antinomian Attitudes and Behavior

In sectarian Tantric traditions, there are antinomian attitudes and behavior, with which, in the framework of a vow (vrata), norms of attitude and behavior are deliberately spurned. This dismissal materializes precisely through attitudes of rejection of the environment, and of any acquisition of religious merit (Aghorī type, see illus.). Heterodox practices and veneration of the goddess are important aspects of the Tantra. But they are often overvalued in reception: there are Tantric currents, attested in India even before the year 1000, that—perhaps under social pressure—renounced all heterodox practice, and celebrated a liturgy to a male god.

Tantra in the West: On the History of Its Reception

3. Two media have decisively influenced reception of the Tantra in the West, and have established distinct chains of reception: textual translations, as well as popular volumes of pictures and images. In the first half of the twentieth century, a British judge on the Supreme Court in Calcutta, Sir John Woodroffe (1865–1936), published numerous textual editions and translations of Hindu Tantras, as well as essays concerned with them. Part of his work was done under the pseudonym of Arthur Avalon, and in close collaboration with an Indian assistant Atal Behari Ghosh.[3] Woodroffe's important pioneering labor made Tantric works accessible to a wide public for the first time, and definitively shaped the reception and understanding of 'Tantrism' in the West. Because of his choice of sources, however, his fundamentally apologetical approach, and his sometimes erroneous ordering of the texts, Woodroffe's work must today be regarded as extensively outdated, despite the relatively recent vintage of some of his publications.

The image—and exploitation—of the Tantra as an 'exotic form of pornography,'[4] has, in turn, been influenced by the publication of numerous volumes of pictures and images of erotic Indian art, which give the impression of a coherent religious system of sex, indeed, somewhat, as a 'religion of sex' (B. Soulié). Thus, the Tantra is received in parts of the esoteric movement as an Oriental, holistic sexual therapy (→ New Age; Esalen Institute). The → Osho movement and its environment keenly shaped this phenomenon. The combination of Tantric elements with modern psychotherapeutic methods leaves the context of a Tantric practice of religious ritual almost entirely out of the picture.

1. Guenther, "Foreword" to Dasgupta, Shashi Bhushan, An Introduction to Tantric Buddhism, Berkeley ²1974 (¹1958), ix-xi; Bharati, Agehananda, Die Tantra-Tradition, Freiburg 1993, 319-330.
2. Kakar, Sudhir, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors: A Psychological Inquiry into India and Its Healing Traditions, Delhi 1982.
3. Taylor, Kathleen: "Arthur Avalon: The Creation of a Legendary Orientalist," in: Leslie, Julia (ed.), Myth and Mythmaking, Surrey 1996, 144-164.
4. Hardy, Friedhelm, The Religious Culture of India: Power, Love, and Wisdom, Cambridge 1994, 165.

Literature

Sources: Brunner, Hélène, Somaśambhupaddhati: Rituels dans la tradition śivaite selon Somaśambhu, vols. 1-4, Pondicherry 1963–1998 (Shivaite ritual handbook with text, French trans., and annotation; probably the best introduction to Hintu tantra ritual).

Pictures: Soulié, Bernard, Tantra: Erotic Figures in Indian Art, Fribourg 1982.

Secondary Literature: Avalon, Arthur (alias John Woodroffe), Principles of Tantra, Madras [6]1986 ([1]1914); Eliade, Mircea, Yoga: Immortality and Freedom, New York [2]1969 (French [1]1954); Gupta, Sanjukta et al., Hindu Tantrism, Leiden 1979; Kripal, Jeffrey J., Kālī's Child: The Mystical and the Erotic in the Life and Teachings of Ramakrishna, Chicago/London [2]1998 ([1]1995); Sanderson, Alexis, "Shaivism and the Tantric Traditions," in: Hardy, Friedhelm (ed.), The World's Religions: Religions of Asia, London 1990, 128-172.

→ Buddhism, Esalen Institute, Guru, Hinduism, Lamaism, Mandala, Mantra, New Age, Orientalism/Exotism, Osho Movement, Sexuality, Tantra II, Yoga

Jörg Gengnagel

Tantra II: Buddhist

1. As it does in Hinduism, 'Tantra' in Buddhism denotes a system of texts that appeared in India in the second half of the first millennium, and that represent the groundwork of 'esoteric Buddhism.' The oldest texts date from around the fifth century CE. According to Buddhist Tantric tradition, the Tantras date back to the historical → Buddha or his pupils. Not all Buddhist schools acknowledge the Tantras, however. The texts are based on the foundation of the Mahayana philosophy (esp. Mādhyamika), and integrate an elaborate ritualistics, magical practices, and elements of → yoga. In addition, they contain a cosmology, the key proposition of which is the correspondence between microcosm and macrocosm. The Tantras make use of a language and symbolism of their own, which renders them accessible only to initiates. Initiation is indispensable for an understanding and application of the texts, and requires a teacher (in Skt., guru; in Tibetan, lama). In Buddhist art, the pictorial presentation of a complex didactic content depicts an elaborate Tibetan Buddhist pantheon. In a multi-faceted sexual symbolism, what comes to expression is the concept of the defeat of polarities.

Tantric Classes

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the texts were systematized in four hierarchically ordered Tantric classes.

(1) Kriyā Tantra ("Action"): On this level, the ritual actions and sacrifices predominate. What is important here is the legacy of karmic merit and demerit, but especially the purification of one's individual actions, the emotions connected with them, and their translation to a means of enlightenment.

(2) Charyā Tantra ("Exercise and Implementation"): Ritual actions and interior concentration or composure are of equal value. These first two classes emphasize the exterior aspects of Buddhist practice.

(3) Yoga Tantra ("Yoga"): With the help of a purposeful visualization of certain mandalas, one's own spirit is identified with its Buddha aspect.

(4) Anuttarayoga Tantra ("Supreme Yoga") represents the highest step of spiritualization. Spiritual (mental) capacities and effectiveness increase at each stage; at the same time, physical actions recede (gradually) into the background. On the way to the highest knowledge, not all of the steps need necessarily be taken in order.

Goal of Tantric Practice

2. Tantra, within Buddhism, is a system of ritual techniques and meditation practices, in combination with magical abilities. The Tantra belongs to the Vajrayāna ('Diamond Vehicle') school. Its purpose is the defeat of the three fundamental evils: greed, hatred, and delusion. The Buddhist concept of redemption—deliverance from the cycle of existence—is attainable on an accelerated path, by means of 'dexterous means' (Skt., upāya): the Tantric methods of yoga, meditation, and exercises in visualization. In common with the Mahāyāna ('Greater Vehicle') school, Tantric Buddhism begins with a potential enlightenment (the Buddha nature) interior to all living beings, and sees its realization in the ('existential,' as it were) understanding or knowledge of emptiness (Skt., śūnyatā). In order to attain this goal, an active confrontation with the content of Buddhist doctrine is given precedence over purely textual study. A spiritual teacher is essential for the celebration of the complex rituals, and for an understanding of the text, especially since Tantric practice on a basis of the introduction and application of psychogenic methods is not regarded as entirely without risk. The inaccessibility of the texts leads to the observance of a hierarchy between clergy and lay members that is not explicit in the doctrines of Tantric Buddhism.

The religious dimension of Tantric Buddhism contains practices and conceptualizations of popular religion. Tantric ritual indicates parallels to the death process, analogies between the unconscious developmental and maturational processes of human life, and the consciously traversed stages of meditation. The emphasis is on the transformation of body and consciousness, in a process of understanding through quasi-physical sensation and experience. An example would be the transitions detailed in the Tibetan Book of the Dead. These transitions are called 'bardo,' of which six are distinguished. Here it is not only the condition between death and rebirth that is comprehended as a transition/bardo. Tantric Buddhism is characterized by the interlocking of transcendent Buddhas, with elements, celestial directions, colors, sounds/syllables, and aspects or wisdom, all of which exhibit a web of micro- and macro-cosmic levels. Occasionally, a distinction is posited between a right-handed and a left-handed Tantra. The right-handed Tantra stresses the sublimation of human cravings, and the conquest of the dualities, on a visualized level. The left-handed Tantra stresses the feminine principle, and the experience of the unification of the polarities on a corporeal level.

Esoteric Tantric Buddhism in Japan

3. Secret, or esoteric, Buddhism (in Jap., Mikkyō), with roots in Indian Tantrism, came to Japan at the beginning of the ninth century, where it was introduced by Saichō (767–822 CE), a monk of the 'Tendai' school (a Chinese Buddhist school on Mount T'ien-t'ai), and by Kūkai (774–835), the monk from whom the 'Shingon' school descends (after the Chinese translation of the Sanskrit mantra chen-yen, 'true word'). Both had studied in China, where, in the eighth century, Tantric Buddhism had appeared under the T'ang dynasty. Meditative practices and visualizations, as well as magical procedures (especially the summoning of rain and rites for the lengthening of life) helped the two teachers to great success among the nobility, and later with the uneducated populace. Their religiosity was characterized by the elaborate ritual system that stands in connection with the art of mikkyō. In this art, constructions of images were understood both as the temporary seat of spiritual energies and as an illustration of specific qualities like, for example, wisdom and compassion—the acquisition of which is regarded as indispensable along the way to Buddhahood. After initiation by a teacher, practitioners aim, by means of meditation and ritual actions, at the goal of unification with the Buddha, or with another figure of the broad Buddhist pantheon, in their present existence (zokushin jōbutsu). This attainment occurs through the translation or application of the three secrets or mysteries (sammitsu): (1) bodily acts, especially the execution of symbolical positions of the hands (Skt., mudrā → Symbol/Sign/Gesture), (2) the recitation of magical formulas (Skt., mantra, application in language and aloud), and (3) meditative visualization (mental and spiritual application), through which cultic practice (jisō), in complement, forms a unity with speculative doctrine (kyosō).

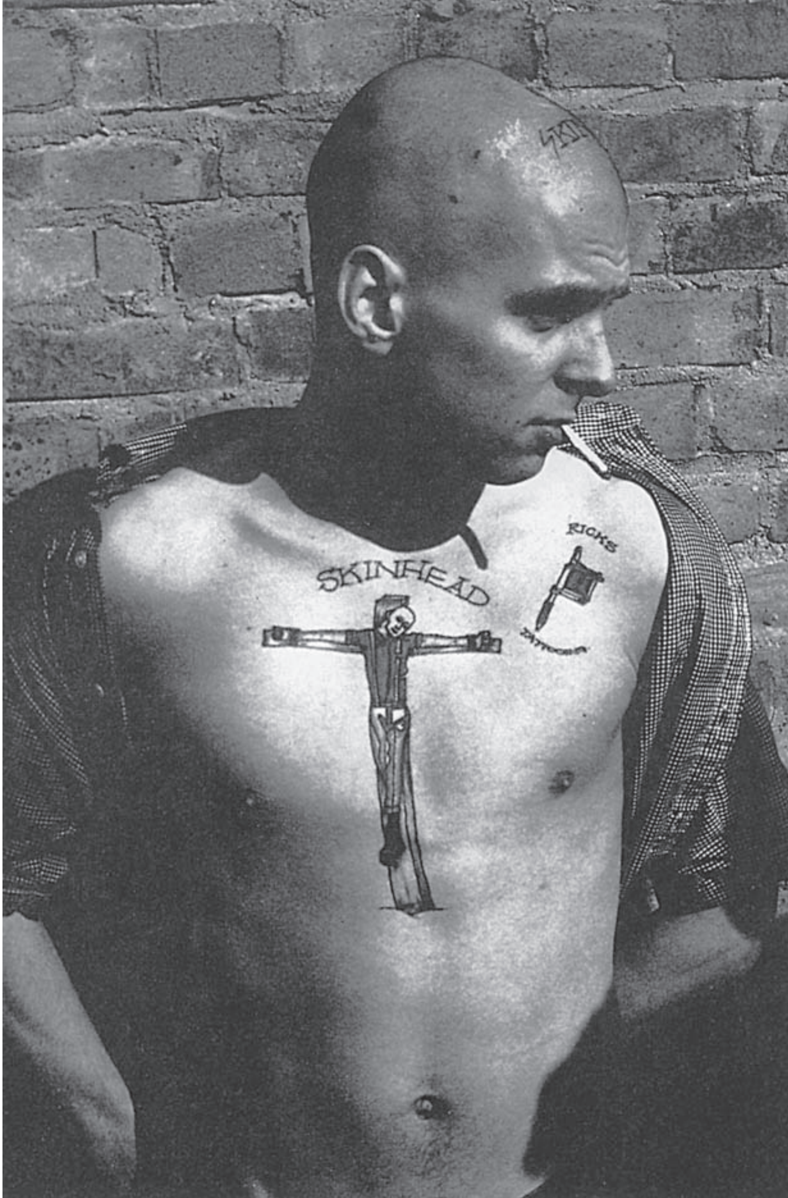
Literature



Astley, Ian (ed.), Esoteric Buddhism in Japan, Copenhagen 1994; Dasgupta, Shashi Bhushan, An Introduction to Tantric Buddhism, Berkeley [2]1974 ([1]1958); Hopkins, Jeffrey, The Tantric Distinction: A Buddhist's Reflections on Compassion and Emptiness, Boston [2]1999 ([1]1984); Hopkins, Jeffrey (ed.), Tantra in Tibet: The Great Exposition of Secret Mantra. With an introduction by the 14th Dalai Lama, London 1977; Mishra, T. N., Impact of Tantra on Religion and Art, New Delhi 1997; Shaw, Miranda, Passionate Enlightenment: Women in Tantric Buddhism, Princeton 1994; Thubten Yeshe (Lama), Introduction to Tantra: The Transformation of Desire, Boston [2]2001 ([1]1987); Wayman, Alex, The Buddhist Tantras: Light on Indo-Tibetan Esotericism, New York 1973; White, David Gordon (ed.), Tantra in Practice, Princeton 2000.

→ Buddhism, Mandala, Mantra, Mysticism, Sexuality, Tantra I

Stephanie Lovász (§§1, 2) and Ursula Hüge

Tattoo

1. 'Tattoo,' from the East Polynesian tatau, to 'strike correctly,' denotes a pattern, image, or ornament, scratched, pricked, or struck through the human epidermis. With scar tattooing, used especially with darker skin, the skin is seared or scratched with an instrument (fragment of stone, bamboo or bone knife, razor-blade). Healing is delayed (rubbing in of ashes, clay), in order that a pattern of swelling may emerge. With color or pricking tattooing (used especially with fair skin), dyed material is brought in contact with, and introduced under, the epidermis through the use of toothed wooden hammers (today usually an electric tattooing needle). Unlike body-painting, tattooing leaves an enduring mark on the body, changing it in a lasting way. The word tatau was imported to Europe from Tahiti by English seafarer James Cook. The connection between nudity and ornament on the body among the inhabitants of the South Sea told Europeans of 'wildness,'

Even in Western industrial societies, tattoos can be for more than just aesthetic and decorative purposes. In youth subcultures, tattooing confers identity (in the sense of a demarcation), and denotes initiation into a 'tribal alliance.' The blood that flows during the imposition of the tattoo emphasizes the transmutation. Thus, the body image of Jesus's Crucifixion attached by skinheads to their bodies is fraught with religious conceptions of Christian sacrificial ideology—the skinhead as misunderstood 'sacrifice,' as 'scapegoat' of a society against whose values he rebels—and he wears his tattoo in protest.

and awakened a certain longing (erotic, to some extent), but also provoked a revulsion before the naked cannibal. Meanwhile, the tattoo has spread worldwide since the Paleolithic Age.

Occasions and Functions

2. The occasions in life for the tattoo are as varied as the signs themselves. In the South Sea, persons have their tongues tattooed out of grief and pain over the departed. Then there is the 'revenge tattoo,' which threatens repayment after the murder of a relative. The facial tattoos of the Maori (New Zealand), again, document the bearer's social rank, origin, and descendancy, so that they constitute a 'visible visiting card.' Further, the tattoo can serve for protection against misfortune and disease. Unlike the art of tattooing in the West, frequently performed for the purpose of aesthetic decoration alone, tattooing in traditional societies interweaves this purpose with socio-religious connections. Western tattoos express individuality, or → protest against prevailing social norms. In tribal societies, by way of an aesthetic code of skin ornamentation, tattooing expresses a society's central values, and conceptualizations of belief.

Tribal Religions

3. In a mythic and cultic connection, tattooing is used primarily with → initiation. Thus, the searing of pubertal men by the Iatmul of New Guinea, is referred to the story of creation. The scar sign, sensible image of reception into the society of adult men, produces an equivalency with the mythical crocodile of primordial times, from which the tribe draws its descendancy. In a framework of culturally specific conceptualizations concerning death and rebirth, scar patterns can be interpreted as wounds received from the bites and blows of the mythical 'greedy one' (Straube 1964). A further purpose of scar tattooing among the Iatmul consists in the spilling of the impure blood of his mother by the male initiand: novices' bodies are transformed from that of a child to that of an adult male. Ritual tattooing can permanently etch cosmological conceptualizations and powers in the body: thus, at the climax of their sun ritual, the Omaha (North America) tattoo marriageable girls with a dish (sensible image of the cosmic deity of the sun) and a star (feminine cosmic power of the night). The signs instill the girl with fertility and life energy. Initiands bear the pain in silence—a test not only of their courage, endurance, and physical strength, but also of their silent agreement to their society's social charter, that brooks no dialogue, nor any contradiction. Thus the individual body becomes the social body—the 'cultural linen' on which this society enduringly inscribes its social and religious concepts: the "body is memorial" (P. Clastres). The tattoo has a memory-bolstering function: it 'inscribes' the individual with the laws and privileges of society.

In private rituals as well, tattoos can refer to religious conceptualizations. Thus, in the view of the Sarawak Kaya (Borneo), disease appears through loss of the soul. After the ritual expert has recalled the soul into the patient's body, he tattoos it with signs, to prevent the soul from being lost in perspiration once more.

Book Religions

4. The three book religions, Judaism (Lev 19:28; Deut 14:1), Christianity (2 Nicaea 787 CE), and Islam (e.g., according to a Hadith of the Prophet's companion Abd Allah ibn Umar)[1] forbid tattooing. Concepts of the integrity of the human body as the 'image of God,' or the intent to distinguish one's own cultic practice from that of pagans, may have been the basis for this prohibition. Still, Christians and Muslims alike wore tattoos as visible documents, for example, of their participation in pilgrimages (crusades, pilgrimages to Mecca). In other societies with an aversion to tattoo, it was sometimes performed with marginal groups and outsiders, such as criminals (Japanese, yakuza), or homosexual persons, for identification and retribution. Only in recent years has tattoo become the fashion in the West: subcultures have adopted it across broad classes of the population, usually in a secular context. (In the countercultures, tattoos with a religious reference are common; see illus.).

Subcultural Tattooing

Revitalization of Indigenous Traditions

Indeed the Western trend has occasioned the revival of forgotten traditions of the South Sea. Consequently upon the Western mission, South Sea Islanders had frequently given up the tattoo. Now, however, it has been revived, partly as a symbol of a distance taken from Western modernity. It also, of course, emphasizes cultural independence and ethnic membership.

1. Transmitted in the Sahib collection of the Buhari.

Literature

Clastres, Pierre, Society Against the State: Essays in Political Anthropology, New York 1989; DeMello, Margo, Bodies of Inscription: A Cultural History of the Modern Tattoo Community, Durham 2000; Jaguer, Jeff, The Tattoo: A Pictorial History, Horndean 1990; Miller, Jean-Chris, The Body Art Book: A Complete, Illustrated Guide to Tattoos, Piercings, and Other Body Modifications, New York 2004; Sanders, Clinton R., Customizing the Body: The Art and Culture of Tattooing, Philadelphia 1989; Straube, Helmut, "Beiträge zur Sinndeutung der wichtigsten künstlichen Körperverstümmelungen in Afrika," in: Festschrift Jensen, vol. II, Munich 1964, 671-722; Thomas, Nicholas et al. (eds.), Tattoo: Bodies, Art, and Exchange in the Pacific and Europe, London 2004; Turner, Victor, "Bodily Marks," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 2 (1987), 269-275.

→ Body, Initiation, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Josef Drexler

Teleology

The word 'teleology,' formed from the Greek télos ('end,' 'goal,' 'purpose,' 'completion') and lógos ('word,' 'reason,' 'teaching'), was originally a coinage by philosopher Christian Wolff (1679–1754). His neologism was based on the thought of the 'purpose,' or 'final cause' of a thing, which Aristotle had conceptualized in a framework of his doctrine of the four causes. Accordingly, the point of departure of teleological thought is the goal-directedness, or purposefulness, of changes or processes. As early as Homer's Iliad, a similar motif is to be found in the form of belief in an overall order of the world, connected with the thought of divine providence (in Gk., prónoia). By contrast, Democritus and Leucippus developed an atomistic conception of reality, governed by causal laws other than, and without, purpose or teleology.

Areas of the application of teleological thought are, especially, the field of behavioral theory or ethics, the philosophy of history, and cosmology or nature theory. In the field of → ethics, teleological thought is, as a rule, presupposed, since responsibility for acts can only be posited from a starting point in the notion that agents pursue a freely chosen intent in their activity. Thus, it is in the other two areas cited above that teleology is more frequently exposed to criticism. In particular, in terms of the 'end' of really existing socialism, it has become the norm to refer to concepts of a philosophy of history grounded in a scientifically predictable, goal-directed historical process (→ Utopia). Even earlier, Karl Löwith and Karl Popper, from different perspectives, made important contributions to the construction of a genealogy, or epistemology, of thought in the area of a philosophy of history.

Philosophy of History

Cosmology

In the astrophysics or cosmology of the present, a renaissance of teleological thought is to be observed with the 'strong anthropic principle.' Simplified, this principle states that the universe is 'the way it is' in order that there be human life. Beginning in the 1980s or so, especially in → New Age thinking, references have reappeared to the model of the succession of ages, building on classical Greek models, the doctrine of yugas in Hindu thought, and astrological circular thinking. An indirect influence may perhaps also be ascribed to the ideas of mystic Joachim of Fiore (1145–1202).

Literature

Löwith, Karl, Meaning in History, Chicago 1949; Popper, Karl R., The Poverty of Historicism, New York 1964; Spaemann, Robert/Löw, Reiner, Die Frage Wozu? Geschichte und Wiederentdeckung des teleologischen Denkens, Munich 1981.

→ End/Eschaton, Evolutionism, History, Millenarianism/Chiliasm, Origin, Salvation/Redemption

Georg Hartmann

Televangelism

Elements of Televangelism

1. 'Tele-church,' or 'electronic church,' designates a North American phenomenon, and denotes the evangelization of believers, with the assistance of the medium of television, by preachers who are usually from the conservative Protestant camp. This programming is the basis of another term, 'televangelism.'

Various elements are presupposed for this special form of interior missionizing, or, better, 'awakening.' The principal elements in question are:

- A special religious tradition is supported by a particular conceptualization of salvation history (America as 'God's own country'; a special sense of mission)—a tradition that has traversed several phases of the awakening movements of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The religious tradition in question is sometimes characterized by a radical individualization of 'religion,' which, in turn, frequently goes hand in hand with patriotism, anti-Semitism, anti-modernism, and anti-state tendencies. Nevertheless, televangelism can be regarded only with reservations as a tendency to the privatization of religion (→ Private Religion).
- A new form of the mediation of religion is introduced, through the use of mass media, such as → television or radio. Despite televangelism's conservative stance and basis, it surrenders its reservations vis-à-vis modern technology, which is so useful in preparing for the 'Second Coming of Christ.' According to B. Bretthauer, conservative Protestants in the United States have a well-nigh unlimited monopoly on religious television, and control three-fourths of all religious radio programming.[1] This dominance explains why evangelical movements of awakening have been so successful in the last twenty-five years.
- A more limited institutionalization and 'doctrinalization' of religion is posited as a presupposition for personal religious experience—for the 'grace of a personal rebirth,' shifts to the center of religious life. Such an experience of grace is supposed to be reached through the special form of 'religious experience in the divine service.' This service is offered in the form of a well-presented television show, with gospel choir, entry of the preacher, healing of the sick, and spontaneous conversion. Here the community of believers gradually becomes an 'audience cult' or even 'fan club,' supporting their special preacher with financial contributions, and intermeshed with other such audiences worldwide, by way of 'mega-' or 'para-churches.' This involvement does not necessarily mean the abandonment of local church communities: often, support of a tele-church and an active community life apart from it go hand in hand.

The Television Preacher as a Star

2. Billy Graham (born 1918) is an internationally famous awakening preacher. Graham recognized the enormous potential of the new mass medium of television for the spread of his message as early as 1950. Just as prompt to seize on televised communication was Jerry Falwell, founder of the 'new Christian right' and the 'Moral Majority' (→ Fundamentalism). The medium often contributes to the popularity of the messenger, as in the case of Pat Robertson, founder of the Christian Coalition, who campaigned for the Republican presidential nomination in 1988. Currently his organization numbers more than one million committed members.

Today it is calculated that the audience of these religious programs comprises between 13 and 60 million viewers, mostly white Protestants. Moral questions constitute the main themes, such as that of → abortion, or of pre- or extra-marital sexual intercourse (in the 2004 presidential election, the issue of homosexuality played an important role as well, and helped the Bush campaign to win the race). But the conviction is propagated also that devout prayer, along with financial contributions, guarantees happiness, wealth, and professional success—the whole often coupled with a simplification of the facts at issue, and a populist anti-intellectualism. One premise for success—besides the topics of the preaching—is the professional planning and organization of the programming. Religious presentations are prepared as professional entertainment, with technical perfection, sensational showmanship, and frequently a powerful emotional charge (→ Charismatic Movement). The television preacher becomes a television star, who presents his audience with other stars as well.

The appeal for contributions is an important element. It is this mechanism that primarily sustains the tele-churches. More than ten percent of program time is spent on such appeals. Further sources of income are 'gifts' sold to the audiences, in the form of videos, books, cassettes, stickers, and so on. The format persists, despite the fact that a multi-religious research group in England took a poll in 1994, concluding that an amount of time devoted to self-advertising was undesirable (→ Television). The moneys serve mostly for the construction of churches, social institutions such as hospitals or kindergartens, as well as schools and universities, which form a further point of attraction for members and their relatives and friends.

The 'Fan Club'

Over and against the propaganda and announced intention of the TV preachers, whose goal is the conversion of unbelievers and the awakening of those fallen from the faith, the audience of these broadcasts possesses a special affinity for the themes presented, and is highly selective. Viewers often already belong to the fundamentalist, charismatic, or evangelical spectrum, are usually associated with a particular religious group, or even are already members of the 'born again' (polls reveal that in 2004 thirty percent of the American people described themselves as 'Born Again Christians'). These observations support the assumption that, from the side of believers, what is sought from these broadcasts is a confirmation of their already confirmed faith position. This motive would also explain why the TV church cannot, or does not wish to, offer any replacement for an active community life, but rather must be interpreted as an additional variety of religious experience.

1. Bretthauer 1998, 232.

Literature

Alexander, Bobby C., Televangelism Reconsidered: Ritual in the Search for Human Community, Atlanta 1994; Bretthauer, Berit, "Geschäftsmänner Gottes auf Erden: Fundamentalismus und Medien in den USA," in: Bielefeldt, Heiner/Heitmeyer, Wilhelm (eds.), Politisierte Religion, Frankfurt/M. 1998, 232-255; Kintz, Linda/Lesage, Julia (eds.), Media, Culture, and the Religious Right, Minneapolis 1998; Packard, William, Evangelism in America: From Tents to TV, New York 1988; Peck, Janice, The Gods of Televangelism, Cresskill 1993; Schultze, Quentin J., Televangelism and American Culture: The Business of Popular Religion, Grand Rapids 1995.

→ Charismatic Movement, Civil Religion, Endowment/Foundation, Fundamentalism, Media, Mission, Private Religion, Sermon, Television

Jutta Bernard

Television

Religion and Television

1. Between appropriation and criticism: The Christian churches have always made use of the various means available to them for the extension of their concerns, in every phase of the development of cultural techniques. They have not failed to participate in the emergence of television as the principal transmitter of social and cultural identity, and vehicle of everyday culture. In Germany, it was only six months after the first experimental radio broadcast of a popular concert on October 29, 1929 that the first church proclamations were received in the new medium. And in the wake of the development of television after the Second World War, the first church service was broadcast on December 4, 1952 during experimental television in West-Germany (1950–1953).

Parallel to the employment of the media, an intra-church discussion was held on the use of television as an 'instrument of proclamation.' The most problematic area seemed to be the new medium's focus on images. What was presented on television—so went the criticism—constructed an independent reality. From this point of view, the visually constructed television generates new frameworks of meaning that, for the viewers, on grounds of their seeming authenticity, are unimpeachably valid. If at all, then, the medium of film and television could only be an aid to the proclamation of the message, and might only possess a supporting character in the 'search for truth' and 'communication of truth.' This view had two results: (1) the postulate, emerging from their task of proclamation, that the churches possessed a genuine right to share in the use of the new medium; (2) the duty of the churches to set up fundamental propositions for the correct application of the new medium.[1] After 1945, these results practically meant a co-construction of, and co-responsibility for, public and legally controlled television in West Germany. In order to avoid problems and minimize conflict, a distinction has always been made between 'proclamatory programs,' for whose content the churches have sole responsibility (in the Netherlands, Germany, etc.), and 'editorial programs,' for which the TV station's professional editorial staffs are co-responsible. The purposes pursued here are: (a) to report news in the areas of church, theology, and religion, (b) to promote the exchange of ideas and information concerning the church community, and (c) to promote a dialogue between church and world, and thereby to counteract societal splintering and polarization. The so-called 'third broadcast right' (the production of programs lying in the sole responsibility of the churches) is an exception in West Germany to which, otherwise, only governmental bodies or the parties are still entitled.

A monument erected 1996 by the Afghani Taliban in their former capital Kandahar serves as a gallows. Here, bound to a steel scaffolding, old televisions and videos are pilloried. For the Taliban, a Pashtun militia of 'students of the Qur'an,' supported in the Afghan civil war by the United States and Pakistan (before they were attacked by the same allies), television and videos are 'idolaters,' that contravene the Islamic proscription of images by showing representations of living beings. The rigid measure can be explained only in terms of the general introduction and imposition of basic fundamentalist elements of Islam, such as that of the Sharia here being enforced by the Taliban.

Criticism

An attitude toward the new medium of television, ranging from critical to altogether negative is observable in Islamic countries as well, especially in Iran and in Afghanistan. Here the most vociferous reproach is that of a 'cultural invasion by the West,' and this notion is part of the motivation for rigid prohibitions, ranging from the use of television for domestic programs, to the use of satellite antennae, with which 'un-Islamic broadcasts' from Hong Kong, Bombay, or the Arab Emirates could be received. To a certain extent, this process promotes an anticlerical attitude in the population, which feels increasingly threatened by the strict imposition of Islamic behavioral norms even in their private sphere.

3. a) Religious Television and its audience: It has become evident since the 1970s that not even the churches have succeeded in adapting the presentation of their content to the public taste. New approaches and contents are indicators here. Thus, an analytical type of religious program, along the lines of TV documentaries, replaces transmission of church services, and aesthetic, non-theological criteria prevail in films. The problem of a heterogeneous, and, especially, anonymous target audience actually compels an openness to a thematic multiplicity that sets frankly ethical, or generally socially relevant problems in the foreground. With contributions to subjects like abortion, genetic engineering, old age, and violence against women, it is guidance that takes center stage, rather than proclamation in the proper sense—unlike the topics and approaches of television's early days. This is also consistent with the observations of an English study from the year 1994.[4]

Audiences

The expectations of viewers of the multi-religious target group (Christians, Muslims, Jews, Hindus, Pentecostalists), with varying degrees of personal engagement, was not limited, vis-à-vis the theme of religion on television, to the presentation of television preachers or religious programming. An overwhelming proportion of those polled spoke in favor of having religion presented in other program forms, such as news, discussions, films, and 'soap operas' or talk shows. Of interest here would be not only information on, and insight into, other faiths and values, but also positions taken on ethical questions. According to the respondents, religious groups should use television less for advertising themselves, or as sales institutions (videos), than primarily for news about themselves, and, besides edification, also for guidance and problem-solving in the area of ethical or religious conflicts. Most of those polled were in agreement that, in any case, religion should be one of the topics of television, and assigned television an educational function here. The content would be: (a) material on religious minorities, or on one's own religion; (b) material presented in the role of an intermediary among religious groups.

'Entertainment'

b) Competitors in the 'market of opportunities': Public and commercial television are beginning to move closer together, and to shape one another, both in respect of topics addressed, and in the manners of the presentation of those topics. Here the magic word is 'entertainment,' inasmuch as adequate market shares must be guaranteed, along with viewer rates. Entertaining forms of presentation, such as discussions, or hybrid forms like features, mingle documentary elements with sequences from feature films, and have long since conquered their audiences on all channels. But it is likewise evident that particular religious subjects—frequently innovative, to stay abreast of commercial approaches—are tumbling out like an avalanche, since they can count on a particular reaction among the viewers.

Conditions of Production

4. Television and Reality—or Reality of Television: Television is not limited to the classic tasks of news, education, and entertainment. Today, as a medium of social communication, it plays a key role in the construction and profiling of 'reality' and public thought. As 'storyteller,' on the most diversified levels, it creates new meaning-connections and myths, and thereby captures areas traditionally occupied by other institutions, such as the religions. In the form of an experience of immediacy ("I was there!"), it increasingly transports world 'views' and images of the world into the living rooms. These images also help to shape public awareness concerning religion and religions. Important here are special structures of production, on the one hand—along with the content presented by way of the medium—and then, on the other hand, the function of the medium as 'cultural form.' Television shows what is current and can be sold, which therefore is subject to journalistic principles. Simultaneously, it mounts a claim to present an image of 'reality,' to 'document' reality. This 'authenticity of the shown'—up to and including the fiction of the unstructured documentary film of the 1960s and 1970s, with its spare, and aloof, or missing, commentary—keeps silent about the fact that film has a reality of its own, an inherent and constructed one, and that, therefore, film does not simply reflect reality as it was before any filming. Only by revising and touching up that which has been 'registered,' for example by forming it into the montage, can the purely photographical image convey to viewers authenticity and sense. Nor, correspondingly, is there any difference on the level of production between documentation and fiction. Both convert 'pre-filmic' reality into 'filmic.'

Under these aspects—the journalistic as well as those pertaining to production technology—the question arises: to what extent can religion be conveyed over television? Or: how 'telegenic' is religion? On first impression, at least, the 'presentability' of the religious is mainly limited to the area of cult and ritual. Here the 'illustration drive' genuinely inherent in the medium has its escape valve. The presentation of subjects that promise exotic, mysterious, bizarre, or outlandish images can be concessions to the prevailing public taste, and reinforce trends, prejudices, or stereotypes. This dynamic holds especially when, in addition, the filmic means of metaphor or picture-distancing (by coloring, perspective-switch, 'worm's-eye view') is applied. Under these premises, films express more about our selves and our habits of seeing than they do about the object that they intend to picture. A further aspect of the medial transmission of strange cultures and religions is that the original meaning of religious signs loses its 'sense.' Loosed from the cultural context, the accent shifts from the religious experience of the 'believer' to pure information for the viewer. The presence of the camera, and the conditions of the 'shooting,' are not without influence on a cultic act, which in a given case becomes a pure presentation in terms of the premises of medial technique.

Content and Presentation

5. Television as Storyteller: On an entirely immediate level, television is first of all a teller of tales, taking up familiar myths or setting them in new meaning-connections. The topics of television productions, or of feature → films shown on television, include stories from the Judeo-Christian context (e.g., 'Bible films'; or stories from the life of Jesus), as well as from regions of Greco-Roman mythology (so that even a specific genre, the 'sandal film,' has developed). But television also goes back to forms of mythic thought and narrative in a more indirect way. Television stories are usually simple and easy to understand, as well as socially acceptable. They are stories that contribute to the interpretation of life as it is lived, in a 'good and evil' schema (→ Dualism), combining the foreign with the familiar, and most often with a happy ending. At the same time, the complexity of life as it is actually lived is reduced to a minimum, and emotionally strengthened. Thus, on the one side, television is part of the familiar world of every day, taking up its relevant subjects, while, on the other, permitting 'side trips' into another, but, again, familiar, world, or 'reality,' in which the expectation of deliverance, of victory of good over evil, is usually met. The subjects of love and violence, life and death, success and failure, are recounted, over and over again, as existential bases of human life, in ever new 'garments'—whether in the form of → science fiction, or in the regular noon talk show.

Television Rituals

6. The ritual dimension of television: There has never been a pause in the discussion of whether television has taken over religious functions themselves, or is merely being used by religion(s) medially. Television seems to be possessed of quasi-divine qualities merely by the attributes attributed to it: omnipresence, ubiquity (global extension), as well as its seeming omniscience, that allows it to be assigned the import of a kind of 'last instance' (N. Schneider). To formulate it radically, 'reality' wins its existence ultimately by way of its presence on television: what is not conveyed here, has but a slight chance of being perceived at all. Further: television itself gains a ritual dimension, by (a) creating 'television rituals,' by (b) structuring and ritualizing the everyday, through the cyclic character of the presentation of its products, and by way of its use, and (c) 'transcending' the everyday, and—as with traditional religious rituals—creating a 'we-consciousness' (G. Thomas). Major events, such as sports presentations (e.g., the World Soccer Championship in France in 1998, which celebrated its 'soccer gods' altogether as such; → Sports), or the funeral of the British 'Queen of Hearts,' Lady Di, who died in 1997 in an automobile accident, are not only televised globally, but are first formed, or even first made possible by television. Television, then, on one hand, can be regarded as an inseparable part of the ritual event (the sports program corresponds to the sports presentation), and on the other, the 'TV ritual' in question can be also a ritual event on television itself. A further aspect is normative here: repeatability, which creates rites of memory. This dimension was shown, for example in the first days after the death of the British princess: on German national television twenty-five programs were aired on twelve channels between August 29 to September 1, not counting those showing the ceremony of mourning or stories from the life of the Princess of Wales. Then, in relatively short order, the first TV-films were produced, retelling, in modern terms, the ascent of Cinderella to 'High Society Queen.'

Furthermore, intrinsic to television itself, and to its use, are ritual moments directed, in principle, to periodic return. These moments structure the experience of time. Continuity results from the expectation of regular returning occurrences, such as the news, at a particular hour of the day, or the broadcast of a weekly installment of a series. Television thus offers fixed points, and order, in daily reality. Here, content is frequently secondary, and reception or choice of program comes by reason of particular viewing times (e.g. Saturday or Sunday evening), or the offer made by the individual channels. Once more the question arises, as to what function may television have for the individual. As part of a pluralistic society, television has taken over the task of providing us with reflection on our culture. In reports, TV-films, plays, or talk shows, reality is not only transmitted, but newly constituted. The materials of the new constitution are conveyed in the media, and in daily reality. Sentiments like "I am there, and I feel that way too," are bounded by time but are surely globally 'networked.' I am part of a community of viewers, and this participation, for the moment, can determine my identity. Transitory communities are formed, along with the ritual structuring of everyday life, the satisfaction of the need for order, and the simplification of complex, immense connections. Aside from this, the question whether television can be an equal compensation for gratifying religious requirements of its audience is still unanswered.

1. Conciliar Decree on Social Communications Media Inter Mirifica, art. 3, issued December 4, 1963.
2. Gunter/Viney 1994.

Literature

Davis, Douglas, The Five Myths of Television Power or Why the Medium Is Not the Message, London 1993; Gunter, Barrie/Viney, Rachel, Seeing Is Believing: Religion and Television in the 1990s, London 1994; Linderman, Alf, The Reception of Religious Television: Social Semeiology Applied to an Empirical Case Study, Stockholm 1996; Newman, Jay, Religion vs. Television: Competitors in Cultural Context, Westport/London 1996; Peck, Janice, The Gods of Televangelism, Cresskill 1993; Schneider, Norbert, "Das Fernsehen: ein Mythenproduzent?," in: Hickethier, Knut (ed.), Fernsehen. Wahrnehmungswelt, Programminstitution und Marktkonkurrenz, Frankfurt/M. 1992, 109-127; Schultze, Quentin J., Televangelism and American Culture: The Business of Popular Religion, Grand Rapids 1995; Thomas, Günter, Medien—Ritual—Religion: Zur religiösen Funktion des Fernsehens, Frankfurt/M. 1998.

→ Communication, Film, Media, Publicity, Televangelism

Jutta Bernard

Terrorism

1. The word 'terror' (Lat., terror) designates fear and horror, whether or not intended. Terrorism, on the other hand, is a label for strategies that consciously introduce terror in order to reach goals extrinsic to it. It is a matter of a kind of 'symbolical violence' or 'force' (→ Conflict/Violence). The actual intended objects of terrorism are less the persons directly affected, or their pain, than those in whom the pain or fear of terror inspires its own terror; this result is an ulterior intent in the minds of the terrorists. Whether, in what measure, and in whom a given deed of violence will inspire fear and horror, depends on the collective fears, norms, and opportunities for communication that prevail in the cultures in which they are perceived. Nearly all known cultures accept certain forms of violence as legitimate, or at least as de facto normal. Thus, fear and paralyzing shock are to be expected only when and where violent deeds transcend the expected borders of inter-human violence. In ancient Eastern mythologies, the capacity and willingness for in- and super-human violence was especially ascribed to deities and

On November 4, 1995, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was murdered in Tel Aviv. In recognition of his work in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, he had received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1994, together with Yassir Arafat and Shimon Perez. During the weeks after the act of terror, persons, mainly youth, assembled at the square where he had been murdered, and they held protest vigils, carrying storm lanterns, flowers, and letters. The wall at the place of the crime was spontaneously filled with images and graffiti. The government offered its contribution only later, with a memorial plate in the soil and by officially naming the square "Rabin Place." The graffiti, of which the picture shows a section, were varnished, and kept as a historical memorial. In this time of terror, the graffiti writers adopted the Hebrew biblical expression, Yakum Damo—"His Blood Be Avenged!" Whether these words represent a petition to God or a challenge to human beings, remains ambiguous. The references to the Song of Moses (Deut 32:43), as well as that to Ps 79:10, indicate that the murder calls for the wrath of God, as it brought down a person who acted according to God's will, Yitzhak Rabin. The expression used at parting, Shalom, Haver—"Goodbye, Friend" (on the left, under the portrait)—originally an expression of sympathy, grief, and shock, has long since become a widespread saying. It was the last sentence in President Bill Clinton's address (otherwise in English) at the funeral ceremony. Meanwhile T-shirts and bumper stickers recall the deceased. Members of the Socialist Party use it to greet Rabin as a comrade. Partisans of the peace movement appeal to him as a person of like mind. And a fragment in the picture suggests the frequently applied verse Ata Haser ("We Miss You"). The greeting of peace has become a slogan, with which inhabitants of Israel express their support for the peace process. (A. Kleefeld and Kirsten Holzapfel) divinities: the Hebrew Bible includes the Great Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, punitive droughts. However, in societies with unstable hierarchies, conscious and unilateral contravention of social moral bounds has also repeatedly served as a means to the establishment or maintenance of everyday relations of power. The demonstrative transgression of the 'normal' horizon of expectancy of inter-human power relationships underscored the agents' pretensions, beyond or above the conventions of existing society. It could also serve to surround them with the halo of categorical, almighty power (→ Government/Rule/Politics/State). Frequently, there was also an 'emphatically public' presentation of symbolical acts of violence (public executions, murder of highly placed personalities in public places, destruction of public places of cult).

From the Terreur to Terrorism

2. In the political vocabulary of the modern age, the designation 'terror' has been linked principally to conceptualizations of tactics of terror and intimidation mounted by the state. Here the prime exemplar is the Terreur of the Jacobin revolutionary government in France (1792–1794), where the purpose was to intimidate the royalist opposition and establish a realm of 'virtue' (→ Revolution [French]). Just as, later, with the 'Red Terror' of the Bolshevist revolutionary government in Russia, the concept of 'terror' was utilized here by the agents themselves, namely, in the (positive) sense of a particularly reckless application of violence for the purpose of creating a perfect society in this world. Assaults of terrorism by anarchists on leading officials in the nineteenth century were frequently justified as 'creative' acts, for the construction of an ideal society, one without state or God.

In the twentieth century, the concept was transferred more and more to the work of non-state agents. In this connection, it sank to the status of an—often polemical—collective category for forms of illegitimate political violence that were to be spurned. The viewpoints as to what was to be regarded as illegitimate violence, of course, and what was not, diverge widely, as dictated by the position of the respective speaker. Hence the consecrated bon mot, “One man’s terrorist is another’s freedom fighter.” Western mass media and governments today are overwhelmingly inclined to label politically motivated deeds of violence as 'terrorism' when they (seemingly) are perpetrated by non-state agents, and are directed against civilian, non-military targets.

Religion and Terrorism

3. Many religions endorse terrorism to a limited degree. For example, it has often been sanctioned as applied to lawbreakers or the heterodox. Nonetheless, mono-causal connections between religion and terrorism seem almost nonexistent. Organized religious terrorism generally presupposes a social environment that supports, or tolerates, the agents of terrorism. Here, the borderline between organized terrorism and the 'spontaneous' terror of individual agents is fleeting. Radical religious milieus and doctrines that justify violence promote militancy among their followers. The willingness of agents to risk their own lives in public assaults (as, for example, with 'suicide attacks' by Shia and Sunni extremists in Lebanon and Palestine) need not always be based only on religious considerations, of course. Agents' psychological and material problems as well, coercion, and coincidence can play a role. But, interpreted as a testimonial to the power of one's own belief, such assaults can produce a martyrial cult, or, in case a religious disposition to a martyrial cult already exists, can be stylized as models that inspire imitation (→ Martyr).

State Terrorism, Religious

(a) Massive terrorist violence has emerged in history especially where the means for it have been abundantly present, namely, with the state. Accordingly, religious state-terrorism has prevailed where particular religions have ranked as beneficial to state or community. Even the biblical Book of Deuteronomy provides for horrible deterrents against polytheistic cults in Israel. Prominent examples from recent times have been, in medieval Europe, the persecutions of the Albigenses and the pogroms against the Jews, or elsewhere, the violent Shiitization of → Iran in the sixteenth century under the Safawids, or Saint Bartholomew's Night (1572) in France. If Communism and Fascism can be conceptualized as secularized → 'political religions,' then the Anti-Semitic terror of the National Socialists, or of the Stalinist mass liquidation of 'class enemies' can be labeled as religious state-terrorism in the broadest sense.

Assassination and Tyrannicide

(b) As the principle of divine right in government was superseded by the evident supremacy of material might, the notion gained prominence that 'unrighteous' rulers might be violently removed, for purposes of the reestablishment of the divine order. In ancient Athens, the regicides Harmodios and Aristogeiton were honored with the first statues dedicated to humans rather than gods. Breaches of the unity of throne and altar in medieval Europe repeatedly led to the 'excommunication' of disobedient rulers by parts of the clergy, and, in case of conflict, could occasion a demonstrative justification of 'tyrannicide' by Catholic scholars. Standing as examples are the murders of Henry III (1589) and Henry IV (1610) of France. In the twentieth century, religiously motivated assassinations of politicians of one's own religious community reflected the pairing of religious fanaticism with nationalistic ambitions, as with the murder of Mahatma → Gandhi by a Hindu (1948), Anwar al-Sadat by Islamists (1981), or Yitzhak Rabin by a Jewish extremist in 1995.

Non-State Terror Groups

c) With non-state groups, the organized transition to terrorism has nearly always depended on the concurrence of certain conditions of society, politics, and historical attitude:

(1) A perception of prevailing society as basically unjust.
(2) An activist, world-altering ethic.
(3) A consciousness of one's own military weakness.
(4) The reasonable expectation that, through spectacular deeds of violence, publicly effective signs can be posited.
(5) The availability of adequate logistics.

Thus, in the first century, an especially militant group of Jewish zealots, called by the Romans sicarii (from Lat., sica, 'dagger'), would publicly stab to death Romans in Palestine, or prominent Jews who cooperated with them, in order to set off an eschatological conflict between Romans and Jews. The Shia sect of Nizari Ismaelites that became famous in Europe under the name of 'assassins' (from Ar., 'hashish-eaters'; → Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens) compensated for their political and military weakness by spectacular murders of highly placed personalities. In neither case was it only the killing of political adversaries that kindled fear and horror, but the impression of confronting a hidden power that attacked from out of the dark.

Nationalistic and National Religious Terror Groups

In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, a good many nationalistic movements took up terrorism. It is true that, until into the 1970s, religion was often an important component of the formation of a national tradition, for example in the case of Algerian, Armenian, Chechnian, Cypriot Greek, Hindu, Irish, Palestinian, Serbian, Tamil, or Zionist nationalism. But the transition to terrorism was accomplished predominantly by organizations in which secularists provided the tone—for instance, by the Zionist Irgun Zeva'i le-Umi ("National Military Organization"), the Algerian Front de Libération Nationale (FLN), the Irish Republican Army (IRA), the People's Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), or the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) in Sri Lanka.

Only since the 1980s has the attention of the international mass media been much more attracted to acts of terrorism with religious or national religious background. Of high symbolical meaning was the success of the Iranian Revolution (1978–1979; → Iran), which, with the four hundred forty-four day 'Teheran Scourge Affair' (1979–1981), humiliated a world power, the United States of America, and was able to challenge the consensus of the Western world, with the → Fatwa of Ayatollah → Khomeini against British writer Salman Rushdie (1989), which was tantamount to a death sentence. Then, further, the suicide attacks of Shia activists on American and Israeli troops in Lebanon (1983–1985) propagated the conviction that religious enthusiasm sparked less fear of death than readiness for sacrifice, and thereby superior power in battle. Relatively successful groups like the Lebanese Hizbulla, in the wake of their military consolidation, distinguished ever more clearly between attacks on military and civilian targets, while weaker religious militant groups, in quest of unprotected targets in the 1990s, have multiplied blood baths among civilians, front and foremost among these organizations being the Algerian Groupe Islamique Armée (GIA), the Egyptian Jamaa Islamiyya, and the Zionist Kach Party.

Apocalyptic Groups

Apocalyptic groups, awaiting a prompt end of the world (→ End/Eschaton), are especially inclined to activities of terrorism in terms of the world crises that they foresee. When they announce the crisis that, in many traditions (such as that of the Christian → Apocalypse of John) is to proclaim the approaching final struggle between good and evil, they not only long for it to come, but (a) try to hasten it by acts of violence that effect polarization (poison-gas attack in the Tokyo subway, March 1995; plans of Jewish extremists to destroy the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem), or (b) stockpile weapons in an attempt at least to prepare for it (Branch Davidian commune in Waco, Texas, 1993). At the opposite pole on the scale of violence stand introverted attempts to reach a new and better world by collective suicide (doubtless not always voluntary), for example the mass suicides of the members of the People's Temple under Jim Jones in Guyana (1978), of the Solar Temple in Switzerland and Canada (1995, 1997), or of Heaven's Gate in the United States (1997).

Social Religious Groups

Purposive terror against civilians emerges from movements with a religious coloring, as well, which struggle with social developments or particular state institutions, laws, or measures. These traditions early included the terror campaigns of the American → Ku Klux Klan against Afro-Americans after emancipation, as well as, in more recent times, lethal assaults on → abortion clinics by American 'defenders of life,' or, again, the bomb attack on the United States Government office building in Oklahoma by a Christian 'patriotic militia' (1995), with which the government in Washington was supposed to have been struck a blow as a conspiratorial mythical symbol for foreign domination.

It is questionable whether the high numbers of victims registered in the 1990s, especially with attacks by religious groups, are to be referred mainly to the religious motivation of the agents. Equally important elements could be an ever more intense competition for the attention of the mass media, and improved defensive measures for military and state objects.

Literature

Demandt, Alexander (ed.), Das Attentat in der Geschichte, Cologne 1996; Ford, Franklin L., Political Murder: From Tyrannicide to Terrorism, Cambridge 1985; Hall, John R., Apocalypse Observed: Religious Movements and Violence in North America, Europe, and Japan, London/New York 2000; Juergensmeyer, Mark, Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence, Berkeley 2000; Laqueur, Walter, A History of Terrorism, New Brunswick 2001; Lincoln, Bruce, Holy Terrors: Thinking about Religion after 9/11, Chicago 2002; Rapoport, David C., "1984: Fear and Trembling. Terrorism in Three Religious Traditions," in: American Political Science Review 78 (1984), 658-677; Reich, Walter (ed.), Origins of Terrorism: Psychologies, Ideologies, Theologies, States of Mind, Cambridge 1990.

→ Anarchism, Conflict/Violence, End/Eschaton, Fanaticism, Fundamentalism, Political Religion, Revolution (French), Violence

Thomas Scheffler

Teutons

Discovery of the Teutons in Romanticism

1. a) The early nineteenth century's emphasis on appreciating one's own people and history resulted in a rediscovery not only of the Middle Ages, but also Teutonic prehistory. Research into the folktale, popular sagas, and folk usages began during this time. Jacob Grimm (1785–1863) attempted to expose ancient, concealed folk material, and thereby, presumably, to meet with a plethora of pagan relics of pre-Christian times. This work, however, has been surpassed by today's scholarship. In the popularization of ancient Teutonic myths (Walhall, Götterdämmerung [Ger., 'Twilight of the Gods']), a special contribution has been Richard Wagner's musical dramatic cycle, Der Ring der Nibelungen (Ger., "The Ring of the Nibelungs"), an 'art myth' referring to the thirteenth-century epic, Nibelungenlied ("Song of the Nibelungs"). Wagner's work applies a variety of Nordic Teutonic poems. Religious elements, orbiting the questions of guilt and redemption, do arise here, but they exclude the philosophical, educating and educated, religion of the nineteenth century.

Ariosophy

After the founding of the Reich (Empire) in 1871, the political right appropriated the symbol of Teutonic spirituality (Völkische Religion), and shaped it, in varying fashion, into a Romantic popular, and anti-Semitic, 'art faith.' 'Ariosophy' preached redemption by a strict separation of races, and the subordination of presumably inferior races to the superior ones. This interest in the Teutonic, which served certain currents in → National Socialism (Himmler's foundation Ahnenerbe, Ger., 'Ancestral Legacy'; Alfred Rosenberg), largely collapsed after 1945. Nevertheless, some groups of this circle (on the political and cultural right wing of postwar society) are still found today as continuations or revivals of their earlier forms.

'Neo-Teutonism'

b) Currently, on the one side, there are organized communities, resembling orders. They mount appeals to the organizational forms and content of the popular neo-paganism of the first half of the century (Armanic Order, Godi, Germanische Glaubensgemeinschaft ['Teutonic Faith Community'], Treuekreis Artglaube Irminsul ['Faithful Irminsul Circle of Race Belief']). On the other side, there appears a universalistic 'neo-Teutonism,' more consistent with the new nature piety of American origin, British neo-Celtism, and other Western and Eastern 'spiritual paths.' While the older neo-paganism evinced a racist piety (→ Race/Racism), the later 'esoteric' neo-paganism, under the application of the same myths, represents a variety of today's feminist ecological piety. This distinction says nothing as yet about reciprocal influencing and possible future developments.

Teutons, today, serve not only as the subject of their myths, but also as an object of the new myths of a racist or ecological spirituality, which in turn serves to proffer an alternative vis-à-vis Christian conceptualizations of God. Odin, then, according to a widespread interpretation, represents the shamanic archetype, and the Eddaic narratives serve to describe the spiritual effects of corresponding archetypes. There are no myths of old-Teutonic religion, but only narratives calculated to establish a cosmic-ecological and feministic-psychological spirituality of the close of the twentieth century.

Teutonic Religions

2. The history of the research shows how little we actually know about the life of the Teutons. Under 'Teutonic religions' are understood tribal religions of Northern, Central, and Eastern European peoples of related language and culture (→ Celts; Europe I), from their first mention by ancient writers (first century BCE) to the Christianization of Scandinavia, which had been accomplished by the eleventh century. Like all of Europe's pre-modern cultures, these peoples were agrarian societies (→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic). The subjects of their myths and cults are fertility, life and death, and defense from outside enemies. Along with vegetation festivals, we have reports of rites of transition for the life cycle. The custom of leaving burial gifts at gravesites, of building mounds or rune stones on the graves of princes, indicates that a life after death was held to differ from earthly life only in incidentals.

a) Cult was practiced at determinate places. There were also, among the Teutonic peoples, sacred functionaries, whose tasks included the celebration of public cult as well as the supervision of sacred law. Holy women served as seers, who could also bestow great power among peoples with whom oracle and omen were of high importance. A matriarchal societal structure, however, cannot be concluded from these facts. Religion focused on the existence of associations of kinship ('tribes'): thus, it was a public concern, which could also have a juridical character. Extremities such as famine or disease, and events of war, were accompanied by sacred acts. Among them were the war sacrifices in sacred glades, attested by literature and archaeology. Human beings were also sacrificed.

b) The gods and goddesses of the Teutons were figures of an agricultural world, who had to protect fertility and ward off evil. The three supreme gods, whom Roman historian Tacitus enumerates in his Germania, are colorless, and unspecific, and must by no means be identified with otherwise known gods Tivaz, Wodan/Odin, and Donar. Tacitus or his informant translates their function in Roman terms, giving their names as Jupiter, Mercury, and Hercules, responsible respectively for power, act/mobility, and strength. We have little concrete information about the veneration of these deities. But they were neither nature gods nor ethical ideals, but, as tribal divinities, are comparable to the original state gods of Rome.

The appeal of neo-Teutonic circles to medieval Nordic sources is problematic. Not only Icelandic sagas and Skalden songs, but also the two collections of myths under the name of Edda ("Songs of Edda," and the "Edda of Snorri Sturleson," both of the thirteenth century) have appeared only against a Christian background, and are therefore not unreservedly or unconditionally applicable as sources for pre-Christian religious history.

Literature

Sources: Church, Alfred J. et al. (trans.), The Germania of Tacitus, London 1924; Dronke, Ursula (ed./trans.), The Poetic Edda, Oxford 1969; Eadem (ed./trans.), The Poetic Edda, vol. II: Mythological Poems, Oxford 1997; Ryder, Frank G. (trans.), The Song of the Nibelungs: A Verse Translation from the Middle High German "Nibelungenlied," Detroit 1962.

Secondary Literature: Acker, Paul/Larrington, Carolyne (eds.), The Poetic Edda: Essays on Old Norse Mythology, New York 2002; Beck, Heinrich et al., Germanische Religionsgeschichte, Quellen und Quellenprobleme, Berlin 1992; Cusack, Carole M., Conversion among the Germanic Peoples, London 1998; Davidson, H. R. Ellis, Gods and Myths of Northern Europe, Harmondsworth 1964; Eadem, The Lost Beliefs of Northern Europe, London 1993; de Vries, Jan, Altgermanische Religionsgeschichte, 2 vols., Berlin [2]1959 (still an important work, despite its uncritical use of mythological and historical sources); Goodrick-Clarke, Nicholas, Black Sun: Aryan Cults, Esoteric Nazism and the Politics of Identity, New York 2002; Idem, The Occult Roots of Nazism: Secret Aryan Cults and Their Influence on Nazi Ideology, rev. ed., London 2004; Lindow, John, Handbook of Norse Mythology, Santa Barbara 2001; Russell, James C., The Germanization of Early Medieval Christianity: A Sociohistorical Approach to Religious Transformation, New York 1994; Simek, Rudolf, Dictionary of Northern Mythology, Cambridge 1993; Stanley, Eric Gerald, Imagining the Anglo-Saxon Past, Cambridge 2000; Wolf, Jürgen, Neopaganismus und Stammesreligionen, Münster 1997.

→ Celts, Europe I, National Socialism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Reception

Jürgen Wolf

Text / Textual Criticism

1. The word 'text' derives from the Latin textus, 'tissue,' and then acquires the meaning, still familiar today, of a supply of linguistic signs written down and gathered in a 'work' or textual corpus—a manuscript, a novel, a sermon, a sacred writing such as the → Bible or the → Qur'an. The rhetorical concept of 'text' was coined by Roman orator Quintilian, first in the sense of an 'address connection' (9, 4, 13), in his influential work Institutio Oratoria (c. 95 CE). Humanistic philology adopted this concept, and applied it to the object of its work: a 'text' became that to which a relation was articulated in the form of a commentary. The concept established itself only against the background of a philologically oriented culture of explication (→ Hermeneutics; Exegesis)—thus, in dealing with written statements whose direct understanding became problematic, due to their great age, or on other cultural grounds. Since humanism and the → Renaissance, an examination of the texts of ancient cultures has formed the field of activity where philological textual criticism has established the central importance of the concept of 'text' as 'work with texts.' In recent scholarship in the area of literature and linguistics, the concept of 'text' is preferably applied as a communicatively founded basic concept, vis-à-vis concepts of genre (Fr., genera) like 'poetry' and → 'literature.' It seems impossible to give a clear definition of a word whose denotation is as general as 'text,' which has entered everyday language. Still, one must keep in mind the fact that its application is not restricted to written fixations of linguist communication, but that, in today's semiotics compositions, there is a more generalized concept of text. The latter also includes other communicative statements based on systems of signs that are responsive to repetition and to the adoption of relationships, such as image-signs ('icons'), or ritual gestures (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture).

Textual Media, Textual Constancy, and Canonization

2. Production of religious texts can occur orally or in writing. Religious communities may acknowledge a more or less broadly apprehended → canon as the set of binding religious statements. These then receive a specially legitimized rank and value vis-à-vis other religious texts. As a rule, canonized texts manifest an extremely narrow spectrum of variation, in the oral as in the written traditions. Thus, in the discoveries at → Qumran, an additional textual constancy for individual books of the Bible is evident over a millennium. In this connection, the concept 'book religion' is relevant. It denotes the peculiarity of a religious community in centering its identity on a sacred writing. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam were constantly aware of it, although, for example, it is also to be found in the religion of the Sikhs. It is striking, however, that, unless they are produced in special forms for sacred use (Torah scroll), canonized texts are not linked to a determinate medium of conveyance: the Bible, New Testament, or Qur'an are found today digitalized on CD-ROMs or on internet servers.

Form of the Text: Textual Loci (Genres) and Poetic/Rhetorical Quality

3. Texts consist of a core text, and a descriptive or disclosing 'paratext,' such as title, preface, notations, marginal material, subtitles, dividing signs (see diagrams at → Talmud). Even as 'sacred scripture,' they are artificial and artful linguistic images. These signs are artificial because, despite their frequent claim to divine inspiration and authorship (verbal inspiration, 'word of God' or 'message from the beyond'), scriptures are the result of an often complicated process of textual production and redaction, representing a multiplicity of textual 'genres' (genera), in which, as in the Gospels of the New Testament, similitudes (parables), sayings (in Gk., logia), prayers, hymns ("Magnificat"), miracle accounts, and so forth are gathered together. These same signs are artistic because they contain, or can be read as, literary texts, because they are composed by way of rhetorical ornament, and because they are rendered aesthetic by poetical, dramatic, or narrative means. Texts in the Hebrew Bible that employ lyric art-forms, include, for instance, the Psalms, and the Song of Songs. The form of the short story is employed as in the arrangement of the material on Joseph. In the Bible, very heterogeneous material is presented literally, and, to an extent, is elaborated in multiple ways. In the Qur'an, instead, one observes that stylistic gestalt takes effect even in a religious textual corpus that essentially owes its existence to one person, and that this need by no means stand in contradiction with the subjective honesty of the presumed author. To an extent, the fact of a conscious conformity to the exemplar of other religious assertions can go hand in hand with spontaneous religious emotion. The all but constant employment of rhyming prose certainly stands under the influence of ancient Arab Kahin sayings, but is first of all an adequate medium of expression or proclamation especially of eschatological content. Later, as the regulation of the Muslim community system by way of juridical elements moved into the foreground for Muhammad, rhyming prose became an outward stylistic trait.

Authorship

The special → authority of religious texts, the claim to be indeed the word of God, offers various strategies of legitimatization that lay special claim to the concept of authorship. This authority is especially evident with the concrete authorship of a particular person, if, for example, the religious founder steps forward as personal author (Mani as author of the Kephalaia, Muhammad as author of the Qur'an, Hubbard as author of Dianetics). Anonymity, as in the case of the Bible, or with Vedic hymns, is often to be observable bearing high authority with religious writings. But false ascriptions (intentional or in good faith), as well, to persons of great authority, but frequently of doubtful historicity, are also often encountered ('pseudepigraphy,' e.g., Denis the Areopagite, or Hermes Trismegistus).

Intertextuality

Even with religious texts, as with fictional literary texts, various textual relations can be established. Of course, account must be taken of the fact that religious texts normally act outside purely literary validity, even in the area of religious practice. Intertextuality—the more or less broadly defined reciprocal relation among texts—is a very important phenomenon with religious texts. New texts emerge against the background of (and often in competition with) established religious structures and their texts. The meaning context of religious assertions is textual content, fixed in writing in the same degree as the social environment is fixed.

Dealing with the Text

4. The historical process of the forming of canonized sacred texts, when these are fixed 'to the last jot and tittle,' necessitates their exposition and commentary. The longer they have been fixed, the stronger this necessity will prove. In many religious organizations, in parallel with the canonization of the text corpus, there emerges a monopoly of interpretation on the part of religious → 'specialists,' who specify rules of exposition and establish dogmatic interpretations. This theological 'exegesis' enfolds the sacred text in an aura of commentaries, marginal glosses, or collections of excerpts ('catenae'), thereby producing further text. To its corpus corresponds everyday, practical propagation, then exposition and interpretive adaptation of the text in the life of religious communities.

Maintenance, Conveyance, Tradition of the Text—Example of the Qur'an

5. In the course of historical development, the strict establishment of the sacred text has led to the ever-growing challenge of the maintenance of the text—that is, of the perfectly accurate conveyance of the text, even in an oral form. A typical example of a religious culture at whose center stands a sacred text, is → Islam. The → Qur'an is the first book to appear in Arab literature. As the Prophet died, he did not leave the Qur'an as a book completely composed; rather, the individual parts of the revelatory text lay before its redactors, and they set to work on it some twenty years after → Muhammad's death. From the very beginning until today, with the conveyance of its exact text, an oral communication of the Qur'an, along with its written form, has played an important role. The textual accuracy of versions of the Qur'an had wide-reaching cultural consequences. A concern for the fixing of the sacred text, and for its propagation—concretely, for the copying of its manuscripts—promoted the development of Arab script (→ Writing), in whose connection a lexicography and grammar developed, as well. In parallel, out of the collections and critical judgments of the oral reports of the words and deeds of the Prophet and his contemporaries, a scholarship and historiography of the Qur'anic tradition appeared. The foundations of legal scholarship lay here, as well: the Qur'an, and the reports of the words and deeds of the Prophet were soon established as the most important sources for Islamic law. Beginning in the ninth century, translations of especially scientific texts from the Greek welded two cultures of textual tending and exposition: the Arabic exposition of the Qur'an, and the ancient tradition of—profane—textual commentary. This historical fact shows—over against fundamentalistic positions—that historical developments owing to foreign influences have an essential share in the whole culture, and thus in the interpretation regarded by a culture as valid for its sacred scripture.

Textual Analysis through Historical Criticism

6. Christianity established a special approach to dealing with the canonical text. There emerged a commitment to philological confrontation with original texts, in their original language, and this in the sense of the humanistic watchword, "Back to the sources" (Ad fontes), and of the Reformation slogan, Sola Scriptura, "by Scripture alone." The text of the Bible was then approached with the same philological toolbox with which, for example, the ancient pagan texts were examined, and an entirely new relation developed to traditional exegesis, which was now measured more and more by the touchstone of textual criticism. Pursued with consistency, this route led to an approach to the text of the Bible as one literary testimonial among others, and today the text of the Hebrew Bible is considered in close connection with other texts of the Ancient Near Eastern environment. The recognitions gained by such a procedure place the claims of the religious proclamation before a difficult challenge to their exclusivity. Thus, for example, Ugaritic research showed that psalms heretofore understood as referring to the one God of Israel—so that plural forms of the name of God have traditionally been interpreted as the 'majestic plural' of that name—exhibit close parallels with Ugaritic hymns that are addressed to several gods. A philological approach to the biblical text in terms of textual criticism first found acceptance in → Protestantism. At the roots of this acceptance stood Luther's efforts to make the text of the Bible accessible to every believer, by way of his translation of the Bible. A correct understanding of the biblical text was then seen as a duty, for whose performance concrete efforts must be undertaken, and in which it was perfectly possible to fail. In the course of the nineteenth century, along with a traditional theological exegesis, there arose—against opposition that was sometimes robust—a textual scholarship and culture of interpretation in terms of scientific historical criticism. This approach, now used with the Christian Scriptures themselves, gradually succeeded in establishing itself in the institutional context of theological teaching.

Thus the situation was created that has split today's Christian theologies between a pretension to scholarship—hegemonic, rational, and secular—and the actual handing on and expounding of the faith. This development repeatedly leads to tensions, some of them powerful, even within the confessions, as, for example, in the case of the clash over modernism in the Catholic Church, or in the confrontations over → fundamentalism and the Evangelical movement.

Literature

Battersby, James L., Reason and the Nature of Texts, Philadelphia 1996; Black, David A. (ed.), Rethinking New Testament Textual Criticism, Grand Rapids 2002; Dane, Joseph A., The Myth of Print Culture: Essays on Evidence, Textuality, and Bibliographical Method, Toronto 2003; Greetham, David C., Textual Scholarship: An Introduction, New York [2]1994; McGann, Jerome J., A Critique of Modern Textual Criticism, Chicago 1983; Thorpe, James, Principles of Textual Criticism, San Marino 1972; Tov, Emanuel, Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible, Minneapolis/Assen 1992.

For further literature, see the entries "Bible, "Qur'an," "Writing."

→ Bible, Book, Language, Literature, Qur'an, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Oral Tradition, Qur'an, Talmud, Tradition, Translation, Writing

Heidrun Eichner

Theater

1. Originally, 'theater' denotes a 'space for viewing' (in Gk., théatron, from theásthai, 'consider,' 'contemplate,' 'observe'). In this space, human beings and their acting (in Gk., dráma), are brought before an audience as a scene, whether in free, improvised performance, or on the basis of (poetical) narrative. To theater as an art form, then, belong players (actors), audience, and theater as a place where acting occurs. Depending on whether the presentation—or performance—prioritizes verbal or nonverbal means of communication, the term 'speaking theater' or 'body theater' is used. In sacred theater, expressive means of presentation are often preferred that emphasize the body: → masks, → dance, gestures of the body (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture).

In sacred → drama, means or media are introduced as part of complex rituals. But in many cultural traditions, secular forms of theater have developed, from or together with, sacred forms. In turn, and in manifold wise, these are enriched with religious content and means of expression. Secular theater can be a place for the revitalization, aestheticization, and production of myths, as in the Western theater of modernity, where ancient myths have come to be presented out of 'pagan,' Greco-Roman tradition. As a 'moral arrangement,' it can reinforce, or call into question, the ethical demands of a religion; or it can itself seek to undertake ritual tasks that are equivalent to those of religion.

This Buddhist demon theater from Ambalangoda, in Sri Lanka, is to be found today in the puppet theater museum of the Alois A. K. Raab foundation, Kaufbeuren. It is a mechanical theater, with two-dimensional wooden figures on a three-level stage. The lower and upper levels are cut off by swathes of flame. The figures' parts are movable, to an extent, with ropes and pulleys. The theater originated in mid-twentieth century, and was set up for temple festivals. According to the museum founder, T. Wilson de Silva, the theater had a curtain in front, but was accessible to pilgrims. Buddhism has extensive and detailed depictions of hell, with long, cruel, and ingenious scourgings. The devil theater threatens pilgrims with other, similar punishments in the afterlife, to be executed by demons (branding, sawing to pieces, skewering) as sanctions for deviant behavior. In the background, on a throne on the upper level, is a 'chief demon.' The scene is flanked by a cluster of corpses, which can be moved by ropes like a jumping jack. (M. Herzog)

2. Ancient theater can be regarded as the actual cradle of Western drama. First came choral dances and songs, which, in connection with the sacred celebrations of Dionysus, developed forms that were ever more fixed. With the formation of the polis, around 500 BCE, these forms underwent a further differentiation. Tragedy, on one side, became the human being's tension in mythical dependency, between free will and an enthrallment by fate (in Gk., moíra; → Destiny/Fate). The hero's catastrophe was verification of the existence and activity of a superordinate power. On the other side, it attracted interest in real conflict among human beings. Aristotle described theater as mimesis—as the 'imitation' of reality. He designated the effect of tragedy as a → catharsis, a 'purging,' that delivered one from hybris, sacrilegious pride, and rendered one capable of sympathy, and of bearing one's fate. Comedy, by contrast, had developed from the sacred Dionysus tradition of merry, mocking songs (satyr plays), and delivered up the heroes of myth and politics to public hilarity.

Roman theater served at first to reflect the virtues of the state ideology. Burlesque comedies that attributed to the gods the passions of human beings, such as Plautus's (250–184 BCE) intricate "Amphitruo," brought pleasure to a wide audience. With the incipient imperial era came the age of state-financed spectacles, a sign of the power of rule: chariot races, gladiatorial combats, and rough popular improvisations, to serve the entertainment of a broad public. Panis et circences—'bread and circuses'—became the slogan for the employment of theater as social technology.

With the beginning of the Christian age, mimded burlesques of Christians and their rites were favorite presentations. The Church prohibited the frequenting of theaters. With their myths of the gods, or even their vulgar burlesque, theaters stood in the pagan tradition, and spectators were threatened with excommunication. In the fourth century, the renunciation of such spectacula actually became an article of the Christian baptismal creed. At the same time, the Church itself utilized the experiential sensory worlds of theatrical forms. In the area of symbolical actions, these forms frequently supplemented liturgical celebrations (→ Liturgy/Dramaturgy), and in the Middle Ages, via the 'mystery plays,' developed into an independent Christian genre of sacred → drama.

3. During the Counter-Reformation, the spiritual play and the didactic piece presented for moral edification flourished for the last time in the Catholic Baroque theater. Calderon de la Barca's "Life Is a Dream" (premiering in 1635), exemplifies and explicates the proposition that the transitory quality of worldly values prevents anyone from finding life unless united with God and guided by faith. With the Enlightenment, however, and the triumphal campaign of the middle class, modern theater definitively established itself as a confessionally independent platform, from which to take up the conflictive existence of emancipated citizens responsible for themselves. The price of this new worldly affiliation is doubt and confusion. The secular person finds redemption by divine grace (Schiller, "Maria Stuart," 1801; Goethe, "Faust": part 1, 1806; part 2, 1832). The myth of the 'Faustian man,' with his double soul, who finds redemption only through 'love from on high,' has been a theme of currency for many a landmark presentation of "Faust," from Max Reinhardt (1909) to Christoph Marthaler (1993).

Twentieth Century

4. a) At about the turn of the twentieth century, in distinction from the naturalistic theater of illusion, an avant-garde movement developed that demanded a new intercourse with stage space, stage image, light, and even the actor's art. Representatives such as Adolphe Appia (1862–1928) and Edward Gordon Craig (Toward a New Theater, 1913) sought to free theater from the shackles of literature. Under the provocative slogan, "Theater of Cruelty," Antonin Artaud called for a theater of 'bodiliness,' a consciousness of the language of the body. He worked with indigenous traditions, such as that of Balinesian and Tibetan ritual theater (Le théâtre de la cruauté—premier manifeste, 1932; second manifeste, 1933 [Fr. "The Theater of Cruelty—First Manifesto … Second Manifesto"]). Erwin Piscator's and Bertolt Brecht's 'epic theater' used Verfremdungseffekte ('effects of alienation') in order to generate an emotional distance in the audience, and stimulate it to reflect on a reality in need of change. It was not the relationship of the human being to herself, nor her relationship to God, but the meaning of her societal function that ought to stand at midpoint in the performance.

Theater of the Absurd

b) The theater of the absurd distinguished itself as theater presenting the quest of the human being who has lost himself in a world devoid of meaning. It is intimately coupled with the existentialist ideas of Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus, who described the world as a metaphysical 'no man's land,' in which the human being is condemned to freedom, and, in permanent struggle against absurdity, must himself give meaning to his existence. The protagonists in Samuel Beckett's "Waiting for Godot" (premiering in 1953), or Harold Pinter's "The Caretaker" (1960), manifest their condition as 'lost,' and their existential 'fear,' by way of their 'automated' speech (→ Existentialism).

Theater of Experience

c) In the theater of experience, artists such as Jerzy Grotowsky, Peter Brook, Eugenio Barba, Adrienne Mnouchkine, and Richard Schechner adopt elements of the ritual theater of the Far East (Japanese noh theater, Beijing opera), and other traditions with a religious anchoring. These playwrights include the usages of ritual ceremony, such as gestures, movements, and masks, as well as elements of the trance and mystery play. By contrast with the psychologism of speech-centered European theater, it is the actor's body that becomes the tool of self-revelation. Even more than the presentation itself, it is now a process of 'testing' that becomes the locus of an existential self-knowledge on the part of the actors, the self-knowledge that bestows on them their meaning. Here, classic texts are dismantled, linked with elements of bodily ritual, and, by means of personal experiences, joined together in a new system (Peter Brook—Shakespeare, "The Tempest," 1990). The ensemble becomes the 'ritual group,' blending the boundaries between theater and ritual drama (Richard Schechner, "Bacchae," 1969; Robert Wilson, "KA MOUNTAIN and GUARDenia Terrace—A Story about a Family and Some People Changing," 1972). Typically enough, the presentations programmatically overstep the place and time of customary presentation: they take place from sunset to sunrise in a quarry (Peter Brooks, "Mahabharata" in Aix-en-Provence, 1985), or even, as for Wilson, take spectators and players, for seven days, on seven mountains around Shiraz, in Iran. American avant-gardist and theoretician Richard Schechner's collaboration with anthropologist Victor Turner, for example, attests the route 'from ritual to theater,' and shows the sacred drama of India and Africa as a source of inspiration for the contemporary Western stage.

d) Theater in the age of the mass media is still a place where myths and existential themes are recalled and displayed. Wilson's theater of apocalyptic images develops its effect by way of a 'teamwork' of rhythmic movements by the players in slow motion, light, music, individual words, and bizarre costumes ("Death, Destruction & Detroit," 1979, 1987, 1999); meanwhile, theater directors such as Peter Stein (Ibsen, "Peer Gynt," 1971; Aischylos, "Orestia," 1980), or authors such as Botho Strauss (Trilogie des Wiedersehens, Ger., "Trilogy of Return," 1976), Hans Neuenfels ("Medea," 1976), Frank-Patrick Steckel ("Penthesilea," 1978), reach back to classical texts of the collective European memory. These performances lead (universal) theater back, once more, to its origin: the space for illustration and visualization of human existence in being and acting.

In December, 1972, with his troop of eleven international players, director Peter Brook spent a hundred days traveling in North and West Africa, to help discover the extent to which understanding and agreement is possible among people from various parts of the world. With improvisations based on the ancient Persian legend, "The Conference of the Birds," in which many birds gather in order to deliberate as to how God can best be found, Brook was trying out a 'universal theater.' Was a meeting site possible for the sharing of human experience, independently of language and culture? In this scene, poles lead the players, and help them to lose their egos on the stage. The players' bodies become vehicles of the rhythms of the gods, so that "God may pass before our eyes" (J. Heilpern). Brook names this theater the "Theater of Naiveté or Innocence." Its symbol is the circle.

Literature

Ashby, Clifford, Classical Greek Theatre: New Views of an Old Subject, Iowa City 1999; Brauneck, Manfred, Die Welt als Bühne. Geschichte des europäischen Theaters, 4 vols., Stuttgart 1993ff.; Idem, Theater im 20. Jahrhundert. Programmschriften – Stilperioden – Reformmodelle, Reinbek 1982; Brockett, Oscar G./Hildy, Franklin J., History of the Theatre, Boston 2002; Brook, Peter, The Empty Space, London 1968; Croyden, Margaret, Conversations with Peter Brook, 1970–2000, New York 2003; Flashar, Hellmut, Inszenierung der Antike: Das griechische Drama auf der Bühne der Neuzeit, Munich 1991; Schechner, Richard, Between Theater and Anthropology, Philadelphia 1985; Schnusenberg, Christine, The Relationship between the Church and the Theatre: Exemplified by Selected Writings of the Church Fathers and by Liturgical Texts until Amalarius of Metz, 775–852 A.D., Lanham 1988; Sennett, Herbert, Religion and Dramatics: The Relationship between Christianity and the Theater Arts, Lanham 1995; Turner, Victor, From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play, New York 1982.
Journal: The Drama Review, ed. by Richard Schechner.

→ Drama (Sacred), Liturgy/Dramaturgy, Mysteries

Elke Sofie Frohn

Theocracy

1. What has occurred in → Iran and in Algeria in the last two decades of the twentieth century, in terms of deadly violence, deprivation of individual rights, and coercion to live according to the rules of religious laws, is perceived in the West with horror and revulsion, and labeled 'theocracy.' 'Theocracy' (Gk., 'God's government') contradicts 'democracy' (Gk., 'people's government'). The former designation fuses a criticism of the religious grounding of political crimes with a criticism of religion across the board. Both of the countries above cited were subjected to a rapid modernization, and the West had shown its ugly face: human rights were valid on paper alone. In Algeria, in addition, democratic elections were halted, as a siege of the Islamists seemed imminent. "Backslide to the Middle Ages!" was one formula with which the West rejected the model. "How could you bear [a] theocracy?" was another.[1] But the West has only preached the value of the Enlightenment in colonialism, not realized it. It is to this reality that the ideal of an Islamic theocracy is opposed.

Sketch of a Constitution for the New Beginning

2. Theocracy as a utopia: a) The cry for a 'government of God' first emerged in a determinate historical situation. In Israel/Judaea, in 586 BCE, the royal palace and the Temple in Jerusalem were destroyed, and the people lost their independence. The upper classes were carried off into exile in Babylon. Along with those who clung to the old model—insisting on insurrection, and a king of their own—and along with those who established themselves in Babylon, others managed a return to Israel, drafting an entirely different constitution (Ezek 40-48, Deuteronomy). The equality of all was guaranteed.

Land apportionment in equal areas for each family continued its effect for a while: exploitation and debtors' slavery were impossible, since, every seven years, in the Sabbath year, debts were cancelled, and every forty-nine years, in the Year of Jubilee, the original land apportionment was restored. There would be no more kings, since it was this institution that was regarded as being at the root of the accumulation of power, and as having inevitably introduced inequality. Instead of kingship, a 'contract,' a 'covenant between God and man,' was to be obligatory. The Commandments bound all equally, irrespective of social position. God needed no representative: the 'covenant' of the law, struck of old 'with (under) Moses,' represented God in any current government and under any particular laws.

Josephus: Rule of the Priestly Nobility

b) The word 'theocracy' was introduced by Josephus (c. 94 CE) in order to describe the particular character of Jewish society for a Greco-Roman audience.[2] Scion of a priestly family of Jerusalem, Josephus advocated the theocracy, which assigned the priests an important function. The theocracy is distinguishable from a variety of community organizations constrained to the religious area, as was necessary in rabbinical Judaism after the loss of sovereignty under Roman rule. But it is also to be distinguished from the model of the Messiah King. Even the latter, however, was seen more as laying the groundwork of a divine government than as presage of a return to the monarchy. Thus, out of the monarchy of the royal family emerged the rule of the priestly nobility.

Reign (Kingdom) of God?

c) This model base shapes the foundation of Jesus's message of the Basileía Theoû, "when God comes into His Kingdom." Planned not as a 'reign of heaven' in the beyond but as the constitution of an earthly society, its effectuation promptly falls under the Christian reservation that it can only be realized outside history, outside earthly reality. Thus, under the condition of 'antecedence,' secular rule is made over no longer to the covenant of the law but to the future, while life in the state is 'still' under the customary order.

d) Unlike the Lutherans, the Reformed (Zwingli, Calvin) take the viewpoint that the 'royal rule of God' must be measured by reality. Their city-republics may be taken as the model of democracy and civil society. However, here as well, 'religious constitutions' frequently stand under the compulsion of having to right all things, above and beyond the humanly possible. Religion becomes terror, theocratic rule turns into police state. Calvin's Geneva is as just as much an example of → terrorism as is → Khomeini's Iran.

Control of the Executive

3. Who is the sovereign? The deciding question for a theocratic constitution concerns the government—the institution, therefore, which is to represent God, and which, on the human, social level realizes the everyday 'translation of the law into laws.' A subordination advertised as identical with that required by Jesus of his disciples[3] can disguise violence with religion. The Pope as Servus Servorum Dei can at the same time, as Vicarius Christi, require utter obedience. In a theocracy, the 'Servant of the Servants of God,' because he is 'Vicar of Christ,' can claim for himself the absolute rights of a monarch. Thus, theocracy makes for a power uncontrollably unleashed. But the Jewish model aims at a sacred limitation of the rule of persons by persons: the government of God in the form of the law makes the current government just as surely controllable as the currently valid laws. → Democracy, with its distribution of power, is every bit as genuine a consequence of theocracy as is religious tyranny.

1. Colpe, Carsten, Problem Islam, Frankfurt/M. 1989, 142; 61-88.
2. Josephus, Contra Apionem 2, 16; trans. in Taubes 1987, 65, 79.
3. Matt 22:21; that loyalty to the state here is identical with that of Paul's Rom 13 is disputed by Pinchas Lapide; see Lapide, P., Er predigte in ihren Synagogen: Jüdische Evangelienauslegung, Gütersloh 1980, 34-55.

Literature

Assmann, Jan, Moses the Egyptian: The Memory of Egypt in Western Monotheism, Cambridge 1997; Bohatec, Josef, Calvins Lehre von Staat und Kirche, Breslau 1937; Baber, Johansen, Contingency in a Sacred Law, Leiden 1999, 263-348; Kepel, Gilles, La revanche de Dieu: Chrétiens, juifs et musulmans à la reconquête du monde, Paris [2]2003 ([1]1991); Reventlow, Henning et al. (eds.), Politics and Theopolitics in the Bible and Postbiblical Literature, Sheffield 1994; Runciman, Steven, The Byzantine Theocracy, Cambridge 1977; Taubes, Jacob (ed.), Religionstheorie und Politische Theologie 3: Theokratie, Munich 1987; Walton, Robert C., Zwingli's Theocracy, Toronto 1967; Weiler, Gershon, Jewish Theocracy, Leiden 1988.

→ Democracy, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Iran, Law, Papacy

Christoph Auffarth

Theodicy

The question of the meaning of this world's → evil—of natural evil (natural catastrophes), of moral evil, in the sense of war and crime, and of personal suffering (hunger, disease, death)—is encountered by every human being. It seems to have become fundamental for personal meaning. Thus, for some religions, the fact that there is such a thing as 'bad' poses problems of no little significance. How is a good and caring God to be reconciled with blind fate, and evil? The believer feels frequently exposed to these forces. A 'justification of God' is called for, for the evil that God permits: 'theodicy' (from Gk., Theós, 'God'; díke, 'right,' 'righteousness'). German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716) first coined the term. In Leibniz's Essais de théodicées sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme, et l'origine du mal ("Essays in Theodicy: The Goodness of God, the Freedom of the Human Being, and the Origin of Evil"; 1710), he sought to reconcile the fact of evil in the world with the idea of God's justice and perfection. The question of the moral justification of God appears in its full import especially in the monotheistic religions (Judaism, Christianity, Islam), whose point of departure is in the existence of an almighty and omniscient, personal God, ultimately responsible for the divine creation. Other concepts, especially polytheistic, dualistic, or gnostic, emphasize either the ambivalence of God/the gods, assume a concrete cause of evil, for example a demiurge—in an attenuated sense, this function is fulfilled by the Christian → Devil—or explain suffering through reference to a guilt personally incurred by the human being in a previous life (concept of karma in → Buddhism).

Attempts at Theological Solutions

With the intent to establish a theological foundation for evil and suffering in the world, the discussions of theodicy have adopted the following assumptions: (1) the free will of the human being who can decide for or against the good; (2) the accompanying sinfulness of the human being (indeed, in Christianity, an original fault or → sin), that incurs a 'punishment from God'; (3) the believer's testing and instruction, as it comes to expression in the biblical story of Job, the 'undeserving sufferer.' A solution to the problem emerges from the assumption that there is a justice that 'evens things out' in the next world, for example in the form of a final judgment. In all of the monotheistic religions, however, there is also the tendency to accept that a judgment upon God and upon the divine creation is beyond the capacity of the human being to manage; this position is explicit in Calvinism, for example.

Crisis of Theodicy

Two events in European modernity raised the question of the 'justice of God' in a special degree of keenness. The earthquake in Lisbon, in 1755, which killed tens of thousands of persons, shook the assumption of modern → rationalism that the goodness and existence of God could be justified in terms of the laws of nature of an ordered world, a world as the Enlightenment had come to see it. In the twentieth century, the problem of theodicy flared up anew, under new omens, on the occasion of the existence and function of the National Socialist extermination camps. The question of the moral legitimization of God is found mirrored in the question of 'anthropodicy'—the 'justification of the human being': How can persons permit this suffering? Does that moral failure mean a reductio ad absurdum for the concept of 'further ethical development'? Today, a tendency prevails to interpret catastrophes and suffering as artifacts, engendered by persons in many ways, for example by means of technological and civilizing incursions into nature.

Literature

Beal, Timothy K., Religion and Its Monsters, New York/London 2002; Kreiner, Armin, Gott im Leid. Zur Stichhaltigkeit der Theodizee-Argumente, Freiburg 1997; Petrik, James M., Evil Beyond Belief, Armonk 2000.

→ Devil, Ethics/Morals, Evil/Evil One, God/Gods/The Sacred, Hereafter, Meaning/Signification, Progress, Sin, Suffering, Will (Free)

Jutta Bernard and Stefan Hartmann

Theology

Reflected Speech

1. The word 'theology' (from Gk., theología) denotes "reflective discourse concerning the being and acting of God or gods." The function of theology is to solve (1) the individual's problems of meaning, and (2) society's problems of interpretation of the world, as well as those of order or structure—in reference to the bases and foundations of a given religious system (which not infrequently means: in terms of a transcendent point of reference).

Theology—Not Only in Christianity

2. Until the mid-twentieth century, theology was a concept referred primarily to Christianity. It designated especially any teaching resting on biblical revelation, and in itself rationally grounded, concerning the being and works of the triune God of the Christians and that God's relationship to the human being and the world. It included Mariology, any teaching concerning the human being in need of salvation, salvation history, and the opportunities for the attainment of salvation and for communication with God. It likewise included the doctrine of the mediating role of the Church and the saints, including church law. But the increasing scrutiny, since the middle of the nineteenth century, of other religions, in language and content, demonstrated the fact that they, too, possess theology. This observation applies to → Judaism, → Islam, and the monotheistic religions of → Hinduism, as well as many polytheisms. Obliquely, it holds even for religions in which no 'God' (theós) stands at the focus, but in which, indeed, there is a transcendent point of reference, as, e.g., in → Buddhism, or in the Vedanta of the Hindus.

As long as the concept of theology seemed to denote a primarily Christian phenomenon, it was adequately defined as authoritative Christian doctrine, legitimated by the instances of ecclesiastical control. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), however, the extension of the concept 'theology' to other religions—a concept widely accepted by the other Christian churches, even those without comparable institutions of ecclesiastical control—implies that it can be defined today neither by specific content of belief, nor by doctrine conformed to the church. Rather, reference must be made to a more general characteristic, one that is the property of all theology. Thus, one may conclude: "Theology is the product of a rational reflection, accompanied by premises of belief, on the content of a given religious tradition, and on the instructions concerning salvific activity that are to be deduced from that content, when the latter is legitimized by previous initiation and by consent of leading supporters of a community of belief." It is its perspective determined by belief that distinguishes theology from the → academic study of religion. The latter regards the religions, including their theologies—likewise rational—from an outer perspective, one that includes a neutral attitude toward belief. Initiation into an authoritative tradition distinguishes theology from the philosophy of religion.

Theology as Religious Tradition's Rational Self-Reflection

Meaning and Order

3. The function of responding to questions of meaning, and problems of structure, falls to myths as well, or texts of revelation. That is, it falls to the reports concerning the will and activity of God or the gods, which, in the self-concept of a given religion, stem from a divine source. The religious level on which theology is settled distinguishes it from these forms of bestowal of religious meaning. Theology is not the word of God, but human reflection on, and interpretation of, the word of God. It is not the visionary sight of divine acting, or a mythic report concerning the creation event and other deeds of God or the gods. Instead, it is an attempt to arrange in structures of meaning the activity of God as known from such sources. That is, theology is an attempt to understand and base the volitional impulses of suprahuman powers—those impulses that can be deduced from religious tradition and from nature—and to set them in a connection with the activities of human beings.

Doctrine of Obligation

4. It is characteristic of theology, then, to attempt to generate a meaningful system of thought that will bind deities, world, nature, human beings, and society into a consistent model of interpretation. Theology gathers, searches, orders, and evaluates the traditional discrete, disparate utterances of religious experience. It canonizes them, explains them, and connects them into an intellectual system. The character of its interpretation as a system permits it to draw conclusions concerning the being of God or the gods, concerning the meaning and order of the world, and concerning the duties and obligations of human beings. Theology also clarifies and shapes religious acts, in → sacrifice and → prayer, sacraments and → liturgy, which produce an immediate relation to the religious life of the community. Oriented to the structure of the society that is its vehicle, it develops ideals of cosmic order (→ Cosmology/Cosmogony), and of a paradisiacal world free from suffering, disease, and death, attainable in the hereafter or realizable in the present world (→ Garden/Paradise; Heaven/Sky; Luck/Happiness; Utopia). Oriented to conceptualizations of ideals like these, it can occasion social changes. It lays down, legitimizes, and alters norms of social behavior. It orders and weighs 'sins,' on a scale that can extend from light transgressions to mortal sin, it establishes penances and punishments. It reflects on → guilt and repentance, on beatitude and suffering, on merit and grace. Its responses relate to questions on the purpose of being, on the meaning of → suffering, and on death and victory over death, as well as on questions touching on the role assignment of the individual in society—on the human being's rights, duties, and goals. At the same time, it sketches and represents general ideals to which individual and societal life can be oriented, e.g., peace, truth, order, eternal life; or love of neighbor, compassion for living beings, responsibility for creation and the environment.

Norm and Development

5. However, the development of relations of meaning is not theology's only task. Theology also constantly adapts the interpretation of religious experience and tradition to the evolving conditions of life, and to the social and cultural context. It alters, complements, or thrusts aside earlier understanding and misunderstanding, then integrates new knowledge, but also defends important traditional values. Only when theology petrifies, and no longer performs these functions, is a religion seriously threatened from within. However, this dynamic also signifies that theology frequently stands amidst the tension between orthodox conservation, and a renewal or renovation of → tradition in keeping with the times. Both renewal and the judgment as to what may be regarded as orthodox need legitimization. This condition holds for all religions. It does not presuppose organization, but does require acknowledged types of entry into religious specialization, and the construction of consent. As a rule, legitimization is consequent upon → initiation, which is ordinarily performed by the already initiated, through examination or testing and consecration after the candidate has spent time as a student. Examples include various phenomena such as priestly ordination, or initiation by a → guru after a time of studies. But initiation can also be directly conferred by a divinity, which selects, or takes possession of, a person, and then expresses itself through a knowledge 'self-acquired' by (revealed to) the person, together with a personal → charisma, by inspiration, prophetical power, or supernatural abilities and miracles. In such cases of the manifestation of divine powers, subsequent formal initiation is not necessary. But recognition by other religious → specialists is indeed required; these latter must accept the person thus selected as an authentic representative of their religious tradition. Without that acceptance, the crucial legitimization of the religious tradition will be missing, and along with it, the possibility of altering a prevailing theology from the inside, under normative auspices. (There have been numerous exceptions, however, one of which was the refusal of Jesus of Nazareth to seek legitimization at the hands of those influential contemporaries whose knowledge of scripture could have been expected to be determinative.) Theologians' purposed reforms thus have their limits, defined by foundations of belief emerging from their own religion's character as a system. They may indeed alter forms of reverence or worship, and content of belief, or adopt them from other religions, so long as these alterations fit into their own system without friction. When, however, new intellectual approaches, or syncretistic adoption of foreign content of belief, change basic structures of their own system, then theological renewal transforms into → heresy, and is rejected.

History of the Concept

6. a) The word 'theology' appears for the first time with Plato (Politeia 379a), and denotes myths, which, to be sure, ought not to falsify the basic traits of the being of the gods. Here, the call for a rational, critical appraisal of myths is articulated, which was shortly to lead to a division between → myth and theology. Aristotle lists theology as a subdivision of metaphysics (sophía, philosophia prima [Gk., Lat., resp., 'wisdom,' and 'first philosophy'])[1] that is ordered to all reflection on the last things, including the being of the gods. In Hellenism and the time of the Roman Empire, 'theology' included not only the interpretation of the myths (ratio quae de diis explicatur—Lat., "reasonable element explained concerning the gods"), but also the teaching of the intercourse with the gods in ritus (Lat., 'rite') and cult. In ancient Christianity, the word was adopted by Origen (d. c. 254), but it was soon restricted: with Eusebius of Caesarea (d. c. 339), it again denoted only knowledge concerning the being of Christ, and the God of the Christians, and excluded all statements concerning pagan gods. This constraint also confined the concept of theología even more: now there was a distinction between the attempt to understand God himself, and the last principles, and on the other hand, oikonomía (Gk., 'economy'), which concerned itself with God's activity, especially his salvific activity, and his coming to human beings as human being and redeemer. Both were aspects of sacra scriptura and sacra doctrina. Only in the Middle Ages, through Abelard (1079–1142), were these two parts of divine doctrine once more joined in the concept of theology.

Theology and Philosophy

Other problems appeared in the relationship of theology and philosophy. From Boethius (480–525) to the heyday of scholasticism (eleventh to thirteenth centuries; → Aristotelianism), Aristotelian logic became an essential aid in theological intercourse with the content of faith. Granted, philosophy was still the 'handmaid of theology' (in Lat., ancilla theologiae), and thus subordinate both to God's revelation, and to the concept of unconditional faith. 'Pagan' philosophy, and with it, the claim of human reason (ratio) on autonomous knowledge, was not admitted, as shown by the Justinian's closing of the Platonic Academy and other places of learning of the ancient philosophy (525 CE).

b) A similar distinction between theology and philosophy, arisen from a situation of competition between the two, does not appear in other religions, such as in Buddhism, in the Hindu religions, and in the East Asian religions. Even in Islamic theology, Ilm al-kalan ('scholarship of disputation'), to an extent, it was overcome through an incorporation of basic disciplines of philosophy (epistemology, logic, etc.), and natural science (elements of nature, theory of motion, etc.). Islamic theology's research and investigations were directed to the 'foundations of religion' (usul ad-din).

Islamic Philosophy

Its formative period, the norm for modern Islamic theology, ended at the beginning of the twelfth century—shortly before the time of the climax of Christian scholasticism. The fruitful influence of Islamic sciences and scholarship on Christian scholastic theology, and the discovery by the West of other works of Aristotle, began with Avicenna (Ibn Sina, 980–1037) and Averroes (Ibn Rushd, 1126–1198). Finally, with the growing importance of theological university faculties, the concept of 'theology' expanded to embrace all subjects taught there and having a bearing on life, religious or social.

1. Aristotle, Metaphysics VI, 1 1026a19; XI, 8, 1064b3.

Literature

Di Berardino, Angelo et al. (eds.), History of Theology, Collegeville 1997ff.; Ford, David F. (ed.), The Modern Theologians: An Introduction to Christian Theology in the Twentieth Century, 2 vols., Oxford 1989; Hanson, Bradley C., Introduction to Christian Theology, Minneapolis 1997; Meyendorff, John, Byzantine Theology: Historical Trends and Doctrinal Themes, New York [2]1979; Roberts, J. Deotis, A Philosophical Introduction to Theology, London/Philadelphia 1991; Smith, William Cantwell, Towards a World Theology: Faith and the Comparative History of Religion, Philadelphia 1981; von Stietencron, Heinrich, Theologen und Theologien in verschiedenen Kulturkreisen, Düsseldorf 1986.

→ Academic Study of Religion, God/Gods/The Sacred, Liberation Theology, Meaning/Signification, Metaphysics, Myth/Mythology, Religion, Scholasticism, Spirituality

Heinrich von Stietencron

Theory of Evolution

The theory of evolution (from Lat., evolvere, 'turn out,' 'develop'), in the strict sense, means a series of biological concepts that gives a scientific explanation for the arrival of life and the development of species. It is common to these interpretations that they do not regard life as a divine and inalterable creation, but hold life forms to be the product of a progressive development (theory of derivation, origin of species). By the beginning of the nineteenth century, Jean-Baptiste de Lamarck (1744–1849) had already proposed, as an explanatory model, the notion that differentiated organs develop for the preservation and protection of their elementary needs, and that these purposeful self-adaptations to an environment could be inherited. Charles Darwin (1809–1882) ascribed evolution to a 'natural selection' of varying biological materials ('mutations') by coincidental, chance mutations. Current theories, on the other hand, such as represented by Manfred Eigen (b. 1927), shift evolution to the area of molecular biology.

The Christian side raised opposition to the theories of evolution, reproaching the scientific explanations with contradicting the biblical myth of creation. To this day, specific circles of Protestant fundamentalists in the United States assert the word-for-word validity of the myth of Genesis in the first Book of Moses, according to which God created the earth and living things in seven days, with the human being enjoying a unique position in creation. Thus, in the 1920s, some Southern states succeeded in legislating a prohibition of the teaching of the Darwinian theory in public schools (leading to a spectacular "Monkey Trial" of a teacher in Tennessee). The Catholic Church, in recent times, has given up this opposition. Evolution—according to an enunciation of John Paul II—may be interpreted of the expression of a creatio continua (Lat., 'continuous creation').

Literature

Darwin, Charles R., On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or The Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle of Life, London 1859; Di Gregorio, Mario A., From Here to Eternity: Ernst Haeckel and Scientific Faith, Göttingen 2005; Riedl, Rupert, Order in Living Organisms: A Systems Analysis of Evolution, London 1979; Wilson, David Sloan, Darwin's Cathedral: Evolution, Religion, and the Nature of Society, Chicago/London 2002.

→ Evolutionism, Fundamentalism, Natural Science, Origin, Progress, Science

Stefan Hartmann

Theosophical / Anthroposophical Society

1. The object of the following considerations will be not the older, Christian theosophy (Gr., theosophía, 'divine wisdom') of Jacob Böhme and others,[1] but that of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891). This, the most important neo-religious creation of the nineteenth century, ostensibly gathered Europe's various 'occult' traditions (Neoplatonism, → Gnosticism, → Kabbalah, → Hermeticism, the Rosicrucian teaching, → Freemasonry; → Esotericism) into an assembly also containing elements of extra-European religions (Coptic Christianity, → Sufism, → Zoroastrianism, → Hinduism, → Buddhism). The result was a supra-confessional, universalistic, 'primitive' and 'world' religion, intended as a contrast with the orthodoxies of Judaism and the Christian churches, along with 'materialistic' Darwinism. This formulation is what gained institutional housing in the Theosophical Society. Blavatsky presented a neo-gnostic conceptualization of the divine descendancy of the human being, its ever more significant submersion in matter and corporality, and its already accomplished introduction to new spiritualization and divinization (→ Gnosticism). Blavatsky also taught 'magical' practices, then, for the division of the astral body from the physical. The new inter-religious and intercultural Theosophy was of great importance as a transporter of syncretistic content like monism, holism (→ Wholeness/Holism), → reincarnation, and the notion of karma. Among Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, surrounded by the three 'Masters,' Koot Hoomi, Morya, and Prince Ragoczy. As 'spiritual supermen,' said to live on the 'roof of the world,' in Shigatse, in Tibet, they authoritatively legitimated Theosophy. The 'letters of the Masters' were its sacred scripture. The myth of the 'Masters' profited from the fact that the realm of the Dalai Lama had long since been closed, and thus surrounded with mystery—for instance, as late as Heinrich Harrer's Seven Years in Tibet! England and Russia sought to gain political influence over the country (British expedition of 1904), and Blavatsky was suspected of being an agent of Russia sometimes, of England at others.

the recipients of this content is the → New Age movement (the concept of a 'New Age' gained great popularity through Blavatsky's disciple Alice Ann Bailey, 1880–1949). As early as the death of the founder, and still more keenly afterwards, the Theosophical Society split into fractions, sometimes with a national stamp. One of them was the Anthroposophical Society, inspired by Rudolf Steiner (1832–1907) (see §3).

Madame Blavatsky and the Theosophical Society

2. After an adventurous life of spiritual quest, German Russian Noble Blavatsky, together with Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907), founded the Theosophical Society, a 'universal brotherhood of man' in New York in 1875. With her Isis Unveiled (1877), she moved away from an original foundation in → spiritism, and, as she traveled with Olcott to Bombay a year later, the turn eastward was intensified. She then filled out the Theosophical doctrine with concepts of Hinduism and Buddhism (cosmic cycles, reincarnation, karma). In India, she also connected with members of the indigenous elite (cf. her emphasis on a common 'Aryan' origin), for purposes of cultural and political renewal. In 1882, the Theosophical Society's headquarters were moved to Adyar near Madras. But in India the movement found its keenest crisis, with the publication of the Hodgson Report of the Society for Psychical Research in England: Blavatsky was accused of charlatanry.[2] In particular, her legitimating appeal to the secret 'Great White Brotherhood' of the 'Masters,' 'Adepts,' or 'Mahatmas,' enlightened 'world teachers' allegedly hiding in Tibet, and their "Mahatma Letters," were interpreted as Blavatsky's counterfeits. Only in recent times has K. Paul Johnson sought to offer evidence that, behind the 'Masters' were concealed real and sometimes politically influential persons—including well-known Hindu and Sikh leaders—who were important for Blavatsky's spiritual development and political strivings. Blavatsky's most productive literary period began with her final return to Europe in 1885, as she published in London her multi-volume Secret Doctrine: The Syntheses of Science, Religion, and Philosophy (vols. 1, 2 in 1888; vol. 3 posthumously, in 1897). In this work she created a new mythical, poetical 'genesis,' (cosmogony and anthropogony), entwining Eastern thought with Western concepts typical of her time—especially with evolution, progress, and racial doctrine—and connected them with her claim to a scientifically based religion.

Crisis and Division

After Blavatsky's demise, not only did the unity of the Theosophical Society break apart once and for all, but the First World War occasioned the collapse of its international order: the Adyar organization, with its many members in Australia and New Zealand, openly took sides with the Western powers against Germany, and appealed to the British Empire as the model for the coming 'world commonwealth.' Another conflict was sparked by the announcement, shortly after the turn of the century, of the return of a 'World Teacher': Lord Maitreya and Christ in the person of Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986). The proclamation of this global savior was propagated by the Adyar Society, under Annie Besant (1847–1933) and Charles Webster Leadbeater (1847–1934), by way of the Order of the Star in the East.

Independence for Anthroposophy

3. These conflicts within the Theosophical Society led to institutional independence for Theosophy in Germany. The split began with Franz Hartmann (1838–1912), reaching its climax when Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925) stepped down as Secretary General of the German Section of the Theosophical Society, an office which he had held since 1902, and created (1912/13) an independent Anthroposophical Society. Steiner's motivation, besides personal competition, was his anti-Eastern position. Steiner rejected the notion of Krishnamurti's election, strengthening instead his appeal to Rosicrucianism and esoteric 'Christosophy,' with a central event in the 'mystery of Golgotha.' Steiner's cosmic message of salvation, his Geisteswissenschaft, on the other hand, stems from Theosophy, just as does his vision of a future spiritual superman bound up with racial notions ("From Homo sapiens to Homo divinus"), or his doctrine of karma and reincarnation.

At first, the world center of Anthroposophy's strivings was to be Munich's artistic and cultural quarter Schwabing, with parallels, in its intended religious practice, to Richard Wagner's Bühnenweihefestspiele (Ger., 'stage dedication plays') held in Bayreuth. The offer of a tract of land in Dornach, near Basle, definitively determined on the construction, beginning in 1913, of the new sacred place on the 'hill'—a 'karmic selection,' as well, since it turned out to be a politically and economically advantageous location through two World Wars.

Religious Praxis and Membership

4. Common to both Theosophy and Anthroposophy is the eventual formation of 'Churches' orientated to worship and liturgy (Liberal-katholische Kirche, 'Liberal Catholic Church,' 1916), or Christengemeinschaft ('Community of Christians,' 1922), as well as the success among the nobility of their anti-egalitarian, hierarchical image of the world and persons, and among the upper-middle class of a message of self-redemption through self-rearing and self-education. Now Steiner attempted a social 'tripartition,' which he developed, from 1917 on, under the influence of a presumably lost war, and through which he wished to draw the working class into the societal model of a class state. He found, however, no response from these addressees. With Steiner, Blavatsky's anti-Darwinism (aimed, among others, at Ernst Haeckel), issued in a 'Goetheanism'—a variant of the cult of Goethe that appealed to, in particular, Goethe's scientific writings, concluding to the epistemological path of an intuitive 'gaze,' as well as to a spiritual formulation of nature. Steiner's sacred edifice, the Goetheanum in Dornach, was dedicated to the concept of the 'metamorphosis.'

Goetheanism

By contrast with Theosophy, Anthroposophy developed a decided trait of the reform of life. Steiner's Geisteswissenschaft not only sought to point to a goal of interiority, but strove for the transformation of the world through practical work on that world. An implementation of (conducted by, and on the principles of) Anthroposophy preserves not only the heritage of the reform movements of c. 1900 (→ Ascona/Monte Verità), but configures a considerable part of Anthroposophy's attraction the world over: sacred architecture ('temple building'; cf. first and second "Goetheana") and 'mystery dramas,' reform schools ("Waldorf Pedagogy"), and 'biologically dynamic' agriculture (Demeter Reform products), holistic medicine, health and body-care means (Weleda products), as well as the translation of the expressive dance of the turn of the century into a pedagogical and therapeutic means ('eurhythmia') all embody this kind of successful project. On the other hand, certain projects failed after the First World War: the alternative economic projects Der Kommende Tag (Ger., "The Coming Day"), and Futurum A.G. From the Protestant youth movement, finally, emerged the inspiration for the founding of the Christ Community (1922), with the aim, fostered by Steiner's Catholic heritage, of a Christian renewal through worship and sacrament.

Content in Terms of Political Ideology

5. The political contents of Theosophy and Anthroposophy have attracted particular interest, and are likewise devalued as 'undemocratic' and 'racist,' like the impulse expressed in völkisch nativism, especially the Celtic and Neo-Teutonism.[3] It is true that Blavatsky and her followers (including Steiner) had proclaimed an unequivocally racial concept, in the sense of a 'cosmological evolution,' nor were anti-Semitic tones lacking. However, Theosophy possessed a strong liberal, internationalistic, and thus

'Enlightenment,' counterbalance, and only the particular Austrian/German development of the 'Ariosophy' of a Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels (1874–1954) could absolutize the 'occult,' 'karmic,' racial doctrine of Theosophy/Anthroposophy in the sense of a racial biologism.

External Effects

Just as with their predecessor, the spiritistic movement (→ Spiritism), one of the most important external effects of Theosophy and Anthroposophy has always lain in their fertilizing influence effect on modern art, to which, with its 'fantastic science,' it opened new 'invisible worlds.' Stimulated by Richard Wagner's project of a 'holistic work of art' (Gesamtkunstwerk), Steiner promoted the bonding of elements of architecture, sculpture, painting, dancing, and vocal presentation in a liturgical and sacred framework. Not only did the Theosophical and Anthrosophical revelation of the 'supra-sensory' inspire important artists of classical modernity, such as Wassily Kandinsky (Über das Geistige in der Kunst—Ger., "The Spiritual Element in Art"; 1912), or Piet Mondrian; its effect ranges all the way to Anthroposophically-based concepts of the 'social plastic' in Joseph Beuys. More recently, new fields of influence have opened to Anthroposophy, for instance in the area of ecological construction, or state-free schooling, which have found new addressees in the alternative/ecological movement since the 1970s.

Theosophy and Anthroposophy Today

6. The various Theosophical Societies today, as well as the Anthroposophical Societies, are active worldwide, even on the Internet. Their geographical distribution is historically conditioned. Theosophy has its center of gravity in the Anglo-American world (especially in the United States and Australia), and in the lands that it has particularly influenced. Anthroposophy flourishes especially in German-speaking countries. The Adyar Theosophical Society, for example, stresses the ecological, and socio-political dimension of its message (combat against war, overpopulation, exploitation). Anthroposophy, meanwhile, offers not only its theoretical responses to the spiritual crisis of the present, and to the many questions of our contemporaries that are concerned with living, but also, and especially, to its practical proposals, which range from recreational activities to care of the mentally and physically challenged.

1. Cf. the title of the 1730 edition of the complete works of Jacob Böhme, Theosophia Revelata (Lat., "Theosophy Revealed").
2. Report of the Committee Appointed to Investigate Phenomena Connected with the Theosophical Society (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 3), London 1885.
3. Antroposofie en het vraagstuk van de rassen: Eindrapport van de commissie Antroposofie en het vraagstuk van de rassen, Zeist 2000. Cf. Zander, Helmut, "Sozialdarwinistische Rassentheorien aus dem okkultem Untergrund des Kaiserreiches," in Puschner, Uwe et al., Handbuch zur "Völkischen Bewegung" 1871–1918, Munich 1996, 224-251.

Literature

1. Theosophical Society
Sources: Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna, Collected Writings, 14 vols., Wheaton 1966–1985; Gomes, Michael, Theosophy in the Nineteenth Century: An Annotated Bibliography, New York 1994.

Secondary Literature: Caldwell, Daniel (ed.), The Esoteric World of Madame Blavatsky, Wheaton 2000; Campbell, Bruce F., Ancient Wisdom Revived: A History of the Theosophical Movement, Berkeley 1980; Cranston, Sylvia, The Extraordinary Life & Influence of Helena Blavatsky, Founder of the Modern Theosophical Movement, New York 1993; Godwin, Joscelyn, The Theosophical Enlightenment, New York 1994; Gomes, Michael, The Dawning of the Theosophical Movement, Wheaton 1987; Johnson, Paul K., The Masters Revealed: Madame Blavatsky and the Myth of the Great White Lodge, Albany 1994; Idem, Initiates of the Theosophical Masters, Albany 1995; Meade, Marion, Madame Blavatsky: The Woman behind the Myth, New York 1980; Möller, Helmut/Howe, Ellic, Merlin Peregrinus. Vom Untergrund des Abendlandes, Würzburg 1986; Taylor, Anne, Annie Besant: A Biography, Oxford 1992.

2. Anthroposophical Society
Sources: Deimann, Götz et al. (eds.), Die anthroposophischen Zeitschriften von 1903 bis 1985. Bibliographie und Lebensbilder, Heidelberg 1987; Steiner, Rudolf, Gesamtausgabe, Dornach 1955/56ff.; Wagner, Arfst, Dokumente und Briefe zur Geschichte der anthroposophischen Bewegung und Gesellschaft in der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus, 5 vols., Rendsburg 1991–1993.

Secondary Literature: Ahern, Geoffrey, Sun at Midight: The Rudolf Steiner Movement and the Western Esoteric Tradition, Wellingborough 1984; Klatt, Norbert, Theosophie und Anthroposophie. Neue Aspekte zu ihrer Geschichte, Göttingen 1993; Lamprecht, Harald, Neue Rosenkreuzer. Ein Handbuch, Göttingen 2004, 191-205; Leijenhorst, Cees, "Anthroposophy," in: Hanegraaff, Wouter J. et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, Leiden 2005, 82-89; Lindenberg, Christoph, Rudolf Steiner. Eine Biographie, Stuttgart 1997.

→ Esotericism, Gnosticism, New Age, Occultism, Orientalism/Exoticsm, Paganism/Neopaganism, Spiritism

Ulrich Linse

Tibet

1. With its extreme climatic conditions, the highland of Tibet is only sparsely populated. Few live here other than cattle-raising nomads. Soil is farmed until an altitude of 4,000 m. The center of gravity of settlement and agricultural geography lies in the Tsangpo Valley. Politically, today, what exists is the 'Autonomous Region of Tibet,' established in 1965 in the People's Republic of China. Parts of the region that had stood under the regime in Lhasa were annexed to Chinese provinces after the incursion of Chinese troops.

Popular Religion

2. In Tibetan popular religion, the objects of worship are regional and local supernatural beings, who dwell, for example, in mountains and stones, trees, rivers, lakes, soil, and the air. For the assurance of material well-being, and in order to ward off dangers, Tibetans ascertain the spirits' influence by → prophecy, and render them benevolent in rituals and sacrifices.

Buddhism

Buddhism was brought to Tibet in two phases—in the seventh to the ninth centuries, and again from the end of the tenth century—and made its way on a broader basis. On the basis of the teachings of Mahayana and the → Tantras, schools of an independent Tibetan Buddhism developed, each with its respective particular doctrinal traditions, philosophical systems, practices of meditation, and monasteries. As a result of cultural exchange, the southern regions of the Himalayas, broad parts of Central Asia, and the regions of the Mongols, all exhibit noteworthy Mongolian qualities. Tibet's form of government after the second unfolding of Buddhism can be called theocratic, inasmuch as, along with the landed proprietors, it was monastic hierarchies that exercised political power (→ Lamaism; Theocracy). Beginning in the seventeenth century, the monk who held the highest position of the Gelugpa, the → Dalai Lama, was also regarded as the country's political sovereign (although with varying actual political authority).

Bön

Islam and the Bön religion are important minority religions in today's Tibet. Followers of the latter are called Bönpo. In pre-Buddhist times, Bönpo were religious specialists entrusted with caring for the dead in the world to come, through sacrifices, as well as with the state cult. Today, Bönpo designates the followers of a religion that, in parallel with Buddhism, has developed its own philosophy and monastic system. With regard to the central teachings of karma, rebirth, and redemption, the Bönpo are in agreement with the Buddhists. Their sacred texts are partially identical with those of the Buddhists, but apply their own terminology, and are considered to be the teaching of their (not historically identifiable) founding personage, Dönpa Shenrap.

Religious Practice

Both Tibetan Buddhism and Bön have adopted or accepted practices of folk religion. Thus, partially reinterpreted figures of popular religion have been incorporated into the Buddhist pantheon. The divine worlds of the Tibetan Buddhists and the Bönpo are nominally and iconographically distinct, however. Members of religious orders in either religion can be active as ritual specialists, devote themselves to intellectual schooling and the art of debate, and practice exercises of meditation (→ Monasticism). Characteristic of the religious practice of Tibetan laity is the recitation of salvific syllables and expressions (→ Mantra), which they also activate by way of prayer wheels and banners (→ Prayer/Curse). Pilgrimages and the ritual circling of stupas—clockwise by Buddhists clockwise, and counterclockwise by Bönpos—are regarded as meritorious.

Fantasies and Projections

Until well into the twentieth century, Europeans visited this 'land on the roof of the world' only extremely rarely, due to its geographical and political inaccessibility, and the Tibetan government reacted with great disapproval to a colonizing European presence in Asia. In the service of religious and ideological controversies in Europe and North America, Tibet became the place of fantasies both positive and negative. It was then a timeless, concealed garden of wisdom and spirituality, or an example of dark despotism and prison of superstition, or a 'degeneration' of Buddhism. The perception of ancient Tibet was occasionally overlaid with the Tibetan myth of that realm of paradise and peace, Shambhala, visualized as an accessible utopia, and premise of clarity of consciousness, to be attained along the path of the spirit. Even the fictitious, hidden valley of Shangri-La, on which James Hilton's fantasy novel Lost Horizon (1933) was founded, now became a long-lived premise for mystifying images of Tibet. The tendency to posit Tibet as an idealized counter-image of one's own experiential world all too often distracts one's view from the real concerns of Tibet and Tibetan religion, even today.

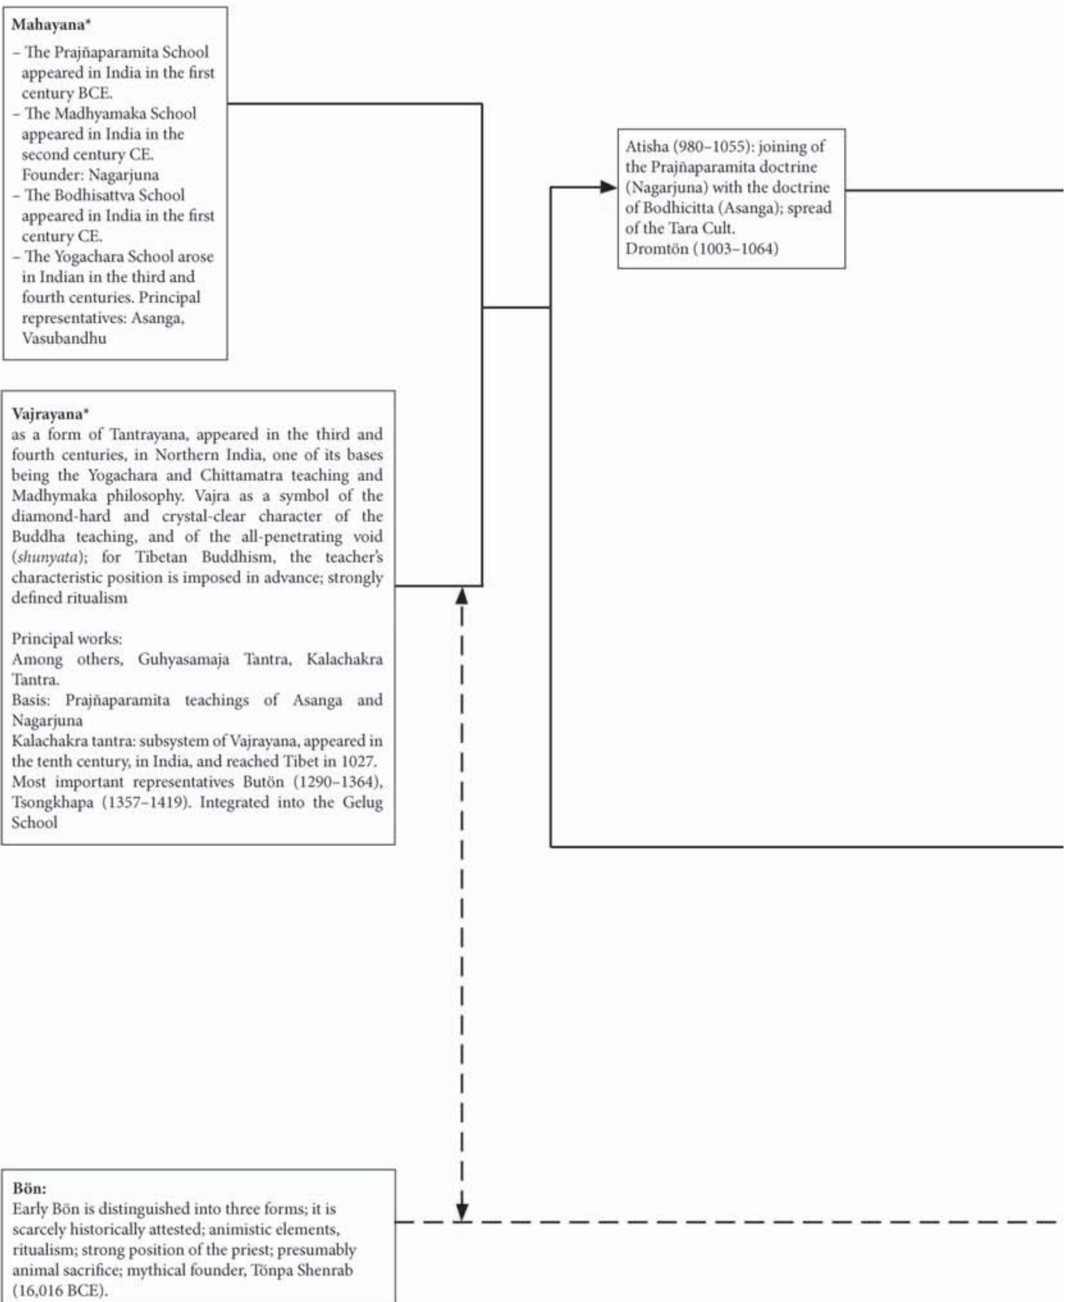
Present Situation

Tibet today is also home to a sizeable number of Chinese immigrants, invited by Beijing in its resettlement policy. The devastation in the wake of the invasion and the Cultural Revolution, created a wave of refugees beginning in 1959, that carried along with it many representatives of the clergy, abandoning their country, whose situation with regard to religion was bleak indeed. Numerous monks and nuns found themselves in political imprisonment, as they had played an important role in the resistance against the Chinese government. Some religious were able to return to the monastery, but access to religious training in Tibet is all but nonexistent. In exile, Tibetan Buddhists, and, to a lesser extent, Bönpo, have built a network of institutions, in order further to hand on the religious culture of Tibet to Tibetans and non-Tibetans alike.



Literature

Baumer, Christoph, Tibet's Ancient Religion Bön, Trumbull/Bangkok 2002; Bechert, Heinz/Gombrich, Richard (eds.), The World of Buddhism: Buddhist Monks and Nuns in Society and Culture, London 1984; Hoffmann, Helmut, The Religions of Tibet, Westport 1979 (Ger. [1]1956); Kvaerne, Per, The Bon Religion of Tibet: The Iconography of a Living Tradition, London 1995; Lopez, Donald S., Prisoners of Shangri-La: Tibetan Buddhism and the West, Chicago 1998; Powers, John, Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism, Ithaca 1995; Idem, History as Propaganda: Tibetan Exiles Versus the People's Republic of China, New York 2004.

→ Buddhism, China/Japan/Korea, Dalai Lama, Lamaism, Reception, Reincarnation, Silk Route, Tantra II, Theocracy

Kirsten Holzapfel

Lines of Tradition in Tibetan Buddhism

* The difference between Mahayana and Vajrayana lies to an extent in the conception of whether enlightenment is possible in a single life. Mahayana accepts this premise, Vajrayana holds it as possible only under certain conditions and extreme discipline with an appropriate teacher. But the shorter the path to enlightenment, that is, to the end of the rebirths, the more complex the doctrine. This practically leads to restrictions, since very few are in a position to arrive at this understanding. Interestingly, Western Buddhists feel especially attracted to precisely this form of Buddhism—in spite of the fact that it adopts an extreme attitude toward the overcoming of the ego, in contradiction to individualistic concepts of the West.

Kadampa:
lit., 'oral instruction'
Founded by Atisha, pupil of Dromtön
Concern is the establishment of Buddhism in Tibet on the basis of a systematic schooling and discipline of the monks.
Textual study, meditation techniques, for the cleansing of the spirit. Bodhisattva ideal Galugpa:
lit., 'School of the Virtuous,' last school of Tibetan Buddhism.
Succession of the Kadampa; founded by Tsongkhapa; Mahayana texts as basis, emphasis on the Vinaya Rules, Madhyamaka School (Nagarjuna), emphasis on study of the texts.
Divided founding of monasteries: 1409 Ganden 1416 Drepung, 1419 Sera.
New head covering: yellow instead of red (Concept of yellow/red caps felt as pejorative.)
Centers in the West:
Monastic Institute of Rikon, in Switzerland;
Buddhist Center in Hamburg
Kagyüpa:
lit., 'school of oral instruction,' uninterrupted transmission is of central meaning and importance.
Line of transmission from Tilopa to Naropa, to Marpa, Milarepa, and Gampopa. Gampopa's pupils found the Kagyü Schools.
Principal works include:
Mahamudra, Six Teachings of Naropa.
Karma Kagyü:
Founded by Düsum Khyenpa (1110–1193)
Principal monastery:Tshurphu (founded 1185)
Karmapa incarnation-line (distinction between black-hatted Karmapa and red-hatted Sharmapa); at the moment, two Karmapas: Ugyen Thinley, Thaye Dorje
Today's Center:
Rumtek/Sikkim;
Centers in the West:
Lama Ole Nydahl is the Karma Kagyü Umbrella Organization;
Chogyam Trungpa founded the Vajradhatu School in 1973; Samye Ling Monastery in Scotland (founded 1967)
Drukpa-Kagyü:
Founded by Tsangpa Gyare Yeshe Dorje (1161–1211)
Principal monastery: Ralung (founded 1180);
From the thirteenth century, spread in Bhutan.
Since 17th century, under Shabdrung Ngawang Namgyal state religion of Bhutan;
Bhutan is Drukyul, i.e. Land of the Druk School
Drikung Kagyü:
Jigten Gönpo (1143–1217) founded the principal monastery, Drikung Thil; monasteries Lamayuru and Phiyang in Ladakh belong to the Drikung Kagyü School
Sakyapa:
Named for the principal monastery founded in 1073 by Drogmi (992–1072?)
In the thirteenth century, under Sakya Pandita and Phagpa, the Sakyapa reach political preeminence in Tibet, establish the basis of the later forms of monastic rule.
Teachers in the West Today:
Sherab Gyaltsen Amipa (b. 1931) lives in the Rikon Institute, Switzerland
Nyingmapa:
lit., 'School of the Elders,' meaning tantras that are regarded as a non-canonical textual corpus.
This school, going back to Padmasambhava, was established in the eleventh century.
Peculiarity:
Terma texts, i.e. treasure texts, composed by Padmasambhava.
Best known: Bardo Thödol ("Deliverance by Hearing in the Intermediate Condition").
Generally regarded as the Tibetan Book of the Dead.
Principal teaching: Dzogchen (Great Completion/Perfection)
Teacher in the West:
Sogyal Rimpoche, Rigpa Union
Rime Movement:
Mainly a syncretistic school of Tibetan Buddhism. Carried by Nyingmapa
Beginning in the eastern region in the nineteenth century, would like to formulate a doctrine based on all Tibetan schools.
Founded by Sakya teacher Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo (1820–1892).
Celebrated representative: Jamgon Kongtrul (1811–1899).
New Bön:
established at the same time as the Buddhist schools; many parallels with the Nyingma School; in the fifteenth century, a renewal takes place, simultaneously with the founding of the Gelugpa. Principal monastery: Menri, founded 1405. Founder and first abbot: Shenrab Gyaltsen (1356–1415). Beginning in 1834, headquarters of the school is Yungdrungling. In 1977, the Dalai Lama recognizes the New Bön school as the fifth school of Tibetan Buddhism.
New Menri Dolanji Monastery at Dharamsala, founded 1967 by Tenzin Namdale
Diaspora Centers

Tibetan Buddhist Lines of Tradition: Explanation of the Schema

Between the eleventh and the fourteenth centuries, Buddhism was definitively established in Tibet. This involved the formation of the Buddhist traditions of the Kadam-pa, Kaglyü-pa, Sakya-pa, Nyingma-pa, and Gelug-pa, all of which retain some relevance today.

a) The founding of the Kadam-pa, the 'school of oral instruction,' is ascribed to Atisha and his disciple Dromtön (1003–1064). This school was reformed, in the fourteenth century, by Tsongkhapa, and was absorbed by the Gelug school, founded by him. Atisha, in Tibet, introduced the veneration of bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara (Chenrezig), as well as the Tara cult, and established the Bodhisattva Way as a method for the realization of enlightenment. The altruistic virtues of compassion, and all-embracing love, are central for this Way. Also of great importance and meaning is observance of the Rules of the Order. Monks live in celibacy. Study and meditation count a great deal.

b) The founding of Kagyü-pa, 'School of the Transmitted Commandments,' goes back to tantra master Milarepa (1052–1135), doubtless the most famous saint of Tibet and a disciple of Marpa. Characteristic of the Kagyü tradition is the doctrine of the mahamudra, the 'Great Seal.' The most important exercise is the meditation called the 'restful lingering,' that is to lead to the knowledge of shunyata, the all-penetrating 'emptiness.' The interiorization of the 'four noble truths' and the spiritual cleansing of body and soul prepare the practitioner for the knowledge of the absolute vacuity of all phenomena. The Kagüpa have their ancestral seat in the monastery of Tshurphu, founded in 1189.

c) The Sakya school of Tibetan Buddhism is named for its principal monastery, Sakya, founded in 1073. The monks of this tradition are subject neither to celibacy nor to an obligation of residence in a monastery. Meditations, especially on transiency, the realization of all-penetrating compassion, as well as indifference and the knowledge of shunyata, belong to the core points of this school. In the thirteenth century, the Sakyapa reached the high point of their political power, after the Mongol ruler Godan had installed the abbot Sakya Pandita (1182–1251) as regent of Tibet. Investiture with economic and legal privileges formed the basis of the monastery's political power. Until the overthrow of the Mongol rulers in China in 1368, the political unification of Tibet prevailed under the rule of the Sakyapa.

d) In their doctrinal structure, the Nyingma-pa, the 'School of the Elders,' are descended from Padmasambhava, and represent the first expansion of Buddhism in Tibet. But they formed as an independent and closed tradition within Tibetan Buddhism only in the wake of the formation of the other schools. In Padmasambhava, its followers see an incarnation of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of infinite compassion. The Nyingma-pa stress that the relationship between teacher and disciple is of key importance for the upholding of the chain of tradition, and for the guarantee of the authenticity of teaching. In this connection, the Terma texts play an important role—religious texts hidden in secret places, to be discovered at a given time by suitable persons and made accessible. A famous example of these treasure-texts is the "Tibetan Book of the Dead," the Bardo-Thödol.

e) Tsongkhapa (1357–1419), the great restorer of Tibet's clerical structure, belonged at first to the Kadam line of tradition, but then founded the School of the Gelug-pa, the 'virtuous,' by renewing the discipline of the order. He integrated the teaching of Indian scholars Nagarjuna and Asanga into his Way: that of the 'steps to enlightenment' (lamrim). The point of departure for this doctrine is that human existence is the favorable form of being for the attainment of enlightenment. The exercises of the Way of the Steps include both corporeal and meditative schooling, and join body, speech, and mind to the process of redemption. For this school, as well, the proper goal is the redemption not of the individual, but of all living beings.

Tsongkhapa introduced the Monlam Chenmo, the great prayer festival, in the first month of the Tibetan calendar. Symbolically, this feast represents Tibet's symbolic surrender to Buddhism. Tsongkhapa initiated numerous monastic foundations, including Ganden (1409), Drepung (1416), and Sera (1418). With his disciple Gendün Drub, superior of the Gelug-pa and founder of the monastery of Tashilhunpo, began the chain of reincarnations at whose end, for the time being, stands the fourteenth Dalai Lama. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, with the support of the Mongol khan, the Gelug-pa established not only their spiritual, but also their political predominance in Tibet. Altan Khan, converted to Buddhism by Sonam Gyatso, emerged as patronal lord of the Gelug-pa, and in 1578, conferred on its superior the title of Dalai Lama ('Ocean of Wisdom'). The fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Lobsang Gyatso, extended the political power of the Gelug-pa throughout Tibet. At the same time, he ended the power of the other schools of Tibetan Buddhism, but not without extensive integration of their teachings into the doctrinal structure of the Gelug-pa.

f) Today, a distinction is made between the older forms of the Bön religion and the tradition of the New Bön, which was established, in the eleventh century, in parallel with the founding of the Buddhist Order. To this day, little is known of the origin or content of the archaic Bön. The reputed founder of the Bön religion is called Tönpa Shenrab, whose birth is dated in the mythic year of 16016 BCE. The school of the New Bön evinces many parallels to the Nyingma tradition of Tibetan Buddhism. In the fifteenth century CE, the New Bön executed a kind of restructuring of the organization of the Order. The founder and first abbot of the Menri monastery (founded 1405) was Shenrab Gyaltsen, Tsongkhapa's contemporary. In 1834, the center of the Bön School moved to the newly founded monastery of Yungdrungling. The abbot there is the elected superior of the Bön-pa.

g) After the flight (1959) of the fourteenth Dalai Lama, many Tibetans left their homeland, including many high 'clergy,' to settle in exile in India, Europe, or the United States. By way of their new centers, founded there, Tibetan Buddhism is becoming known in the West. With the wave of support for Tibetans' political concerns, interest in the Tibetan form of Buddhism has increased as well. Recognized teachers such as Chögyam Trungpa (Karma-Kagyü; 1939–1987), Sogyal Rimpoche (Nyingma; founder of the syncretistic Rigpa Union), Dudjom Rimpoche (Nyingma; 1904–1987), or Namkhai Norbu (Nyingma; Rime movement; born 1938), have founded Buddhist schools, and created learning traditions, that seek to develop a form of Vajrayana Buddhism tailored to Western conditions. Western teachers also follow the Tibetan tradition, and themselves found centers (in which doctrinal authenticity is not always preserved, however). The Hamburg Buddhist Center, under the leadership of Geshe Thubten Ngawang (b. 1931), as well as the Monastic Tibet Institute, under Geshe Ugyen Phulotshang (b. 1914), in Rikon, near Zurich (founded 1968), are two of the important Gelug monasteries in Europe.

Stephanie Lovász

Time

A Primary Category

1. Like space, time belongs to the primary categories of human perception and human construction of the world. There is no priority between the two. Time is repeatedly described in metaphors of space (length of time, axis of time), concrete space, at the same time by movements, and therefore by time (three-day trip, or three light-years away). Time appears as a fixed property of the world—unchangeable, encompassing, and subjecting everything to temporalization. Acts and events can be described as occurring 'before' or 'after,' and thus ascribe → meaning to fortuitous co-incidences; post hoc, ergo propter hoc (Lat. "After this, therefore because of this"). Particular experiences and the social construction of time emerge in truly manifold guise: duration is experienced differently from the succession of a series, and concentration on the present is distinct from the fixation of a point in time, which slips out of the future, through the present, into the past. The same unit of time can be perceived as different periods, the same rhythms as distinct tempi. Although theoretical approaches exist that assume different forms of time, it seems more sensible to start from a unitary concept of time, and precisely thus to attempt to describe the different time forms as individual, area-specific, or cultural differences.

The Social Character of Time

2. Time is fundamentally socially structured time. Even where it is experienced as abstract physical (chronographs), or concrete natural (phases of the moon, 'day' from sunrise to sunset) time, the latter is always a matter of historically emerging symbolic structures of meaning. This contingency is concealed by the metaphors of 'measurement': one proceeds from the fiction that what is (ever more precisely) determined is only that which is naturally given. The successive refinements of the measurement of time make possible a precise determination of the internal concatenation of the acts of all persons and things involved, but make the 'time-screen' that much less available to individuals or groups.

The assumption of a social construction of time does not militate against the existence of certain constants in the human, or even animal, perception of time, as indicated by psychological or chrono-biological investigation: the minimal duration of perceptible stimuli ('absolute time-threshold'), as well as the minimal interval of stimuli whose sequence is correctly determined ('judgment of succession'), both in the range of milliseconds; the period still perceived precisely as a unitary moment ('present time'), in the range of a few seconds; finally, physiological phases repeated, for example, every twenty-four hours ('circadian'). An absolute 'biological clock' that uses the counting-off of regular neuronal occurrences as absolute standard of the sensation of duration (and of the control of biorhythms), has not been identified. On the other hand, 'free-running' rhythms are characteristic, as, for example, the average twenty-five-hour (with a large margin of variability) human rhythm of waking and sleeping. (By way of signals natural and social—sun, alarm clock—this rhythm is then coordinated with social time, ultimately to reveal its periodicity only in sleep-experimentation.) Social time may succeed in supplying life with a rhythm, however imperfect that success: the night manager is an individual deviant, yet even different groups may use different social time-rhythms in the same world of living. For example, Jews in the Roman Empire had to be allowed special rules when donations of wheat fell on Sabbath. The orienting capacity of societal constructions of time is not to be underestimated, however. Linguistic metaphors make time into a grammatical subject ("It's time," "The time is coming," "Time heals all wounds"). They also ascribe 'dominion' over time to high gods—indeed, identify time with the divine—which indicates the perceived dominion of time itself. Indeed, time flows so inexorably that, precisely because it does, it can appear as a severe God. Only highest gods can, by way of exception, interrupt the normal course of time or promise it as time 'devoutly to be wished,' outside (before, after, beyond) our world of experience, as a state of salvation (→ Eternity; Immortality).

The Time of the World: Cosmos and History

3. World time: The multiplicity of the constructions of time, of such varying breadths, can be ordered to two poles. The first deals with constructions of time that embrace 'the whole' of → history, and seek the boundaries of time. The second concerns time-constructions that serve the coordination of activity in the social setting.

a) Cosmological time maintains the possibility of fundamental changes. The world was not as it is, nor as it is will it be. The questions arising with time-models of this particular breadth reach to a beginning (cosmogony) and end (eschatology, → End/Eschaton). Accordingly, these questions also regard whether time exists beyond these temporal limits, what meaning the time in between has, such as → progress, → teleology, or decadence, and whether, within this horizon, time runs continuously or leaps. Under the scholarly cloak of complicated calculations and epochs of inconceivable length, the → specialists in cosmological time practice a critique of the present and a prognosis of the future: for example, "The 'Golden Age' lies behind us and before. Knowledge thereof is secret, and a mystery." Thus the unproductive 'work' of the knowing is legitimated.

Linear/Cyclical

b) From the viewpoint of the history of religion, an interesting observation is to be made in this discourse, and in its systematization of cultural history. Images of 'foreign' conceptualizations of time, generated by a nimble selection of sources, themselves serve polemical goals. An opposition has been posited between (1) the linear conception of time, of the Judeo-Christian tradition, with its direction toward progress and thereby, ultimately modernity, and (2) a cyclical conception of a time ever and again returning to its 'origin,' and thereby ultimately emptying history and the effort of historical act of all value. The latter conception of development can be seen to be one hostile to history, and shaped by antiquity (and present also in the European Renaissance), such as by the culture of India. Nietzsche sketched out this opposition polemically, against a bourgeois Christian notion of progress. Thus, in this sketch, he appeals to antiquity. The opposition becomes a commonplace of anthropology and cultural comparison, praising the primitive and the original, and reviling the modern, as in the work of scholar of religion Mircea → Eliade. Now the antinomy is the prisoner of asymmetrical description. There are recurring routines and rhythms, from time-constructions of recent social history, which are under obligation to attempt to reproduce any current society. These routines and rhythms return even in the 'leveled-out' societies of the cosmological time-models, in the long-term perspectives entertained by these latter. Here as well, they are invested with the constraint to reproduce their respective societies. On the other hand, periodical elements of cosmological sketches are frequently plucked from complex contexts: the ancient Stoic notion that the world 'burns up' at regular intervals (ekpyrosis) and emerges anew, does not rule out the possibility that, within a world age, progress appears (the world can grow better and older). Neither does it mean the return of the same, if time is seen as repetition of worsening world ages. If time continues 'running' as the world repeatedly ends, then a mere position in time guarantees an adequate difference between world ages.

God's Timelessness and Human Time

c) A question repeatedly arising in cosmological sketches of time is the problem of the beginning of time, or: Before the beginning, was there nothing ('creation out of nothing')? If God is continuously timeless, and releases human beings into materially determined time, then creation turns out to be a state of deficiency, which is possibly transitory, and can be defeated by leaps between the levels. The possibility of divine prescience arises, just as does the coordination of individual (over the course of history) and collective eschatological time. The latter then includes the 'before' of the departed as well. Contrariwise, Hindu and Buddhist concepts, which lay stress on individual suffering in temporality, usually reject the notion of a ('secondary') beginning of time.

d) For the development of the conceptualization of time in Europe, the relatively brief chronology of world history became important. The latter was developed in ancient Christian historiography, from the third century onward, and adopted the six (thousand-year) days of the world—that rest on Jewish speculations on the chronology of world history—before God and his people can celebrate the world Sabbath. Competing chronologies and doctrines of the world ages (such as the saecula of the Etruscans and the Romans), likewise produce a brief chronology—perhaps typical of city-states' limited universalistic need for legitimization. Here is a picture altogether opposite from that of the tremendous numbers of the Indian cycles that leave room for highly complicated sequences of rebirths (→ Reincarnation). This sort of short projection screen managed to deliver simpler stopping places for movements of a millenarian character. It must be emphasized, however: → Millenarianism does not stop at an even thousand, and still less for a hundredth anniversary, but, instead, designates the present as the immediate prelude to the eschaton ("It's five to twelve"). The radical New Time can produce the New Person. Cosmological time, then, no longer offers a (remote) horizon of the justification of everyday constructions of time, but legitimizes their radical critique. Thus it is not so much a question of consolidating trans-cultural differences in the identification of fundamentally diverse models of time. Instead, it is a matter of the 'historicizing' question of the presence and function of determinate cosmological conceptualizations of time, in their respective 'presents.'

Conceptualizations of Time in the Social Environment

4. Current time and calendar: Time is doubtless the most important tool of coordination in the social environment. Pocket calendars, watches, travel plans, office plans, and time plans determine the daily life of industrialized societies. Clocks are visible everywhere, and even children have to know how to read them. The coordinating service of these tools is a double one, then: they concentrate persons in the same place, or at least in the same activity, or else they divide them up, in order to avoid lumping and queuing. Again, 'time slips' allow work time to be calculated, unless it is not the same for everyone in a group. Independently of societal distribution and technical precision, clocks and → calendars are instruments for drawing up records and schedules. Thereby they offer orientation for activities. Even if the year is marked by an abundance of annual (or even more frequent) events, it thereby offers few points of reference that are unambiguous and foreseeable. Only societal convention creates a sufficient number of this sort of points of relation for the structuring of the activity of the entire society, or of individual segments.

Week and Month

a) The week and the month are among the most effective constructions of time. Weeks usually run from four to ten days, and are structured by boundary days. Regionally: the local border days are preferably scheduled on different days, and thereby coordinated. Weeks themselves permit a comparatively high frequency of common activity outside the family. The importance that the weekly assembly of religious communities has gained, in post-classical Judaism, in Christianity, and then in Islam, is altogether atypical, and a theoretical norm rather than a social reality even for the religions cited (→ Sunday/Sabbath). Nevertheless, alternatives were unsuccessful, such as Stalin's short-lived five-day week in the 1930s—offering, as it did, no common weekly holiday, and merely retaining individual days of rest. By way of complement, a monthly rhythm enters the scene, especially where weeks run unevenly, and thus need to be coordinated with the month. The latter was the case in ancient Greece, as in the French Revolutionary calendar, with their ten-day weeks. Even in more complex societies, many economic, judicial, political, and societal, as well as religious routines, can develop in monthly periods (tax due dates, judicial and session days, organizational meetings, full-moon and/or new-moon celebrations). The discrepancy of mensual lengths in the Julian and Gregorian calendars, as such, were no problem, since they were predictable. Only the growing calculability of economic time-units, in the absence of a commensurability of the lengths of the month (and of the quarter), ushered in problems (e.g., coordination of the thirty-day tax month with the actual calendar month), and these repeatedly sparked projects of calendar reform. True, in the popular understanding (weather forecasting, rules for marriage), and graphic illustration, individual months acquire individuality. Nevertheless, the religious qualification of entire months is rather rare (the Islamic fasting month of → Ramadan, the—liturgically sparsely marked—Marian month of May).

Year

b) The year gathers larger social units into → feasts or festivals, these being celebrated either at one central location or simultaneously in all places. The year is simply calculated by the rhythm of weeks or months, or else is promptly 'evoked' after the appearance of the first blossoms. More or less complicated festival calendars are a typical form of temporal organization in the religions. In their function of conferral of identity, they are much adopted by the national states, and re-shaped. The style and expenditure of coordination, here, is clearly higher than in the more important weekly rhythms. Easter letters, festal proclamations, printed calendars, and lists of feast days are necessary for the coming year. For periodicities of more than one year, the ancient Olympiads, revived in 1896, constitute the most familiar example (→ Olympic Games). The Holy Years of the Roman Catholic Church are celebrated in counted years (in periods meanwhile shortened to twenty five years); there is, however, a growing tendency, with this sort of infrequently celebrated grand event, to supplement or replace fixed rhythms by setting dates according to social need (a new government, for example).

c) The establishment of the societal time-premises rests on their attractiveness as generally familiar for planning activities, but, in individual cases, also for the maintenance of sanctions and police supervision. The establishment of time-constructions is also a question of power. Political and economic powers compel timely behavior even against the particular interests of the individual. It is typical of the highly differentiated modern → industrial societies that the partial systems gradually develop their own calendars, established in respective organizations. The task of coordination falls to the individual. The clear marks placed on the days of the (religious) week that characterize early and high European industrialization seem to represent rather a transitory phase: now the religious ethics of time that defines Sunday as a day of rest from labor is being successfully reversed—six full workdays—and utilized for economic purposes. But there is longer-lasting interest in abstract conceptions of time, whose units of time stand open to qualification in terms of the system (opening day, delivery date), and demonstrate no progressive qualifications (festival day, rest period, bad-luck day).

Hours

d) A high density of interaction in organizations calls for a temporal precision that the calendar no longer provides. Clocks have been familiar since ancient times, but frequently could reveal only short periods (hourglasses), or lead to dissimilar units (sundials). The driving force behind the massive spread of mechanical miniaturized clocks, even of clocks that can be held in the hand, is economic need for measurable work time. In late antiquity, the powerful introduction of rhythm in a total organization like the Christian monastery was able to do without such devices. Nevertheless, the multiplication of the clock shows how the prestige value of technology can outrun massive economic need. Neither the precision of the late-medieval tower clocks, nor of today's pocket chronometer, was 'necessary.'

Life Cycle and 'Crises'

5. Time and religion: The orientation of religious systems is typically played out primarily on the level of cosmological time. For individuals, the concrete link with this super-ordinated level comes by way of rituals of the → life cycle. These acquire their permanent characteristics by temporal placement or analogy-formation. Besides, for individual problematic situations, techniques of → divination are available, often concentrated on the problem of timing: when do I make the trip, marry, or lay the foundation? (Geomancy, the question of whether the location is appropriate, on the other hand, is less common.)

Usage of Time

Faced with competing systems, the individual must come to grips with the problem of the brevity of time, and of an ethics of usage of time. In a rigoristic phase of industrial capitalism, this demand led to a dominant position of the area of economics, legitimized by religion. Activity without profit was a waste of time. This core element of the Weberian thesis of the connection between Protestantism and Western modernity is extended in individual micro-economic theories (→ Economy; Money): "Time is money." The 'leisure time,' as well, is calculated as lost profits. But this rigoristic economic option (just as a rigoristic religious concentration of all time on religious activities) is not actually available for many: Work for profit is not unlimited, or freely available. Further, consumption is replaceable by consumer goods only to a very limited extent: Prosperity in terms of time also becomes an important concept in new economic outlines.

On the other hand, substituting time with time is more plausible. Delaying the payment of a loan by way of an indefinite post-mortem grace period is a common religious approach. By way of a limited life (death), the brevity of time conditioned by 'responsibilities' (in turn conditioned by the brevity) is compensated by an open-ended promise. True, 'time off,' and 'extra time' of old age, broaden the opportunities for the activities of this life, so that this form of compensation loses its attraction. This schedule, however, raises the problem of contingency again—death immediately before retirement—and thus a specific area of religious competence. Characteristically, religions provide claims of orientation beyond their own partial systems and consequently focus more on the temporal structures of their members than on the time budget allotted to the religions themselves. From an organizational point of view, this problem can be compensated only through full-time religious specialists, i.e. through a division of labor.

Literature

Balslev, Anindita Niyogi/Mohanty, J. N. (eds.), Religion and Time, Leiden 1993; Biervert, Bernd/Held, Martin (eds.), Zeit in der Ökonomik. Perspektiven für die Theoriebildung, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Chapin, F. Stuart, Human Activity Patterns in the City: Things People Do in Time and in Space, New York 1974; Davies, Paul, The Mind of God: Science and the Search for Ultimate Meaning, London 1992; Dohrn-van Rossum, Gerhard, Die Geschichte der Stunde. Uhren und moderne Zeitordnungen, Munich 1992; Elias, Norbert, Time: An Essay, Oxford 1992 (Ger. [1]1984); Frazer, Julius et al. (eds.), Time, Science, and Society in China and the West, Amherst 1986; Gell, Alfred, The Anthropology of Time: Cultural Constructions of Temporal Maps and Images, Oxford 1992; Harnoncourt, Philipp/auf der Mauer, Hans Jörg, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit II/1, Regensburg 1994; Helfrich, Hede (ed.), Time and Mind, Seattle 1996; Nowotny, Helga, Eigenzeit. Entstehung und Strukturierung eines Zeitgefühls, Frankfurt/M. 1989; Sorokin, Pitrim Alexandrowitsch, Sociocultural Causality, Space, Time: A Study of Referential Principles of Sociology and Social Science, Durham 1943; Wendorff, Rudolf, Zeit und Kultur. Geschichte des Zeitbewußtseins in Europa, Opladen 1980.

→ Astrology, Economy, Feasts and Celebrations, History, Calendar, Sunday/Sabbath

Jörg Rüpke

Tolerance

A Commandment of Peace

1. Tolerance means the 'enduring,' 'bearing,' or (colloquially) 'standing' or 'putting up with' the views, lifestyles, goals, interests, and so forth, of others, which do not conform to one's own positions, or that, indeed, contradict them. Socially, or societally, an obligatory organization, like a political state, which possesses the corresponding (or necessary) means of power to impose its position, can accord 'tolerance' to deviant groups, minorities and individuals. However, material and ideal grounds may advise a majority to tolerate deviating notions. The principle of tolerance is also suggested by the insight that persons can err, and that therefore other ideas are to be tolerated. There has been, and still is, intolerance in all areas of human life. The idea of tolerance has developed in Europe particularly in religious questions since the wars of religion of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Christian revelation could be made obligatory only for its believers, while faith can be "no object of compulsory laws" (Religious Edict of Wöllner, 1788). Thus, in the modern age, the attempt has been undertaken to make obligatory for all only the conceptualizations established by scientific means, that in principle can be accepted by every qualified agent of the corresponding domain. This standard is based on the presumption that the human being is an insightful being, endowed with reason. Discoveries by modern psychology, especially by → psychoanalysis, that views a human being as essentially determined by drives, admit of considerable doubt with respect to this premise. However, particularly the social sciences, which are responsible for questions of social and individual relations, do not agree in these issues. The result is that they cannot rise to the measure of the hopes reposed in them, so that they could have made their findings the basis of decisions binding for all. In the modern age, what cannot be scientifically proved is declared a private matter. Other views, then, must be tolerated. Only the essentials that underlie these sciences are excepted, while their findings pertaining to value, for example in the constitutions, are withdrawn from alteration even by majority decision. As a rule, these essentials are legitimized by the fact that, without them, even a peaceful coexistence is impossible. Of course, here a distinction must be made between external actions and internal judgments. As a rule, deviant views on these fundamentals are tolerated, provided that they do not lead to concrete actions. Since the → Enlightenment, the fostering and maintenance of tolerance has been regarded as a duty of the state. The foundations of tolerance were the ideas of → human rights. These ideas go back to Christian and Western culture and tradition, and have for some time been regarded as unique. Hence the demand for tolerating such positions, which themselves remove the foundation of tolerance. This conundrum became clear in the discussion on the justification of violence, in which freedom from violence as a presupposition of tolerance finds itself implicitly canceled, and to tolerate force, under the name of revolution, is justified. Here the question of the limits of tolerance is posed. Can a position that is itself intolerant be tolerated in the public sector—and if so, to what degree? Today, no voluntary community (such as a religious, a political, or a sports community) must be based on tolerance, since a resignation from that community is possible at any time.

Subject of Tolerance

2. Religious tolerance is allowed by a state, or by a dominant religion allied in some way with the state, to other religions, or to deviant views in the main religion. It must be clearly distinguished from → freedom of religion, which is a fundamental right of all human beings. Religious freedom presupposes that at least two religions, or two different concepts of one religion standing in mutual contradiction, exist in one society at the same time, and that this divergence leads to conflict. Thus, the question of a religious tolerance arises in societies that host a variety of religious notions, cultural contact, missionary activity, and so on, with each of these factors developing in its own way. These societies will then be confronted with mutually incompatible, and conflicting, convictions of faith and belief, along with mutually irreconcilable sacred acts. In tribal societies, as a rule, culture and religion are very closely connected. Thus, the problem of religious tolerance is rarely posed there. Furthermore, as also in segmented societies, these conflicts can be circumvented by separating them (Sigrist 1967). Deviating doctrines and behaviors become a problem only in despotic societies, when the solidarity of the community, order, or government is called into question. When a number of such cultural communities come together, and create a unitary product, or are brought together by a military defeat, the problem arises as to whether, and to what extent, the different parts can be brought together. Accordingly, tolerance can also be regarded as a compromise among conflicting positions. Furthermore, all religions give different answers to the questions: How should I live, what may I do and what not, in order to partake in a promised salvation? On the basis of different religious views, therefore, history displays a plethora of wars and militant confrontations. Contrary to the commonly expressed opinion, religions per se are neither pacific nor tolerant. Rather, tolerance has had to be wrested from them. The only exceptions are communities that withdraw from society and renounce a societal structure. It is observable, of course, that the foundation of tolerance has emerged from confrontations within religions. With the privatization of religion, religion today could become an instance of the proclamation of tolerance.

Historical Forms

2. Different forms of tolerance have developed in the history of religions. In the ancient Roman Empire, with some exceptions, deviant religious notions and cults were tolerated—as long as the cult of the Emperor, the symbol of Roman rule, was recognized. Christianity, from the time of its installation as state religion at least until the Reformation, inclined rather to religious intolerance. ("Error has no rights.") Apart from certain intolerant phases, Islam granted the members of the scriptural religions, as a rule, tolerance. Ever since the experiences of the division of India and Pakistan and the subsequent militant conflicts between Hindus and Muslims (destruction of the mosque in Ayodhya, December 6, 1992; see Hacker 1957), the tolerance formerly attributed to the Indian religions is evidently a misunderstanding. Only those religious concepts were indulged that could be integrated into the Dharma and the Karma system. Hacker, then, speaks of 'inclusivism.' Buddhism, as well, which explicitly teaches tolerance, has been unable to prevent intolerant phases in its history, as one sees currently in the civil wars in Sri Lanka and the reaction to them by numerous Buddhists.

Literature

Abu-Nimer, Mohammed, Nonviolence and Peace Building in Islam: Theory and Practice, Gainesville 2003; Forst, Rainer, Toleranz im Konflikt. Geschichte, Gehalt und Gegenwart eines umstrittenen Begriffs, Frankfurt/M. 2003; Grell, Ole Peter/Porter, Roy (eds.), Toleration in Enlightenment Europe, Cambridge 2000; Guggisberg, Hans R., Religiöse Toleranz, Stuttgart 1984; Hacker, Paul, "Religiöse Toleranz und Intoleranz im Hinduismus," in: Saeculum 8 (1957), 167ff.; Laursen, John Christian (ed.), Religious Toleration: "The Variety of Rites" from Cyrus to Defoe, New York 1999; Laursen, John Christian/Nederman, Cary J. (eds.), Beyond the Persecuting Society: Religious Toleration before the Enlightenment, Philadelphia 1999; Locke, John, A Letter Concerning Toleration (1689), ed. by J. Horton and S. Mendus, London/New York 1991; Nederman, Cary J., Worlds of Difference: European Discourses of Toleration, c. 1100–c. 1550, University Park 2000; Sigrist, Christian, Regulierte Anarchie, Olten 1967; Stanton, Graham N./Stroumsa, Guy G. (eds.), Tolerance and Intolerance in Early Judaism and Christianity, Cambridge 1998; Zagorin, Perez, How the Idea of Religious Toleration Came to the West, Princeton 2003.

→ Conflict/Violence, Freedom of Religion, Heresy, Peace, Pluralism, Religion, Sect, Witch/ Persecution of Witches

Hartmut Zinser

Tourism

"The Tourist Way of Knowledge"

1. "The Tourist Way of Knowledge" was a performance by David Byrne in the Public Theater in New York at the beginning of the 1980s. Taking the denotations of the title, we seem to see something like the hero of old, the seeker of knowledge and new impressions. These 'heroes,' however, carry their limited, limitable knowledge along with them, within their own limits, everywhere they go, all of it available on the inside of their own limitations. They are not requited with knowledge and wisdom, then, as the ancient proclamations teach (→ Daoism; Martial Arts; Zen Buddhism), but with their own projective corroboration of the exotic. Tourists are the 'ignorant abroad.' They journey through the imaginary geography of their own day-dreams (collectively or privately arisen), and their route to thinking, seeing, discovering, and feeling is walled in by their personal world, by the perceptual reality of their 'homeland'—to which, in their far-off adventures, they always take their ultimate orientation.

Rise of Tourism

2. Travel as an end in itself is attested in ancient times, this is true. We need only recall Pausanias and his Greek travel guide of the second century CE. In modern times, however, it was unknown until well into the eighteenth century. One traveled if it was necessary. Travelers were soldiers, statesmen, criminals, couriers, and merchants. In early Hebrew, the word for traveler and merchant is the same (Heb., rokhel). Mountain climbers must be accorded a key role in the history of tourism. In the forefront here are the English founders of Alpinism. In 1857, the Alpine Club was founded in London as the first association of mountain climbers. The Alpine movement defines what tourism is all about. Its trade names, still claimed by all tourists today, are 'Adventurous,' 'Elementary,' 'Untouched.' (Mountain) tourists seek, and yearn for, the blessing of freedom—but also the satisfaction of their curiosity. The two ends of the parable of experience mark (1) Petrarch's ascent of Mount Ventoux in 1336, with Augustine's Confessions, and their hymn of creation, in his pack (→ Landscape), and (2) today's extreme sportsman à la Reinhold Messner, the one who looks for borderline experiences, and shocks of self-discovery.

3. a) The rising tempo of tourism is caught and 'notched' by Hans Magnus Enzenberger, in three categories, of which each is indispensable for the development of an industry in the grand style: Normung, Montage, Serienfertigung (Ger., 'standardization, assemblage, series-manufacture'). With the concept of 'worth seeing'—a 'sight' in the touristic sense—an element of the journey becomes fundamental and 'normed,' like the trip-leader's 'course book.' The invention of the latter goes back to the year 1836, the year of the appearance of John Murray's Red Book, which makes a list of 'the things worth seeing,' or 'sights,' selecting them from Holland, Belgium, and Rhineland. "The sight is not only worthy of visitation; it demands it peremptorily."[1] Tourists perform their duty in order to give their journey a meaning.

The strange and foreign evokes our 'hunger for looking,' especially when its guise is as picturesque as the bathing and burning places of the banks of the Ganges (→ Benares), with their entries down to the water. The boat trip past the eighty-four ghats, part of the tourist's compulsory program, furnishes an ideal glimpse into the unfamiliar cultic practice. As far as the view from the Holy City is concerned, it is indeed permitted for Western travelers to enjoy the lovely view from one side of the city unhindered. The uncomfortable part begins when onlookers must 'stay outside' and not be integrated into the sacred cult. Especially in the case of an intimate act like the ritual bath in the River, they get into the position, willy-nilly, of voyeur-like 'peeking,' and of 'eying' believers as if they were fish in an aquarium. Still, with their tense attitude, tourists betray the fact that they have taken to heart the prohibition of photography. The perspective from the boat, by the way, is also adopted by pilgrims who abridge their lengthy routes to remote sites of religious reverence, in such a way as to be able to fulfill their ritual obligations from the water. (Hubert Mohr)

Touristic sightseeing, here, runs the risk of competing with the practice of religious cult, and with a sacred power of signification. Cultic construction such as Saint Peter's Basilica and the Sistine Chapel in Rome, Notre Dame in Paris, or the Cologne Cathedral become extensively invested with the tone of a museum, travel groups outweigh groups of pilgrims, the perspective of art history or even of art religion dares to tread on intimate sectors, or sacred, banned areas such as the sanctuary of the altar (→ Art Religion; Museum). Sights are still only buildings. Especially in bus tourism, competition prevails between stable and mobile architecture. The mobile architecture of modern tour buses is dedicated to the purpose, outfitted as it is with movie seating, air conditioning, a kitchen, with full-circle glass all around, to show and reach as many 'sights' as possible. By way of the assemblage of sights for the prepared trip, these 'sights' can be specifically marketed. Wholesale tourists obtain the 'sights' strung on a line, and they can uncoil them without any inconvenience. Like any consumer goods, the trip or journey must be set up in long series. In 1845, Thomas Cook organized the first 'club' trip. Mass tourism had been born.

b) Even modern individual tourism no longer changes this. The normative touristic destinations no longer need be equipped and set in a series. They are ubiquitous. The holy mount in the Himalayas and the Greek procession of the Saints, together with the 'hip' Kaphenion that still sent the 'dropout generation' of the 1960s and 1970s scurrying about after secret tips, are discovered today when the tourist finds them in illustrated travel guides, or newspaper travel-supplements, and all of the other tourists come running to peek. Enzensberger, in this connection, decries the 'denunciation of tourism.' Indeed, the detractors are frequently concerned with the maintenance of their privileged position, the retention of the exclusive trip, without the cheap 'tourist crowd'—tourists are still always 'the others.'

Authenticity Claims and Commodification

The touristic self-disavowal, however, is a self-deception. The attempt to preserve the 'untouched adventure of freedom' ends in the destruction of the object. The untouched elementary—the traditional feast, the 'hearty hospitality,' the once-in-a-lifetime experience of this landscape, the 'authentic' tribal rites—become present only through contact. Thereby the 'untouched

Shiva is the great god of Hindu ascetics. By way of the most strenuous practices, performed in the heights of the Himalayas, he inherits the power to destroy the universe—and the unknowing that blocks the route to salvation. Lord of the peaks, he is also accounted the guardian of a hotel proprietor and her establishment in Gandhruk, a resting place for wagon pullers in the mountains of central Nepal. Accordingly, she reverences him by way of a poster on the wall of her Shiva Hotel—a usage occurring in Hindu lands, to the honor of various deities, on the walls of houses, shops, and factories (Lakshmi, goddess of fortune and prosperity; Ganesha, remover of all obstacles). The lady also knows, however, that the colorful world of the gods will not fail to leave its impression on her principal clientele, Western mountain-climbers with spiritual inclinations. (S. Stapelfeldt) elementary' is annihilated as well. "The disappearance of the uniqueness of places through their constant technological accessibility, can be interpreted by comparison with the loss of the aura of a work of art through technological reproduction."[2] Aspirants also reach a dead end when they go to distant lands for a discovery of self, or to the consumption of intoxicating drugs by the Kabul-Katmandu connection in the 1960s and 1970s, or as with the disciples of Maria Sabina or Carlos Castaneda in Mexico. Foreign cults and cultures all too often serve only as material for filling up the modern, individual emptiness of a society of superfluities. Marlboro has bought up the freedom of adventure, however. And even the hole in your shoe is no longer a lacuna in the market. In ever-new attempts, tourism, embittered, struggles to escape the cycles of freedom, and destruction of the same things, of foreign experience and self-projection, of pretension to authenticity and marketability, change of scenery, which are its law of life. And time and again, it fails.

Tourism in Numerical Figures

c) International tourism today is a billion-dollar business. In 1961, the outlay was 6.8 billion dollars; by 1985, it had risen to 10.5 billion. These figures can be concretized in the storm to the Alps. In 1871, the first cog-rail track was built, at Rigi, and transported 70,000 persons in its second year of operation. By 1816, only three hundred persons had climbed this mountain. In the 1980s, Switzerland had a good 1,700 cable and elevator installations, with a capacity of around some 1.1 million persons—per hour! The harm done to nature is immense. Ski slopes need 24,000 hectares of land. That is as much as taken up by the Canton's railroad. Every second, another square meter is built up in Switzerland. "The danger of tourism's self-destruction is not empty chatter, but an altogether real process—although one transpiring by steps and often unnoticeably."[3]

Pilgrim Tourism

4. Worldwide, some one-third of all tourists travel for religious or spiritual reasons. 'Spiritual tourists' usually go it alone, with a backpack, and into remote areas of India, where they are already awaited by 'shamans,' or to places of power and cult like Stonehenge or → Machu Picchu. Rituals can be 'co-booked.' Pilgrims move in groups, as they always have. Twenty million Muslims alone start out for Mecca; Saint Peter's Basilica in → Rome sees six million tourists a year (in the Holy Year 2000, ten to twenty million pilgrims visited Rome); eleven million pilgrimage to Lourdes. All in all, around 300 million pilgrims are on the road in Europe each year. In order to channel these travel currents and skim off a yield most profitably, specialized travel agencies have been formed for pilgrim tourism. All important pilgrimage destinations are made accessible. The pilgrimage bureaus woo even those who go to Thailand, or India, to study world religions. The concept of the pilgrimage is promoted, along with exchange among those of like mind. With many trips, besides the technical tour leaders, priests are available. At the end of their journey, tourists on pilgrimage will surely return home interiorly enriched. Frequently, the sponsors of these undertakings are church institutions.

1. Enzensberger 1987, 670.
2. Gehlen, Rolf, Welt und Ordnung, Marburg 1995, 220.
3. Mäder, Ueli, "Sturm auf die Alpen," in: Universitas 7 (1987), 692.

Literature

Burns, Peter M., An Introduction to Tourism and Anthropology, London 1999; Chambers, Erve (ed.), Tourism and Culture: An Applied Perspective, Albany 1997; Enzensberger, Hans Magnus, "Eine Theorie des Tourismus," in: Universitas 7 (1987), 660-676 ([1]1958); Nash, Dennison, Anthropology of Tourism, Oxford 1996; Nash, Dennison (ed.), Beginnings of an Anthropology of Tourism: A Study in Intellectual History, Oxford 2004; Ross, Glenn F., The Psychology of Tourism, Melbourne 1994; Rossel, Pierre (ed.), Tourism: Manufacturing the Exotic, Copenhagen 1988; Shields, Rob, Places on the Margin, London 1991; Smith, Mick/Duffy, Rosaleen, The Ethics of Tourism Development, London 2003; Smith, Valene L. (ed.), Hosts and Ghosts: The Anthropology of Tourism, Philadelphia [2]1989 ([1]1977); Vukonic, Boris, Tourism and Religion, Oxford 1996; Woodside, A. G. et al. (eds.), Consumer Psychology of Tourism, Hospitality and Leisure, 3 vols., Wallingford 2000–2004.

→ Colonialism, Environmentalism, Landscape, Local Devotion, Mission, Orientalism/Exotism, Pilgrimage, Place (Sacred), Religious Contact, Road/Path/Journey, Sports

Gerhard Schlatter

Tradition

The concept of 'tradition' plays an important role in the study of religion. It invokes the continuity that justifies historical analysis and comparison. Were there no religious tradition(s), scholars would have nothing to study, no threads with which to card and spin their own academic traditions. The fact that 'tradition' can serve as a synonym for both → 'religion' and 'culture'—terms notoriously fraught with definitional and ideological tensions—hints at hidden depths. Tradition raises complex questions, as do all acts of transmission or → translation. Does that which is transferred remain the same or is it changed, as it passes between different generations, social groups, → languages, and cultures? To what extent is the continuity of tradition a 'natural' effect of social and institutional structures, and to what extent is it a strategic construct of human (or superhuman) agents? What epistemological and ideological issues are implicit in attempts to characterize traditions as authentic or inauthentic, genuine or invented? Is it possible to evaluate such judgments beyond simply choosing allegiances among potentially incommensurable perspectives, e.g., orthodoxy/heterodoxy, primary/secondary source, insider/outsider, and colonized/colonizer?

Etymology and Antonyms

Tradition is the act of handing over. Early meanings (many now archaic) emerge from religious (especially Christian) conceptions of → authority: beliefs passed down, above all orally (→ Oral Tradition), from generation to generation, including the Oral Torah (→ Bible); oral instruction, including teaching the Creed to catechumens; the apostolically-legitimized teachings of the Roman Catholic Church; and the sunna of the Prophet → Muhammad. In the sixteenth century, 'tradition' was generalized to include both transferring the possession of objects and custom, or normative usage more generally. Insofar as the content of tradition is seen as sacrosanct, questions of authenticity are shifted to the process of transmission. This shift is indicated by a third cluster of meanings, according to which tradition is also betrayal, including delivery of oneself or others over to Satan and the surrender of Christian scriptures to persecuting authorities.

Just as 'sacred' takes on determinate meaning in contrast to 'profane,' and 'culture' in contrast to 'nature,' 'tradition(al)' becomes clearer in relational tension with other concepts. Tradition is commonly held to be static, ancient, unitary, local, continuous, received, and repetitive in contrast to that which is dynamic, modern, plural, global, discontinuous, invented, and innovative. The basic metaphor of 'handing down unchanged that which is meaningful and valued' portrays 'tradition' as the other of various forms of semantic rupture. Tradition roots continuity of meaning in (a) externalities (e.g., creeds, → texts, → rituals, institutions) that (b) function as warrants of authenticity by virtue of their perceived contiguity to the past: e.g., the authority of the Hadiths is a function of their repetition of historical originals. Discontinuity can result from severing the link to externalities: e.g., the Radical → Reformation was radical due to its internalization of discipline, breaking the self-consciously historical and institutional relation between restitutio and traditio. It can also result from severing perceived links to the past: e.g., → colonialism, modernization (→ Modernity/Modern Age; Postmodernity), and globalization have created social, economic, and political ruptures, undermining the long-established → identities of cultural groups around the world.

Great and Little Traditions

Robert Redfield (1956), drawing on anthropological studies of Mayan culture(s), drew an influential distinction between 'great tradition' and 'little tradition.' The former tends to be elite, urban, universal, textual, 'religious,' orthodox, scholarly, refined, central, and, above all, "consciously cultivated and handed down" (p. 70); whereas the latter tends to be popular, peasant-based, local, oral, 'superstitious,' heterodox, folk, unrefined, peripheral, and unreflective. Redfield stressed the need to study mutual interactions between the two: "Great and little tradition can be thought of as two currents of thought and action, distinguishable, yet ever flowing into and out of each other" (p. 72). McKim Marriott (1955) suggested that processes of 'universalization' and 'parochialization' were responsible for the slow two-way movement between village and more global levels. Milton Singer (1972) emphasized the strategic use of public ritual to manage portrayals of India's great tradition, arguing, contra Redfield, that great/little does not correspond to modern/traditional, because much that is 'modern' is old and many 'traditions' are recent inventions. The great/little distinction has been criticized as over-generalized, under-theorized, colonialist or orientalist (reflecting biased outsider discourses; → Orientalism/Exotism), and elitist or fundamentalist (reflecting biased insider discourses; → Fundamentalism). Even granted its potential value, the distinction has suffered from two main problems: it hides normative assumptions behind a descriptive tool; and it has too often justified an exclusive focus on one or the other extreme (e.g., on village-level micro-analyses or global generalizations based on normative texts), ignoring the question of mutual influences and the ideological dimensions of the distinction itself.

The Invention of Tradition

Seeing tradition as 'the given' ignores agency, i.e., the strategic value of claiming the high ground of 'tradition' in struggles for power. Malinowski emphasized that myth is "a hard-working active force" (1992 [1926], 101); recent scholarship goes further in seeing tradition as a tool. Eric Hobsbawm distinguished genuine from invented traditions: "insofar as there is [. . .] reference to a historic past, the peculiarity of 'invented' traditions is that the continuity with it is largely fictitious. In short, they are responses to novel situations which take the form of reference to old situations, or which establish their own past by quasi-obligatory repetition [. . .]" (Hobsbawm/Ranger 1983, 1). Hobsbawm suggested that the invention of tradition (and the '(re)-invention' of 'extinct' traditions) has become more frequent in modernity, as 'the old ways' of genuine traditions have been threatened by rapid social transformation (pp. 4-8). Terence Ranger, in the same volume, argued that Western scholars and administrators invented African 'tradition' as the other of modernity: where African societies had, as a matter of historical fact, been characterized by "multiple identities" and "overlapping networks of association and exchange," this "pre-colonial movement of men and ideas was replaced by the colonial custom-bounded, microcosmic local society," whereas "there rarely existed in fact the closed corporate consensual system which came to be accepted as characteristic of 'traditional' Africa" (pp. 247-248; 254).

The agency of invention is not limited to the colonizers: (re)invention of tradition can be an important indigenous strategy in resisting or rejecting colonization, modernization, and globalization (see, e.g., → North America [Traditional Religions]). In this light, the authenticity of tradition can be framed in terms of autonomy—not historical truth—as characterized by a wider or narrower scope of agency: tradition is "volitional temporal action," with its contrary being "not change but oppression" (Glassie 1995, 409 and 396). Is the Melanesian re-invention of tradition through the discourse of kastom inauthentic because it self-consciously appropriates and inverts colonial discourse, or is it authentic because it is a product of indigenous agency (cf. Babadzan 1988)? The latter alternative is closed if we insist that post-colonial invented traditions are necessarily oppositional and counter-hegemonic: i.e., that "the discourse of the dominant shapes and structures the discourse of the dominated" (Keesing 1994, 41; → Discourse). Less deterministically, "Just because what is done is culturally logical does not mean the logic determined that it be done [. . .]. [T]raditions are invented in the specific terms of the people who construct them [. . .]" (Sahlins 1999, 409).

Academic Traditions

Western academic traditions on 'tradition' manifest the usual spectrum of views, from realist through constructionist to relativist. For example, the distinction between genuine and invented traditions—between historical facts and orientalist/colonialist constructions—presupposes the modernist distinction between real and represented (Friedman 1992, 849). This raises the possibility that any search for genuine religious tradition(s) reflects an invented aspect of Western political/academic traditions: "how do we defend the 'real past' [. . .] and 'genuine' traditions [. . .] if we accept that all cultural representations—even scholarly ones—are contingent and embedded in a particular social and political context?" (Linnekin 1992, 250). 'Tradition' quickly unfolds into issues of truth, authenticity, authority, autonomy, and power; and distinct academic traditions inform varying answers to questions such as the following: Can we make sense of the alleged unity of → 'Hinduism' as an ancient tradition founded on the Vedas without giving a central role to both (a) the Western academic tradition on this 'tradition' and (b) the traditions invented by nineteenth-century Hindu Reform movements as they reacted to colonial portrayals of Indian history (cf. Fitzgerald 2000, 134ff.; Sontheimer/Kulke 1989)? Richard King suggests that the secular and reductionistic tendencies of the academic study of religion are rooted in a post-Enlightenment valuation of modernity vs. tradition, a constructed rupture often linked to another: progressive West vs. timeless East (1999, 46; → Progress; History). Extending this view, religious studies can never escape the situated and limited perspective of its own invented tradition(s) re 'tradition(s).'

However, it may be possible to chart a less radically relativistic course—losing a few colleagues to Scylla rather than the whole boat to Charybdis—by analyzing 'tradition' in relational tension with other concepts. Likely the most significant analytical appeal to 'tradition' in the study of religion has been the Weberian distinction between traditional, charismatic and rational-legal forms of authority, especially as embodied in the tension between → priest and → prophet (1978; → Weber; Charisma). Here, 'tradition' is defined in terms of its conservative function, and it is analyzed from the point of view of specific social and institutional structures (Bourdieu 1987 [1971]). As such, tradition—whether it is believed to be invented from whole cloth or guaranteed authentic by divine authority—is both 'traditional' and radical, depending on one's analytical frame.

Literature

Babadzan, Alain, "Kastom and Nation-Building in the South Pacific," in: Guidieri, Remo et al. (eds.), Ethnicities and Nations, Austin 1988, 199-228; Bourdieu, Pierre, "Legitimation and Structured Interests in Weber's Sociology of Religion," trans. Chris Turner, in: Lash, Scott/Whimster, Sam (eds.), Max Weber, Rationality and Modernity, London 1987, 119-136; Engler, Steven/Grieve, Gregory (eds.), Historicizing 'Tradition' in the Study of Religion, Berlin/NewYork 2005; Fitzgerald, Timothy, The Ideology of Religious Studies, Oxford 2000; Friedman, Jonathan, "The Past in the Future: History and the Politics of Identity," in: American Anthropologist 94/4 (1992), 837-859; Glassie, Henry, "Tradition," in: Journal of American Folklore 108 (1995), 395-412; Hobsbawm, Eric/Ranger, Terence (eds.), The Invention of Tradition, Cambridge 1983; Keesing, Roger M., "Creating the Past: Custom and Identity in the Contemporary Pacific," in: Contemporary Pacific 1 (1989), 19-42; King, Richard, Orientalism and Religion, London/New York 1999; Linnekin, Jocelyn, "On the Theory and Politics of Cultural Construction in the Pacific," in: Oceania 62 (1992), 249-263; Marriott, McKim (ed.), Village India, Chicago 1955; Malinowski, Bronislaw, Magic, Science and Religion, New York 1992; Redfield, Robert, Peasant Society and Culture, Chicago 1956; Sahlins, Marshall, "Two or Three Things That I Know about Culture," in: Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 5 (1999), 399-421; Singer, Milton, When a Great Tradition Modernizes, New York/London 1972; Sontheimer, Günther/Kulke, Hermann (eds.), Hinduism Reconsidered, New Delhi 1989; van Henten, J. W. /Houtepen, A. (eds.), Religious Identity and the Invention of Tradition, Assen 2001; Weber, Max, Economy and Society, Berkeley 1978.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Colonialism, Demise of a Religion, Discourse, History, Memory, New Religions, Oral Tradition, Reception, Translation, Text/Textual Criticism, Writing

Steven Engler

Trance

1. The word 'trance' derives from the Latin prefix trans- ('over,' 'beyond'), and occurs for the first time at the end of the eighteenth century, in connection with Mesmerism. It means a condition of consciousness 'beyond' normal waking consciousness. It denotes a sleep-like condition in which those involved seem no longer to be themselves. Anthropologists of the twentieth century have observed that trance plays an important role in the rites and cults of all cultures. Here it is described as a condition of dissolution, accompanied by a deficiency in controlled movements, as well as by hallucinations and visions, which are then often forgotten. Trance appears in two principal forms: possession and ecstasy. In the condition of possession, or → 'enthusiasm' (from Gk., én-theos, having a 'god within'—being god-enthused or in-spired), a god, a spirit, or a demon takes possession of the believer and penetrates the believer's body. With the trance-form of ecstasy, just the other way around, the psyche leaves the body, which—as frequently in → shamanism—may fall into a stupor-like rigidity.

The Psychology of the Condition of Trance

2. Under usual circumstances, human perception takes place consciously. This condition is generally experienced as normal. There are, however, numerous other states of consciousness that are not perceived as normal, such as sleep and → dream, → intoxication and → ecstasy. These altered states of consciousness include trance, which occurs in a religious context as well as in a secular. Trance is a congenital behavioral pattern that can be activated through certain corporeal techniques (dancing, running, swaying with the upper body). Trance instills those affected with a feeling of dissociation: they feel themselves to consist of two observers, one part of their consciousness being directed within, while the other part has a sense of leaving the body, and observing itself and its surroundings from without.

Trance allows subjects to be released from everything learned hitherto, and renders them capable of accomplishments of soul and body that they would not otherwise attempt. Considered from a psychological viewpoint, the trance stage makes possible a grasp of psychic processes that are hidden

An interesting form of the secularization of trance can currently be observed in Morocco. The cult actors of the Gnawa Brotherhood are disconnecting themselves from their old traditions, and broadening their opportunities. Selected by a Danish gallery director, some of them have even begun to paint pictures while in a trance, and thus to render visible their inner life. This process becomes extremely clear in a painting by Mohamed Tabal. Here Tabal expresses his own possession by the spirits of the water, and thereby alludes to the origin of Gnawa on the Niger River. One can see fish, but also camels, which represent the voyage from Nigeria to Morocco. The expression on his face is that of a person all in ineffable rapture and referring to a frenetic presentation of the spirits, who incite self-mutilation. (F. Welte)

A medium, the human representative of a divine being, incarnates a divine 'General,' at the Festival of Beigang in Taiwan. He is in a deep trance and belongs to a group of eight 'generals' who must precede the divine litters, in order to restrain the spirits. After his emergence, he collapses, falling into the arms of the members of the cult. The finger pressure on the tip of his breastbone is intended to extract him from the trance condition. The medium has shifted his consciousness completely inward, and is insensitive to normal external stimuli. The pressure on his breastbone represents a conditioned stimulus ('trigger release'), which makes it possible to resume contact with him. Exactly the same pressure can be used to place him in a deep trance. The same mechanism is employed by the Moroccan Gnawa cult (see other picture), where mediums are enfolded in a trance, and extracted again, through the use of incense. The trigger release varies with the particular cult; the conditioning is essential, and it is molded by cult and culture. The medium's face is altogether enraptured. Without his companions' attention, he would be completely helpless. Only the consciousness of being protected makes possible the extraordinary exploits of the trance medium, such as self-mutilation, or the receipt of visions and prophecies bestowed in the depths of a trance.

from waking consciousness. Normally, knowledge of these other forms of reality is available only through a recall of dreams, by the ingestion of drugs, and by reports of things not available to personal experience—→ visions by prophets and seers, clairvoyants and mediums.

The most important characteristic of the trance is the extensive exclusion of waking consciousness. The goal is to shift one's consciousness from without to within, so that the outer world is effaced. The results of research into consciousness suggest that it draws from a determinate palette of possible experiences. Segments of it can be activated by certain experiences, and thus become sensible to the subject. Familiar techniques include → fasting, flogging (→ Flagellants), hyperventilation, sleep deprivation, extreme athleticism, dancing, techno parties, under-stimulation, over-stimulation, and ingestion of intoxicating drugs and hallucinogens. Trance is often induced through the use of music, especially that of rhythmic instruments such as drums or rattles (→ Rhythm).

3. The experience of trance is extremely varied. A distinction is made between moving and unmoving, lighter and deeper trance. Trance can be either self-induced, or induced by other persons, with or without drugs.

a) Everyday trance is scarcely perceived. Driving a car through the rain, looking through the constant back-and-forth of the windshield wipers, one may find one's sense of time altered. One is lost in a daydream. Space and time are now deprived of any objects, as likewise occurs in sexual intercourse and orgasm, when one's perception is shifted away from its accustomed objects.

b) The most familiar example of the self-induced unmoving trance is autogenous training, a type of self-hypnosis. By way of the inner pronunciation of standardized autosuggestions, such as "I am becoming entirely

During the vegetarian festival, celebrated annually among Chinese immigrants on the island of Phuket in Thailand, scenes like this one can be observed. In a trance, this man has pierced his cheek with a television antenna, in order to be able to introduce positive energy into his body. This procedure is supposed to bring health to himself and to his family. The apples impaled on the antenna stand for the prosperity for which he hopes. Apples do not grow in Thailand, and must be imported; thus, they are among the country's costly fruits, and have a high prestige value. (B. Heusel) peaceful," the consciousness is turned inward, and the outside world is to a large extent effaced. In this way, a light trance is attained, making it possible to affect the vegetative nervous system. It is a matter of a voluntary form of auto-manipulation—a manner of proceeding reminiscent of prayer, with which, by the recitation of set vocal formulas like the Lord's Prayer, the prayers of the Rosary, or the Hindu → mantras, an altogether determinate state of consciousness is intended.

Hypnosis

c) Purely externally, other-induced unmoving trance resembles the state of sleep, and is therefore named hypnosis, which derives from hýpnos, the Greek word for sleep. The two states, however, differ significantly. Clinical investigation by electroencephalogram (EEG) has established that, with hypnosis, so-called alpha waves emerge, corresponding to the normal waking state of someone who is excited. With autogenous training, or in prayer, as above, suggestions are pronounced interiorly; but with hypnosis, the subject takes careful note of the hypnotist's suggestions with 'free-floating attentiveness.' The hypnotist, by way of enunciation of the suggestions, also enters a light state of trance, with greater receptivity receptive to the condition of the subject than is available in the waking state.

Deep Trance

d) Especially gifted trance personalities, such as mediums, shamans, and spiritual healers, have the capacity to go into deep trance, and to direct their consciousness far deeper within than is possible for average people. The characteristic peculiarities of this kind of ecstatic trance are eyes staring aloft, slightly open mouth, and wild nodding and shaking of the head—to the point of catalepsy, an extreme state of corporal rigidity. Everyday awareness can be completely excluded, and messages, visions, or even prophecies can be received. Deep trance is accompanied by loss of memory, and so, for their journey to their interior, mediums need a guide, to attend to them, and to note down or interpret their messages.

Spiritism

e) The exclusion of waking consciousness is also used in occult and spiritistic practices. With glass and table shifting or moving, a focus of the eyes on the glass or table produces a self-induced group hypnosis, in which a harmony of unconscious muscular movements is achieved, which then leads to the seemingly improbable movements of glass and table (→ Spiritism, with ill.). Simultaneously, a group fantasy is formed, which is then referred to the intervention of invisible spirits.

Trance Play

f) Trance finds its most impressive form in the trance play, a dramatic presentation. Spirits are represented, most of whom are regarded as responsible for diseases, ancestors, gods, demons, totem animals, and even historical personalities such as rulers and saints (obviously Caucasian), and objects, such as satellites or an automobile, whose presence ought to be impossible. The presentations are of the highest intensity. Trance is reached by way of a superfluity of external stimuli. Roaring music is one of the means, as is the burning of incense, or a scenic presentation by members of the cult, frequently to the point of raging, screaming, and self-mutilation. This spectacle is followed by a calm on the part of the preponderantly female participants, who then allow themselves to fall into a trance, with a pronounced cathartic effect (→ Colonialism I, with illus.).

Trance in Western Reception Today

4. In Western society, trance, when evident, has until now been a monopoly of the churches. With the increase of secularization, however, this monopoly has been extensively lost. The need, afterwards, has remained, however, and is satisfied, e.g., by the utterly copious offers of the → New Age and the modern esoteric scene. Bhagwan Shree Rajnesh was a spiritual leader, who, in the 1960s, propagated Hindu trance practices among Westerners as group therapy, and had himself venerated by his disciples as a guru (The Orange Book, 1985; → Osho Movement). American anthropologist Felicitas D. Goodman has chosen an altogether different route to a satisfaction of the enduring need for trance. She concerned herself scientifically with psychological anthropology and linguistics, researching various forms of religious ecstasy. By way of experimental research with her students, she discovered that, with the adoption of certain bodily postures, linked with a drawn out, monotone auditory stimulus, the state of trance can be induced. From this practice she has developed her particular trance technique, which she calls 'ritual bodily postures.' She teaches worldwide.

Literature

Bourguignon, Erika (ed.), Religion, Altered States of Consciousness, and Social Change, Columbus 1973; Goodman, Felicitas, Where the Spirits Ride the Wind: Trance Journeys and Other Ecstatic Experiences, Bloomington 1990; Kramer, Fritz W., The Red Fez: Art and Spirit Possession in Africa, London 1993 (Ger. [1]1987); Lambek, Michael, Human Spirits: A Cultural Account of Trance in Mayotte, Cambridge 1981; Mana, Abdelkader (ed.), The Gnawa and Mohamed Tabal, Casablanca 1998; Rouget, Gilbert, Music and Trance: A Theory of the Relations between Music and Possession, Chicago 1985 (Fr. [1]1980); Suryani, Luh Ketut/Jensen, Gordon D., Trance and Possession in Bali: A Window on Western Multiple Personality, Possession Disorder, and Suicide, Kuala Lumpur 1993; Welte, Frank M., Der Gnawa-Kult. Trancespiele, Geisterbeschwörung und Besessenheit in Marokko, Frankfurt/M. 1990.

→ Channeling, Dance, Dream, Ecstasy, Enthusiasm, Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens, Music, Possession, Psyche, Rhythm, Shamanism, Vision/Auditory Experience

Frank Maurice Welte

Transcendence

Transcendence is originally a philosophical concept that distinguishes the immediately accessible, differentiated world of reality from a foundational space that lies behind it. The theological theme of God's quality as a reality 'beyond' was open to a corresponding development, which has indeed been realized. Since antiquity, transcendence is essentially a space reached neither by sensory perception nor by speech. Thus, God remains in the realm of the ineffable. Approaches to the transcendent God belong to 'negative theology,' which generates its propositions by way of negations.

Boundaries Drawn

An application of this concept in terms of the study of religion can take as its point of departure the fact that all systems of religious symbols find a boundary between the approachable and the unapproachable, the controllable and the uncontrollable. But it is not to be assumed that the areas thus set in mutual relation lead to the same propositions in all religions, or even that they are used with constancy and consistency in the same religion. Instead, variable, and multifariously vague, boundaries present themselves, in some instances in a multiplicity of areas. Nor is it only a question of the being and quality of transcendence that is at issue. Also involved is the (ever asymmetrical) relation between the realm 'beyond' and the region 'here.'

Localization of Transcendence

Transcendence can be variously located, most obviously in outer space. Thus, for example, cultivated space can be bounded off from uncultivated space, with varying positive or negative qualities. For example, the forest or → water can be seen as a realm of menace, or of life-promoting powers. The development of this space varies. Areas of the sky, or of the underworld, can be considered thematically, either in detail, or sparsely. Even the inner world of the human being (→ Soul), the region of ecstatic and uncontrolled experiences (→ Trance), offers an occasion for the localization of transcendence. In the dimension of time, the area before the beginning or after the end comes into question. Finally, transcendence can be considered in a context of transitory processes (→ Time), as the uncontrollable coincidence.

→ God/Gods/The Sacred, Hereafter, Metaphysics, Place (Sacred), Religion, Theology

Fritz Stolz

Translation

Insofar as → religion is a cross-cultural phenomenon—and because its academic study is international—translation is integral to its history and study. Yet scholars of religion rarely critically examine the creativity, limitations, or biases of translation. This omission is surprising given that complex relations between → language, → meaning, culture, and ideology clearly undermine the ideal of a simple, transparent correspondence between statements in different languages. Several issues present themselves here: the place of texts and translation in religion(s) and in the study of religion(s); the 'non-transparency' of translation and the inevitability of semantic distortion; ideological issues raised by relations between source and target cultures; and theoretical issues raised by claims of a common cross-cultural core that allegedly justifies the use of a generic concept of 'religion.'

The Focus on Texts

Texts are central to most religions, though entirely absent in others, and they are the primary religious materials for scholars of religion (→ Text/Textual Criticism; Writing). The study of 'religion' has consisted primarily of contextualized readings of selected texts from many cultures, above all 'sacred scriptures,' including revelation, theology, commentary, hagiography, creeds, legal codes, sectarian history, and devotional literature. Max Müller's translation of the Upanishads (1879), inaugurating the fifty-volume Sacred Books of the East series, was just one milestone marking the importance of translation to the development of the modern study of religion. Scholars have recently placed greater emphasis on non-scriptural phenomena, such as oral traditions, rituals, art, and architecture, but here too texts remain central, e.g., transcriptions of oral performances by the Haida story-teller Ghandl, instructions for ritual purification in the Zoroastrian Avesta, statements on iconoclasm by the ninth-century Christian Councils, or architectural norms in the medieval Hindu Agamas.

Insider and Outsider

The translation of religious texts has both insider and outsider dimensions. On the one hand, members of a given religion often belong to different linguistic and cultural groups, e.g., Muslims who read Indonesian or Turkish renderings of the Qur'an. On the other hand, scholars of religion work with and publish both primary and secondary sources in various languages. In all these cases, to translate is to transpose, transform, transfer or transplant: difference always intervenes between what can be said in any two languages, between educated and casual readers, and between the cultural, social, and political contexts of source and target languages. These same issues of translation are also raised by the transposition of texts within what is arguably a single language: from ancient to modern Greek, Chinese or Hebrew, or from Shakespeare's tongue into colloquial twenty-first-century English.

Technical Terms, Standardization, and Audience

Perhaps the most significant long-term translation project in history was the diffusion of Buddhist texts from Pali and Sanskrit into Tibetan and Chinese. Many of the translators, such as Kumarajiva, were widely esteemed for their genius. Three central issues in the translation of religious texts are illustrated by this centuries-long endeavor. First, the treatment of technical terms demanded the expression of ideas foreign to the intellectual traditions of the target languages. Early Chinese efforts used transliterations of Pali and Sanskrit terms or borrowed concepts from Daoism. There is a trade-off here beyond ease of comprehensibility and corruption of meaning. (Christians faced similar problems in translating 'Holy Spirit' into African languages, sometimes drawing on indigenous concepts for 'spirits' or 'wind' and sometimes importing Latin or other European loan words. The related decision to sometimes translate 'demons' using words for 'ancestors' underlines the role of ideology here.)

Second, the variety of solutions to problems of translation resulted in disparate renderings of the same or similar texts. Chinese and Tibetan translation efforts were generally piecemeal, with only limited use of more standardized approaches—as in the work of the seventh-century pilgrim and translator, Xuanzang. (In a variant of this problem, conservative Christian views that the Holy Spirit guided the writing of the Bible generally fail to note the correlated need for a theory of inspired translation, especially given the proliferation of modern-language English versions [Allert 1999].)

Third, these Buddhist translations varied greatly according to their intended audience. In China, for example, educated lay readers preferred paraphrases that used classical stylistic devices, where scholars preferred more literal versions. (Similar tensions exist among twentieth-century English translations of the Jewish Talmud. The recently-completed seventy-three-volume Schottenstein edition is aimed at a popular audience largely unfamiliar with Talmudic nuances, but scholars prefer the more literal Soncino edition or the JTS El 'Am partial translation, with its lengthy critical commentary.)

Historicity and Colonialism

Scholars of Christian scriptures have also had a long fruitful engagement with issues of translation. Biblical scholars have paid admirable attention to developments in translation theory: e.g., formal vs. dynamic equivalence, implications of → discourse analysis, and cultural ideologies. This consideration is partly because the Christian Bible is always already in translation. (Most Christians believe that God became incarnate as a speaker of Aramaic. Yet the → Bible is in Hebrew and Greek.) Muslims and Orthodox Jews hold, respectively, that the → Qur'an and the Torah are God's literal revelation in Arabic and in Hebrew. In contrast, the historically determinate diffusion of God's Word through translation has always been essential to Christianity, with the Bible now translated, in whole or in part, into almost 2,000 languages. Lamin Sanneh argues that Christianity's emphasis on "mission by translation" has led to a "radical pluralism of culture" that aims "to make the recipient culture the true and final locus of the proclamation" (1989, 1, 29). As a result, Christianity has sometimes empowered the languages and cultures of the colonized by invoking them as worthy vessels for the Word. Post-colonial theology has also highlighted less optimistic relations between translation and ideology. R. S. Sugirtharajah, for example, holds that European translators imposed alien textual values in South Asia (e.g., an emphasis on fixed texts as scriptural archetypes). He argues for "a wider intertextuality which will link biblical texts with Asian scriptural texts" (1998, 90-92).

Cultural Context and Ideology

Although discussions of translation have traditionally tended to focus on the extent to which a given translation is 'faithful' to an 'original,' recent theory of translation pays greater attention to issues of cultural context, ideology, and power relations between source and target cultures. The extent to which complex cultural issues intervene as texts are translated is illustrated by two cases involving gender. The Koiné Greek original of Rom 16:7, in the Christian New Testament, mentions 'Junia'—clearly a woman's name on the evidence of contemporary non-biblical texts—as 'prominent among the apostles.' Medieval translators and commentators frequently changed this name to the extremely unusual masculine form 'Junias.' The King James Version preferred the weaker 'of note,' rather than the more frequent 'prominent' or 'outstanding.' Some modern commentators suggest that epísêmoi en tois apostólois is best rendered as 'well known to the apostles.' Many feminist scholars see, in this history of translation, a patriarchal erasure of women's participation in the early Church. A contrasting change occurred in East Asia from the seventh to tenth centuries CE. The male bodhisattva of compassion, Avalokiteshvara in Indian Sanskrit texts, became the male Chenrezig in Tibet (incarnate in the Dalai Lamas) but was transformed into the female Guanyin in China (Kannon in Japan, Kwanŭm in Korea, Quan'Am in Vietnam, and Kanin in Bali). This shift was prominent in iconography as well as in texts. The reasons for this transformation remain unclear, but culturally specific attitudes toward gender roles are clearly part of the story. The complex trajectories of these Christian and Buddhist figures remind us that, in translation, the linguistic surface invokes complex historical, cultural, and ideological depths.

Critical Approaches in Religious Studies

Another complex set of translational boundaries involves distinctions between insider and outsider, between data and theory, between religions and their study. The history of the → academic study of religion is replete with examples of terms from a specific cultural context that come to be used as generic concepts for describing religious phenomena across cultures, e.g., tabu (→ Taboo), mana (→ Power), shaman (→ Shamanism), → sacrifice, spirit, → sin, grace. This act of cross-cultural categorization begs questions regarding the nature of the phenomena under study: applying common labels can blind us to differences. In addition, as J. Z. Smith, Russell T. McCutcheon, and others emphasize, the use of emic terms as etic concepts threatens to import biased presuppositions into the basic categories of religious studies.

The concept of → 'religion' itself is open to these critiques. Hans Penner, Nancy Frankenberry, and others have made theory of translation central to a semantic critique of essentialist views of religion. If all religions are characterized by participating in—or referring in some symbolic manner to—the sacred (→ Holy), and if the sacred is ineffable or wholly other, as phenomenologists often claim, then how does this trans-linguistic other come to be translated into the many languages of different religions? Translation is a relation, however complex, between spheres of determinate → meaning; but the generic, cross-cultural concept of 'religion' is hypostatized as beyond determinate meaning (unless it is defined in a reductive, functionalist, or purely descriptive manner). Translating between different religions is one thing; translating between religion and religions is something else entirely. Yet, unless we can make sense of the latter, how can we claim that all the things we call 'religions' truly fit under that one umbrella term? These sorts of critiques indicate that theory of translation has much to contribute to discussions of the nature and function of comparison as a method in the study of religion.

Literature

Allert, Craig D., "Is Translation Inspired? The Problems of Verbal Inspiration for Translation and a Proposed Solution," in Porter/Hess 1999, 85-113; Engler, Steven et al., "Consider Translation: A Roundtable Discussion," in: Religious Studies Review 30/2 and 3 (2004), 107-120; Munday, Jeremy, Introducing Translation Studies: Theories and Applications, London/New York 2001; Frankenberry, Nancy K. (ed.), Radical Interpretation in Religion, Cambridge 2002; Porter, Stanley E./Hess, Richard S. (eds.), Translating the Bible: Problems and Prospects, Sheffield 1999; Sanneh, Lamin, Translating the Message: The Missionary Impact on Culture, Maryknoll 1989; Sugirtharajah, R. S. Asian Biblical Hermeneutics and Postcolonialism: Contesting the Interpretations, Maryknoll 1998.

→ Bible, Book, Communication, Literature, Meaning/Signification, Qur'an, Text/Textual Criticism

Steven Engler

Trickster

What Is a Trickster?

1. The concept of the 'trickster' is a concept of figure typology. In the anthropology of religion, cultural anthropology, and literary studies, it expresses the being and activity of (usually male) mythical, literary, or historical (but now inserted into literature) figures, now more precisely identified as in human or animal form. In the eighteenth century, in English, 'trickster' meant someone of dubious morality and principles, but appreciable intelligence. English philosopher Shaftesbury (1671–1713) characterized (1711) → Prometheus as such—that is, as a deceptive 'quack' or dangerous 'swindler.' Trickster figures emerge in the mythology, folklore, and literature of nearly all cultures. The trickster's body and soul are, or become, identified to a certain extent through his actions.

Tricksters play their tricks by way of unusual incorporeal powers, for example, techniques of cunning and deceit, secret knowledge, and the arts of transmutation (→ Mask). Nonetheless, tricksters are 'foolish,' and their actions often miscarry or work against them, so that they also represent ungodly, disorganized areas, such as those of laughter and humor (→ Fool, Upside-down World, → Carnival). But they are also tied up with the comical and laughable; their actions caricature or ridicule anything serious or important. Trickster figures look strange and striking, which marks them as outsiders: unnatural bodily development, altered appetites (enormous hunger or digestion/excretion, or sexuality), enlarged or diminutive, multiple or missing, bodily (e.g., sexual) parts. Thus, with Wakdjunkaga (lit. the 'roguish one'), a trickster of the North American Winnebago people, his over-long penis is either backwards or rolled up. A squirrel casually gnaws off his sexual part and plants it: out of it grow useful or vital crops like maize, turnips, or (sweet) potatoes.[1] In François Rabelais's satirical serial novel Gargantua and Pantagruel (1522–1564), a modern-age literary match for a Trickster story-cycle, the protagonists are remarkable for their body size and proportions, their extremes of gluttony and intemperance, and their frivolously scatological earthiness. Some literary → animal legends in European culture are based on elements and figures of a trickster sort, such as the crafty, sly Fox or the Raven with the droll blotches. As trickster figures fail to abide even by biological norms, then, surely, we must expect them to transgress, at will, other, 'sacred,' boundaries—law, ceremony, convention—most often spontaneously, less often working from a plan, but always out of a craving for novelty. In this manner, they broaden their own latitudes, as well as the frames of standardization of those with whom they come in contact. Hence they are (further) designated as 'liminal' beings (→ Marginality/Liminality). On the basis of cunning and ridiculous craftiness, the trickster often appears as a cultural → hero, the one who brings down fire and other two-edged techniques of culture, such as agriculture and labor, medicine and disease, and death (→ Prometheus, cf. above, Wadjunkaga). Often he is the dangerous counterfoil of the Supreme Creator, who 'brands' a mark on the trickster's spirit and body (→ Stigmata/Stigmatics) as the one who has dared to transform the ordained world order.

Figures of the Trickster

2. A famous trickster of the Mediterranean region, along with Prometheus, is Hermes, messenger of the Greek gods. Hermes roams everywhere with impunity, protects thieves and the underhanded, and is identified with Ibis-headed Egyptian Thoth, the master of secret knowledge (→ Hermetism/Hermeticism). In Teutonic mythology, the crucial trickster is Loki the troublemaker (→ Teutons). Wolf, Fox, and Raven frequently emerge as his cohorts. African trickster figures such as the Hare and the Hyena of the Kaguru people, the spinning Ananse (or Ture) of the Ashanti, or Eshu Elegba of the Yoruba, somewhat similar structurally to the Judeo-Christian Lucifer, all have multiple connections with everyday life. Rich in their variants, trickster tales and their protagonists can become metaphors for human conduct ('busy as Eshu'). North American trickster figures frequently appear in the guise of animals (→ North America [Traditional Religions]). Among peoples of the Northern Pacific coasts, the story is that Raven has stolen the sun that had been hidden by the Supreme Being, and thereby brought light into the world. The Coyote trickster, in the Indian picaresque cycle, often transforms itself into a dish, to gobble up food or provisions, or among Plains peoples, frequently acts as a demiurge. Navajo material sees in the Coyote the cultural hero who has stolen fire from the sky. In this he is similar to the Hare, the most important trickster in Southeastern North America. Hare and Rabbit, who live with Grandmother, and everlastingly nibble away her provisions, are also the clumsy ones, whose stupid-heroic pranks make the world such as it is. As trivialized, modern assimilations of these trickster figures, in the form of American 'slapstick' humor, popular films in trick photography and cartoons feature characters like Bugs Bunny (film hero since 1938, comics since 1941), Coyote, Duffy Duck, or 'sexually liberated' Fritz the Cat, in style since around 1970 (comics and film). From the Hollywood heroes of Harold Lloyd to Buster Keaton to Charlie Chaplin to the current films of a Woody Allen, the trickster traditions continue in film. Optional subjects like transformation (costuming) feature a reversal of relationships, and grotesque exaggerations of moral and religious norms. Thus they vary the trickster's comic-tragic figures of central relationships and present portraits of his everyday form in nearly all social contexts. Examples would be the 'idiot,' the court jester, the clown, the charlatan, the Schlemiel, the artist of life, the idealist, the scapegoat.[2] Tricksters of the native peoples of → Central and → South America are usually animal beings, who, strikingly, often work by manipulated openings-out of the body—turn their concealed 'insides' outward and render them visible. Thus, the Yanomami of Northern Brazil report of the bird-being Hasimo, who stole the fire caught in the jaws of a primitive crocodile by bombarding the crocodile with its excrement, and thus causing it to laugh.[3]

3. Trickster tales emerge, in considerable number and in a great wealth of variation, in non-writing societies (Anomami). In agricultural societies, they appear on the boundary between the religious and the secular everyday, in ceremonies of healing, carnival festivals, or rites of initiation, as a folkloristic legacy still in living memory (e.g., among Indian brujos in Central America). As a part of the Western culture of entertainment, they come in written or film form. Trickster tales usually occur in considerable number, and with a great wealth of variation. Frequently, they come as serialized stories, to whose extension there is no limit. Examples would be the Tyl Eulenspiegel cycle, the Trickster Hare cycle of the Winnebago, the 'to be continued' structure of many comic strips and animated films. The great quantity and variability of the 'stories' told guarantee the strongly defined continuation of a tradition. With the freedom of variation at hand, trickster figures can be brought right up to date, and adapted to the times. Finally, the culture of their provenance cannot be determined with any degree of reliability, and is only to be met in the area of the disreputable, laughable, and comical; thus, trickster figures outlast the transformations of times and alterations of fashions. Of course, their image and appearance change, which is typical of their essence.

1. Radin 1969, 39.
2. Cf. illustrations of Joseph Beuys's theatrical presentation, "I Like America and America Likes Me," under entry, "Art."
3. Sullivan et al. 1987, 15 and 52.

Literature

Bianchi, Ugo, "Der demiurgische Trickster und die Religionsethnologie," in: Paideuma 7 (1961), 335-344; Erdoes, Richard/Ortiz, Alfonso (ed.), American Indian Trickster Tales, New York 1999; Hynes, William J./Doty, William G., Mythical Trickster Figures: Contours, Contexts, and Criticism, Tuscaloosa 1993; Köpping, Klaus-Peter, "Absurdity and Hidden Truth: Cunning Intelligence and Grotesque Body Images as Manifestations of the Trickster," in: History of Religions 24 (1985), 191-214; Radin, Paul, The Trickster: A Study in American Indian Mythology, commentaries by K. Kerényi and C. G. Jung, New York 1969 ([1]1956); Sullivan, Lawrence E. et al., "Trickster," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 15 (1987), 45-53.

→ Animal, Carnival, Hero/Heroism, Marginality/Liminality, Mask, North America (Traditional Religions), Prometheus

Michael Weis

Truth / Dogma

Levels

1. The dimension of the religious problem of truth is determined according to the levels on which the question of truth is posed.

a) On the level of historical facts and empirical perception, truth is related to the correctness of enunciations. Religious propositions are true or false in this sense, to the extent that they are related to historical or empirical facts. The designation "the five books of Moses" is untrue on this level, because these writings do not come from one author, but from various sources.

b) Furthermore, the question of truth indicates a need for compulsory knowledge of orientation. In this connection, truth means reliability of attitudes, opinions, convictions, and manners of behavior. In this sense, all religions and systems of belief raise a comprehensive claim to truth. They differ, however in the degree to which that claim is systematically reflected and linguistically formulated. Here the function of dogmas enters the scene. These fix the basic condition of what is to be held as valid in a system of belief. Dogmas elucidate the ideological interrelation of inner and outer, by defining orthodoxy and repelling heresies.

c) Finally, the question of truth is posed in the context of theoretical knowledge of the world, with respect to the plausibility of an interpretation of reality. Inasmuch as a religion often claims to elucidate not only one sector of reality, but reality as a whole, it emerges as true, if its interpretation of the world (e.g. as a creation of God) is universally acknowledged.

Accordingly, truth attaches to a system of belief when it corresponds to empirical experience, practical orientation, and theoretical interpretation of the world as a whole. It comes into a crisis, on the other hand, when religious propositions on one or more of these levels are contested. The occasion of this sort of crisis is identifiable as the historical (§ 2) and cultural (§ 3) relativization of truth.

Truth and Truths

2. a) Both in the Greek city states and in the Roman Empire religion was a public affair. The gods were venerated as those of the community. The determination and establishment of truth was the obligation of the state. However, along with the official cults, a multiplicity of offers of religious meaning were present. Mystery religions, together with local and individual spirituality, satisfied the individual needs for certitude of salvation. In this religious landscape, Christianity arose as one belief system among others. In the wake of its expansion, it increasingly found itself with conflicting salvation doctrines (→ Gnosticism, cult of Mithra) and faced the philosophical consciousness of truth. Thus, with the establishment of Christianity as the state religion at the close of the fourth century, the process of the canonization of the Bible began, along with the institutionalization of church offices, and finally, the dogmatization of fundamental truths of faith. Henceforward, the imperial → Church established binding truth and battled its denial ever more stoutly over the course of the Middle Ages. Nor did it eschew the cooperation of state power.

b) Since the early modern age, the Church's claim to a monopoly over truth has seen itself exposed to growing criticism. As a consequence of the → Reformation, truth is no longer accepted simply upon authoritative presentation. It is now to be preserved in critical reference to the Bible. Instead of dogmas, confessions (→ Profession of Faith) are important, and their intent is less a universal validity than a personal adaptation in a 'confessing' (professing) community. Humanism and the universities founded in the Middle Ages occasion the rise of a 'scientific community,' in which truth is produced from a confrontation among varying positions. Furthermore, state order and questions of religious truth are now uncoupled. These approaches are first brought into service, for the peaceful coexistence of various faith convictions, in the Peace of Westphalia (1648).

c) An awakening historical consciousness and the discovery of foreign cultures, in the wake of the Enlightenment, led to further conflicts between ecclesial and general truth-consciousness. Subsequently, questions of religious truth were increasingly privatized and subjectivized. The state of Frederick II enjoined: "Each one becomes blessed [enjoys sacred happiness] in his own fashion." Schleiermacher understood dogmas as "conceptualizations of Christian pious frames of mind." Another tendency interpreted doctrinal tradition ethically (Lessing, Kant). Not doctrinal belief, but moral convictions and casts of mind would then decide the plausibility of pretensions to religious truth. On the other hand, any clinging to time-honored doctrinal propositions for their own sake is designated dogmatism. The course of this concept in Protestantism leads to the plea for an undogmatic Christianity (Harnack), emphasizing one's own decision of conscience, the personal assimilation of the content of faith, and the impossibility of closure in the discovery of truth. In Catholicism, the concern of dogmatic hermeneutics is a transmission of the historical genesis and current of dogmas.

d) On grounds of the progressing globalization, the current situation of the problem of religious truth is signalled by the coexistence of different cultures, with their differing religious elements, and varying systems of belief, all of which have developed differing procedures for approaching truth:

Source of Truth

(1) Intuition: In ancient cultures and non-writing societies, truth often culminates in feeling. Since truth is understood as a substance or sphere, it is reached by empathetic understanding and intuition. Cultures with a monistic image of the world share this conceptualization of truth as a feeling of unity. This route is extended in → mysticism: the oneness of everything is a truth that can only be felt intuitively, since it transcends the restrictions of the thinking faculty and sensible perception.

(2) Communication: Unlike intuition, this route takes its point of origin in the concept that truth is not immediately accessible, and can be attained only by transmission. The true is the outcome of communication, so that it takes its nourishment from authoritative sources: prophets, seers, stars, oracles, or sacred scripture. In particular, the transition to → writing and the canonization of sacred texts (→ Canon/Canonization) are fundamental for the further development of pretensions to religious truth, because they lead to the emergence of elites in exposition, and of teaching systems.

(3) Reflection: A relatively late concept finds the royal road to truth in the independent activity of reason. Where religious truth is sought in this manner, salvation transforms itself into knowing. The attraction of this route lies in its free accessibility to truth, without the transmission of the latter from elites and hierarchies. Nevertheless, when all is said and done, this model turns out to be limited, since it can only discover the rational aspect of religious truth.

(4) Sensation: For the most recent model in the history of thought, what is true is only what can be grasped by the senses (→ Perception). The process does have analogies in the sensory practices of religion. Nevertheless, sensory perception has turned out to be the greatest enemy of the claim to religious truth, since the sense and meaning of religious phenomena remain closed to it.

3. After the "end of the grand narratives" (Lyotard), religion is experiencing a renaissance. The loss of belief in both enlightened reason and a meaning of history leaves a vacuum that can be filled with the 'other's truth.' Accordingly, the question of its truth appears in how it brings to utterance what is referred to as the 'reality of the Holy.' Measured by a rationalistic concept of truth, this claim is not a small one. Still, in the case of Christianity, religion's genuine concern is not correctness, but existential truth—salvation.

Literature

Sources: HARNACK, Adolf, What is Christianity?, New York 1957 (Ger. [1]1900); KANT, Immanuel, Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der bloßen Vernunft (1794), in: Kants Werke, Akademie Textausgabe VI, Berlin 1968; LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, Nathan der Weise, Berlin [2]1983; SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich, Der christliche Glaube, Berlin 1960 ([2]1830/31).

Secondary Literature: BLONDEL, Maurice, The Letter on Apologetics and History and Dogma, Edinburgh 1995; FERNÁNDEZ-ARMESTO, Felipe, Truth: A History, London 1997; KIRKHAM, Richard L., Theories of Truth: A Critical Introduction, Cambridge 1992; LYOTARD, Jean-François, The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge, Minneapolis [12]1999 (Fr. [1]1979); MACGRATH, Alister E., The Genesis of Doctrine: A Study in the Foundations of Doctrinal Criticism, Oxford 1990; SCHMITT, Frederick F. (ed.), Theories of Truth, Malden 2004.

→ Authority, Canon, Christianity, Church, Fundamentalism, Knowledge, Pluralism, Profession of Faith, Revelation, Science, Theology, Tolerance

Markus Buntfuß

UFO

1. The abbreviation 'UFO' (for 'Unidentified Flying Object') has long been an all but magical concept of everyday culture. But, as the 'U' expresses, it lies pretty much in the dark what the term properly relates to. Regarded phenomenologically, a UFO experience contains an encounter with an (at first, or altogether) unexplainable celestial apparition. It belongs in the area of → new myths and systems of belief of the twenty-first century, however, by reason of the fact that the apparition can be, and is, interpreted as a meeting with extra-terrestrial intelligent beings (aliens), where the eyewitness accounts range from simple sighting to out-and-out abduction (see § 3). It is disputed whether all sightings that at first seem unexplainable can actually be related to what is familiar. (German Astrophysicist Illobrand von Ludwiger calls them—all sightings—'UFOs in the broad sense.') In this case, what would be present in the UFO phenomenon would be either an ongoing process of mythologization, or, as other scientists maintain instead, indeed a problem of a small percentage of these sightings remaining mysterious even after analysis—'UFOs in the strict sense.'[1] The reality of an encounter with extraterrestrials is not excluded (but see § 6).

Characteristic of the UFO phenomenon, in any case, is precisely the fact that a massive psychological complex has formed out of speculation, disinformation, and mythic fascination. This complex embraces not only the 'UFO believers,' but also the military and political sector (for example, a UFO belief could conceal secret arms projects), the millions constituting the audience of the entertainment industry, as well as the scientific community.

On the History of the Phenomenon

2. There have been reports of remarkable disc-shaped or wheel-shaped flying objects for millennia (e.g. Ezek 1:4-28). The twentieth century received its UFOs on June 24, 1947. Amateur pilot Kenneth Arnold, flying over Washington state, saw nine semicircular discs "that moved like saucers flung over a wet surface"[2]—a momentous simile, which remained inseparably joined

At the Pyramid of Gizeh, white-clad believers in UFOs attempt to attract extraterrestrials to Earth. Cultic actions such as appear here are inseparably connected with the phenomenon of UFOs, but are to be ascribed directly only to the secondary mythic complex that has taken shape around the unexplained core phenomena (the 'unidentified flying objects'). It is an altogether open question what all of this is ultimately 'about': the 'extraterrestrials' hypothesis is only one possible explanation among many.

with the phenomenon. There followed the first 'flap' in the history of the UFO: by July 30, 1947, 850 sightings of UFOs in the broad sense had been reported. On July 4, United States Independence Day, there were 162 sightings in 37 states. Under the code name "Sign" (later "Grudge"), the U.S. Air Force began to collect the cases. On July 6, 1947, a farmer in Roswell, New Mexico, took Air Force officers to his ranch, where he had found the wreckage of a remarkable flying apparatus. The 'Roswell crash'—still unexplained today, according to some—attracted worldwide attention in 1995, when film shots appeared of the alleged autopsy of an alien allegedly killed at that time (→ New Myths/New Mythologies, with illus.).

In 1951, under the leadership of four Air Force officers and astronomer J. Allen Hynek, Project Blue Book was inaugurated, with the task of assembling the ongoing reports of UFO sightings. In 1956, a scientific institute evaluated some 4,000 reports of sightings between 1947 and 1952: the most reliable of these (from pilots, etc.) contained the highest number of genuine 'alien' sightings, those of 'unknown' objects. This analysis contradicted the thesis of the skeptics that it was mainly poor observers who 'saw' anything unknown.

In 1968, with some 12,000 sightings on file with the U.S. Air Force, a team from the University of Colorado issued the Condon Report under commission of the military. Fifty-nine cases had been investigated. Of these, 33 remained unidentified. Nonetheless, in his Foreword Edward Condon came to the conclusion that there was nothing to the UFO reports. The study therefore drew criticism. Obviously, the reality of the phenomenon cannot be concluded simply from the frequency of the sightings. The possibility of individual and mass suggestion must be taken into account, as with the witch persecutions (see § 6).

There were waves of sightings, among others, in France in 1954, in the United States in 1952, 1966, and 1973, and in the Soviet Union in 1960, 1967, and 1978. In 1989, in Belgium, for nearly a year, there were repeated sightings of giant triangular objects in the sky.[3]

Typology of the Sightings

3. Following Hynek, a distinction had been adopted between UFO sightings and 'close encounters.' In encounters of the first and second kind, the UFO is very close and affects things and persons physically (through light, electromagnetic waves, gravitation, etc.). Encounters of the third kind involve contact with apparently living alien beings. Since 1961—and recently, more intensively—encounters of the fourth kind have been reported: abductions by 'the aliens' on space ships, frequently with painful and humiliating physical manipulations. American artist Budd Hopkins collected and published such reports. The presentations by New York writer Whitley Strieber ("Communion," 1987; "Transformation: The Breakthrough," 1988) are probably the most detailed.

The Problem of Sources

4. A common element in the reports of Hopkins and Strieber is that the statements and first-hand reports of the victims of the abductions had usually materialized only under conditions of hypnotic recall. This method, with all kinds of encounters, raises fundamental problems of source criticism. Interdisciplinary research teams can perform good work. But in order to address the primary controversy regarding the existence and nature of UFOs, there is a need for consensus regarding the reasonableness and scientific merit of such investigations. Investigators such as Jacques Vallée and Illobrand von Ludwiger have developed useful systems of classification for the quality of the sightings and the credibility of the witnesses. Only a common interdisciplinary understanding of the matter can shed light on whether the things described are what they seem to be phenomenologically, or, instead, in their profound ontological structure, are something altogether different.

UFO Cults

5. At the beginning of the 1950s, with the reports of a certain George Adamski (1891–1965), the UFO cult began. Adamski claimed to have had, after the landing of space ships from Venus, telepathic contact with their passengers. Since then, in numberless UFO groups, spiritistic revelations through channel-mediums (→ Channeling) and eschatological and redemptive expectations have fused into an (often sectarian) worldview. At the beginning of 1997 one of these groups in the United States, named Heaven's Gate, committed collective suicide, in order to get on board a hoped-for UFO in the train of the Hale-Bopp Comet, just then appearing in the sky. German and Swiss 'Light Siblings' constantly speak of an 'evacuation' by waves from an electronic-wave ship. Reports by persons claiming to have contacted UFOs are often exposed as falsifications, as in the case of the Swiss Billy Meier. Hollywood, too, has for decades strongly contributed to the UFO cult with → films like "The Day the Earth Stood Still" (1951, dir. Robert Wise), "Close Encounters of the Third Kind" (1977, dir. Steven Spielberg), and "Independence Day" (1998, dir. Ronald Emmerich), just as has television series "X Files" (USA 1993ff., writer Chris Carter), which reached non-English audiences as well in the 1990s.

Science and the UFO Phenomenon

6. A scholar wishing to research the core phenomenon seriously still risks a loss of professional and social status today. The fact that the UFO cult is propagated precisely through ignorance of serious scholarship, however, is increasingly acknowledged, as in the words of para-psychologist Eberhard Bauer: "It is better to go into the subject seriously, than to leave it to the profiteers and charlatans."[4] What ought to be fostered would be an official sighting office with a multidisciplinary team of researchers, in which both natural scientists and technologists, as well as psychologists, anthropologists, and scholars of religion, should take part. The greatest obstacle in UFO research, according to Jacques Vallée, is the hasty assumption (met largely in UFO cults) that UFO space ships would have to be from other planets. Accordingly, the state of the research is disparate and tangled. However, once the subject as such were accepted—just as with the equally exotic astronomical project, Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligence (SETI)—there would be a multiplicity of reasonable hypotheses: UFO phenomena could be connected with, for example, other dimensions of reality (including the future), or an archetypical middle realm, like the collective unconscious (Kenneth Ring, Jacques Vallée), or a realm of 'pre-personal' and 'transpersonal' energies (Stanislav Grof, Ken Wilber), or, finally, the impulses of an extraterrestrial intelligence. It would be highly advisable to take into account the → psychopathology of traumatized depths of the soul, where (from 'poltergeists' to C. G. Jung's 'psychoid projections') very important research problems lie hidden. Collective imaginations and traditional social myths play a role, like the (green!) water men and 'little people' of Celtic Mythology (U. Magin), or traditional stores of religious beliefs such as epiphanies of God and apparitions of Mary.

1. Von Ludwiger 1992, 17.
2. Ibid., 105.
3. Societé d'Études des Phénomènes Spatiaux (ed.), UFO-Welle über Belgien. Zivile, polizeiliche, militärische und wissenschaftliche Augenzeugen berichten. Eine Dokumentation der Massensichtigung, Frankfurt/M. 1993 (Fr. [1]1991).
4. Bauer, Eberhard, "Forschungsobjekt Ufo?", Interview in Süddeutsche Zeitung, 29 December 1994.

Literature

Desmond, Leslie/Adamski, George, Flying Saucers Have Landed, London 1953. Denzler, Brenda, The Lure of the Edge: Scientific Passions, Religious Beliefs, and the Pursuit of UFOs, Berkeley 2001; Hynek, J. Allen/Vallée, Jacques, The Edge of Reality: A Progress Report on Unidentified Flying Objects, Chicago 1975; Korff, Kal K., Spaceships of the Pleiades: The Billy Meier Story, Amherst 1995; Lewis, James R., The Gods Have Landed: New Religions from Other Worlds, Albany 1995; Magin, Ulrich, Von Ufos entführt. Unheimliche Begegnungen der vierten Art, Munich 1991; Matheson, Terry, Alien Abductions: Creating a Modern Phenomenon, Buffalo 1998; Pritchard, Andrea/Stein, Gordon, "Alien Discussions: Proceedings of MIT Abduction Conference," in: The Skeptical Inquirer: The Zetetic. Journal of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal 19,5 (1995), 46 (see also pp. 43-45); Saler, Benson et al., UFO Crash at Roswell: The Genesis of a Modern Myth, Washington 1997; Shepard, Leslie A. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology, Detroit [2]1984; Vallée, Jacques, Passport to Magonia: From Folklore to Flying Saucers, Chicago 1969; Idem, Anatomy of a Phenomenon, London 1974; von Ludwiger, Illobrand, Der Stand der UFO-Forschung, Frankfurt/M. 1992.

→ Epiphany, New Myths/New Mythologies, Science Fiction

Michael Schaefer

Unification Church

The Beginnings

1. The Unification Church, popularly known under the designations 'Moon Sect,' or even 'Moon Movement,' stands among the new religious movements (→ New Religions). It emerged from elements of → Confucianism and Korean → Protestantism. Its founder is Sun Myung Mun (in English, 'Moon,' whence the coarse name for his followers, 'Moonies'), whose family stems from Chon-gin (North Korea). In 1930, the family converted to Presbyterianism, when Moon was just ten years old. As early as 1936, Moon is reported to have had his first visions, in which Christ appeared to him and enjoined him to complete the mission that had remained unfulfilled because of the crucifixion.

Moon's religious course began in 1946, in North Korea, where he had returned from Japan after studies in electro-technology. Beginning in 1951, Moon—then in South Korea—preached a doctrine of his own, and three years later, in 1954, founded the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, incorporating it under civil law. Quite soon afterward, the first missionary activity began, in Japan, the United States, and Europe. The Society for the Unification of World Christianity, founded in 1964, numbered only its seven founding co-members. Finally, the street mission turned out more successfully. The following years (1972–1981) were the most active for the Unification Church, and, especially after Moon's move to the United States in 1972, the principal activities began to be transferred to North America. With Moon's return to Korea, in the mid-1980s, the active missionary phase came to an end. At the end of the 1980s, the Church numbered an estimated 150,000-200,000 members (including Korea).

Organization

2. The Unification Church's organization is divided hierarchically, with Moon's authority undisputed. In addition, there are Moon's direct descendants, and his second wife. His sons gradually receive more and more leadership roles. Moon's wife, especially in recent years, entered the public consciousness as founder of a women's movement, the Women's Federation for World Peace. Every country involved has its own leadership, whose individual centers are each presided over by a center leader. In the inner circle, to be sure, that of the foundational superiors, a Korean dominance is unmistakable.

Connected with the Unification Church are a number of other organizations, partly with a religio-cultural character (e.g., Assembly of World Religions), at times of a religio-economic nature (e.g., Happy World, Inc., in Japan, with some 600 offices), or the publishers Aquarius and KANDO.

Teaching and Religious Life

3. Moon's principal writing, The Divine Principle, appeared in 1957, and achieved the status in the community of a sacred book, along with the Bible. Ultimately more important for instruction and missionary activity, however, was Prof. Young Oon Kim's Study Guide (Divine Principle and Its Application, 1960). Kim came under the influence of the work of Swedish theosophist Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), and is of great importance for the entire development of the philosophy of the Unification Church.

In its basic characteristics, the Unification Church is apocalyptic (→ Apocalypse) and chiliastic (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm), and rests on two elements in particular: (1) a peculiar exposition of the Bible, and of components of the Yin-Yang philosophy, and (2) the emphasis, originating in Confucianism, that matrimony, generational antecedence, and family stand at the focus of theology. Thus, God committed to man and woman the duty of becoming perfect spouses. The Fall is interpreted as a frustration of the divine plan, consisting in the premature sexual union of Adam and Eve. Moon interprets the whole of Jewish and Christian history as God's attempt to reconstitute his relationship to the human being, disrupted since the Fall. Moon's own commission, as 'Lord of the Second Coming,' is to continue the unfinished work of Jesus Christ, and, in a perfect marriage and → family, fulfill God's original plan of creation. Moon's second marriage, contracted in 1960 as the 'Wedding of the Lamb,' is therefore equivalent to the beginning of a new age. As 'true parents,' Moon and his wife can realize spiritual perfection even physically, and lead humanity to a condition of sinlessness, in order to erect God's ideal world on earth.

In Moon's theology of unification, good and evil confront each other in the form of a mitigated → dualism. In its view of the Korean War (1950–1953) and the Cold War, the Communist world was the incarnation of evil, and must then be dutifully overcome by democratic systems, first and foremost by the United States. Moon's anti-Communism is based on the personal experience of his internment in a Communist labor camp from 1948 to 1950. His mission, in his consciousness, is therefore the unification of Korea, and only then that of the world. In recent years, however, the agenda has taken more and more distance from the idea of a military confrontation, and the idea that has been propagated is that of a battle to be waged on a spiritual and political level.

Cult

Cult in the Unification Church is centered on the wedding, marriage itself, and the 'blessing' of couples in great numbers. Most followers lead a bourgeois life. Beginning in 1961, there have been 'mass weddings,' at which 'perfect marriage' and a sinless progeny are vowed. In 1982 in Seoul, 5,837 couples are supposed to have been 'blessed.' In 1995, the last mass wedding of couples was performed, simultaneously on three continents, by telecommunication. Today, non-members, or even persons already legally married, are permitted to participate in these ceremonies.

Membership

One becomes a new member of the Unification Church by participation in seminars, and through study of the The Divine Principle. The reception is finalized by an official vow, in which the candidate recognizes the Principle. Daily and weekly meditations are customary, at which Moon and his wife are present in pictorial image, as 'True Parents' (a title which does not betoken their deification). Mission in the West is no longer particularly worthy of note; the Church's earlier fundraising through collections, or the sale of flowers, pamphlets, etc., has ceased.

Situation Today

4. With the collapse of Communism, the year 1989 signaled, for the Unification Church, the beginning of the end of an active confrontation between the forces of good and those of evil. Today, dialogue is the watchword, and mission in the erstwhile Eastern bloc is long since under way. The Unification Church has always been reproached for too strong an interference, in existing family conditions, between members and their families. Increasingly, the Unification Church has had to fight the appearance of following destructive and authoritarian structures. Today, then, the Unification Church prioritizes the cultivation of a positive image, a change in both its internal practices and its religious and political claims. To what extent its religious community, as a child of the East-West conflict, can also make its message plausible under the changed conditions of world politics, remains to be seen. The task of surviving its charismatic founder, and institutionalizing a mechanism of succession, is something that the Unification Church has yet to face.

Literature

Sources: San Myung Mun, The Divine Principle, trans. and comp. by Young Oon Kim, ed. by the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, Yong San Ku/Seoul 1956; Jones, W. Farley (ed.), A Prophet Speaks Today: The Words of Sun Myung Moon, New York 1975; Young Oon Kim, Unification Theology, New York 1980.

Secondary Literature: Barker, Eileen, The Making of a Moonie: Choice or Brainwashing?, Oxford 1984; Chryssides, George D., The Advent of Sun Myung Moon: The Origins, Beliefs and Practices of the Unification Church, Basingstoke 1991; Dean, Roger A., Moonies: A Psychological Analysis of the Unification Church, New York 1992; Karow, Yvonne, Bhagwan-Bewegung und Vereinigungskirche. Religions- und Selbstverständnis der Sannyasins und der Munies, Stuttgart 1990; Kehrer, Günter, Das Entstehen einer neuen Religion. Das Beispiel der Vereinigungskirche, Munich 1981; Lowney, Kathleen S., Passport to Heaven: Gender Roles in the Unification Church, New York 1992; Mickler, Michael L. (ed.), The Unification Church, vol. 1: Views from the Outside; vol, 2: Inner Life; vol. 3: Outreach, New York 1990.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Mission, New Religions, Sect

Jutta Bernard and Günter Kehrer

Utopia

Abstract and Concrete Utopia

1. Etymologically, the word 'utopia,' derived from the Greek, means the 'place [tópos] that is not [ou],' or 'no such place.' Ever since Thomas Moore's De Optimo Rei Publicae Statu, deque Nova Insula Utopia (Lat., "The Best State of the Republic, and the New Isle of Utopia"), 'Utopia' has been a luminous popular concept. As a generic concept, it denotes the (mostly literary) forms of utopian delineations ('utopian state novel'). Henceforth Utopia, the 'not-place,' is an imaginary place, a wish-picture, at a spatial and/or temporal distance. As an 'abstract Utopia,' this place emerges as the utterly Other, delivered from all historical and material conditionings. In a more modest sense, the 'concrete utopia' (Bloch) reflects the resulting situation (→ Marxism). In utopia, both abstract and concrete, what comes to expression is a yearning, immanent to human thought from time immemorial, for the better, the best. This 'utopian consciousness' is a prerequisite and impulse for every piece of societal progress that human beings are to produce. It may even be that the 'circensian element' (Ueding) that emerges, a counterpart of thinking in mere logic, lends utopia the quality of an instrument of criticism. It is in this sense that Ernst Bloch recalls → art, → fantasy, and → dreams as loci of the utopian, since what comes to expression here is what must be translated in function of the 'not yet realized' (objectively) and the 'not yet conscious' (subjectively).

2. The vision of the better, the perfect, in the consciousness of an autonomous power of action, is an exploit of the modern age. Consequently, the concept of utopia in the modern age is only conditionally transferable to other human ages and social vantages. Nevertheless, even with a ban upon myth, nature, and religion, utopian content is identifiable.

Temporal (Time) Utopias

The Genesis narrative—known also to other cultures, in various conjugations—'recalls' a harmony lying on the threshold of history, and lost through human misbehavior. The promises that come to expression, as well as the perspective of salvation history in everything that occurs, point to the option of reaching this harmony once again, 'after' history. In the Judeo-Christian tradition (in its apocalyptic traditions; → Apocalypse), this 'utopia content' appears to the human being in the shape of a concrete goal, attainable along a kind of railroad of time, and portrayed plastically, in powerful, effective language, and therefore credibly. By way of the prophetical impulse of those who believe that they can determine the exact point in time of a future happy age, on the basis of special knowledge (→ astrology, numerology, division into time-periods, discipleship of the Messiah/false messiah), this notion receives a dramatic concretization. As examples here, we may cite Joachim of Fiore (c. 1130–1202), with his 'Third Empire of the Spirit' dealt with in his Liber Concordiae Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Lat., "Book of the Concord of the Old and the New Testament"; first printing, 1519). Through integration into utopian content, chiliastic and eschatological materials enjoy a considerable potential for radical change and revolution. Further, the conceptions imply the (current) world's imperfection, and thereby the thought of divine imperfection. Here we have an assault on prevailing relationships.

Spatial Utopias

Beginning with the Renaissance, temporal (religious) utopias, which seemed 'attainable' along the path of time, were supplanted by (humanistic) spatial utopias. The utopian sketches that then emerged returned to an ancient model: Plato's Politeia and his Myth of → Atlantis. Common to these outlines was an origin in their respective temporal contexts. As they begin there, they reflect the optimal state. Moore's Isle of Utopia introduced a flood of literary utopian sketches. Here belong Tommaso Campanella's City of the Sun (1623), Johann Valentin Andreae's Christianopolis (1619, in the spirit and milieu of Lutheranism), and Francis Bacon's Nova Atlantis (1626). There appear at the same time a plethora of sketches of the ideal city; these complement the abstract utopias of space and state, since they obviously cannot be generally regarded as the architectonic materialization of the latter. As forms of a utopian effort, nevertheless, they aim at an independent 'utopian perfection' (Joergensen). On this point, they are also to be distinguished from monasteries, whose model translation of an ideal, one taken from the tradition of the 'evangelical counsels' (poverty, chastity, community of goods, obedience), posits less a utopia, than a concretization susceptible of composition. Such a plan is a rationally governable architectonic ideal, intended for the real world as a model, while at the same time being referred to that world in order to be able to survive.

In ever new and distinct ways, the successive utopias of the Baroque era reflect the worlds of experience ('exotic lands'), and philosophical discoveries (Enlightenment) of their time. The spatial utopia is rich in variants, and is applied to different contexts and popularized. Thus, for example, J. G. Schnabel's Insel Felsenburg (Ger., "Isle of Felsenburg," 1731–1743) binds the utopian social outline to 'Robinsonades' and to adventure literature critical of civilization.

Arcadia

From the Renaissance onward, another element complemented utopian consciousness. The former was not as compelling, in its quality as a utopian element, as were the state utopias. En revanche, however, as an aesthetic sign, it was subjectively clearer and plainer, in terms of its interior appreciation as a utopian sign. This new element was that of the 'Arcadia,' whose image Jacopo Sannazaros's novel, Arcadia (printed in 1504), coined definitively. Arcadia had been the object of yearning since antiquity (Vergil). But in the Middle Ages, Arcadia's landscape, despite its similarities with that of Paradise, had been forgotten. The pagan character of Arcadia was too obvious; its origin as a place of pleasure could unfortunately not be wiped away. Henceforward, however, the idyll of the shepherd indicated a Utopian (Arcadian) longing ever critical of the present, and gave Arcadian thought a 'concrete' fundament that could be felt subjectively: homeland (Bloch).

New Temporal Utopias

From the nineteenth century onward, the classic spatial utopia was itself eclipsed by new temporal utopias. The utopias of liberty and equality, of socialism and communism, as utopian constructs, evince cultural similarities to the (religious) temporal utopias.

Negative Utopias

In terms of Engels's demand, "From utopia to science!" out of 'utopian socialism' comes 'really existing socialism.' Over the course of the twentieth century, however, disillusionment with the Soviet system of government, on the one side, and the experience of totalitarian Fascism on the other, fashioned a variant of the original optimistic spatial utopia. The variant, at the same time, can be interpreted as the final chord of the utopian song as such: the negative utopia. It sketches the pessimistic picture of a future society in which, through psychological manipulation, totalitarian governmental systems enslave human beings in unfreedom (George Orwell, 1984, 1948), and interdict them, once and for all, through artificially generated promises of happiness (Aldous Huxley, Brave New World, 1932).

Science Fiction and Utopia

While the utopian novel thus bears utopia to the grave, it solemnizes its trivial resurrection in the genre of → science fiction. In the 'endless spans of outer space,' in "Star Wars," and the land of the 'Jedi knights,' utopian longings find themselves squeezed into myths as fanciful as they are popular.

The Principle of "Hope"

3. An attempt to defeat the troubling paradox of utopia—that antithesis of what is and what ought to be—places high demands on any engagement in utopia. Its defamation as utterly unrealistic fantasy, and the censure of ideologization, come readily to hand. 'Misunderstandings' such as these inevitably issue in attempts to fetter utopia in practical categories. Karl Mannheim differentiates utopia according to types: (1) the salvation doctrines (orgiastic chiliasm), (2) the liberal, humanitarian notion, (3) the conservative idea, and (4) the socialistic/communistic idea.[1] These approaches rightly reflect the ideological content of self-styled (temporal) utopias, whose practical realization in history often conditioned, or still conditions, totalitarian governmental structures. But, in their limitation to practice, these categories reduce the different potentials of the utopian consciousness to a programmatic determination of ends. The category 'hope,' introduced into philosophy by Ernst Bloch, takes the aspiration for the better, the perfect, in earnest, and places it in a new connection with societal practice. Hope can be disappointed, but never falsified! The 'utterly Other,' for human beings, is still both an orientation and a motive for action. In the gray monotony, Arcadia glistens …

1. Mannheim, Karl, Ideologie und Utopie, Bonn 1929.

Literature

Sources: Bloch, Ernst, The Spirit of Utopia, Stanford 2000 (Ger. [1]1923); Idem, The Principle of Hope, 3 vols., Cambridge 1986 (Ger. [1]1959); Bruce, Susan (ed.), Utopia / Thomas More. New Atlantis / Francis Bacon. The Isle of Pines / Henry Neville: Three Early Modern Utopias, Oxford 1999; More, Sir Thomas, Utopia: A Revised Translation, Backgrounds, Criticism, trans./ed. by Robert M. Adams, New York/London 1992.

Secondary Literature: Joergensen, Sven-Aage, "Utopisches Potential in der Bibel. Mythos, Eschatologie und Säkularisation," in: Vosskamp, Wilhelm (ed.), Utopieforschung. Interdisziplinäre Studien zur neuzeitlichen Utopie, 3 vols., Stuttgart 1982, vol. 1, 375-401; Saage, Richard, Utopieforschung. Eine Bilanz, Darmstadt 1997; Manuel, Frank E./ Manuel, Fritzie P., Utopian Thought in the Western World, Cambridge 1979; Schaer, Roland et al. (eds.), Utopia: The Search for the Ideal Society in the Western World, New York/Oxford 2000; Wegner, Phillip E., Imaginary Communities: Utopia, the Nation, and the Spatial Histories of Modernity, Berkeley 2002.

→ Apocalypse, Atlantis, Dream, Fantasy, Garden/Paradise, History, Millenarianism/ Chiliasm, Science Fiction, Time

H.-Georg Lützenkirchen

Values

1. Even in the colloquial sense, values and their imagined or actual change are exposed to a nearly inflationary usage. At the same time, varying understandings of values are cultivated by several scientific disciplines, especially philosophy, religious studies, economics, pedagogy, psychology, and sociology. Common to their efforts is an attempt to grasp human acts less as arbitrary, than as possessed of a tendency to calculability. Viewed from the standpoint of the social sciences, values are social rules or outlooks, of an emotive and/or rational kind, settled in individuals and supporting the activity of individuals or groups. Apart from professional argumentation, each more or less socially relevant expression or change of opinion can then be referred to values, such as when pregnancy counseling (→ Abortion/Contraception) or youth violence are discussed controversially.

Max Weber

2. Today's predominantly sociological reception of the theoretical socioeconomic efforts of Max → Weber conveys an interpretation according to which "given reality is ordered according to categories that [. . .] present the premise of our knowledge, and are bound to the premise of value of that truth that alone can give us the knowledge of experience" (Weber 1904, 213). The objects of Weber's investigations, however, are not societies in the sociological sense, but cultural circles of world religions, and the actions of the persons shaped by them. For Weber, "belief in the value of scientific truth" is the "product of determinate cultures, and not naturally given." At the same time, he ascertains a "belief in the supra-empirical validity of the last and highest value concepts" and an "unexposed alterability of concrete viewpoints." Therefore, "the concrete shape of the value relation is still […] fleeting, subject to change" (ibid.). Today, in retrospect, Weber's warning seems to have been wasted, so that a "wild pursuit of new viewpoints and conceptual constructions" is indeed judged to be the "proper task of social science" (ibid., 214).

3. Scholarship poses questions of the meaning and possibility of freedom of values. In religions, it remains a matter of dispute whether, or to what extent, human concerns for self-definition, and for knowledge, are acknowledged merely as culturally relative, or as universally valid (e.g., human values and → human rights). Conflicts of value emerge daily, individually as well as inter-individually. Here it is a matter either of simple inclinations or of levels of knowledge in the sense defined by philosophically ambitious child psychologist Jean Piaget (1898–1980). To explain values as social rules (philosophically: morality), as an expression of personal competency within a structurally transparent maturation process in Piaget's sense, is to broaden the theme of a dimension neglected in sociology and religious scholarship. How does consciousness arrive at the point of attending to rules? Setting heteronymous and autonomous decisions in mutual opposition, and analyzing the connection between the two as a maturation process, Piaget explains the process of socialization as the progressive development of individual competency, especially that of cognition (Piaget 1977). In the course of an increasing differentiation of personalities, the child develops a mental attitude that consists in a step-by-step dismantling of childish egocentrism. Relatively early, children notice that their parents, and other persons, are neither almighty nor omniscient (infallible), nor ubiquitous, so that they are not gods. In parallel, the childish worldview becomes extensively overcome as a whole, including that of belief in an animated nature, and so in sun, moon, wind etc., as seemingly outfitted with intentions (→ Animism). At the age of about eleven to thirteen years, children grasp that social rules cannot only be laid down by authorities (parents, gods), but also freely negotiated.

Jean Piaget

For the co-founder of sociology as an academic discipline, Émile Durkheim (1858–1917), the source of morality lies in the collective, and values 'are products of the general opinion.' Their objects possess no value of themselves, but only in relationship to certain states of consciousness. The totality of the ideas, convictions, and feelings are presented by society (see Durkheim 1954). For Durkheim, the liberty of the individual lies in the insight into social necessities. While Piaget would have the level of the individual, in the sense of a capacity for knowledge, decisive for social judgments, therefore for values as well, Durkheim finds the level of social environment determinative. This arrangement does not inhibit the individual as part of a pre-modern—that is, with little differentiation of labor—clan, nor as a member of a modern society. In the clan, moral rules are not valid universally, and so not, in principle, independently of culture and society, but with a relation to culture—here in a special measure vis-à-vis one's extended kinship. In the clan, conflicts of value are decided strictly hierarchically, and, in case of doubt (as currently to be observed), by force, while in modern societies with a division of labor, a growing trend is to be seen in the direction of self-development, which contributes to a pluralistic order of values (→ Pluralism). The latter's premise, it must be added, is a type of socialization, whose state of maturation and concept of society accepts a position different from—and, as the case may be, even opposed to—one's own, as enjoying equal rights.

Émile Durkheim

4. One's own hierarchy of values does not always furnish desires or appraisals that are essential and relevant for action. Tenacious ambivalences—that is, orientations appropriated by feelings at once positive and negative—result in futility. Results appear that compare cultures, in → group conformity, in positions and attitudes taken vis-à-vis authorities and innovations, and finally, in feelings concerning achievement (Boesch 1971).

5. Different attitudes with regard to values can widen, and become images of the world, such as emerged in the Cold War between East and West, until approximately 1990. In both political systems, specific types of activity and patterns of interpretation developed, and the transitory risk of a military confrontation increased. Within the Western system of values, to be sure, capitalism and socialism converged in respect of ideas of self-devotion and self-control in connection with the process of the progressing industrialization of the moment (Gouldner 1970).

In a word, value represents a collective designation of mutually complementary or exclusive interpretations of motives, interests, and goals—in toto, of essential foundations of human acts. All evaluations are based on orientations in time, space, symbol, and rule (cf. Durkheim 1968). Religious content in terms of sense and meaning contains evaluations, and is transmitted symbolically.

Literature

Boesch, Ernst E., Zwischen zwei Wirklichkeiten. Prolegomena zu einer ökologischen Psychologie, Bern 1971; Durkheim, Émile, The Division of Labour in Society, London 1984 (Fr. [1]1893); Idem, Sociology and Philosophy, London 1954 (Fr. [1]1898); Idem, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, London 1968 (Fr. [1]1912); Gouldner, Alvin W., The Coming Crisis of Western Sociology, New York 1970; Helle, Jürgen, Soziologie und Symbol. Verstehende Theorie der Werte in Kultur und Gesellschaft, Berlin 1980; Idem, Verstehen and Pragmatism: Essays in Interpretative Sociology, Frankfurt/M. 1991; Joas, Hans, The Genesis of Values, Chicago 2000; Piaget, Jean, The Child's Perception of the World, London 1929 (Fr. [1]1926); Idem, The Moral Judgement of the Child, Harmondsworth 1977 (Fr. [1]1932); Weber, Max, Die "Objektivität" sozialwissenschaftlicher und sozialpolitischer Erkenntnis (1904); Idem, Der Sinn der "Wertfreiheit" der soziologischen und ökonomischen Wissenschaften (1918); Idem, Wissenschaft als Beruf (1919), in: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Wissenschaftslehre, Tübingen [7]1988 ([1]1922).

→ Abortion/Contraception, Authority, Economy, Ethics/Morals, Group, Meaning/Signification, Money, Prestige, Ritual, Science, Socialization/Upbringing, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Weber

Harmut Salzwedel

Vegetarianism

1. The term 'vegetarianism,' defined by the founders of the British Vegetarian Society in 1842 as meatless nutrition, is derived from vegetus (Lat.,

'alive'). This means that vegetarian food excludes the products of a slaughtered animal (including fish). Within the groups of persons who live according to vegetarian principles, there are three forms of diet:[1]

- Ovo-lacto-vegetarians constitute the largest group. These do consume milk, milk-products, and eggs, besides vegetable products.
- Lactovegetarians avoid eggs, in addition to meat and fish.
- The most rigorous section among the devotees of a meatless diet is composed of the vegans, who restrict themselves to a vegetable diet. Vegans avoid animal products across the board (including leather, wool, silk, and honey).

Vegetarianism, nevertheless, is more than a manner of nutrition, and is understood and defined, today more than ever, as a Weltanschauung. The motives for a vegetarian lifestyle are manifold and extend from ethical (moral) and religious (spiritual) considerations, to health, hygiene, and aesthetics, then to ecological and social motives. Amidst this multiplicity, according to polls, motives of health and morals predominate (→ Ethics/Morals). The religiously signed rejection of the killing of living beings and the extension of the object of the Fifth Commandent ("You shall not kill") to all beings endowed with life, enter this discussion. So does the capacity of animals for suffering, and reflections on modern treatment of animals. Thus, vegetarianism stands in direct connection to movements for animal protection and animal rights (→ Animal).

Antiquity

2. The basis for meatless nutrition was laid in antiquity itself. Ethical motives stood in the foreground, followed by considerations of health. The first impetus for the renunciation of meat consumption emerged from the religious sect of the Orpheans in the sixth century BCE. The dietary counsels of the followers of mythical Orpheus lent the Greek understanding of religion new insights. By comparison with received (sacred) dietary proscriptions, a total, and especially, a persevering abstinence represented an altogether new mindset vis-à-vis the sacred food prohibitions.

Until well into the nineteenth century, the vegetarian diet was designated the 'Pythagorean fare,' a designation coming down from philosopher and mathematician Pythagoras (592–493 BCE) and his school. Through belief in a → reincarnation of souls, abandonment of meat and the non-consumption of 'animate' (Lat., 'ensouled') beings became an essential, elementary component of Pythagoreanism.

Being essential to various traditions of → Hinduism and → Buddhism, the vegetarian tradition played a certain role in Christianity, as well.[2] The doctrine of reincarnation is crucial to Buddhist tradition; at the same time Buddhism considers non-violence and vegetarianism as belonging to the five fundamental steps to self-knowledge. The ultimate goal is the state of Nirvana, the ending of all suffering and the release from the circle of rebirth. Hinduism, for its part, is not only one of the oldest religions, but probably the religion with the highest esteem for animals; according to the Vedas and other Hindu texts the eating of meat and thus the acceptance of killing is inconsistent with the liberation from the circle of reincarnation.

In church history, nevertheless, throughout the centuries, the anthropocentricism of the biblical image of the world and the human being prevailed. In its resistance to → Gnosticism, and in order to set itself apart from Pythagoreanism, Christian doctrine now placed human beings, by virtue of their immortal souls, above the animals, which were corruptible beings.[3]

Modernity

Only in mid-nineteenth century did the transition to modern vegetarianism occur, from a point of departure in English vegetarianism. The Vegetarian Society in the UK, as the most important organization worldwide, today has more than 28,000 members. Now the traditional elements of a millenia-old dietary system were joined by the institutionalization of the vegetarian movement. Thus, in 1867, in Nordhausen in Northern Thuringia, the first vegetarian association in Germany was founded, the Verein für natürliche Lebensweise (Ger., 'Association for a Natural Lifestyle'), followed by several other organizations. On an international level, the International Vegetarian Union (IVU) was founded in 1908, and is still active today, with little change.

3. Vegetarianism can be a component of various systems. Obvious here first of all is an incorporation into the multiplicity of dietary systems (→ Eating/Nourishment). The vegetarian diet is an alternative nutritional regime, standing in clear contrast to conventional dietary habits, especially in Western industrial countries. Not coincidentally, modern vegetarianism emerged in the nineteenth-century age of industrialization (→ Industrial Society) and technologization, and in the nutritional changes involved with that period. Vegetarianism was a response to the changing nutritional habits and the diseases of a civilization dependent on nutrition, with its sufficiently well known and scientifically attested diseases emerging from dietary patterns. A first overview of the alternative nutritional tendencies (for example, macrobiotics, raw diet) demonstrates that a meatless (or at least greatly reduced meat content) nutritional recommendation represents the lowest common denominator of these alternative models, and that the vegetarian regime is thus a significant component in today's nutritional behavior.

The life-reform movement in general offers a further opportunity for integration. Naturism, with its 'Back to Nature' effort, as well as its active animal-protection and antivivisection movements, may be especially singled out in this connection. In 1975, Australian ethics professor Peter Singer wrote Animal Liberation, which was the first scholarly work to present ethical arguments for not eating animals or experimenting on them (→ Bioethics; Genetic Engineering). This inspirational book was the perfect compliment to F. M. Lappé's Diet for a Small Planet (1971), which showed exactly how to go about eating things other than animals. What Diet for a Small Planet did for vegetarianism, Animal Liberation did for animal rights, virtually launching the animal rights movement in the U.S. overnight. Animal rights groups started popping up everywhere, including PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals) in the early 1980s and the ALF (Animal Liberation Front) in the 1990s (→ Environmentalism).

Peter Singer

The Situation Today

4. Various estimates and polls indicate that, in Europe at this time, some three to five million persons practice vegetarianism. In Great Britain, vegetarians make up about seven percent of the population. In the industrialized countries three to seven percent consider themselves vegetarians and 20-30 percent buy vegetarian products. The practice of vegetarianism today is not historically determined. But on the basis of the world situation, it is an invitation to individuals. Advocates of meatless nutrition see vegetarianism as the sole possible diet of the future. Citing the same efficiency concerns as environmentalists and economists, many vegetarians see natural resources as being freed up by vegetarianism. Many people believe that the production of meat and animal products at current and likely future levels is environmentally unsustainable. They also argue that even if it does prove sustainable, still, modern industrial agriculture is changing ecosystems faster than they can adapt. While vegetarian agriculture produces some of the same problems as animal production, the environmental impact of animal production is significantly greater. It takes about 10 kg of good quality plant protein—such as wheat and soy—to produce 1 kg of meat protein.

The multiplicity of vegetarian cookbooks in bookstores and the great variety of recipes for vegetarian dishes in women's magazines show quite clearly that a meatless diet has become an element of Western eating culture and nutritional situation. At the same time, more and more persons reflect how a responsible interaction with nature, the environment, and our fellow creatures, can or must appear. The discussion in Christianity of the person/animal relationship (which includes the nutritional aspect) has been carried further in recent years, in talks, discussions, declarations, and the like. Thus, a responsible behavior with animate as well as inanimate nature is pursued as a goal. The extent to which a renunciation of meat is regarded as a logical consequence of this effort is a very individual judgment, even today. Today, acceptance of vegetarianism by medical authorities and the general public is at an all-time high.

1. In Germany, there are c. 250,000-460,000 vegans (and 5 million vegetarians); in the USA estimates give a number of c. 0.9% vegans (and 2.5% vegetarians), with a tendency toward increase. Unfortunately, confirmed estimates are lacking with regard to the number of vegans world-wide; it is reasonable, however, to assume that c. 1% of the global population follows a vegan diet.
2. The vegetarian elements in primitive Christianity have not yet been exhaustively addressed; cf. Rosen 1987.
3. Cf., especially, the work and contributions of Eugen Drewermann.

Literature

Barkas, Janet, The Vegetable Passion: A History of the Vegetarian State of Mind, London 1975; Berry, Rynn, Food for the Gods: Vegetarianism and the World's Religions, New York 1998; Dombrowski, Daniel A., The Philosophy of Vegetarianism, Amherst 1984; Dyer, Judith C., Vegetarianism: An Annotated Bibliography, Metuchen/London 1982; Lappé, Frances Moore, Diet for a Small Planet, New York 1971; Rosen, Steven, Food for the Spirit: Vegetarianism and the World Religions, New York 1987; Singer, Peter, Animal Liberation, New York 2002 ([1]1975); Spencer, Colin, The Heretic's Feast: A History of Vegetarianism, Hanover 1995; Walters, Kerry S./Portmess, Lisa (eds.), Ethical Vegetarianism: From Pythagoras to Peter Singer, Albany 1999; Idem (eds.), Religious Vegetarianism: From Hesiod to the Dalai Lama, Albany 2001.

→ Animal, Buddhism, Eating/Nourishment, Environmentalism, Ethics/Morals, Hinduism, Nature Piety, Reincarnation, Sacrifice

Judith Baumgartner

Veil

1. In many societies, the covering of the head and → hair, from the simple headscarf to a complete cloak, has a long tradition. A person's head is literally of outstanding significance. It is not only the bearer of the brain, and thus the seat of thought and reason, but it is also the locus of all sensory organs. On it, as the highest area of the body, decoration and covering stand out most meaningfully.

People have preconceptions and → prejudices regarding the veiling of Islamic women. These two title photos from the German-speaking press show the extent to which these ideas are dependent upon their presentation in the media. The woman masked in a tent-like black veil, from the magazine ZEIT-Punkte, vol. 1 (1993)—with the title "Islam: Enemy of the West?"—from whose face only the staring, black-framed eyes are to be seen, looks the observer straight in the face. Immediately, a subliminal impression of foreignness, of threat, arises, generated and reinforced by the caption under the picture, which the photograph associates with Islam. The question posed there is actually only a rhetorical one. The answer is given in the photo. Islam is indeed an 'enemy of the

The veiling of the body, or parts of the body, has always served two principal purposes. First, it is meant to protect the wearer from evil influences, be it from the → evil eye, or from → demons, who could penetrate the body at any of the several apertures of the head. By veiling the head, and outwardly altering the appearance, or even making oneself unrecognizable, one thinks to be able to deceive the demons. Because many cultures regard women as the weaker sex, among them the obligation of veiling themselves, or the wish to do so, occurs more frequently. Second, the veiling of the body or its parts is meant to defend wearers against their own evil powers, among which are those of sexual attraction, and therefore of seduction (→ Eroticism). Further: headgear, just like clothing, adornment, or coiffure, is a part of nonverbal communication, and signals to the environment that the wearer belongs to a particular cultural group, or even documents a particular condition (→ Mourning), social state (e.g., married/unmarried), or ideological posture (e.g. orthodox) within the group.

2. A fundamental assertion may be made, to the effect that a head covering possesses a double effect in terms of signal. It is equivalent to a social status, as well as to sexual unavailability. As early as 2000 BCE, it is reported that, among the Assyrians, widows and wives—thus, respectable women—wore veils, while slaves and whores were not permitted a veil, so that they were identified as unfree, unmarriageable, and sexually available. Urban, free, Byzantine women also wore it, in order to distance themselves from poorer women, who went about without a veil because it would have hindered them while working. These influences then determined Islamic practice.

In Christianity as well, the veil was important. According to Paul (1 Cor 11:3-16), a woman is obliged to wear a veil at divine service (where she 'prays or prophesies'). As this commandment is grounded in the Hebrew Bible, it is understandable that it would inform the everyday practice of the Christian-Jewish environment, which prescribed the wearing of the veil. Modern theologians, as Max Küchler, see in the veil a 'crystallization': on the one side, it betokens the subordination of the woman, her position beneath the man, and on the other, it serves for a defense against → eroticism. In the time of the Carolingians (seventh to tenth centuries), it became the obligation of women to cover their heads, especially when attending church. Furthermore, uncovered hair stood for woman's inner sexual and magical power, which it was important to keep under control (→ Witch/Persecution of Witches).

The form of the head covering, however, was at once a modish element, and strongly dependent on worldly events. Thus, at the time of Charlemagne, there was a preference for Byzantine material, worn in the style of the oriental veil, leaving the face free, however. While in the fourteenth century the style was in bonnets, in the fifteenth, Spanish and French hats ruled.

As early as the Byzantine age, clothing, and especially the head covering, served the class society of the Middle Ages to demonstrate membership in a class. As late as the nineteenth century, no lady went out of the house without a head covering. This rule slowly changed with the emerging women's movement at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century. It rejected the bonnet as a sign of woman's subordination to man, just as it battled against the corset and for leg hose and a free selection of hairdo. While this last goes without saying nowadays, the scarf that the farmer's wife still wore in Western countries until the 1950s, and that is still widespread in Italy (especially in Sicily and Sardinia), bears witness to the earlier importance of a head covering. Similar relics include the bridal veil and nuns' clothing ('brides of Christ').

West.' It is altogether otherwise in the picture on the right, on the cover of the Swiss cultural newspaper Du (Ger., "You," 7-8/1994), with the title reading "Islam: The Mediterranean Encounter." Here the dark headscarf scarcely has a negative effect: its wearer openly, and a little slyly, smiles at the reader, and thereby comes into contact with her or him. Oppositely from the depersonalized presentation on the left, here it is the person that counts, not the scarf. The cover picture is a friendly invitation to come into contact with the foreign culture and religion.

Qur'an

3. Through its broad spread in the East, as well as through contact with Byzantine Christians, the veil found entry into Islam. In the → Qur'an itself, it is true, it is only recommended that orthodox women wear part of their scarves over the necklines of their garments (suras 24:31; 33:59). However, there is also a hadith—a declaration of the Prophet Muhammad—that women are to veil themselves when they leave the house: face, hands, and feet are excepted. This hadith forms the basis for the most varied manners of veiling in the Islamic world.

The latter are principally founded in sex. Women are to provoke no lust in men, and neither are they to expose themselves to their lustful gaze. The reason for this is the high value of virginity in Islamic families, which, indeed, also obtains in pre-modern societies generally. Virginity is supposed to guarantee the exact control of reproductive behavior (→ Regeneration/Fertility). Girls' virtuousness was of great importance for the honor of the whole family, and frequently still is today. In order to protect it, besides spatial division of the sexes, the optical neutralization of woman is an important factor.

However, the variety of the manners of, and prescriptions for, the wearing of the veil show that these are just as much determined by culture as by religion. From the simple scarf of the farmer's wife in Turkey or Egypt, to the black tshador of the Iranian woman, to the burqa in Pakistan, which permits women only a partial view through a fence-like opening in the whole-body garment, every nuance is present.

The attitude of Muslim women themselves to the veil, however, is a matter of oscillation. With the opening of the twentieth century, a powerful movement of emancipation emerged among Islamic women, in the course of which its members demonstratively ripped the veils from their heads as a sign of the conclusion of male dominance. In our own day, it is still especially the middle class, with its orientation to Europe and to Western values, that regards the unveiled head as a sign of freedom and progress.

Since the end of the 1970s, a robust return to the veil has occurred. It was first manifest among the women in black tshadors, who paraded them in the face of the West as a symbol of the revolution in → Iran. The linkage of religion and veil with political goals has made the veil a symbol of otherness between Islam and the Western world. The latter sees it as a sign of the rejection of civilization and progress, the former a symbol of their own cultural and religious identity. This symbolic charge explains why so many women have voluntarily donned the veil in recent years. Here a distinction must be made between urban, often well educated, women, who have consciously decided in favor of the veil on grounds of their religious conviction, as a symbol of their self-awareness as emancipated Muslim women—and women, chiefly of rural origin, for whom it is part of the maintenance of a farming tradition. Although most cases are those of this last, the scarf or veil in the Western world has become simply a symbol of the Muslim woman, or even simply of Islam, as the 'scarf debate' (→ Laicism) shows. The media, with their tendency to oversimplification, have also contributed to the emergence of 'veil' as a negative stereotype, so that the very word is now a buzzword arousing or denoting hostility or distaste towards foreigners in Western Europe.

The Veil and Political Discourse

Literature

Bailey, David A./Tawadros, Gilane (eds.), Veil: Veiling, Representation and Contemporary Art, Cambridge/London 2003 (exhibition catalogue); Biebuyck, Daniel P./Van den Abbeele, Nelly, The Power of Headdresses: A Cross-Cultural Study of Forms and Functions, Brussels 1984; Bullock, Katherine, Rethinking Muslim Women and the Veil: Challenging Historical and Modern Stereotypes, Herndon 2002; Göle, Nilüfer, The Forbidden Modern: Civilization and Veiling, Ann Arbor 1996; Guindi, Fadwa El, Veil: Modesty, Privacy and Resistance, Oxford 1999; Knieps, Claudia, Geschichte der Verschleierung der Frau im Islam, Würzburg 1993; Llewellyn-Jones, Lloyd, Aphrodite's Tortoise: The Veiled Woman of Ancient Greece, Swansea 2003; Macleod, Arlene Elowe, Accomodating Protest: Working Women, the New Veiling, and Change in Cairo, New York 1991; Özdalga, Elisabeth, The Veiling Issue, Official Secularism and Popular Islam in Modern Turkey, Richmond 1998; Scott, Georgia, Headwraps: A Global Journey, New York 2003; Shirazi, Faegheh, The Veil Unveiled: The Hijab in Modern Culture, Gainesville 2001; Vogelsang-Eastwood, Gillian, Veiled Images, Rotterdam 1996 (photographs).

→ Clothing, Eroticism, Evil Eye, Gender Stereotypes, Hair, Islam, Laicism

Silvia Kuske

Veneration of Persons / Personality Cult

1. 'Veneration of persons,' or 'personality cult,' indicates reverence for a special personality. This reverence can go so far, in certain cultures, that the venerated persons are actually ascribed divinity. As a result, the designation, which has not yet established itself in religious studies, is often applied polemically, as a 'counter-concept' to reverence for God. Originally, 'veneration of persons' was a 'buzz phrase,' with a negative connotation. It was coined by Nikita Khrushchev in 1956 at the Twentieth Convention of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, as a criticism of the Stalinist brand of leadership. In a system of collective leadership, veneration—or 'cult'—of persons denoted the amassing of power and authority in a single person, and his/her exaggerated veneration. The concept, with a background in political history which is mostly forgotten today, is nevertheless the earmark of a broader spectrum of religious phenomena. A basic distinction must be made as to whether it is living persons who are venerated in cult, or whether the veneration occurs posthumously.

Roman Emperor Worship

2. In the Rome of imperial times, the ruler was accorded special veneration. The original reverence paid to the Roman divinity Genius—the deified power of male generation (cf. Lat., gen-, 'generate')—was transferred to the ruler's genius, or creative power (→ Genius). In the year 29 BCE , the Senate determined that, at all meals, public and private alike, a solemn gift was to be offered to the genius of Augustus. Two years later, Augustus had the Temple of 'Divine Julius' (Aedes Divi Julii in Foro), with its own priestly service, erected for Julius Caesar (murdered 44 BCE) on the Forum Romanum. After his own death, a corresponding Templum Divi Augusti was constructed to his own honor, on the Palatine. By 192, temples were built to seven more deceased Emperors by their successors. After Nero and Trajan, even the title of the reigning ruler (e.g., Dominus et Deus: Emperor Aurelian, reg. 270–275) bore the divine designation. The title of divinity survived even the end of the ancient veneration of persons under Constantine I, who in 324 prohibited the temple cult to the veneration of the ruler, and his interdict prevailed into the Byzantine Age.

Christian Martyrs and Saints

3. With Polycarp at the latest (second century CE), we meet the tradition of honoring Christian martyrs (and later, saints in general) in a memorial cult. Early indeed, it would seem, believers had begun to gather on the anniversary of the martyr's birth or death, at the place in which her or his bones were buried (Lat., memoria, 'memorial place'), to remember the person. Later, such places became the sites of churches, which, as a rule, bore the names of the martyrs. The background of this devotion—besides the community-building commemoration—was the concept that, thanks to their suffering and death for their faith, martyrs were especially possessed of sacred powers (→ Charisma; Power), so that miracles occurred at the location of their graves or → relics. A new type of saint to whom devotional veneration was accorded, appeared on the scene in late-third-century Egypt: the monk of the ascetic life, who had abandoned life in community, and settled in the wilderness, or in remote, uninviting places (→ Monasticism). From the late tenth century onward, however, only those who had been canonized by the

The young Peronist who lights an altar candle in the meeting room of a local Peronist group of Buenos Aires, pays tribute to the founding couple of the Party, Juan Domingo Perón (1895–1974) and his wife, Eva ('Evita') Duarte (1919–1952). Perón led Argentina from 1946 to 1955 with an authoritarian presidential regime that had taken on the characteristics of a mass, social revolutionary, → political religion, such as that recognized in the European Fascism of the twentieth century. His wife 'Evita,' a singer and motion picture actress by profession, succeeded, in exultant scenes, in making herself and the regime advocates of the 'shirtless' poor (Span., descaminados) and women. Evita's early death from cancer, at the age of 33, contributed to her becoming the object of an enthusiastic cult of the dead, promoted by Perón's Labor Party (Partido Laborista). Her corpse was embalmed, and her mausoleum was preserved as a place of pilgrimage, while her office at union headquarters became a room for memorial and meditation. In modern political movements, the veneration of persons encourages an intentional eradication of the boundaries of nation, party, and salvation movement. The devotional shrine pictured here may serve as an example. It is at party headquarters, and features a Catholic altar furnished with missal, crucifix, and Madonna, but dominated by photographs of the 'holy couple,' Juan and Evita. The transition from commemorative picture to image for meditation (perhaps even divine idol) seems fleeting. Granted, charisma and veneration of persons cannot be planned, as was acrimoniously shown at the close of Perón's career. After his political comeback in 1973, Perón tried to 'clone' Evita, presenting his second wife, dancer María Estella Martínez (b. 1931), as 'Isabel,' the new popular leader. After Perón's death, Isabel did succeed him in the presidential chair, but did not possess the capacities for control of the masses that her predecessor had demonstrated, and in 1976 she was ingloriously overthrown by a military junta. (Hubert Mohr)

Pope in a formal process could be regarded as officially 'holy,' or 'saintly,' and thus as worthy of veneration and cult. The Reformers dismantled canonization in all of its forms, but the sacred elevation of men and women as 'blessed ones' or 'saints' survived in Catholicism. Since 1918, this process has taken on the form of a trial, with one attorney or advocate for, and one (colloquially, the 'Devil's Advocate') against the candidate. The process is regulated in the Codex Juris Canonici—the "Code of Canon Law" (canons 1999–2141; → Veneration of Saints).

Outside Europe

4. A particular form of personality cult is found, for example, in Asia, in the manner of reverence or veneration of the religious teacher or 'master.' In some traditions, one's personal → guru is regarded as an embodiment or incarnation of the divinity (sad-guru) from whom a direct transfer of power and salvation to the pupil is expected, and to whom a special reverence is accorded. Gurus like Satya Sai Baba in India, who lays claim to being a divine incarnation (Skt., avatara), or Sri Chinmoy, in New York, whose photograph is used by his followers as an object of meditation, are not so much teachers for the few, as an object of veneration for the many.

Modern Personality Cult, Political

5. As examples of personality cults in modern times, we may consider phenomena within national states and → political religions. Here, politicians have been met with an enthusiastic veneration that can definitely have religious traits. In the Far East (Kim Il Sung in North Korea; Mao Cult in the People's Republic of China), in Europe (Benito Mussolini in Italy; 'Generalissimo' Franco in Spain), and in the USSR (V. I. Lenin, Joseph Stalin), the emergence of a dictator or Führer (Ger., 'Leader'; in It., Duce) in the twentieth century, with its effect on the masses, provided an occasion for the ritual presentation of politicians as 'saviors.' We may cite, for example, the ingenious Führer cult around Adolf Hitler (→ National Socialism). In some cases (Lenin, → Mao, Kim Il Sung), a political veneration of the dead has even made use of the magical presence of the mummified body in mausoleums (→ Mummification). Many dictatorial regimes of the 'Third World,' as well, cultivate a frank veneration of persons, although in most cases they do not survive their champions.

The Cult of Bismarck

Less well known today is the cult around the unifier of Germany, and founder of the German Reich (Ger., 'Empire') from 1871, Otto von Bismarck (1815–1898). Some five hundred monuments to Bismarck were erected, among them the characteristic Bismarck pillars and towers, for which monetary contributions were made amounting to well over 60 million dollars (in today's value and purchasing power). The symbolic content of these was amplified by the fact that they were intentionally built on remnants of prehistoric or medieval constructions, and that they exhibited 'altars,' 'fire altars,' and 'sacrificial stones,' on which could be held the 'circles of the Fatherland' on Bismarck's birthday, and the ritual of the 'Bismarck fires' at the solstices. "Thus, we set fire basins before him, half in his celebration, half smoking with sacrificial incense, beside his temple. And two sentries, who protect the devout pilgrim, repel malevolence, and shield the rising steps."[1] Here was the 'German Messiah,' who had once known how to join a severed Germany, and from whom one hoped for succor in an unsure time. "O Bismarck, stride down from heaven, grasp once more the tiller of the Empire," as the newspaper Bismarck-Bund ("Bismarck Federation") put it in 1904, making Bismarck the equivalent of a patron saint. After 1945, it is true, the Bismarck cult mostly fell into oblivion.

Pop Culture

That prominent persons of pop culture and show business (→ Idol) can now, for all practical purposes, be saints, was proclaimed and demonstrated, in 1999, at the London Tate Gallery's exposition "Heaven" (shown in Düsseldorf and, subsequently, in London). There, for example, a life-sized figure of the Madonna with the face of princess Diana was exhibited—and vigorously criticized in England, where many believers took it as an insult to their religious feelings. The gallery defended the concept with the argument that people today adore supermodels and pop stars, and prefer to go on pilgrimage to princess Diana's grave than to venerate traditional religious figures.

1. Insert with a sketch of a national monument to Bismarck in Dingerbrück; cited according to Heidinger, Hans-Walter, "Der Bismarck-Kult. Ein Umriß," in: Stephenson, Gunther (ed.), Der Religionswandel unserer Zeit im Spiegel der Religionswissenschaft, Darmstadt 1976, 201-214, p. 212.

Literature

Brown, Peter, Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity, London 1982; Cong Dachang, When Heroes Pass Away: The Invention of a Chinese Communist Pantheon, Lanham 1997; Gledhill, Chr. (ed.), Stardom: Industry of Desire, London 1991; Hunter, Helen-Louise, Kim Il-Song's North Korea, Westport 1999; Jourdan, Annie, Napoléon: Héros, imperator, mécène, Paris 1998; LeVitte Harten, Doreet (ed.), Heaven (exhibition catalogue Tate Gallery London/Kunsthalle Düsseldorf), Ostfildern-Ruit 1999; Velikanova, Olga, Making of an Idol: On Uses of Lenin, Göttingen 1996; Walter, Tony, The Mourning for Diana, Oxford 1999.

→ Genius, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Guru, Hero, Idol, Mao (Cult of), Masses, National Socialism, New Myths/New Mythologies, Political Religion, Veneration of Saints

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

Veneration of Saints

Saints and Divine Persons

1. Non-Christian and Christian saints are considered divine persons, in the sense of enjoying a special religious bestowal of grace, although, in their lifetime, in society, they have frequently occupied the position of an outsider. On the basis of the exemplary life ascribed to them, they become phenomena of the daily piety or devotion of believers and groups. → Charisma and the attribution of miracles can raise persons to the status of saints in their own lifetime, since it is not through their death—as it is with martyrs—that they reach religious perfection at last. Especially at a saint's grave or tomb, believers oftentimes erect a devotional center, at which a relic, a statue, or a lifelike fragment of the saint is venerated. The grave, church, and chapel are memorial places of the historical persons, their advents, and their miracles. They draw a boundary between the profane and the sacred worlds, serve as places of common liturgy, and demonstrate that the miraculous power of the saint is still at work.

Devotional Practice

2. Veneration of the saints is not bound up with ritually established frameworks, and is differently marked in different religions. Common elements, however, are pilgrimage, prayers, objects used in exercises of personal piety (e.g., images of the saints), and the application of devotional objects: promised or spontaneous votive offerings, offered in thanksgiving, with a petition for help, or in fulfillment of a vow, such as candles, documents, votive images, or monetary contributions. The relationship between the believer and a saint, which becomes visible in these actions, is not to be reduced to the sheer function of the Do ut des (Lat., "I give in order that you may give") 'contract,' but is frequently the expression of a profoundly religious act. In everyday life, saints serve as succor, protection, and patronage in situations of crisis and challenge. In Christian theology they are only the bearers of petitions to God. But over and above this intermediary function, they are attributed both good powers (the power of healing) and a power of retribution (causes of diseases or death in return for unfulfilled promises).

The statue, in believers' religious practice, is the worldly, human side of the saint, and the symbol of an auspicious, miraculous power, reminding the believer of the exemplary function of the saint's life. It represents the confluence of the human need for the visible manifestation of divine power and its personification. In addition, statues appear at church feasts, or on saints' days and in processions, as theatrical and dramatic symbols. The legends, tales, songs, and hagiographies transmitted by the faithful, carry 'ideal' and edifying reports of the saint's life. In Catholic Christendom, a person is officially regarded as 'holy' after, first, a beatification (declaration as 'blessed,' following an official church veneration), and then only when she or he is declared holy, a 'saint,' in a second step, consequent upon a strictly regulated procedure. Pope John Paul II, in his more than twenty-year reign (until 2005), had pronounced more than 280 men and women saints, and more than 800 blessed—more than any of his predecessors. In particular, a relationship with the present is becoming ever more important: the Saints and Blessed not only need to belong to every age of life and to different nationalities. They must also, so far as possible, have lived and died in the twentieth century, as did Edith Stein, a German Jew converted to Catholicism, who was murdered by the Nazis in a concentration camp. Besides these 'canonized' persons, however—persons inscribed in the official church catalogue of saints—there are many other persons, not officially legitimized as saints, who are venerated by the faithful, such as → Hildegard of Bingen. Meanwhile, certain 'traditional saints'—for example, Saint Christopher, or Saint George—can be excluded from the church's official list.

Historical Practice

3. Christian veneration of the saints developed from the reverence paid to the martyrs of the second century CE, which was succeeded by an intensification of the ancient cult of the dead. Ever since the third century, veneration of the saints has borrowed elements of the Greek veneration of heroes. Veneration of the grave as a 'house of the dead' and the veneration of relics, based in antiquity, are still important today for the veneration of the saints. In modern times, by way of the Enlightenment and the sciences, the saints have been stripped of their miracles and myths. It is true that, for example in the wake of industrialization, devotion to the saints has received a new meaning, especially among the working class, with the veneration of Joseph, encouraged by the Church.

Saints in Other Religions

Phenomenologically, the Islamic saint stands nearest to the Christian. While lacking legitimization according to the Qur'an (Suras 9:31; 10:19), the Islamic saint is classed, in venerability, as the 'Friend of Allah,' and as mediator between the human being and God. For believers, it is Islamic saints' miraculous activity, or wondrous efficacy, that stands in the foreground. Then, further, they rank as instances of right and truth. In Judaism, saints' graves and tombs, and the pilgrimages involved, are essential for their veneration. In addition to the sacred acts of veneration performed at the pilgrimage destinations, the festivals celebrated on the anniversaries of their deaths are noteworthy. Saints in the religions of India are venerated as such in their very lifetime, and after their death. They are regarded as ideals of → asceticism, and thus vessels and vehicles of higher wisdom.

4. The orientation of veneration of the saints to the aspect of the piety of the 'simple folk' has, on the one hand, neglected the theatrical and dramatic potential of this religious practice. On the other hand, the individual fragments of usage or veneration often were not integrated into cultural and religious everyday life. But everyday religious life is part of the power relationship among religion, church, state, politics, and society. Thus, the veneration of the saints is not only a religious force, but also a societal one, that stands at the point of the complex intersection of the formation of individual, kinship, religious, territorial, and political identity. In Palermo, for instance, Saint Rosalia, a patron against the plague from the twelfth century, and patron saint of the city of Palermo, is at the same time a figure of the integration of various social groups in their revolt against Mafia structures in Sicilian society.

Literature

Abou-El-Haj, Barbara, The Medieval Cult of Saints: Formations and Transformations, Cambridge 1994; Ben-Ami, Issachar, Saint Veneration among the Jews in Morocco, Detroit 1998 (Heb. [1]1984); Brown, Peter, The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity, Chicago 1981; Cartwright, Jane (ed.), Celtic Hagiography and Saints' Cults, Cardiff 2003; Dinzelbacher, Peter/Bauer, Dieter R. (eds.), Heiligenverehrung in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Ostfildern 1990; Farmer, David Hugh, The Oxford Dictionary of Saints, Oxford 1978; Meri, Josef W., The Cult of Saints among Muslims and Jews in Medieval Syria, Oxford 2002; Sluhovsky, Moshe, Patroness of Paris: Rituals of Devotion in Early Modern France, Leiden 1998; Taylor, Christopher S., In the Vicinity of the Righteous: Ziyāra and the Veneration of Muslim Saints in Late Medieval Egypt, Leiden 1999; Thacker, Alan/Sharpe, Richard (eds.), Local Saints and Local Churches in the Early Medieval West, Oxford 2002; Vauches, André, Sainthood in the Later Middle Ages, Cambridge 2005 (Fr. [1]1997); Wilson, Stephen (ed.), Saints and Their Cults: Studies in Religious Sociology, Folklore and History, Cambridge 1983.

→ Charisma, Drama, Joan of Arc, Miracles, Relics (Veneration of), Pilgrimage, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Annemarie Gronover

Violence

Theologically, it can certainly be concluded that all religions have the goal of peace. But the opposite goal can just as easily be deduced. The rejection of violence among the historical conditions of a religion's emergence says nothing as yet about the possibility, in other situations, of justifying violence, and founding it in religion. The historical experience of Christians' crusades and Islamic tolerance occasions doubts as to whether the images of the 'sword of Islam' and that of the 'God of love,' have an objective basis at all. Religion is a feature of identity and differences among societies. In → conflict, it can just as well be put to use by warmongers and advocates of violence, as be appealed to by pacifists and opponents of violence.

→ Conflict/Violence, Fundamentalism, Holy War, Peace, Tolerance, War/Armed Force

Christoph Auffarth

Vision / Auditory Experience

Heroldsbach 1949–1952

1. On October 9, 1949, four ten and eleven-year-old girls went to the park of the Castle of Heroldsbach, in Franken (Germany), to gather fall foliage.[1] They had just participated in an evening meditation on Mary. Upon leaving the wood, first one of the girls, then the others, felt a sudden compulsion to pray. Immediately thereafter, they saw, first, a black figure between the trees, then the abbreviation 'JHS' (in the popular German reading, Jesus—Heiland—Seligmacher, 'Jesus—Savior—Beatifier'), in green script between two birch trees, and finally, a female figure in white, 'like Mary,' atop one of the trees. Out of this children's afternoon outing, there developed, unstoppably, one of the longest series of visions in modern history, lasting until October 31, 1952. On the third day of the visions, the Christ Child was seen as well; on the fifth day the children first heard the apparition speak, resulting in a somewhat extended interplay of questions and answers. Subsequently, on the eighth day of the visions 5,000-6,000 of the faithful were present; from October 19–21 the Archiepiscopal Investigation Commission were on the scene. On December 8, 1946, a 'miracle of the sun' occurred—as at Fatima, the visitors saw the solar disc turn. This was adjudged a 'sign' of the Madonna, who came ever nearer to the children. On February 3, 1950, the tactile threshold was crossed for the first time, and Gretel, one of the children, touched Mary's cloak, which felt 'like silk.' From Christmas Eve 1949 on, however, two ambiguous, dark figures were emerging: first a 'black man,' presenting himself as the apparition of the deceased lord of the castle, Baron von Sturmfeder-Horneck, and then, on February 7, 1950, the Devil in very person, who at once gave Gretel "three powerful blows on her chest." The horror reached its climax on May 16–17, 1950, with the 'Russian vision,' as the children saw themselves transported to a landscape of debris and martial combat on the Soviet Crimean Peninsula. The positive side came with the 'Garden of Heaven visions.' As in medieval visions of the afterlife, the children were transported into a celestial garden by rapture, with angels working fields of flowers (May 7–9, 1950). From the end of April onward, the children reported olfactory (scent of roses) and even gustatory (drinking honey-water from rose blossoms) impressions. Another climax was reached on June 8, 1950, as the young visionaries, with those escorting them, went walking on the 'hill of the apparitions' with the Child Jesus. Unfortunately, the Holy Office in Rome failed to share the visionaries' enthusiasm. On December 10, 1951, it had its definitive judgment read from the pulpits: the "apparitions cited are not supernatural." One visionary and one male companion were excommunicated for disobedience. Still, the Diocese of Bamberg discerned 1971 the necessity of a new proscription of a 'Heroldsbach cult.'[2] But finally, in 1998, the enduring pilgrimage to Heroldsbach was officially tolerated by the Catholic Church and its Marian Pope John Paul II and the unauthorized prayer house was consecrated.

The extraordinary perceptions of Heroldsbach belong to a religious tradition of ancient deference: since earliest times, visionaries, prophets, nuns, mystics, and shepherd children have claimed to have received visions (from Lat., videre, 'to see'), apparitions (→ Epiphany), or heard voices ('auditions,' from Lat., audire, 'to hear'), containing unheard-of insights and messages from hidden worlds. How are these to be understood?

Different answers can be given, from the side of perceptual and cognitive theory, from social psychology, or from social and religious history. Here the clear-headed observer treads on thin ice. Almost more than in case of miracles, visionary reports differ enormously regarding to appraisals and judgments, broadening the gap between subjective experience and other persons' descriptions, even to sheer misunderstanding. No neutral denominative vocabulary exists. On one hand, the designation 'vision' comes from Christian theology and mysticism, and today is used in general speech to exalt the profane and the commercial, sentimentally or prophetically ('visionary enterprise,' 'technological vision'). At the same time, there are scientific descriptions, mostly in → psychopathological speech: let one speak of 'sensory delusions,' 'phantasms,' 'optical' or 'acoustical hallucinations' (P. Schallenberg), and 'illusionary' misconstructions of perception, and one is at once open to suspicion of criticism of religion, or even of plain rationalism.

Determination of the Concept

Should one attempt to walk a middle path in religious studies, and find a value-neutral application of the concepts, then visions (and correspondingly, auditions) in the strict sense will be defined as extraordinary experiences of consciousness bound up with optical (or acoustical, etc.) sensations. Under 'sensations' we shall understand not only hypothetical external objects and phenomena, but also those of the imagination or other subjective function—hallucinations, illusions and → projections, individually ('seer' or 'visionary,' → 'prophet,' 'medium' [→ Channeling]) or collectively generated and attested, and received as 'sight,' 'summons,' or 'call'—sensations which mostly are interpreted as religious → experience. Visions in the broad sense are complex psychosocial events, resting indeed on individual mental processes, but imbedded in a sometimes confusing network of a collective work of interpretation and of '(re)actions.' In brief, visions are to be approached as 'social syndromes.' Among optical and acoustical experiences, the former are reported more frequently, and as a rule are allotted greater importance by those involved. Therefore, one often speaks of 'visions' even when, in the course of the experiences, other sensory hallucinations emerge as well. And here we shall do the same.

With respect to content, visionaries claim two special forms of experience of and knowledge of higher worlds. One is insight into hidden knowledge, including prophetical, 'pre-cognitive' (fore-'seeing'), or actually 'visionary' perception of future events. The other is the equivalently sensory, imaginative perception (especially, hallucinatory 'sight') of mythic or historical persons, animals, places, events—gods, guardian spirits, angels, saints, the departed, the landscapes of the afterworld with heaven, purgatory, and hell. The theological distinction between (passive) vision and (active) apparition or → epiphany of a transcendent individual, seems, of course, just as unsatisfying as a restriction to 'full visions' (see § 2), after the model of the medieval journeys to, or in, the beyond (P. Dinzelbacher). According to our present understanding, therefore, apparitions of gods or Mary, just like dreams, are special instances of visions, which, for their part, belong to a societal production of fantasies.

Psychodynamics: Between Sensory Hallucination and Imagination

2. a) Visions and auditions are among the phenomena that constitute the borderline between → perception and → fantasy. They are imagined sensory impressions. More precisely, they represent inner perceptions that are themselves generated less, if at all, by the stimulus information of the sensory apparatus, than by the spontaneous action of the → psyche: by fantasy, by → memory, by representations residing in the memory, by associations, by learned thought-patterns, and/or by dispositive and cultural image-impressions. Such intra-psychical constructs of perception are not restricted to seeing or hearing impressions, but include also olfactory sensations ('phantosmy': 'odor of sanctity,' scent of roses), stimulus of touch and feeling (touching the cloak of the Madonna or the wound in Jesus's side), or indeed gustatory sensations.

Besides their sensory quality, visions can be distinguished according to the measure of their superimposition on observable inter-subjective 'normal reality.'

- With 'partial visions,' also called pseudo-hallucinations or illusions, sensory impressions or sensory constructs emerge within the subjective, environment-related field of perception—a dark figure at the edge of the wood (Marian apparition in Heroldsbach), a diaphanous specter (of a dead person) in the bedroom of the bereaved (→ Spirits/Ghosts/Revenants), a 'voice from heaven' (Matt 3:17), a → UFO on the horizon.
- With 'full visions,' on the other hand, the visionary feels transported to another world. He or she undertakes, for instance, a journey through the skies, where the fate of the good and the wicked is shown, as in moralizing near-death narratives recounted since antiquity, or finds himself or herself in a distant place ('Russian visions' in Heroldsbach; Muhammad's flight through the skies to Jerusalem, sura 17), or undertakes a perilous shamanic journey to overcome demons of disease (ecstatic 'trip' of Friuli Benandanti to a place 'out on the fields').
- At the other extreme we find 'intuitive,' aniconic understanding (Augustine's visio intellectualis,[2] Zen Buddhism's satori), to be listed as an experience of enlightenment (Lat., illuminatio; → Light/Enlightenment) rather than as a vision.

Psychology of Perception: Mental Representations, Attitudes of Expectation, and Environment-Related Conditions

b) Neurophysiologically, and in the psychology of perception, visions rest on the fact that the human brain is extensively disconnected from environmental stimuli. Sensory impressions are perceived as mental representations, or 'percepts,' whereby a few (or, as in hallucinations, no) external stimuli suffice to (re-)construct known patterns out of the memory. "The memory is our most important sensory organ."[3] In the case of the religious vision, this observation means that the religious socialization of visionaries holds a decisive meaning. In the storage capacity of their brain, they have a pre-formed mythic store of signs, ever on call, a language of forms that endows them with a double capacity: to model the inner (and possibly the outer) process of perception according to the precedents of tradition, and to vary this process. Perceptual expectations, predisposed by religious upbringing or social milieu, assign themselves an important role here. Just as I suddenly think that I recognize on the street someone I am looking for, someone for whom I am on the 'lookout,' in many persons, so can a perception-dispositive 'Mary' be summoned and therefore 'found,' under certain circumstances, by way of a scenario of the environment. If the person's interaction with environment is cramped by hunger or weariness, by ascetic practices like → fasting or going without sleep, by the use of drugs, by → trance, hypnosis, or forms of psychic illness such as neuroses or psychoses, the process gains strength (→ Psychopathology). The 'censor system,' with its ability of reality-testing, recedes into the background, in favor of the 'emotion and fantasy system,' to which intensified sensory qualities are attributed (B. Grom). The case of apparitions under post-traumatic stress is familiar, when, early in a time of → mourning, survivors behold their loved ones bodily before them. The same thing occurs in the contrary case of the removal of sense stimuli ('sensory deprivation'), when the environment, screened by a special localization, is minimized, and the psyche is left alone with its percepts. Not by chance did Jesus meet the Devil after forty days in the wasteland, or the Angel Gabriel appear to Muhammad in or before a cave, or today's seekers venture after visions to one of bleakest of wildernesses in America, the edge of Death Valley, on a journey undertaken for the sake of 'self-experience.' Traditionally, it is precisely the 'blind seer'—Teiresias in the Greek myth (→ Oedipus), who sees with his inner, 'third' eye—and who gains special credibility. Spontaneous or neuropsychological processes are indicated by → light phenomena that stand at the beginning of many visionary syndromes, and that are at once filled with mythic shape—and mythic meaning, as with Ezekiel's "cloud with brightness [. . .] and fire" (Ezek 1:4), and the "four living creatures" of the chariot of the throne (v. 1:5). Experiences of brightness here span the arch to the light-tunnel visions, such as are attested in reports of near-death experiences. Especially remarkable are cases in which the vision is inscribed in the body of the visionaries, by way of a mechanism of psycho-somatic identification—for example, when stigmatics show the recorded wounds and stripes of Christ, in the imitation of his sufferings (→ Stigmata/Stigmatics; Francis of Assisi).

Dissociation of the Ego Consciousness

c) Whether arising spontaneously, or consciously initiated, the attested perceptual images or patterns move according to the respective psychic disposition and social situation between 'normal' production of fantasies and being pathologically overpowered by them. Psychologically, one may perhaps speak of a splitting ('dissociation') of the ego-consciousness (B. Grom): thoughts and feelings 'in the head' are projectively shifted to the outside, and there seen, heard, felt as percepts of the objective world—forms of wish-fulfillment, psychic compensation, or fear-repression. But there may also be the possibility of 'secret thoughts' being expressed, of the ambiguous being rendered unambiguous, as repressed or unconsciously wished psychic materials take on form and voice. The perception of hearing an 'inner voice,' that warns, incites, or commands, is widespread. As a psychic instance of the → conscience, this form of subjective perception has found its place in Europe's cultural history since the Socratic daimónion—although, of course, also in the criminal history of psychopathological agents. The transitions to mythic personalizing ("the voice of God is speaking to me") are fleeting.

Subjective and Collective Reality

d) Common to all visions and hallucinations is the fact that subjective perceptions of what is without are observable only conditionally, if at all, by bystanders (e.g., as shadow or light reflexes). This uncoupling of subjective and collective reality posits a key problem for evaluation (including evaluation within the religions). But it seems to be responsible for the enormous psycho- and socio-dynamics of visions. The paradoxical premise, "I see something that you do not see," provokes both the interpreting facility of the community and the seers' charismatic power of conviction. A great deal is at stake: the local group's self-image, the specialists' skill and power of appraisal, the religious distribution of roles, the unity of the world of perception, and, last but not least, the credibility of all of the persons involved. This crisis requires common efforts of interpretation, a 'work on the vision' by a social group, so as to be able to integrate individual 'experience' and social expectations in a collectively negotiated pattern of experience. This integration happens, for example, when that which is perceived becomes filled with the depths of a religious tradition of images and doctrines—whether in the form of figures ('Madonna,' 'The Angel Gabriel'), messages ("Pray three hours a day"—Medjugore, 28 July 1983), or scenarios ('gardens of heaven,' 'suffering of sinners')—, and thereby becomes identifiable as culturally comprehensible signs (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture). Unless the subjective reality of the experience of the image is anchored in a solid religious framework, an 'epidemic of visions' looms. The collective will be swept away by the suggestive current of perceptions of the 'seers.' 'Waves of sightings,' as with the Marian apparitions in Basque Ezkioga (1931–1933), or the → UFOs over Belgium (1989–1990) offer abundant example. Or else those involved, by reason of failed communication, end up at the stake or under psychiatric treatment.

Socio-Dynamics: Visions and Hallucinations as Social Events

3. a) Thus, in each of these experiences, the question of the Sitz im Leben is just as important as is that of its individual genesis. "There will be visions as long as people believe in them. In order to understand visions, then, we must study those who believe in them."[4] Even when they are received in the desert, visions do not happen in empty social space. A typical constellation of involved persons determines the course of the visions, as well as the configuration of their content. In terms of a typology of roles, we can distinguish the following.

(1) The mediums (the visionaries): As the center of the event, they are the triggering factor. With 'hot visions' (see § 3b), they can have a precipitous and seductive career from outsider to insider and religious 'guru': indeed, they can advance to the status of spiritual stars—a gratification that could be too much for children especially.

(2) One or more co-visionaries: Persons who supervise, confirm, and guide the visionaries—the religious → specialist or master (shaman, etc.), or spiritual director (in the medieval and Catholic area, frequently the father confessor), or, indeed, relatives and familiars. These regulate outside contact but also, at times, make the visionary their own creation and preform content and messages, by supervising, or themselves producing the (written, etc.) documentation of the event. They vouch for the authenticity of the spiritual experience (even in confrontation with other representatives of their religious community), and can of course make use of their protégés for political or religio-political purposes.

(3) The audience: These people form the echo chamber, the sustaining instance, and, if they are in tune with one another, the audience can even replace the visionaries. Especially, the 'hot visions' of the modern age are → mass events, the expression of a 'religion from below,' here blazing its spectacular trail. The core event constitutes the point of crystallization for forms of piety in popular religion, which are all too often sensationalistically and politically chopped up and sold by the media. Representatives of the hierarchy regard this kind of spontaneous religious counterculture or 'counter-public' with understandable mistrust.

Social Dynamics: 'Cold' and 'Hot' Visions

b) We are faced with a revealing paradox, at this point, in terms of social history. In many ethnic or traditional religions, visions have possessed, or still possess, their solid place, in initiations, in master-pupil relations, with prophetical role-playing, or with the regular arrival of the dead. In modern industrial society, however, visions seem to occur irregularly, 'chaotically.' One can almost speak of two fundamental forms of the visionary syndrome: one 'cold,' imbedded institutionally, and one 'hot' form, as part of 'ecstatic religion' (Ioan M. Lewis) and spirituality, settled at 'hot spots,' on the far edges of society and institutional control.

Institutionalized Visions

As an example of the initiatory vision, let us examine the 'vision quest' conducted by North American candidates for → shamanism. In 1890, anthropologist Franz Boas reported that young men of the tribe of the Shushwap in British Columbia go into the mountains at puberty, build a sweat lodge, and stay overnight there until an animal appears to them in a vision. They take this animal as their spirit helper or 'protective lord.'[5] Doctrinal visions, accompanying and guiding the master-pupil relation, are found in contemporary Egyptian → Sufism (as well as with the Christian Copts of the same vicinity; see V. J. Hoffman). Prophetical visions are familiar from ancient Israel—most far-reaching, in Ezekiel's 'chariot of the throne' (merkabah) vision, the vision of vocation out of which the mysticism of the → Kabbalah would eventually develop: "In the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, on the fifth day of the month, as I was among the exiles by the river Chebar [near Babylon], the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God" (Ezek 1:1). Ezekiel's symbolism, which was joined on an equal footing by that of John's → Apocalypse, constitutes a transition to fictional visions: political or didactic allegories (→ Hildegard of Bingen; often as a vision by the ruler in a dream: Gen 41, Dan 2 and 4), as well as tendentious literature in visionary garb. Doubtless the most elaborate is Dante Alighieri's Divina Comedia. Thus, the wealth of the religious image-worlds rests not least of all on a visionary production of fantasies and the development of these.

'Hot Visions'

The visions of the ancient Israelite prophets—like the visions of the monks, nuns, and hermits of the Christian monastic culture, and those of → mysticism—occur on the boundary between institution and charismatic 'outsiderdom.' From the 'saint' to the 'witch,' from the divine vision to the diabolical is frequently but a little step.[6] Despite the unforeseeable nature of these spontaneously emerging, hot visions, they follow a typical protocol along their course.

(1) A subjective perception occurs (apparition of light, lightning/voice/touch).

(2) The perception is received with a mythic interpretation or orientation, through the visionary or a co-visionary, as epiphany (of gods, angels, demons), as the 'voice of God,' etc.: it becomes a vision or 'audition.'

(3) The 'reception' of the vision/audition is routinized and ritually solidified (even by way of → trance techniques), while the content is imaginatively decorated and systematized. 'Learning effects' accrue, with both actors and audience; group-dynamic processes of building up (P. Schallenberg) are often discernable, processes that can be promoted from the side of the visionaries by the proclamation of 'secrets' or messages (cf. Fatima).

(4) The stage of decision is reached. A juridical examination, from the side of the established → authority, decides whether the vision/audition is reconcilable with official doctrine, and thus is either integrated or prohibited.

(5) The event is institutionalized: a church is built at the place of the apparition, a new destination for pilgrimages emerges. In case the authenticity is rejected, a special group (→ Sect) can be constituted, as in Heroldsbach in Franken.

Dynamics of Myth: Mythology and Perception

4. a) Extraordinary religious perceptual experiences such as visions and auditions also enter the picture in the choice of the sensory channel through which they manifest themselves to those concerned. The channels are not optional, but are tied to the respective mythic premises. Thus, the God of Israel is an invisible God; his glance slays (Gen 32:31; Ex 33:30)—hence, the modus of perception chosen by God as a mythic person is auditory. YHWH uses a human voice; speaks in a person's sleep (1 Sam 3); thunders from the storm (Job 37:2-5; Deut 4:12; 33); 'roars like a lion' (Hos 11:10; cf. Amos 1:2); at the divine apparition at Sinai, trumpet blasts resound from the mountain. That the people lose their sight and hearing is not coincidental. Perceptual extremes belong to the pathetic enormity of many pictures of God. The German word Donner ('thunder') is to be connected with the name or the ancient Teutonic god of the storm, and of fertility, Donar (Thor). Ancient Roman believers also perceived more or less audible 'sky voices' (Lat., voces caelestes), where they largely rang from temples or groves. The warning voice coming from the grove of Vesta, in 391 BCE, under the name Aius Locutius ('Divine Speaker'), was even personified as a god, and venerated in religious worship.[7] In ancient Greece, on the other hand, as in European modernity, with its sight-oriented societies, visions predominate: Odysseus sees Athena, the children of Lourdes and Fatima see → Mary before they have any other sensory experience of her.

b) Visions and auditions are dramatized, and subjectively experienced, myth. Figures of faith suddenly become sensibly perceptible: as if on an 'inner stage,' they unfold a fantastical, and phantasmatic, life of their own. But visions are also 'religion risky and risked.' Their 'dramatics' result from a seemingly immediate plunge into daily life on the part of the 'Utterly Other'—without reflection, without censorship, at times even without church and safe framework of interpretation. The risk is unveiled when the 'discernment of spirits' and therefore the examination of inner and outer reality is at stake. Here is shown how much revelation a religion endures. Or whether the seer can stand his or her sight.

1. What follows is according to Schallenberg 1990, 164-208, and the documentary appendix, 393-397. Schallenberg evaluates unpublished papers of one of those involved.
2. Augustine, De Genesi ad Litteram, 7,16. Cf. Ruh, Kurt, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, 1 (1990), 103-113.
3. Roth, Gerhard, Das Gehirn und seine Wirklichkeit, Frankfurt/M. [3]1996 ([1]1994).
4. Christian 1996, 71.
5. Boas, Franz, The Shushwap, Leeds 1890; cf. Eliade, Mircea, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, Princeton 1964 (Fr. [1]1951).
6. Dinzelbacher, Peter, Heilige oder Hexen?, Zurich 1995.
7. Varro, Antiquitates Rerum Divinarum, frag. 107 (Cardauns).

Literature

Sources: Dinzelbacher, Peter (ed.), Mittelalterliche Visionsliteratur. Eine Anthologie, Darmstadt 1989; Foster, Steven/Little, Meredith, The Book of the Vision Quest: Personal Transformation in the Wilderness, rev. ed. New York 1988 ([1]1980).—Cf. also Schallenberg 1990.

Secondary Literature:
Psychology: Grom, Bernhard, Religionspsychologie, Munich 1992; Scagnetti-Feurer, Tanja, Religiöse Visionen, Würzburg 2004; Schallenberg, Gerd: Visionäre Erlebnisse. Visionen und Auditionen in der Gegenwart. Eine psychodynamische und psychopathologische Untersuchung, Augsburg [2]1990 ([1]1980); Siegel, Ronald K., Fire in the Brain: Clinical Tales of Hallucination, New York 1992.

History of Religions: Benz, Ernst, Die Vision, Stuttgart 1969; Christian, William A., Visionaries: The Spanish Republic and the Reign of Christ, Berkeley 1996; Clarke, David, The Angel of Mons: Phantom Soldiers and Ghostly Guardians, Chichester 2004; Clausberg, Karl, Kosmische Visionen. Mystische Weltbilder von Hildegard von Bingen bis heute, Cologne 1980; Ginzburg, Carlo, The Night Battles: Witchcraft and Agrarian Cults in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, London 1983 (It. [1]1966); Goodman, Felicitas D., "Visions," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 15 (1987), 282-288; Hoffman, Valerie J., "The Role of Visions in Contemporary Egyptian Religious Life," in: Religion 27 (1997), 45-64; Knoblauch, Hubert: Berichte aus dem Jenseits. Mythos und Realität der Nahtod-Erfahrung, Freiburg 1999; Myerhoff, Barbara, The Peyote Cult, Ithaca 1974; Sahlin, Claire L., Birgitta of Sweden and the Voice of Prophecy, Woodbridge 2001; Smith, Forrest S., Secular and Sacred Visionaries in the Late Middle Ages, New York 1986; Speyer, Wolfgang, "Himmelsstimme," in: Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum 15 (1991), 286-303; Voaden, Rosalynn, God's Words, Women's Voices: The Discernment of Spirits in the Writing of Late-Medieval Women Visionaries, Woodbridge/Rochester 1999; Wiebe, Phillip H., Visions of Jesus: Direct Encounters from the New Testament to Today, New York/Oxford 1997; Zaleski, Carol, Otherworld Journeys: Accounts of Near-Death Experience in Medieval and Modern Times, New York/Oxford 1987.

Theological Positions: Knotzinger, Knut, "Zur Geschichte und Theologie der Unterscheidung der Geister," in: Khoury, Adel Theodor (ed.), Zur Unterscheidung der Geister, Altenberge 1994, 30-72; Rahner, Karl, Visionen und Prophezeiungen. Zur Mystik und Transzendenzerfahrung. Enlarged reedition of the 2nd ed. 1958, ed. by Josef Sudbrack, Freiburg 1989 ([1]1948/49).

→ Channeling, Experience, Fantasy/Imagination, Hildegard of Bingen, Light/Enlightenment, Memory, Mysticism, Parapsychology, Perception/Sensory System, Private Religion, Projection, Psychopathology, Revelation, Shamanism, Stigmata/Stigmatics

Hubert Mohr

Voodoo

Concept

1. Like the Afro-Brazilian religions Candomblé and Umbanda, or Cuban Santería, the Afro-Caribbean Voodoo religion is one of the African systems of religion that emerged in colonialism. These systems were brought to the 'New World' by enslaved members of African tribes, and there underwent an independent development. The word 'Voodoo' (variant, 'Hoodoo') is from the Haitian Creole French language (Fr., vaudou; Creole, vaudoux), where it originated in the language of the Ewe Fon, of West African Benin and Togo. In Haiti, it is used mostly as a denomination of foreigners across the board, and thus is applied to a large number of Haitian indigenous cults. In colonial, and Western Anglo-American, linguistic usage it is a (pejorative) synonym for 'black magic.' Ultimately the denomination is from vodún, the word for 'god' or 'worship' in the language of the Ewe Fon. Beginning in the seventeenth century, 'Voodoo' was used in the missionary literature that dealt with the Ewe Fon, who call an initiate in their religion a vodúnsi or hunsi, a 'bride of the deity,' a concept adopted by the Haitian Voodoo religion. In the Caribbean, in the South of the United States (Florida, Louisiana), and in parts of South America, 'Voodoo' can denote various phenomena. On the one hand, the concept refers to an Afro-Catholic religion that is widespread on the island of Hispaniola, especially in Haiti. The designation can also be applied synonymously with those of persons: for 'spell-worker' (hoodoo doctor) in the Southern states of the United States, for 'witch' (bruja) in Latin America. In the broad sense, 'Voodoo' can denote the religions and cults originating in regions of West Africa.

Political Influence and Social Background

2. Haitian Voodoo is the religion of the former African slaves carried off from West Africa in the eighteenth century by the French colonialists, and put to work in the sugarcane fields. It has at times had an important political role: it was able to mobilize forces against the rulers, as at the close of the eighteenth century in the struggle for the abolition of slavery and the country's independence from France (1804). It gathered opposition to various Haitian regimes devoted to policies of their own interest. The last instance of the latter was under dictator 'Papa Doc' François Duvalier (ruled 1957–1971). Socially, there is a distinction between rural and urban forms of Voodoo. In rural areas, worship and belief are oriented to small farmers, and have their pillars of support in the traditional family alliances. Involvement with ancestors and farming stands at the center of religious practice. Voodoo believers in the cities have adapted their practice to relationships there. They simplify this practice, to an extent, and find a 'secondary family' in the temple communities.

Divinities

3. Like Candomblé and Umbanda in Brazil (→ Afro-American Religions), Haitian Voodoo still manifests authentic African characteristics. Voodoo is a typical example of a → possession cult centered on divinities or groups of divinities (loas, from the lwa of the Yoruba linguistic groups, 'divinity,' or 'mystery'), and originating in the West African ethnic groups Yoruba and Fon. Voodoo's gods, or groups of gods, are called 'mysteries,' or 'saints.' According to Fon myth, there are three regions of the world, in which various gods reign: the sky, the earth, and in between, the clouds. The creator god (Yoruba, Olorun; Creole, Bon Dieu Bon) lives in the remote sky, and is not reverenced.

Loas, the Gods or 'Mysteries' of Voodoo

Name	Rite / 'Nation'	Region of Action, Attributes	Signs of Possession	Symbols	Dwelling places	Region of the World	Sacrificial Gifts	Liturgical Color	Weekday	Christian Correspondence
Legba	Rada	Guardian of the home; intermediary between God and the human being; sentry at the gate, at intersections, and at streets; rival of Dambala	Brutality, strength, violence	Frail old man in shabby clothing	Gates, intersections, medicinal trees	Earth	Cassava, rice, smoked green bananas, piebald hen	Red	Friday, Saturday	St. Peter St. Anthony (lost articles)
Zaka	Rada	Loa of farming and fields, rural, mistrustful, cunning, greedy, hates cities	Looks like a farmer; large straw hat, blue shirt, blue pants, red necktie, straw purse or handbag	mabouya (small reptile)	Fields	Earth	Maize, bread, raw cane-sugar, liquor	Blue, Red, Green	Friday, Saturday	St. Isidore
Gédé	Rada, Petro	Protection from or attraction of harm; Loa of death	Obscene words and gestures, corpselike exterior	Dead, black cross, farm tools	Cemeteries and subterranean places	Earth	Black ram, black cock	Black, Violet, White	Monday, Friday	St. Expeditus
Baron Samdi	Rada Petro	Leader of Gédé (Loa of death)	Macabre, obscene	Tall, black clothing	Cross at the entrance to the cemetery	Earth	Salted Herring, black she-goat, black hen	Black, Violet	Saturday	—
Dambala	Rada	Principle of the good 107 wealth, happiness, prosperity	Serpentine movements	Rainbow snake	Springs and streams	Water	Anything white: chicken, rice, milk, eggs	White	Thursday	St. Patrick, in the expulsion of the snakes from Ireland
Aida Wedo	Rada	Wealth, happiness, prosperity; wife of Dambala	Serpentine movements	Rainbow snake	Springs and streams	Water	Anything white: chiken, rice, milk, eggs	Blue, White	Monday, Tuesday	Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception
Ezili	Rada	Love, beauty, graces, luxury, pleasure, promiscuity; coquette, sensual mulatto	Seductive exterior, provoking behavior, seeks perfume	Heart, mirror	Riverbanks	Water	Toilet articles, choice and elegant food, rice, chicken	Blue, Pink	Tuesday, Thursday	Virgin Mary
Ogu Feray	Rada	Battler of misfortune, warrior, soldier	Authoritarian, coarse language, barrack-room tone of voice	Sword plunged into the earth	Calabash tree, bamboo stalks	Fire	Red cock, bull	Red	Friday, Sunday, Monday	St. James the Great (Santiago)
Agwe	Rada	Protection of seafaring, of oceanic trade, of fishing; mulatto, with blond hair, and sea-green eyes, naval officer	Seeks water for diving and swimming	ship, oar	Sea	Water	White sheep, chicken, champagne	White, Green, Pink	Thursday	St. Ulrich
Simbi	Petro	Gift of clairvoyance, guardian of springs and ponds	Leaps into a pool or river	Water basin	Springs, caves, mountains	Water	Black or gray animals, swine, ram, guinea fowl, turkey cock, chicken	Black, Gray	Tuesday, Thursday, Friday	The Three Wise Men

Following Laënnec Hurbon, Les mystères du Vaudou, Paris 1993, pp. 140-143.

Through the influence of Catholicism, Voodoo believers also know the Christian God. But besides God and the Voodoo divinities, they also venerate two other kinds of spiritual beings: human souls that have become spirits of the dead, and spirits that have never been directly tied to matter. Voodoo gods live in the sea, waterfalls (including the famous Saut d'Eau, with the pilgrimage to Ezili Dantò, i.e. Our Lady of Mount Carmel), springs, forests, at intersections, cemeteries, piles of stones, and in saints' rooms that stand alongside the places of worship. Many gods of Voodoo possess a correspondence among the Catholic saints, on whose feast days they, too, are celebrated (see chart).

The 'Nations'

Gods and rites are divided into groups (Creole, nanchon), according to the regions of their origin. Thus, there are the Wangol (from Angola), the Ibo, and the Kogo. More important, however, are the Rada and the Petro, who are honored especially in urban areas. The word Rada derives from the name of the capital of the old Kingdom of Arada, near Abomey, in Benin, while the Petro cult, more orientated to the indigenous Creoles, refers to the name of a priest, Don Pedro, who, in the eighteenth century, introduced a variant of the Voodoo trance dance. Petro divinities and spirits are invoked especially for magical actions. Obviously, Voodoo priests may support both groups, and a believer is either Rada or Petro, but may likewise take part in ceremonies of the other type.

Worship

4. As with Candomblé in Brazil, and Santería in Cuba, so with the Voodoo cults is it a matter of a typical phenomenon of the fusion of African religions with Catholicism, spiritism, and the religious traditions of the American Indians. The religion of Voodoo, then, refers not to sacred scriptures, but to ritual practice (it can thus be described as a 'cult religion' in that sense). The latter concentrates on the animal rituals of a bloody sacrifice, as well as on → trance dances. Both are regarded as generating a bond with the gods. The rites are practiced by initiated members (hunsi), in cultic groups presided over by priests and priestesses (hugan or mambo). Initiands are introduced into the group by way of a complicated and rather spectacular ritual sequence. The centers of worship are sacred cabins, or city temples, that have an altar and a central post, which latter will enable the loas to descend to believers, and mount them in trance as their 'riding horses.' There exists, besides, a cult of the dead, with meticulous burial rites, and with the mythic figure of the Baron Sam[e]di as 'Lord of the Dead.' Thus the cemeteries become important places of assembly and worship.

Magical Practices

5. The magical practices of Voodoo are renowned and maligned. It is the preferred cult of the lowest social class in Haiti—the small farmers and the urban (sub-) proletariat—although, today, persons of the upper class are also found here. Participants in the ceremonies seek deliverance from all of the difficulties of normal life. Diseases are seen as the effect of demonic spells. In the state of trance, body and soul find relief: Voodoo gods can break the influence of evil demons. Probably the magical practice best known in the West is the one performed with a small doll, through which certain magical actions are seen as being able to effect the injury of someone's health, or even their 'Voodoo death.'

Reception

6. Little magical dolls, bloodcurdling rites, Voodoo death, the invocation of serpents, → zombies, and dismal nocturnal scenarios are the ingredients that have made the Voodoo religion a favorite staging of Western exoticism. Ever since R. Spencer St. John, with his 1884 adventure account Hayita or the Black Republic, new adventure sensations have continually sprung up in the underground of Western fantasy. Like the witches' Sabbath of yore, Haiti's Voodoo, its 'poor aesthetics' and mysterious aura have assumed for outsiders the shape of a hotch-potch of all of the practices tabooed or disparaged by Christianity: bloody sacrifices, trance dances, invocation of the dead (necromancy), dangerous 'black magic.' For thus the Voodoo religion, precisely via its cinematic exploitation, entered the aesthetic trivia of Western pictures: as a cheap staging of popular horror mythology (James Bond—Live and Let Die, 1973; Angel Heart, dir. Alan Parker, 1987).

A different social reality appears behind these fantasy images, however. Poverty (with seventy percent unemployment at the moment, the country currently ranks as the poorest in the Western hemisphere) and political instability have occasioned the emigration of many Haitians to North America. They have taken their native Voodoo religion along with them to the urban centers of this diaspora: to New York and Montreal, but especially to Miami and to New Orleans, where today there is a Historical Voodoo Museum. Voodoo today has also gained a foothold as a magical practice in the European scene, as well: Hamburg, for example, has its own Voodoo store. Whether all of this will exorcize the phantasm of the sinister, bloodcurdling cult, however, remains an open question.

Literature

Deren, Maya, Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti, London 1953; Fleurant, Gerdès, Dancing Spirits: Rhythms and Rituals of Haitian Vodun, the Bada Rite, Westport 1996; Laguerre, Michel S., Voodoo and Politics in Haiti, Basingstoke 1989; McCarthy Brown, Karen, Mama Lola: A Vodou Priestess in Brooklyn, Berkeley [2]2001 ([1]1992); Métraux, Alfred, Voodoo in Haiti, New York 1972 (Fr. [1]1958); Pinn, Anthony B., Varieties of African American Religious Experience, Minneapolis 1998; Rosenthal, Judy, Possession, Ecstasy, and Law in Ewe Voodoo, Charlottesville 1998; Senn, Bryan, Drums of Terror: Voodoo in the Cinema, 1998.

→ Afro-American Religions, Colonialism, North America (Traditional Religions), Possession, South America, Trance, Zombie

Claudio Mattes

War / Armed Forces

War as a Social Institution

1. Definition: War is an organized carrying out of a → conflict between or among groups equipped with deadly weapons. Unlike the individual exercise of violence, war is therefore a societal institution that permits, indeed legally prescribes, the killing of other persons. Depending on the respective degree of organization and complexity of the societies involved, the profile of war can differ greatly. War presupposes the existence of at least a rudimentary military force and apparatus. Minimally organized, or non-organized applications of violence ought not to be called war, but pillage, raid, incursion, or murder, perhaps vendetta, mounted as these efforts are on the basis of groups defined by kinship or location.

Spiral of Escalation

2. Forms and Functions: Since early modernity, a declaration of war on the part of the state has been considered to be a requirement for the beginning of a war. From a perspective of anthropology or politics, however, must be emphasized that there are stages of the escalation and de-escalation of war—with corresponding consequences for the lawfulness of the killing. Thus, Caplow distinguishes hostile contact, threat, mobilization, armed confrontation, escalation and counter-escalation, retreat, two-sided or one-sided appraisal, and reorganization.[1] Accordingly, war can be evaluated as the failure of nonviolent solutions for conflicts—in a spiral of escalation that, in principle, could have been interrupted at any stage. An effective mobilization is required in order to undertake a war of long duration, as it often is, between states. Thus, economic strength acquires great significance in the maintenance of an intensive war.

b) Far more frequent than wars for the defeat of societies that are technologically inferior in principle (for the purpose of building an empire), are wars waged in regions characterized by the prolonged co-existence of more than one society. Military success, then, depends on capacity for coalition. Alliances of groups with different identities can find acceptance under the name of religion. Contractually and ritually constituted amphictyonies (Gk., 'unions of sacred politics') define the 'alliance situation' (→ Holy War). 'Wars of religion' can suddenly occasion the emergence of new alliances.

c) Wars appear 'necessary' when, in materialistic categories (for example, in a refinement of Malthus's thesis of 1798), the management of 'population surplus' that would necessitate more or better 'living space' and resources, is emphasized as an achievement to be pursued. But wars happen culturally: they confirm societal structures and internal cultural legitimizations (male superiority, murder of female newborns). Individual psychology (aggression drive) or phylogenetic ('love or hatred'[2]) deductions explain the organized exercise of violence only to a small extent. By contrast, increasingly complex cost/benefit 'calculations'—oriented to received, group-specific, criteria—may be executed by elites. In that case, they gain in importance, to the extent that the agents cited are still capable of making decisions that are in any way rational. Indeed, against this same rationality, there is a pressure to maintain an adequate potential for defense (if not, indeed, for aggression). This pressure, in turn, bears down on the social organization, its military apparatus, and the economic orientation, an impulse to adaptation. Just as was verified once more at the end of the twentieth century, even in Central Europe, war belongs to the normality of social life. And it belongs there far more frankly than scholarly anthropological and sociological investigations into war and → peace (especially those initiated in the 1960s) wished to admit.

Religion and War

3. The general deficit that afflicts research on war and peace, also affects relationships between religion and war. War brings to a head individual and societal problems bound up with the function of religion: extreme hierarchies and inequality (army), experiences of alienation, loss, and contingency (exile, need, death). Three fields are of interest here: the religious, especially ritual accentuation and reintegration of the crisis conditions; motives for war; and consequences of war for the religions involved.

Ritual Accentuation

a) In many societies, the beginning and end of a military expedition, the departure and return of the → 'heroes,' the wounded, and the dead, are marked by special or accentuated → rituals. These regulate: the beginning and end of situations of social—and, for combatants—moral exception (legitimate killing, male society, hierarchies independent of usual social norms); the handling, distribution, annihilation or integration of booty and prisoners of war; and the translation of the prestige gained in these exceptional situations, that most of society at home has not even perceived, into everyday perception and admiration. Examples of large-scale rituals include the Roman triumph, the ritual murder of prisoners in ancient Mexico (→ Human Sacrifice), or when God—at least theoretically—is handed all of the booty, as in the 'Yahweh War' in Israel.

Motivation

b) Special promises of salvation to killed combatants (reward in Paradise) and a religious dramatizing of the conflict ('demonizing' of the adversary) are frequently introduced as important elements of war. In the 'totalizing' institution of the military, however, and among professional soldiers, the effect of motivation is easily overestimated. A more important function of religion in war, in all likelihood, is to preserve and extend the legitimacy of the conflict (which secures repeated escalation, as well) vis-à-vis non-participants, the unengaged, and even the losing party. The adversary acquires a different quality in becoming a part of a lasting struggle between 'good' and 'evil,' over and above the currently operative reasons, concerning which varying opinions can be held. → Myths and ritual demonstrations that explain victory over others in terms of superhuman means (miracles) are helpful in the management of defeats. A typical narrative structure is the reinterpretation of an irreversible defeat as part of a still open, or even oppositely observed, history, as with the cargo cults of the peoples subjected in imperialism, or in millenarian movements. Thus, war is secured in cultural memorial (→ Memory; Monument/Memorial Places).

Intensified Piety

Religious commitment in spectacular form, especially in the erection of new temples or churches, legitimizes military achievements (just as it does others). This capability is an important part of the decision about the public presence of particular cults, in the hands of the warring elite, which is not always identical with the religious elite. In modern Europe, intensifications, as well as polarizations (intensified rejections), have been observed in the religious practice of those involved in war.[3] For the outward effects (and correspondingly, for documentation), it may be important whether organized religions succeed—at least, temporarily—in channeling diffuse piety. In any case, religion offers combatants, as well as those at home, a medium and means for thematizing fears.

1. Caplow 1995, 6.
2. Eibl-Eibesfeldt 1986.
3. Boll 1997.

Literature

Boll, Friedhelm (ed.), Volksreligiosität und Kriegserleben, Münster 1997; Caplow, Theodore, Systems of War and Peace, Lanham 1995; Crépon, Pierre, Les religions et la guerre, Paris [2]1991 (collection of sources); Dupuy, Trevor N. (ed.), International Military

Soldiers are often in psychically exceptional situations, and many wish for religious encouragement. Discussion in the churches shows various stances vis-à-vis military pastoral care. One element supports a pastoral duty. Another rejects any church engagement, regarding war in itself as violating the fundamental commandments of religion. Here, soldiers have gathered around a large table that has become an altar through the installation of certain sacred accoutrements. The leader of the divine service is distinguished from the other uniformed persons only by the stole around his shoulders. Field Mass and Eucharist are about to begin. (Christoph Auffarth) and Defense Encyclopedia, 6 vols., Washington 1993; Eibl-Eibesfeldt, Irenäus, Krieg und Frieden aus der Sicht der Verhaltensforschung, Munich [2]1986; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Homo publice necans. Kulturelle Bedingungen kollektiven Tötens," in: Saeculum 37 (1986), 150-165; Johnson, James Turner/Kelsay, John (eds.), Cross, Crescent, and Sword: The Justification and Limitation of War in Western and Islamic Tradition, New York 1990; Kroener, Bernhard R./Pröve, Ralf (eds.), Krieg und Frieden. Militär und Gesellschaft in der Frühen Neuzeit, Paderborn 1996; Mosse, George L., Fallen Soldiers: Reshaping the Memory of the World Wars, New York 1990; Van der Linden, Marcel/Mergner, Gottfried (eds.), Kriegsbegeisterung und mentale Kriegsvorbereitung. Interdisziplinäre Studien, Berlin 1991; Von Stietencron, Heinrich/Rüpke, Jörg (eds.), Töten im Krieg, Freiburg 1995.

→ Conflict/Violence, Hero/Heroism, Holy War, Jihad, Martial Arts, Monument/Memorial Places, Peace, Terrorism, Violence

Jörg Rüpke

Water

1. Water is a prerequisite for any life, and determines the daily existence of all persons at all moments. It is as much as about sixty percent of our body, and covers three fourths of the earth's surface. We encounter it as sweet water—as a spring, a river, a waterfall, a lake, dew, rain, clouds, ice, and snow. We use it as we eat, bathe, or drink. It quenches thirst, freshens, cools, heals, cleans, flushes the old out and the new in. Where it is missing, as in the desert, the effect is as life-threatening as where it comes in the shape of floods or storms. As salt water of the oceans and seas, it conceals mighty nutritional resources, is a feared power of destruction, longed-for vacation place, and garbage dump of industrial society.

In religions, the importance and meaning of water is a matter of extremely multiple levels. In myths, it appears not only as a source of life, a generative and renewing power, but also as a dangerous, menacing power, with a violent potential for destruction. As an element presenting the human being with a largely unattainable, uncontrollable space of life, it stands for 'the other,' strange and mysterious, object at once of fascination and trembling. As a force of nature and bestower of life, persons encounter it only with a need to neutralize its effect on them, and to acquire a positive influence on the potential of water for benediction and peril, especially where persons' lifestyle is most powerfully dependent upon this element. The latter is the case in traditional agrarian societies (→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic), or in seafaring or river cultures (Mesopotamia on the Euphrates and Tigris, Egypt on the Nile), and in coastal regions, where fishing is the stuff of life. In worship, it is the indispensable medium of ritual cleansing, which, frequently, alone accomplishes the premise of standing in connection with the Holy (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming). Indeed, when ascribed transforming powers, water is the medium of the Holy itself. For believers, water is especially a means of intensive sensory experience. Water can be felt, heard, seen, smelled, and tasted. All of the qualities ascribed to it are experienced, 'felt,' with all of the senses. Religion is then a matter of corporeal experience (→ Perception/Sensory System).

Uriella (Erika Bertschinger Eicke) is leader and prophetess of the Order Fiat Lux (Lat., "Let there be light"). Here, in Black Forest Ibach, she transforms ordinary faucet water into 'Athrum water.' She swirls the water to the left, counterclockwise, with her left hand. Through the left hand, according to Uriella, the 'Athrum ray' of life, love, and salvation flows into the water, and charges it. But, for example, in curing the sick, she draws negative elements from the body with her right hand. With Fiat Lux, a purifying lifestyle has a high value, in view of the proclaimed purification of earth and humanity. Believers ingest the saving water to cleanse all their organs, and to strengthen their forces of resistance to illness. For injuries, the water is applied externally. Fruit and vegetables, too, should be immersed to prevent damage, and even the effects of medical injections are supposed to be strengthened when this 'universal medicine' is taken along with them. Small wonder, then, if Uriella's followers bring canisters to Ibach, when they visit there, in order to take plenty of water home with them. Even before the foundation of the order, Erika Bertschinger's friendship circle, Lichtquell Bethanien ('Bethany Source of Light') chose as its emblem a shell, with a cross, flowing from the water, and surrounded with a garland of rays. Even today it embellishes the Fiat Lux Order's stationery, along with its newspaper, Der reinste Urquell ("The Purest Fountainhead"). (Benita von Behr and Kirsten Holzapfel)

2. As a space of life accessible to human beings only with difficulty, water is a vehicle of fascination and mystery, and to this very day a projection screen of collective fears and longings most fertile for the formation of myths: Leviathan, Nessie (→ New Myths/New Mythologies)—the notion of monsters living in the water— → Atlantis and the Titanic—the terrifying image of the destruction of civilization in a flood that swallows up everything whole—are just a few examples.

In myths of → origin, water often plays a key role, and frequently exists before the emergence of the world itself. It can represent the original state of formless, as yet unorganized, 'nothing'— → chaos—in which life develops only through the intervention of divine forces; or also, it can possess generative powers that favor or produce the emergence of life. In many cosmogonies, the inanimate original, inanimate flood is passive, and the creative process alone is a matter of the power of the divine will (→ Cosmology/Cosmogony); or, it comes forth by way of the intervention of divine powers, as in the Japanese Kojiki (collection of mythological texts), in which the divine pair, Izanagi and Izanami, thrust a lance into the sea, and when they withdrew it, its salty drops became the first land, the Island of Onogoro. Water can also be a medium of the emergence of new life, or of a new god—without itself actively producing them, as in the Hindu myth in which Brahma, creating himself, is born of a golden egg awash in the water (Manava Dharmasastra 1, 8-9). In the Babylonian myth of creation Enuma Elish, water itself possesses generating forces: both divinities, Apsu, the male sweet water ocean, and Tiamat, the female salty sea, mingle and generate new gods, the sky (Ansar), and the Earth (Kisar).

Many villages of the Canary island of La Gomera celebrate the feast days of the locally venerated saints with exuberant fiestas. After Mass, figures of many of the saints ride out over the sea in boats. For Our Lady of Guadalupe, patron saint of the island, for Our Lady of Mount Carmel, patron of fishers, or, as here, for the feast day of Saint Peter, another patron saint of fishers, on June 29, processions of boats are held. In this fashion, the existential importance of the ocean for the inhabitants of the island is reflected in their local worship and festival culture. This meaning derives, of course, both from the island's geographical relation to the sea, and from the latter's economic importance (fishing and tourism).

In its function as obligatory elixir of life, water stands for the life-bestowing, nourishing, and fertile principle. In Hindu mythology, for example, the water of the Ganges is associated with cow's milk, and addressed as Ma ('mother'). In the Johannine motif of the 'water of life,' or 'living [i.e. running, flowing] water,' in the Fourth Gospel and the Book of Revelation, water is the symbol of everlasting, inexhaustible life. Revelation 22:1-2 tells of a stream of 'living,' crystal-clear water, flowing from the throne of God and the Lamb, and surrounded by trees that bear fruit twelve times a year. Genesis itself (2:10-14) names a stream that flowed through the → Garden of Eden, split into four branches—Pishon, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates—and rendered the land fruitful.

Water also conceals a danger. In the Great Flood, God released the chaotic primeval floods in their devastating force (Gen 7). The sea appears in the Bible as inimical to life, and will no longer exist in the New Creation (Rev 21:1). Yet God is ruler of water (cf. Exod 14:21). Jesus's walking on the water can be understood in this context (Mark 6:45-52).

The conception is very frequently encountered, that the world of the living is divided from that of the dead by water (→ Hereafter). In Greek mythology, the boatman Charon ferries souls to Hades across the river Acheron (in some versions, across the underworld river Styx), and lake of Acheron. In Sumerian belief, the dead cross the underworld river Chabur on their way to the land without return (Kurnugea). In ancient Egypt, it was in all actuality that the Nile divided the world of the living from that of the dead: all gravesites lay to the west of the river, in the direction of the wilderness, while cities were on the east side. In his "Dead Man" (USA and Germany, 1997), filmmaker Jim Jarmusch developed the theme of crossing the water as a North American Indian myth: At the conclusion, dying protagonist William Blake is cast adrift by Indians. In Christian culture, the expression 'to cross the Jordan' recalls similar conceptualizations. With the West African Ewe, the conceptualization is just the contrary: human beings cross a river before their birth. Frequently, water even marks the bounds of the universe, as in the ancient oriental and biblical notion (cf. Gen 1:6-8) of the water of a primeval sea, divided into an ocean in the sky and a sea under the earth, being kept over the firmament and under the disk of the earth.

Last but not least, water possesses mirroring qualities. It is proverbial that the young Narcissus, in the Greek myth, is bewitched by his own image on the surface of a body of water. In Japanese popular belief, the mirror of the water, with its images that reflect and captivate at once, is a means of magical attainment of influence (especially in the demonic spell). It affords a glimpse of the future, as comes to expression in accounts of springs and ponds near temples that withhold a mirror image from those on the brink of death.

Water Deities and Personifications of Water

3. Throughout the world, there are deities, spirits, and mythical or sacred beings—often, but not always, female—specially associated with water. The waters can be the flowing manifestation of a deity, whose residence and place of worship, or region of power, these waters are. The earmarks of cult are decisively dependent on the role played by water in human beings' manner of subsistence. In Catholic Christianity, in dealing with this moist element, reference is made to → saints of whom many are associated with forms in which the waters make their appearance. This reference often points to a particular connection with the saint's biography (death in the water). The list ranges from the patron saints of brooks (Sebastian), springs (Gangolf, Vitus), fishers (Peter, among others; see illus.), shippers and seamen (Christopher and others), to helpers in emergencies at sea (Nicholas of Myra), in searches for the drowned (Catherine of Alexandria), in floods and storms, or to those to be invoked for and against rain. Water deities and spirits may be associated (a) with a mythical or a concrete body of water, for example with a particular river or spring (Greek spring nymphs), (b) the sea, or even (c) with water in general.

a) Mythical, personified rivers include, for example, the Titan Oceanus, who was presented as the father of numerous rivers and springs in ancient Greece, and who surrounded the world as a ring-shaped sweet water river, or, again, Hindu river goddess Sarasvati. As real rivers in India, especially Ganga (the Ganges) and Yamuna are venerated as goddesses, while all rivers are regarded as sacred, and usually female. Places of the confluence of several streams are especially sacred, and favorite → pilgrimage destinations, such as the confluence of Ganga, Yamuna, and Sarasvati in Prayaga (Allahabad), where, every twelve years, the great bathing festival of Kumba Mela attracts millions of pilgrims (→ Feast and Celebrations, with ill.).

b) It is mainly in its function as a trade route, and as a source of nourishment, that the sea is brought into correlation with gods. In ancient Greece, the mighty and irascible god Poseidon ruled over the sea, which he could swirl with his trident and bring seamen into danger. In China, the Sea Goddess and Sky Queen Tin Hau, who can cut the wind to pieces with her sword, is venerated especially in the coastal regions. Ships carry her image in their cabins, along with three paper talismans, which show the goddess in different presentations. In distress at sea, they are burned, one after the other, to win her succor. In arctic religions, the myth of the female Inuit sea spirit Sedna (Nuliajuk) is widespread. She lives at the bottom of the ocean, and, as ruler over the animals, releases certain sea-animals to the hunt. In famine, it is the duty of the shaman to undertake a ritual journey to her, to comb from her long, fluffy hair the soil that symbolizes human misdeeds, and render her favorable once more. In the Afro-American religions, sea goddess Yemanja (→ Sacrifice, with ill.) is especially loved and revered.

c) Not all divinities and mythical beings can be clearly correlated with a certain type of water. The → 'Voodoo' goddess Nau Wata, for example, who is extremely popular in West Africa, lives in the sea, as well as in lagoons, rivers, and lakes. It is much the same with myths of European mermaids, who are regarded as living in rivers and lakes, as well as in the sea.

4. In worship, water can function as a medium of purification, transformation, and energy.

Functions in Workshop

As a purifying substance, water is an important component of worship in many religions, representing an indispensable prerequisite for contact with the saints. Thus, for example, with ritual washing (ghusl) before prayer in Islam (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming, with ill.), or with the veneration of a god (puja) in Hinduism, water is of inestimable value for ritual cleansing. In India, bathing in sacred rivers, such as in the Ganga, apart from their material power of purification, is of the highest ritual and spiritual consequence. It is the same with → Shintô.

As a medium of transformation, and symbol of a new beginning, water is used in Christianity for → baptism. To recall their baptism, Catholics sign themselves with holy water upon entering a church. The same water serves in the benediction of sacred images and utensils. Salt is added when the water is blessed for all of these uses, and the water receives further attention when it is to be employed on other occasions. Holy water for the consecration of a church or altar contains salt, oil, and wine. Baptismal water is consecrated at Easter and Pentecost.

The widespread conception of water as a vessel of sacred, healing, and vitalizing qualities, inspires numberless pilgrims, worldwide, to embark on their journeys. They travel with empty bottles, to fill with water and take home, sensing its need. The precious moisture is sent from Lourdes the world over, Ganges water is sold to the faithful in copper jars, Muslims draw water from the sacred spring Tzamtzam, in → Mecca, and carry it home: it is, of course, an especially precious gift. A container of water is dipped in Uriella's bathtub before mailing (see ill.). The concept is widespread in → New Age religion that ordinary water, although it has lost its original life force, can be 'energetically animated' by means of 'whirlers' and other activation apparatus, and restored to the condition of its primordial energy. Now 'in-formation,' in the form of very fine matter, will have been conveyed to its field of energy. The notion goes back especially to V. Schauberger (1886–1958), J. Grander (b. 1930), and Wilhelm Reich's Orgone theory, but is also an application of 'Reiki' techniques.

Literature

Alley, Kelly D., On the Banks of the Ganga: When Wastewater Meets a Sacred River, Ann Arbor 2003; Brewster, Harry, The River Gods of Greece: Myths and Mountain Waters in the Hellenic World, London 1997; Brittain, Robert, Rivers, Man and Myths: From Fish Spears to Water Mills, Garden City 1958; Eck, Diana L., "Rivers," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 12 (1987), 425-428; Feldhaus, Anne, Water and Womanhood: Religious Meanings of Rivers in Maharashtra, New York 1995; Jing, Anning, The Water God's Temple of the Guangsheng Monastery: Cosmic Function of Art, Ritual, and Theater, Leiden 2002; Jones, Francis, The Holy Wells of Wales, Cardiff 1954; Propp, William Henry, Water in the Wilderness: A Biblical Motif and Its Mythological Background, Atlanta 1987; Rudhardt, Jean, "Water," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 15 (1987), 350-358; Wild, Robert A., Water in the Cultic Worship of Isis and Sarapis, Leiden 1981.

→ Baptism, Benares, Cosmology/Cosmogony, Materiality, Nature, Place (Sacred), Perception, Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming, Purity

Benita von Behr

Weber, Max

Biographical Sketch

Max Weber, born in Erfurt (Germany) in 1864, enrolled in 1882 in Heidelberg to study jurisprudence; in 1884 he carried on his studies in Berlin, where he received a doctorate for a work on trading societies in Italian cities. In 1892 he did a postdoctoral essay on the importance of Roman agrarian history for government and private rights. In 1893 Weber was appointed as professor of economics at Freiburg (Germany); three years later he got a similar chair in Heidelberg, where he lived until 1918—retired from his professorial duties for health reasons since 1903. In 1919 he accepted an appointment at the University of Munich, where he died in 1920.

Interest in Capitalist Economy

In 1891/1892 Weber did an empirical survey of the situation of farm-workers in East Prussia. In analyzing the data he recognized a dilemma of the estate owners: when becoming modern entrepreneurs producing for the market and hiring cheap Polish labor, they inadvertently undermined the German presence in that region. But when sticking to their traditional way of life, they were in danger of descending to the status of simple farmers (Weber 1984 [1892], 903). Weber's analysis witnessed a keen interest in the conditions, emergence, and consequence of a change to a capitalist economy.

The Case of Antiquity

Weber did not see the development of a capitalist economy as self-evident, as he explained 1896 in a lecture on the "Social Reasons for the Decline of Ancient Culture" (1924). Most scholars ascribed the Fall of Rome to the mass migrations; Weber in contrast saw it as an outcome of a gradual social change inside the Empire. Initially, ancient civic communities based their economies on slave labor. Because of their advantageous position on the coast, they engaged heavily in trade. After the second century CE, because of the Pax Romana, when the supply of slaves dried up and the economic focus shifted inland, a self-sufficient estate economy gradually displaced the trade and industry of the cities. When even government officials and soldiers could no longer cover their needs through taxes, but through barter, little remained of the capitalistic trade economy. At the end of Antiquity the cities disintegrated into villages, the culture once again became rural. It was this reversal of development that allowed the dramatic devastation of the mass migrations.

Protestantism and Capitalism

For a rising capitalist economy political conditions were necessary, as the ancient case shows. But they alone were not sufficient for the establishment of capitalism. The other necessary ingredient is the subject of Weber's famous essay, "The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism" (1904/5; see Weber 1992 and 2002). Weber was not the first to notice a connection between Protestant regions and capitalism; he was the first to give an explanation. Impending capitalism needed the support of an internal power, an ethos, because it first had to bring down a powerful opponent: traditionalism. "A person does not 'by nature' want to make more and more money, but simply to live—to live in the manner in which he is accustomed to live, and to earn as much as is necessary for this. Wherever capitalism has begun its work of increasing the 'productivity' of human labor by increasing its intensity, it has run up against the infinitely persistent resistance of this leitmotiv of precapitalist economic labor" (2002 [1904/5], 16]).

This dogged resistance, which Weber almost ascribed to human nature, did not fade away by itself. It was broken by Puritanism, since that religion required from the believers a methodical pattern of working and abstention from consumption (→ Asceticism). It was this manner of life that pushed forward inadvertently the development of capitalism. Weber's thesis elicited a heated debate. Though a few scholars were critical, at the end Weber was convinced (Weber 1910 and 1978) that his argument had withstood all objections.

Economic Ethics in Comparative Perspective

In order "to correct the isolation of this study and to place it in relation to the whole of cultural development" (1992 [1904/5], 284]), Weber turned to studying the religions of Confucianism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Judaism, and Islam, and investigated the relationship of these world religions to economic ethics. During this research Weber made an exciting discovery, recounted by Marianne Weber: "The process of rationalization dissolves magical notions and increasingly 'disenchants' the world and renders it godless. Religion changes from magic to doctrine. And now, after the disintegration of the primitive image of the world, there appear two tendencies: a tendency towards the rational mastery of the world on the one hand and one towards mystical experience on the other. But not only the religions receive their stamp from the increasing development of thought; the process of rationalization moves on several tracks, and its autonomous development encompasses all creations of civilization—the economy, the state, law, science, and art [. . .]. Weber regarded this recognition of the special character of occidental rationalism and the role it was given to play for Western culture as one of his most important discoveries. As a result, his original inquiry into the relationship between religion and economics expanded into an even more comprehensive inquiry into the special nature of all of Western culture" (Marianne Weber 1988 [1926], 333).

The 'Disenchantment' of the World

From this point onward, 'disenchantment,' understood as the development not of a godless world as Marianne Weber implies (→ Secularization), but of a world in which the gods had lost their ontological roots, became a concept that figured centrally in Weber's thinking about the rise and rationality of Western culture (→ Disenchantment/Reenchantment). Weber was not the only German social scientist at that time to link the analysis of modern Western culture to religious history (→ Modernity/Modern Age). And not only capitalism but other modern institutions too were regarded as in need of explanations that took into account the beliefs of the people involved.

Theory of Action

In order to introduce the history of religions into that analysis, Weber turned to the category of 'action' (1981 [1913]). He sharply distinguished a subjectively intended meaning from an objectively valid meaning. Action is intelligible behavior towards objects and requires a subjective meaning that may be more or less clear to the actor. Since meaning is not supplied by experiencing the reality of cosmos or history, religions have to provide them (→ Meaning/Signification). They alone can supply a world view and → ethics that is able to resist the opposite experience of a world devoid of any inherent meaning. Weber insisted that religious meanings differ from personal motivations, and that they are embodied in social interactions (→ Communication). Closely related to this distinction is the one between rational and correct action. An observer may judge an action as rational though it is oriented to assumptions that he regards as invalid. An action oriented toward conceptions of → magic, for example, is subjectively of a far more instrumental character than ethical or mystical religiosity. In Economy & Society the whole section on religion ("Sociology of Religion," or better: "Religious Communities") revolves around that distinction. In the beginning "only the things or events that actually exist or take place played a role in life." But this situation did not last. Early on an important change set in: "Magic is transformed from a direct manipulation of forces into a symbolic activity" (1978 [1921/2], 403). At the end of the process, "intellectualism suppresses belief in magic, the world's processes become disenchanted, lose their magical significance, and henceforth simply 'are' and 'happen' but no longer signify anything. As a consequence, there is a growing demand that the world and the total pattern of life be subject to an order that is significant and meaningful" (1978 [1921/2], 506). It was a religio-historical development that divested the world of inherent meaning and ultimately also transformed the form and validity of religions.

Professionalization of Religions

In Weber's view, the process of disenchantment went hand in hand with the emergence of religious → specialists—the magician, the → priest, the → prophet, and the intellectual (→ Intellectual Religion)—who conceived and controlled the mysterious powers in different manners. Historically, according to Weber, most religions have known only occasional associations of their adherents. Solely a few developed a full-fledged congregational religiosity: Buddhism, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Their congregations faced a major challenge, however, when religion took the direction of world-rejection as a means to → salvation. The more a religion of salvation developed, became systematized, and internalized as an ethics of commitment—in contrast to an ethics of compliance with laws—the more its adherents experienced 'tensions' with the world.

Paradoxes of Modern Culture

Weber sketched this analysis for the first time in chapter 11 of the religion section in Economy & Society written in 1913/14 (1978 [1921/2], 576-610). In 1915 he revised and expanded it in one of his essays on the "Economic Ethics of the World Religions" (Gerth/Mills 1946, 323-359). Religious congregations requiring brotherly love as an ethic of commitment engendered tensions with respect to the spheres of economics, politics, sexuality, science, and art—spheres that the adherents thus came to experience as autonomous and hostile. In these spheres, believers resolved their tensions by efforts either to 'flee' the world or to 'master' it—the former pathway constituting what Weber calls 'mysticism,' the latter 'asceticism.' In either case, new religious practices arose, practices that became integral to religion within the disenchanted world. Contra Marianne Weber, then, 'disenchantment' was, for Max Weber, not the development of a godless culture, but quite the opposite. An increasingly rational culture (→ Rationalism/Irrationalism), aware of the unethical character of the ruling social orders, stimulated the emergences of varied new forms of religiosity. Weber's exposition abounds in examples of this process. Thus, in his view, Calvinism, when it abandoned the prohibition of usury as a result of inherent economic forces, organized charity for orphans and cripples as an undertaking of its own (→ Charitable Organizations). Historically, mystical religions chose the opposite route and practiced, at least in principle, a loving self-surrender, not for the sake of the poor but for the sake of the surrender itself (→ Mysticism). Likewise, regarding the sphere of politics, congregational religiosity did not merely oppose military violence; it favored either a world-fleeing pacifism or active measures to fight the power of sin. Again and again, Weber emphasized the paradox that the same religious ethics that engendered awareness of social orders as ruled by hostile rational forces simultaneously generated new kinds of religiosity. Regarding the spheres of → sexuality and → art, he even observed the development of practices that entailed a re-enchantment of the world, practices comparable to those of world-rejection: → eroticism and art as means to escape the cold rationality of the modern world.

From this perspective, the less a modern rational culture denies inherent meanings in cosmos and → history, the more a quest for meaning devolves back onto the individual. Under these circumstances, the religions handed down from the past are becoming sources for principles of life conduct—albeit sources whose validity now rests solely on subjective individual decisions. In this 'disenchanted' context, the gods acquire a peculiar new life, as Weber declared in his speech "Politics as Vocation" (1919): "Today the routines of everyday life challenge religion. Many old gods ascend from their graves; they are disenchanted and hence take the form of impersonal forces. They strive to gain power over our lives and again they resume their eternal struggle with one another" (Gerth/Mills 1946, 149).

Literature

Works: Gerth, Hans H./Mills, Charles Wright, From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology. Oxford 1946; Weber, Max, Die Lage der Landarbeiter im ostelbischen Deutschland (1892), ed. M. Riesebrodt, Max Weber Gesamtausgabe (MWG) I/3, 2 vols., Tübingen 1984; Idem, "Die sozialen Gründe des Untergangs der antiken Kultur" (1896), in: Gesammelte

Aufsätze zur Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte, Tübingen 1924, 289-311; Idem, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, trans. by Talcott Parsons, London/New York 1992; Idem, The Protestant Ethic and the "Spirit" of Capitalism and other Writings, ed., trans., intro. by Peter Baehr and Gordon C. Wells, Harmondsworth 2002; Idem, "Anticritical Last Word on The Spirit of Capitalism" (1910), trans. and intro. by Wallace M. Davis, in: American Journal of Sociology 83 (1978), 1105-1131; Idem, "Some Categories of Interpretive Sociology" (1913), trans. by E. E. Graber, in: The Sociological Quarterly 22 (1981), 151-180; Idem, Die Wirtschaftsethik der Weltreligionen. Konfuzianismus und Taoismus (1915–1920), ed. by Helwig Schmidt-Glintzer in cooperation with P. Kolonko (MWG I/19), Tübingen 1989; Idem, Die Wirtschaftsethik der Weltreligionen. Hinduismus und Buddhismus (1916–1920), ed. by Helwig Schmidt-Glintzer in cooperation with K. H. Golzio (MWG I/20), Tübingen 1996; Idem, Wissenschaft als Beruf (1917/1919); Politik als Beruf (1919), ed. by W. J. Mommsen and W. Schluchter in cooperation with B. Morgenbrod (MWG I/17), Tübingen 1992; Idem, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, 3 vols., Tübingen 1920; Idem, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, Teil I: Die Wirtschaft und die gesellschaftlichen Ordnungen und Mächte; Teil II: Typen der Vergemeinschaftung und Vergesellschaftung, ed. by Marianne Weber (Grundriß der Sozialökonomik III. Abtlg.), Tübingen 1921/22; Idem, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft. Vol. 2: Religiöse Gemeinschaften (MWG I/22-2), ed. by Hans G. Kippenberg together with Petra Schilm and Jutta Niemeier, Tübingen 2001; Idem, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, edited by Günther Roth and Claus Wittich, Berkeley 1978; Idem, The Sociology of Religion, intro. by Talcott Parsons, Boston 1993.

Secondary Literature: Gauchet, Marcel, The Disenchantment of the World: A Political History of Religion, Princeton 1999; Kippenberg, Hans G., "Religious Communities and the Path to Disenchantment: The Origins, Sources, and Theoretical Core of the Religion Section," in: Camic, Charles et al. (eds.), Max Weber's Economy and Society: A Critical Companion, Stanford 2005, 164-182; Lehmann, Hartmut/Roth, Günther (eds.), Weber's Protestant Ethic: Origins, Evidence, Contexts, Cambridge 1993; Schluchter, Wolfgang, Rationalism, Religion, and Domination: A Weberian Perspective, Berkeley 1989; Weber, Marianne, Max Weber. Ein Lebensbild, Tübingen 1926 (Engl. as: Max Weber: A Biography, New Brunswick/Oxford 1988).

→ Asceticism, Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Economy, Enlightenment, European History of Religion, History, Meaning/Signification, Modernity/Modern Age, Protestantism, Rationalism/Irrationalism, Science, Society

Hans G. Kippenberg

Wholeness / Holism

1. While the term 'whole' has been one of the fundamental concepts of Western philosophy and science from the outset, the concept of wholeness, as a scientific one, is a neologism, having come into use only toward the end of the nineteenth century. Here it is especially biology and psychology that give the concept the meaning that it still has today in scientific theory ('holism'), medicine ('holistic medicine'), or psychology ('holistic psychology').

Concepts and Theories of Wholeness: Goethe

2. The concept of wholeness has a close affinity with the German word Gestalt (originally, 'figure,' 'mold,' 'build,' 'fashion,' or 'shape'—the way in which something is 'contoured,' is 'settled into its space'). Here it was Goethe in particular, who gave this concept its specific meaning in his scientific studies. Thus, he connected with Gestalt the concept of morphological development in metamorphosis—that is, development of living beings as a transformation of Gestalten. Goethe's notion of Gestalt thereby introduces an essential aspect into the conception of totality, or wholeness: that of development. By contrast with the notion of 'form' (forma as the Latin translation of the Greek morphé), Gestalt indicates a movement of development towards the actual totality of the image of an organism. As 'living form,' Gestalt itself is always the expression of a life history. Here the life process is seen from the whole of a being's system and plan. Individual processes are viewed as elements of the production and reproduction of the whole, and not only the achievements of an order—therefore resembling the biological life-plan of a concrete mechanical biophysics—but also the expression of a free principle of Gestaltung, of 'shaping' or formation.

Psychology

In psychology, the gestalt theory enunciated the totality of perception. Christian von Ehrenfels (1859–1932), in his Über die Gestaltsqualitäten (Ger., "On the Qualities of Gestalt"; 1890), presented an example that has since become a celebrated one: he showed the totality, or 'totality-ness' of perception by appealing to → music, where he pointed out that a melody is always perceived 'totally,' in totality, in its 'totality' or 'totalities,' even though it is only individual respective tones that sound. → Perception, insists Ehrenfels, is a gestalt perception—and thus, not a piecing together of individual values into an image, but the grasping, the 'comprehending,' of a gestalt, in the presence of, and by virtue of, individual traits. Here the microcosm is a reproduction of the macrocosm, and vice versa.

Totality, as the foundation of 'gestalting,' and of knowledge—of coming-to-know—is also to be found in the interpretation of history and in culture theory, especially with Oswald Spengler (1880–1936). In his influential Der Untergang des Abendlandes (Ger. 1920–1922; Eng. as "The Decline of the West"), Spengler attempted to demonstrate that the history of high cultures runs a 'gestalt-like course,' that makes it morphologically comparable. The character of cultures as totalities, Spengler holds, is the expression of a culture-forming force that is always typical in each phase of its development.

Holism and System-Thought

3. An important, if not as well known, direction of theories of totality is presented by holism (Gr., to hólon, 'the whole'). The notion goes back to South African statesman and researcher Jan C. Smuts (1870–1970) and his 1926 Holism and Evolution. The work's basic thought is the vitalist idea of a totality of the processes and events of life, but with a renunciation, and even the exclusion of, any concept of finality. Besides Smuts, especially John Scot Haldane, Adolf Meyer-Abich, Edgar Daché, and Ludwig Bertalanffy can be cited. The common interest pursued by these scientists was to overcome the contradictions between the 'mechanism' of classical physics, and vitalism, which had just found renewal by way of the works of Hans Driesch. This reconciliation was to be reached by the complete replacement of the concept of 'end/goal' with that of 'totality.' Unlike 'end,' totality no longer has a purpose or goal to which any course of nature would have to direct itself, or would be directed. This 'teleological,' goal-determined sort of scientific method still harbors a metaphysical remainder, or superfluity, also subjected to a purpose—and thus, although in the broad sense only, has a dependency on a theological concept of creation (→ Progress). For holists, the holistic concept is unencumbered by such metaphysical presuppositions. These scientists produce the notion or concept of totality in its pure functionality. This means that any natural process produces the totality of its possibilities—or, for instance in the case of an injury, or some harm, returns itself to this totality, regenerates itself. Biologically, then, totality is first and foremost the maintenance of totality. This premise founds a fundamental law of living beings. The individual organism seeks to attain and to preserve that which is applied or invested in it as a totality. The general character of this notion is thereby at the same time its preference and prerogative, since unlike both 'mechanism' (cf. → body) and 'vitalism' (cf. → soul), it supplies nothing substantial.

From this conception of totality, Ludwig von Bertalanffy (Theoretische Biologie, Ger.,"Theoretical Biology," 1932) developed the notion of system—which now has played an important role not only in biology (Humberto Maturana), but also, and especially, in the social sciences (Niklas Luhmann). Orders of totality, then, are self-forming, 'autopoietic,' systems. Accordingly, the conceptualization of totality not only overcomes an old problem of theory, the notion of purpose, but lays out an altogether new point of view—that of system, its inner structure, and its relation to its environment. This concept is consequently foundational for the ecological consideration of → nature. In ecology, nature is grasped with the help of the notion of system, and thereby seen as a totality.

Totality and Religion

4. Today once more, in modern → New Age beliefs, especially in physics-oriented approaches ('New Age Science'), totality or holism play a central role, also due to the influence of East Asian conceptions (Daoism and Zen), which help in constituting a foundation for holism becoming a religious movement. According to these holistic approaches, the assembling of units or objects creates a greater reality that is not analyzable with concepts. Gregory Bateson's notion of holism seeks to bridge the gap to the Cartesian scientific understanding. Thus, Bateson can be regarded as the forerunner of Fritjof Capra and Rupert Sheldrake.

For physicist Fritjof Capra, the pregnant trait of all Eastern Weltanschauungen is the experience of all of the phenomena of the world as a manifestation of a single basic reality as the manifestation of a single identity. Capra parallels this with physics, especially with modern quantum mechanics, and so sees both models of the interpretation of the world in a complementary 'togetherness' or composition. It is the whole that determines the relationship of the parts.

Biologist Rupert Sheldrake sees in holism—as developed by Bateson—an ordering principle in living systems. 'Morphogenetic fields' would thus stamp the form, development, and relationship of organisms, as well as the increase and growth of elementary structures (e.g., of crystals). At this point, climatologist Jim Lovelock enters the scene, with a scientific conception of the terrestrial ecosystem worked out by Lovelock and microbiologist Lynn Margolis under the mythic term GAIA (Gk., 'Earth,' and Goddess of Life). For both, the earth is an intelligent living being that guides itself to the optimum result.

Subsequently, holistic medicine now attempts to understand the totality of the person—body, spirit, and soul—in its complex interaction. In this fashion, it seeks to introduce a conceptualization of health through a consciousness-raising in the individual. Numerous new physical and mental techniques, or therapeutic experiments in holistic medicine, are based on age-old conceptions of the cooperation of body, spirit, and psyche (primarily from the Far East and Southern Asia). From the viewpoint of holistic medicine today, these are to be seen as methods to preserve health rather than as therapeutic techniques, and they always aim at the 'entire person,' who is also to be a 'new human being.'

Literature

Sources: Bateson, Gregory, Steps to an Ecology of Mind, New York 1972; Idem, Mind and Nature: A Necessary Unity, London 1979; Bohm, David, Wholeness and the Implicate Order, London 1980; Capra, Fritjof, The Tao of Physics, London 1975; Idem, The Turning Point: Science, Society, and the Rising Culture, New York 1982; Idem, The Web of Life: A New Scientific Understanding of Living Systems, New York 1996; Idem, The Hidden Connections, London 2002; Harman, Willis, Global Mind Change: The Promise of the 21st Century, 21998; Laszlo, Ervin, Systems View of the World: A Holistic Vision for Our Time, Cresskill 1996; Lovelock, James/Margulis, Lynn, Gaia: A New Look at Life on Earth, Oxford 1979; Meyer-Abich, Adolf, Naturphilosophie auf neuen Wegen, Stuttgart 1948; Rogers, Carl, Person to Person: The Problem of Being Human. A New Trend in Psychology, Lafayette 1967; Sheldrake, Rupert, A New Science of Life: The Hypothesis of Formative Causation, London 1981; Idem, The Rebirth of Nature: The Greening of Science and God, London 1990; Smuts, Jan C., Holism and Evolution, London 1926.

Secondary Literature: Antmann, Rolf, Die Ganzheit in der europäischen Philosophie, Tübingen 1990; Ash, Mitchell G., Gestalt Psychology in German Culture, 1890–1967: Holism and the Quest for Objectivity, Cambridge 1995; Benci, Vieri et al. (eds.), Determinism, Holism, and Complexity, New York 2003; Caruana, Louis, Holism and the Understanding of Science: Integrating the Analytical, Historical and Sociological, Aldershot 2000; Esfeld, Michael, Holism in Philosophy of Mind and Philosophy of Physics, Dordrecht 2001; Johnson, David, Hume, Holism, and Miracles, Ithaca 1999; Lawrence, Christopher/Weisz, George (eds.), Greater than the Parts: Holism in Biomedicine, 1920–1950, New York 1998; Philipps, Denis C., Holistic Thought in Social Science, Stanford 1976.

→ Environmentalism, Esalen Institute, Esotericism, Illness/Health, Mysticism, Nature, New Age, Science, Soul

Stephan Grätzel

Will, Free

1. In general, 'will' (in Lat., voluntas; in Ger., Wille; in Fr., volonté) denotes the motivation of an acting subject in the direction of a particular goal. The subject of a will is not necessarily an individual human being, but, in the transferred sense, can also be a collectivity ('general will,' Fr. volonté générale), or a power conceived as transcendent, and as influencing the human being and the world (will of God). Insofar as the will is qualified as free, it presupposes the possible autonomy of the actor/agent. A distinction must then be made between freedom for self-motivation, and freedom for the choice of an end. In this connection, there are ethical issues. Can an action be ascribed to someone's own responsibility, or not? This question, as to whether there can be a willing act or a free choice, has been of importance for judicial findings ever since ancient Greek penal law. The state of affairs concealed behind the problem of free will points to the core of different concepts and problems of religious images of the human being and understandings of the world. Systems of belief do present systems of action, as well, that, by way of morally qualified concepts, seek to motivate a particular activity.

The Human Being and God: Autonomy?

2. When the problem of the expounding of religious concepts steps front and center (in the literary genre of commentaries, or in dogmatic doctrinal systems), explicit questions arise concerning the motives, purposes, and possibilities/opportunities of human action (or transcendent action with respect to human beings), that were transferred, in Western tradition especially, to the question of human volitional freedom. Free will was discussed in the framework of the relationship of → God, the human being, and the world. The ancient Stoic view takes its point of departure in an order of reason that stands at the disposition of the human will. Through → Augustine's (354–430) doctrine on grace, reflection on the question of the freedom of the human will soared to a primary position in the Christian discussion of the relationship between human action and divine grace. In Augustine's writings, a deterministic conception of free will is more and more to be observed. He had once defended, against → Manichaeism, the freedom of the human will to choose between good and evil. In his later work he was still prepared to grant it when the will stood in harmony with the determining, super-ordinate will of God. This position, to the effect that the free will was dependent on the grace of God, which Augustine sought to see prevail over other Christian positions (e.g., against the will-directed anthropology of Pelagius), found its modern resumption in the conflict between Martin → Luther (1483–1546) and Erasmus of Rotterdam (1469–1536). The balanced and moderate position that Erasmus had presented in his De Libero Arbitrio (Lat., "On Free Choice"; 1524), in which he saw the superiority of human beings over animals in their power of decision, was rejected by Luther, in his 1525 treatise De Servo Arbitrio ("On Enslaved Choice"). For Luther, on grounds of Original → Sin and human → predestination, human works can contain no merit for the attainment of the grace of God. For him, freedom comes only from liberation in faith. The criticism, based on this position, of the granting of indulgences, became the occasion of the Reformation. In the nineteenth century, Schopenhauer's discussion of the will shaped a new dimension. The antagonism between will without knowledge, and reason without will, becomes the principle of the explanation of the world. Friedrich → Nietzsche's (1844–1900) aphoristic, indistinct use of 'will to power' would at first bring to expression a liberation, and a conquest of self vis-à-vis the pressures of the world—and an existential objection to God. Here Nietzsche sees a growing basic tendency of all living beings, and ultimately, a fundamental force of the universe. In the wake of Sigmund → Freud's (1856–1939) → psychoanalysis, the question of the attribution of will and reason to human action was transferred to a tension between conscious, reasoning ego and unconscious id, the latter being the locus of the drives, so that the question is then posed of the extent to which the human being can be 'master in his own house.'

Self-Determination

3. In the scientific discussion of the twentieth century, the conditioned status of the human act in terms of psychology, and of the history of society, became an object of inquiry. Now inserted into that larger concern was the question of the freedom of the will. The will, and the extent of its freedom, became a multiply-influenced part of the human constitution. Science discussed the question of the freedom of the will in the context of a world and a human being conditioned by natural law. The theory of → chaos, and a return to propositions on probability, have recently tended to restore the freedom of human activity to its former scope. → Existentialism, in Sartre's (1905–1980) sense, is less against certain forms of determinism than against the fatalism of the human being. The will to freedom becomes the challenge to the individual. Finally, moments of Rousseau's collective will, and of Nietzsche's will to power, strike a connection in Leni Riefenstahl's "The Triumph of the Will," a Nazi propaganda film in the spirit of an aestheticizing religion. The self-extinction of the individual will in a collective will to victory, on the part of the 'body of the people' who are subjected to the Führer's will alone, becomes a popular, superficially Nietzschean, collective intoxication (→ Masses). Now the goal is the oneness of people, Reich, and Führer translated into a mass scene, and at the same time presented in a film. The dilemma of volitional self-determination now entered the political history of the twentieth century, and its quality as a problem was rendered more acute. In the discussion of phenomena such as the new religious movements (→ New Religions), or fundamentalist currents as well, the problem of freedom, and of the possible manipulation of the human will, abides as an explosive, controversial topic (→ Anti-Cult Movements).

Islam

4. The concept of volitional freedom is characteristic of Western culture and philosophy. But the question of the subject and the autonomy of human activity can be reconstituted as a fundamental problem of non-European belief systems, as well. In Islam, the freedom of the will is predetermined by the divine will, and by the intervention of God in the world. Human beings retain certain opportunities for choice: however, these are limited to (1) the 'obligations' (taklīf), and (2) the individually predetermined human 'capacities' (qudra) for free decision, that are stipulated in revelation. Besides the divine dependency, the will is also constrained by the religious community, which subjects it to the collective will, on the principle of the 'public welfare' (maslaha).

Buddhism

In Buddhism, various conceptions of a human subject were developed, including the denial of its reality. On the one side, the 'I,' and the human will along with it, are regarded as illusions, to be overcome and 'quenched,' since they are responsible for one's clinging to this world, and are thereby responsible as well for the painful cycle of rebirths (karma). On the other side, a right decision, a right action, and therefore a 'right will' are necessary in order to travel the way that leads to the desired liberation. Volitional freedom is therefore necessary, at first, in order to be able to act ethically and religiously, but then is a hindrance to redemption. Thus, ultimately, it is itself to be overcome.

Literature

Alexander, Archibald, Theories of the Will in the History of Philosophy, Bristol 2002 ([1]1898); Anderson, Pamela Sue, Ricoeur and Kant: Philosophy of the Will, Atlanta 1993; Dihle, Albrecht, The Theory of Will in Classical Antiquity, Berkeley 1982; Kenny, Anthony, Aristotle's Theory of the Will, New Haven 1979; Moran, Frances M., Subject and Agency in Psychoanalysis: Which Is to Be Master?, New York 1993; Overhoff, Jürgen, Hobbe's Theory of the Will: Ideological Reasons and Historical Circumstances, Lanham 2000; Petrik, James, Descartes' Theory of the Will, Wakefield 1991; Pink, Thomas, The Psychology of Freedom, Cambridge 1996; Pink, Thomas/Stone, M. W. F. (eds.), The Will and Human Action: From Antiquity to the Present Day, London 2004; Riley, Patrick, The General Will before Rousseau: The Transformation of the Divine into the Civic, Princeton 1986; Saarinen, Risto, Weakness of the Will in Medieval Thought: From Augustine to Buridan, Leiden 1994; Stent, Gunther S., Paradoxes of Free Will, Philadelphia 2002.

→ Destiny/Fate, Determinism, Ethics/Morals, Fatalism, Predestination

Jürgen Mohn

Witch / Persecution of Witches

Meaning of the Word and Determination of the Concept

1. ‘Witch’ (from Old English wicce/wicca, ‘sorceress’) denotes, generally, a female person who can use magic, sorcery, spells, and/or enchantment to evoke hurtful reactions and results. The concepts for ‘witch’ present in European languages and societies betray various accentuations of meaning, depending on different aspects of the person or her activity. In the Italian word strega (from Lat., striga, ‘owl’), the witch is interpreted as a flying, child-abducting being. The French sorcière (from Lat., sors, ‘lot’) indicates witches’ art of soothsaying. In content, a distinction must be made between the cultural pattern of interpretation (C. Honegger) stamped by Europe, and the pattern of behavior (to be found outside Europe, as well) that distinguishes witchcraft as injurious, or else useful, → magic. Anthropological objects such as → amulets and → Voodoo dolls are examples of the same magical ‘reality’ as meant by the witchcraft, of past and present, although, of course, not in their literal reality and operation. ‘Witch crazes’ and persecution of witches are phenomena of European and extra-European societies. Especially in Africa, the killing of persons on grounds of alleged witchcraft has taken on terrifying proportions. In Tanzania alone, between 1970 and 1984, more than 3,000 persons were murdered for allegedly practicing witchcraft (Behringer 1998).

2. Between 1430 and 1870 European persecution of witches occurred mainly in Germany, in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, and in its neighboring regions, Poland, Eastern France, and Northern Italy, but comparatively less in the Ecclesiastical State and in Spain.

The Witch Paradigm

The witch paradigm at the root of these persecutions represents, as a fictitious schema of interpretation, a highly complex texture of popular and scholarly conceptualizations of faith. Scholarship in the area of witchcraft distinguishes the ancient and medieval conception of maleficent witches and sorcerers from the collective concept of ‘witch,’ which was developed around 1430 in Savoy, the Dauphiné, and Western Switzerland (Blauert 1989). In the latter concept, three principal complexes of thought were banded together: (1) older traditions of putting heretics and witches on trial (→ Heresy), (2) non-Christian ideas from popular faith (e.g., belief in fairies), and (3) scholarly theories on the power of the → Devil and → demons. The individual elements of the cumulative witchcraft offense—harmful spells, pacts with the Devil, sexual intercourse with the same, transformation of animals, flight through the air, the witches’ Sabbath—ought not be thought of as a rigid schema, trimmed to fit each individual case. There were different kinds of harmful spells, with differing provenance: injury to crops, weather spells,

A ceremony of initiation into a Wicca coven, a ritual group of the new witches movement (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). High priestess Zsuszanna Budapest presents the initiand (right) with an amulet of feathers. That only women are present has its basis in the fact that Budapest is founder of the feministic direction of 'Dianic Wicca' (after Roman goddess of the hunt Diana), whose ritual groups accept women exclusively. Budapest, born in 1940 in the Hungarian capital, combines traditional techniques used by Eastern European female soothsayers and healers (her mother was a medium), and 'feminist spirituality,' a concept that, she declares, she herself coined. Since 1970, she had been in Los Angeles, and later was a women's liberation activist, reformulating the political tenets of radical feminism in religious concepts and terms. In 1975 she founded the first feminist Wicca coven, Susan B. Anthony Coven Number 1, which became the model in Dianic Wicca. Her Feminist Book of Lights and Shadows (1975; republished in 1989 as The Holy Book of Women's Mysteries) had the effect of creating a cult. In 1975, she was arrested for reading Tarot cards—which led to a paradigmatic trial, and ultimately, in 1983, to the abrogation of California's Law Against the Practice of Divination. Today Budapest moderates her own TV show ("Thirteenth Heaven"), and leads the Women's Spirituality Forum in San Francisco. (Hubert Mohr) generation of illnesses, milk spells, witch dancing, came rather from a rural milieu; animal transformation, and flight, from medieval popular belief; the witches' Sabbath and love-making with the Devil, from scholastic theology, from stereotypes of processes against heretics (especially the Waldenses), and from anti-Jewish propaganda (→ Anti-Semitism).

Historical Survey

The first trials were held in 1415–1445 in the Dauphiné, in 1428 in Wallis, in 1438–1442 in the Diocese of Lausanne. The delict of witchcraft was punished by burning alive, both by the secular courts, where harmful spells were treated as grave capital offense, and by the → Inquisition as heresy and → apostasy, under the concept of apostatic service to the Devil. The procedure mounted against heretics by the Inquisition was whetted by persecutors to the shape of a special judicial process of its own. In this exceptional crime, the defense of the accused was no longer provided, evidence was simplified into the deposition of suspect instances, and the application of punishment was facilitated. The accused, then, especially in the processes of local secular courts, found themselves in a hopeless situation. In not a few cases, higher instances, such as the Paris Parliament in France, and the Imperial Chamber Court in Germany—or authoritative documents in university law departments—offered the only possibility of escaping the death penalty. Of the estimated 50,000 to 100,000 executions of witches between 1580 and 1620, some 25,000 occurred in Germany, and extended to Protestant and Catholic regions alike. The region of the most intensive persecution in Europe was Lorraine, with 2,700 executions between 1560 and 1620. The persecutions came in waves, and were of various duration and intensity in individual countries. The absolute climaxes of the 'witch hunts' were in the years between 1560 and 1630. Some 75-80% of those convicted and executed were women, often widowed and unmarried. Researchers have unanimously repudiated the notion that an above-average number of those found guilty of witchcraft were midwives and 'wise women.' Nor were those outside society more often accused than others. Even children could be victims of the witch trials.

Explanations

Plausible explanations for the witch hunts are crises of agriculture and famine, evoked by changes in climate ('Little Ice Age'), as well as the norms, fears, and fantasies of the witch persecutors. The role of the demonological literature—for example, Inquisitor Heinrich Kramer's Malleus Maleficarum (Lat., "Hammer of Witches"; 1487)—and of the popular notions of witches, has not yet been definitively explained. Numerous regional investigations attest that the pressure to persecution was exerted not from above, but, often, from below, by the broad masses, as means of the regulation of conflict. Opponents of the witch persecutions, as for example physician Johann Weyer (1515–1588), held a difficult position. At times, they appealed to moderate traditional ecclesiastical law; at other times—increasingly, in the seventeenth century—they discerned mentally ill or melancholic women, so that the demonological stereotype was transformed to a medical syndrome.

Witches in the Modern Age

3. In the Age of the Enlightenment, and in Romanticism, the negative appraisals of witches that had been made in the early modern age were turned into positive ones, by way of the formation of myths. Witches now came to be sacrifices of justice—of ecclesiastical and secular repression (Voltaire)—or 'wise women' (Jacob Grimm). Today's feminist (→ Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism) and new religious movements stylize the witch as a symbol of female self-determination, and of a cultic community of nature magic (e.g., Wicca cult in English-speaking regions; → Paganism/Neopaganism). In the United States alone, an estimated 250,000 'new witches' belong to various groups. The figure of the → fairytale witch lives on, in popular narratives of all cultures, as a supernatural being, who disposes of powers of enchantment both injurious and curative. In German folktales and sagas, she is encountered as a hideous old woman, who devours children, and can change herself into animals. The folkloric tradition includes the masking and witch-burnings of Carnival and Winter Solstice. The traditional, primarily rural, belief in witches of the present uses witches' spells for magical defense against bewitchment.

Plastic and pictorial art, poetry, and film attest a lively interest in witches. A case in point would be the witch images in the modern art of Alfred Kubin (1877–1959), Otto Dix (1891–1969), and Max Pechstein (1881–1955), or in the literature of Otfried Preussler (Ger., Die Kleine Hexe, "The Little Witch"; 1957), the best-known children's books about a witch, which has thus far been printed in over fifty editions. Arthur Miller's play The Crucible (1953), a historical parable of denunciation and mass insanity, was filmed in 1957 with the collaboration of Jean-Paul Sartre. John Updike's novel The Witches of Eastwick (1984), whose satirical subject is the battle of the sexes, became popular through the eponymous Hollywood film, with Jack Nicholson. The witch also appears as a mythic backdrop for the entertainment and consumer industries of the present. Magical abilities and utensils are offered, in newspaper advertisements, by commercial 'witches,' for the solution for the problems of life. Penny novels are available in all of the railroad-station magazine racks for creepy self-entertainment during a wait for a train. Leather witch-masks are sold on the sado-masochistic scene, thus rendering the witch a marketable sex object. In many places, tourism concepts have developed around witches. Consumer articles consciously make their concept of the witch a positive one, of the witch as a miraculous healer.

Literature

Sources: Behringer, Wolfgang (ed.), Hexen und Hexenprozesse in Deutschland, Munich [2]1993; Breslaw, Elaine G. (ed.), Witches of the Atlantic World: A Historical Reader and Primary Sourcebook, New York/London 2000; Summers, Montague (ed./trans.), The Malleus Maleficarum of Heinrich Kramer and James Sprenger, London 1928.

Secondary Literature: Ankarloo, Bengt/Henningsen, Gustav (eds.), Early Modern European Witchcraft: Centres and Peripheries, Oxford 1989; Ankarloo, Bengt/Clark, Stuart (eds.), History of Witchcraft and Magic in Europe, 6 vols., London 1999ff.; Bauer, D. R./Lorenz, Sönke (eds.), Das Ende der Hexenverfolgungen, Stuttgart 1995; Behringer, Wolfgang, Hexen. Glaube, Verfolgung, Vermarktung, Munich 1998; Idem, Witches and Witch-Hunts: A Global History, Cambridge 2004; Blauert, Andreas, Frühe Hexenverfolgungen. Ketzer-, Zauberei- und Hexenprozesse des 15. Jahrhunderts, Hamburg 1989; Burns, William E., Witch Hunts in Europe and America: An Encyclopedia, Westport 2003; Clark, Stuart, Thinking With Demons: The Idea of Witchcraft in Early Modern Europe, Oxford 1997; Cohn, Norman, Europe's Inner Demons: The Demonization of Christians in Medieval Christendom, rev. ed., Chicago 2000 ([1]1975); Ginzburg, Carlo, The Night Battles: Witchcraft and Agrarian Cults in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, Baltimore 1983 (It. [1]1966); Idem, Ecstasies: Deciphering the Witches' Sabbath, New York 1991 (It. [1]1989); Godbeer, Richard, Escaping Salem: The Other Witch Hunt of 1692, New York 2005; Honegger, Claudia (ed.), Die Hexen der Neuzeit. Studien zur Sozialgeschichte eines kulturellen Deutungsmusters, Frankfurt/M. 1978; Levack, Brian

P., The Witch-Hunt in Early Modern Europe, London [2]1995 ([1]1987); MacFarlane, Alan, Witchcraft in Tudor and Stuart England, New York 1970; Roper, Lyndal, Witch Craze: Terror and Fantasy in Baroque Germany, New Haven 2004; Waite, Gary K., Heresy, Magic, and Witchcraft in Early Modern Europe, Basingstoke 2003.

→ Apostasy, Demon/Demonology, Fairytale, Gender Stereotypes, Heresy, Inquisition, Magic, Paganism/Neo-Paganism, Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism

Werner Tschacher

Women's Movement / Spiritual Feminism

1. As early as the mid-1970s, chronologically parallel to the emergence and spread/extension of → New Age religious movements, concepts of → magic and → spirituality acquired a greater importance. A spiritual feminism, as an umbrella concept for a multiplicity of forms of belief and expression, has emerged from the new, autonomous women's movement. It is a political, and religious and/or spiritual movement at the same time. The spectrum of subjects involved in an overview of female spirituality extends from the general critique of the political, private, and religious conditions of woman's life in the patriarchy in history and the present (→ Matriarchy/Patriarchy), to today's feminist spirituality in society and church, to feminist spirituality as the vision of a new, female way of life and culture—the quest for a genuinely female identity. The broader concept of spiritual feminism or feminist spirituality can comprise the most distinct groupings. There are as many opinions here as there are women who express themselves on this subject. Feminist spirituality goes out beyond the boundaries of traditional religious spaces, and yet presses into these spaces from without. Thus, Christian and Jewish women seek new paths, forms of expression, and content for female piety, within and without the Church and Judaism. Women belonging to political traditions of feminist 'separatism' find themselves together with liberal mothers and employees in search of both a cultural and spiritual homeland. Together they reverence the potential fullness of a 'Great Goddess.' Spiritual feminism thus represents the quest for the denomination of a multiplicity of currents and (self-) determinations, whose differing assessments depend on women's own respective outlooks.

Feminist Theories and Standpoints

2. The new women's movement in Western Europe and in the United States is one of the most important social movements since the end of the 1960s. It has gained 'revolutionary' and innovative influence in various areas and regions of society, along with initiating a new orientation in political ethics. In the → peace movement, in the → ecumenical movement, in the regions of science and higher education, in the trade unions, in politics, in the churches, their ideas and political demands have established themselves. The goals are change of social norms and institutions, and the rescission of the historically produced biologistic differentiation of the sexes, i.e., culturally conditioned essential definitions of femaleness and maleness (→ Gender Stereotypes), as well as the defeat of any form of sexist oppression and disadvantage. Today, the issue 'Women and Emancipation' has been received across all of the spectra of society. Three great directions are worthy of mention: (a) Liberal feminism, which represents a policy of equal rights in the sense of universally valid rights, (b) socialistic feminism that sees the oppression of women as based in the structures of pan-societal power-relations, and (c) radical feminism, which regards equal rights, participation, and share in the organizations of existing society, as an insufficient goal for women. In this latter case feminism means a separate organizing movement, for the creation of autonomous woman-spaces, the psychological process of liberation of woman from identification with man, and a new definition, or new evaluation, of social problems by women. It explains the patriarchal organization of → sexuality and reproduction (→ Regeneration/Fertility) as the key reference point of male power. It is precisely here that the slogan, "The personal is political," becomes the central theme.

At the end of the 1970s, the interests of radical feminism split in two. A 'political' direction saw self-determination with regard to → body, spirit, and 'soul,' and the political 'struggle,' for example in the ecological and peace movement, as its goal. Thus, this element pursued a 'feminization' of the social system of norms and values. Meanwhile, another part raised demands for matriarchal life structures that would transcend current societal relations. This discussion was conducted within and outside of traditional religions.

'Cultural Feminism'

3. Within radical feminism, theoretical confrontation with patriarchal values and norms began very quickly. Many women perceived a male-centeredness ('androcentrism'), and male sexism, in all areas of society. This construal of maleness promoted radical positions in feminist separatism. Out of their varying components, and over the intermediate positions of a 'cultural feminism,' they then built a bridge of 'spiritual feminism.' This feministic spiritual movement sees itself as a radical counter-sketch to a patriarchal society. In it, → utopias of new collective, cultural, and spiritual forms of female living are drawn up and tried out. Comprehensive, radical criticisms of the patriarchy and its institutions, in politics, culture, and religion, as well as the demand for a genuinely 'female counterculture,' are the earmarks of contributions to the project.

Radical Religious and Cultural Critique of Patriarchy

a) Feminist authors such as Mary Daly, Herrad Schenk, Miriam Simos (alias Starhawk), and Caroline Merchant describe the demise of the patriarchal structure. A society directed by the 'male principle,' and the betrayal of moral principles, is made responsible for the political and social problems of the present. Feminist criticism of religion is here closely bound up with general criticism of patriarchy. Traditional monotheistic religions such as Judaism, Christianity, and Islam are regarded as patriarchal institutions, and stand for settled traditionalism, stamped by the exclusion of female worlds of experience and widespread gynophobia, on the part of male religious dignitaries. Former Catholic theologian and feminist philosopher Mary Daly sees in Christianity compulsion, mythologization, and therewith the eternalization of the sex-role stereotypes. For her, the image or symbol of a male → God is only one of patriarchy's many mechanisms of oppression. Others reproach the Christian Church for its destruction of sanctuaries of female mystery cults (→ Mysteries) and supposed matriarchal high religions. In their criticism of Judaism, a latent → anti-Semitism on the part of feminist theologians is sometimes discernable. To Judaism is ascribed the origin of patriarchal → monotheism, and therewith the beginning of all 'evil.' Many feminists can no longer wish to join themselves to a strong, mighty, authoritative Father, nor do they wish to. He symbolizes abuse of power. Religion is then experienced as no more than a toolbox of patriarchy's control and oppression. The concepts of 'female identity' and 'alienation' are therefore central points of application: women's spirituality can realize itself only in holistic spiritual sisterhood (→ Wholeness/Holism).

Woman—Corporality—Nature

b) The foundational image of → nature as female principle offers a metaphorical approach, which has played a central role in the male concept of femaleness since the nineteenth century. At the beginning of the 1970s, it seemed to many eco-feminists that a solution to the environmental crisis was possible only by way of a revival of concepts emphasizing the special affinity of/between woman and nature. Nature was understood as a living organism, analogous with women (collectively), with both of them being exploited and 'violated' by patriarchy (→ Environmentalism). Here traditional patriarchal religions played a key role, with the hostile attitude toward → body and → sexuality of the Christian churches, and their tabooing and demonizing of female sexuality (menstrual cycle [→ Blood], contraception [→ Abortion/Contraception]).

Spiritual Feminism

4. Many currents within and without ('cultural') feminism make use of the concept of → spirituality. By contrast with traditional and → New Age religions alike, spiritual feminism represents the standpoint of the 'immanence' (→ Transcendence) realized in women's 'fusion' or 'blending' with the earth and nature, which are mythically embodied by the Great Goddess. Notions of a 'genuinely female spirituality' offer a wide spectrum: an all-encompassing, loving 'sisterhood' (meant as ideological as well as spiritual solidarity and community of women), the self-definition of female identity, 'reverence for life,' visions of spiritual freedom and self-determination. Here spirituality is immanent in the world, the spiritual healing of the world. In its most radical configuration, spirituality means self-acceptance, identity, independently of male acknowledgement—a spiritual, economic, and physical as well as psychic independence from 'man.' Spirituality becomes a concept of living.

Feminist Theology

5. Within the churches, the positions of spiritual feminism run a rather moderate course. Its roots reach back to the time of the first middle-class women's movement in the nineteenth century. In the United States, the first woman was admitted to the study of theology in 1847. In Prussia, on the other hand, women were permitted to study theology only in 1908. Women were long denied 'religions competencies,' and even today they are excluded from the priestly office in Catholicism (→ Priest/Priestess). In the ever intensifying lay movement in the Church, struggles for equal rights have been making progress ever since the beginning of the twentieth century. In the 1960s, demands for women's equality in church offices arose across the confessions. Influenced by American and African → liberation theologies, as well as by the budding women's movement, noted theologians, such as Dorothee Sölle, inquired into the place of woman in theology. Many went further, calling their own entire tradition into question (Daly, Mulak, Weiler), and questioning its meaningfulness for women. This spontaneous adoption of themes led to the debates cited above. With an eye to the Bible, and the history of the Church, attempts have been made to write female/feminine (salvation) history—HERstory instead of HIStory, 'thealogy' instead of 'theology.')

Discussions on the legitimacy of God as a male symbol have been conducted, and various new concepts of God have been developed. Resulting positions range from a theology of the figure of Jesus as an advocate for women, and thereby mediator between the sexes, and the sketch of a neuter spirit (Heb., ruakh), to the symbol of a triadic Goddess. Supra-confessionally, feminists today look for new spiritual signs, → symbols, and → rituals. Hostility to the body and the senses as manifested in the liturgy are now to be replaced by new, sensuous rituals—often removed from church buildings—with circle dances, music, song, colors, light, scents. Thus, the bloody mysteries inherent in the → Lord's Supper, which are especially problematic for women, ought to be reinterpreted and re-symbolized; the theological tradition of the sin and atonement of an innate female impurity could be countered with sensuous celebration, in memory of the communion with God. Many new points of criticism have arisen in recent years. Along with calls for women's ordination, the fundamental question has also been posed whether the churches are really the place where feminists feel welcome, and can develop spiritually. The answer is, for one, dependent on the men in these institutions—on their openness to criticism, and readiness for change. But it is also dependent on the individual preparedness of every individual woman to break with traditions, and, if necessary, to live and work even outside of the Church.

The Figure of the Great Goddess

6. A discussion on the necessity and sense of genuinely female or feminine symbols, rituals, and images of God took place at the end of the 1970s, in connection with discussion and research on → matriarchy. For many spiritual women, the symbol of the male → God had outlived its usefulness, and it seemed that that of the Goddess bore the liberating principles of both sexes. This revival of the Goddess/goddesses is more the conscious expression of a political behavior than it is a religious emotion. The logic proceeds as follows. Let the Goddess become a necessary figure of identification for women. She symbolizes the rightness of female claim to authority and aspiration for power. Her sign serves for the evaluation of the female body, and she herself becomes 'Redeemer of the Earth.' The rapidly devised sacred doctrine of 'thea-logy' expresses the wish for a mythic foundation of the 'feminine principle.' Jutta Voss speaks of 'the sacred potency' of the feminine (female), as symbol of life, death, and never-ending rebirth.[1] The triple form of the Goddess represents the female body with its cycles, to which every woman along with the menstrual cycle is physically subject, fostering (1) the phase of youth, (2) that of maturity, and (3) that of age.

Mythological Schema of the 'Threefold Goddess'

Phases: Association	Youth	Maturity	Old Age
Female Type	Virgin	Mother	Wise Old
Mythical Figure	Diana, Aphrodite	Demeter, Inanna, Isis	Kali, Hecate, Percht
Color	White Goddess	Red Goddess	Black Goddess
Function/ Region	Youth, Erotics	Maturity, Fertility Creativity, Birth, Dispenser of Culture	Magic, Death, Beyond, [Old] Age, Rebirth, Healer
Lunar Phase	Quarter Moon	Full Moon	New Moon
Season	Spring	Summer	Fall, Winter
Directions [on compass]	East	South	West, North
Element	Air	Fire	Water, Earth

Ritual Practice

Ritual practice is oriented, for the most part, to the cycles of → agrarian religions and astronomical reference points (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). In many rituals, celebrants make an effort to (re-) produce the unity and harmony of nature, cosmos, and everything that lives. They serve as the healing process of Gaia, the 'Mother Earth.' And so the Goddess symbolizes the concrete, sensible presence of the divine, in a concept of the world in which everything is living, dynamic, reticulated, and bound up, strengthened and reinforced by living energies, a living being (Starhawk 1999). The patriarchal, 'mechanistic' worldview is seen as just the opposite. It looks upon → nature as a dead object, exploiting it without inhibition or containment (H. Göttner-Abendroth, C. Merchant). The Goddess embodies the cyclical world picture of the genuinely feminine, the image so vehemently demanded by female researchers of matriarchy. Connected with the sanctification of the cyclical orbit of nature (and women), there is the hope of more attention, and social regard. Nature is threatened, to be sure, but ultimately nature is divine, as the 'reincarnation of the Goddess.' In matriarchal religion, she is bound up with a myth of 'celestial self-redemption,' and thus with the redemption of the female sex on earth.

Feminist 'Witches'

7. The 'witch' has become an identifying image of the women's movement (→ Witch/Persecution of Witches; Paganism/Neopaganism). At first, she was used only in demonstrations, as a counter-concept expressing the struggle against patriarchal norms and values. By the mid-1970s, however, she was already filled with mythologized ideological content. The ironic, provocative metaphor 'witch,' nevertheless, is consciously adopted only by a part of the women's movement, as by the feminist Wicca witches (see ill. at → Witch/Persecution of Witches). Many exponents of feminist spirituality see themselves rather as priestesses, healers, 'wise women,' or shamans, if indeed they are not simply indifferent to traditional concepts. The first feminist witch circles emerged in the United States. But they were mostly oriented to occult/magical witch paradigms of the Wicca movement that appeared in the England of the 1950s and have since socially established themselves. In the feminist witch movement, answers to questions of ecology, politics, life meaning, and religion, that in church and society have remained unsolved, are sought in varying manners. The ideology of modern witchcraft contains the following. (a) The feeling of homeland, a feeling that is to be attained by a life in 'sisterly' communities of experience and life; (b) a life in peace and harmony with nature (concept of immanence; → Nature Piety, → Wholeness/Holism); (c) the demand to engage oneself, politically as well as spiritually, in the rescue of the world's eco-systems (→ Environmentalism); (d) the formation of a spiritual 'women's culture' (women's communes, women's spiritual projects).

The image of the witch embraces the concept of → magic. Ideas of magic span an arc from therapeutic, to esoteric, to 'classic' ideas of magic (the spell; → Prayer/Curse). In this 'spiritually political' movement, magic/spirituality and witches/shamans are usually grouped at random, and their names applied as synonyms for the same thing. Magic (and → spirituality) have become umbrella concepts, in which a transformed world-image, and newly developed rituals mix together and coagulate. This concept, thus defined in anti-Enlightenment terms, stands for female wisdom and female spiritual power. It forms a wall against patriarchal → science and religion.

Some feminists appeal to magic as a designation for primitive, and now again current, practices of female spirituality. 'Magic rituals' stand for the respective groups that mean to connect with the universe, the elements, and nature (Luisa Francia, Ute Manan Schiran, Heide Göttner-Abendroth)—and therefore have shamanic and pantheistic features (→ Pantheism)—or else are connected with the Goddess as universal power (Anna Dinklmann, Starhawk, Zsuzsanna Budapest).

9. Feminist spirituality contains at once a critique of culture, and a quest for culture. The quest for → identity is at the same time a question concerning feminine self-understanding under the given conditions of the patriarchal society. However, the critique of patriarchy and its 'gods' has not been entirely satisfactory. The 'search for the divine,' as a province of sense or meaning, is first and foremost connected with the wish for self-knowledge of what it is or can be 'to be a woman.' The concrete spiritual or religious concepts then follow. Here spirituality ought to create a commitment that relates to spiritual feeling, group identity, and the sacralization of 'feminine values.' It is the means to form the creators of women's own utopia of spiritual harmony, in the face of social and societal disharmony. Male dis-order is set against a female order (→ Chaos). But the formation of a female identity is not something that occurs only through the search for spirituality: it leads to the new discovery, and conquest, of the world, with all of its offers and opportunities, and participates in the epochal determination of a fundamental revolt. Thus, in other words, it is an attempt to accomplish, by way of religion, a social transformation.

1. Voss, Jutta, Das Schwarzmond-Tabu, Stuttgart 1988, 255.

Literature

Primary Sources: Carmody, Denise Lardner, Seizing the Apple: A Feminist Spirituality of Personal Growth, New York 1984; Daly, Mary, Beyond God the Father: Toward a Philosophy of Women's Liberation, Boston 1973; Göttner-Abendroth, Heide, Die Göttin und ihr Heros. Die matriarchalen Religionen in Mythos, Märchen und Dichtung, Munich 1980; Jones, Prudence/Matthews, Caitlín (eds.), Voices from the Circle: The Heritage of Western Paganism, Hammersmith 1990; Matthews, Caitlín (ed.), Voices of the Goddess: A Chorus of Sibyls, Wellingborough 1990; Starhawk (Miriam Simos), The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess, 20th anniversary ed., San Francisco 1999 ([1]1979); Eadem, Dreaming the Dark: Magic, Sex and Politics, Boston 1988 ([1]1982); Weiler, Gerda, Der enteignete Mythos. Eine feministische Revision der Archetypenlehre C. G. Jungs und Erich Neumanns, Frankfurt/M. 1991.

Secondary Literature: Carson, Anne, Goddesses and Wise Women: The Literature of Feminist Spirituality, 1980–1992. An Annotated Bibliography, Freedom 1992; Christ, Carol P., Laughter of Aphrodite: Reflections on a Journey to the Goddess, San Francisco 1988; Christ, Carol P./Plaskow, Judith (eds.), Womanspirit Rising, New York 1979; Eller, Synthia, Living in the Lap of the Goddess: The Feminist Spirituality Movement in America, New York 1993; Frankiel, Tamar, The Voice of Sarah: Feminine Spirituality and Traditional Judaism, New York 1995; Griffin, Wendy, Daughters of the Goddess: Studies of Healing, Identity, and Empowerment, Walnut Creek/Lanham 2000; King, Ursula, Women and Spirituality, Houndsmill 1989; Meyer-Wilmes, Hedwig, Rebellion on the Borders, Kampen 1995 (Ger. [1]1990); Pahnke, Donate, Ethik und Geschlecht. Menschenbild und Religion in Patriarchat und Feminismus, Marburg 1991; Spretnak, Charlene (ed.), The Politics of Women's Spirituality, New York 1982; van Dyke, Annette J., The Search for a Woman-Centered Spirituality, New York 1992.

→ Body, Environmentalism, Gender Stereotypes, Hierarchy, Magic, Matriarchy/Patriarchy, Nature, Nature Piety, New Age, Occultism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Sexuality, Spirituality, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Angela Schenkluhn

Work

1. a) Work is human activity with the goal of producing what is necessary or useful for the existence of the individual and his or her kin. For this purpose, the working individual must enter into a conscious process of confrontation with nature, and thus, always alter natural circumstances. The simplest example to use for an explanation of this state of affairs is the production of tools. Thus, one of the most pregnant definitions of the human being is his and her specification as the 'tool-making animal.' In spite of this universal anthropological determination of work, an evaluation of work in terms of social and cultural history claims quite a broad spectrum, and this view precipitates out into religious history as well. Aside from a more or less natural division between male and female work—which occurred early in hunting and gathering societies—the division of 'head' and 'hand' labor is of special importance. This dichotomy, still prevailing in the division between 'mental' and 'physical' work, owes its origin to the fact that, by perfecting tools, it has been possible to diminish the amount of work necessary for the satisfaction of the elementary necessities of life.

The 'Tool-Making Animal'

Work as Punishment

b) All of the so-called historical religions—including the world religions—have formed during a time that knew a division between mental and manual labor. This genealogy is reflected in the world of religious concepts in a number of ways. (1) It is reflected in the widespread idea of a primordial paradise (→ Garden/Paradise), in whose condition human beings had the fruits of nature, for free enjoyment, in superfluity. The necessity of work has entered only through an event that has disturbed the harmony and leisure of this life, as recounted in, for example, the story of Original → Sin, in Gen 3. (2) The conceptions of gods and → God know nothing of working gods—gods can indeed battle, and thereby accomplish great deeds, but these acts are not understood as work; rather the gods feel disturbed by the noisy labors of human persons, as is so plainly depicted in the Babylonian Great Flood (Atramhasis) depicted. (3) Religious activity, for example in worship, is not conceptualized as work. In all religions that have ever known religious → specialists, the latter have been specifically exempted from physical labor. In extreme cases, this exemption can actually lead to the formation of a priestly caste, who need perform no manner of gainful labor, as with the Brahmans of ancient India. A necessary premise, in such a scenario, is the production of an economic surplus, and its appropriation by non-working groups in society.

Monks and Work

2. This distanced-to-negative attitude toward work is the contrary of another, likewise grounded in religion: a high esteem for simple work, especially for that of the farmer. This is encountered with many of the prophets of Israel, as in the Book of Amos, for example. This tension was rendered more

Doing the dishes in a Zen Buddhist monastery in Japan. In common, the young men busy themselves with their eating utensils. The Indian tradition of wandering ascetics engages these monks in a contemplative life without any means of their own subsistence. The members of Buddhist orders, whether they beg their maintenance in a daily quest for alms, or live on the landed property of the order, are entirely dependent on the labor of the laity for their life support. In Zen Buddhism, work is appraised not on the basis of its meaning as a profitable activity, but as the exercise of attention in daily actions. Zen monasteries receive contributions from their lay members, while garden and household work is part of the course of the day of a monk or nun. This approach finds its expression in the formula, "A day without work, a day without eating." (Kirsten Holzapfel) acute in religions that originally had no cult personnel. It becomes particularly clear in the history of Christianity, where, as early as the first century, the duty to work was intensified—especially, it would seem, in regard to wandering preachers, who traveled from place to place, and lived at the expense of the community. Very soon, however, a condition formed in the Christian community, as is the general rule in the history of religions: a class of religious specialists formed who engaged in no gainful employment, and who lived on a system of contributions maintained by the communities. At one extreme, this development was propelled by an ascetic class (→ Asceticism), whose members, in conscious negation of the world, included work among the things they eschewed. Benedict of Nursia (480–547) turned this beginning of → monasticism, so little organized, in another direction. The principle of praying and working tended to create a new religious attitude toward work, which, however, could be maintained only with difficulty even in monasticism. The division between lay brothers and clerical monks, in the long term, allowed the separation of mental/spiritual work (vita contemplativa) and corporeal work (vita activa) to revive, with a higher evaluation of the former. The urban mendicant orders of the Middle Ages (Dominicans and Franciscans) limited themselves fully to preaching and cure of souls, and (at least theoretically) obtained the necessities of life by begging. Very soon, however, even here the vow of → poverty bound only the monk, not the monastery. Buddhism exhibits a similar phenomenon, especially in Theravada Buddhism, where, after the establishment of permanent monasteries, the monk was to obtain his sustenance himself by begging, although the monastery, by way of endowments, could have rich landed property at its disposal, worked by laity. As the monastic life is preferred in religion, a lower worth and value is then automatically ascribed to productive activity. The latter, it is true, is not directly rejected.

Work as Religious Obligation

3. It was almost automatically that this tendency arose, that qualified everyday work as being of lesser religious worth than a life dedicated entirely to religion. Thus, it could be assailed only where the division between laity and religious → specialists had been rescinded theoretically, as occurred in the sixteenth-century Reformation. Of course, neither → Luther nor Calvin entertained any high esteem for work performed for the sake of success. Rather, they regarded the essential thing as the fulfillment of one's duty. But in the view of equal value of all activities, in principle, regardless of whether they were spiritual or manual, in any case a new understanding of everyday work was perceptible vis-à-vis antiquity and the Middle Ages. However, in the background of the Reformers' new evaluation of everyday work, there was always their polemic against the special position and rank of the clergy. This was especially true in the case of the orders. In their appeal to the "Evangelical Counsels" (Consilia Evangelica) of chastity and poverty, the orders had come under suspicion of seeking to obtain a state of grace through works. The Reformers stressed, instead, that grace and salvation could be conferred on the human being even in a worldly state. This had never been questioned theoretically, but it was no longer clear in Catholic religious life.

The warning against idleness is known even from the Hebrew Bible, and then, by way of the New Testament, courses through all of church history. This admonition did not yet have the effect, however, of work being considered an end in itself. Only in the eighteenth century did a new evaluation of work enter the scene. The aspect of creativity then won out, over the aspects of difficulty and burden. The causes of this change in evaluation are disputed. Max → Weber, in his famous Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus (Ger., "The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism"), suggests that religious motives were critical. But even today, it is a subject of scientific discussion. A special role is played by the Calvinistic tenet of the double → predestination. Before the creation of the world, God established which human beings were to be destined for eternal life and which to eternal death. If such is the case, what importance or meaning can be ascribed to the activity of human beings? How, then, does the new emphasis on the duty to perform work function as an appropriate means to solve the doubt over one's own status in grace? How, then, has it come about that this accentuation, intended as a pastoral consideration, came thus to be reinterpreted in such a manner that now secular, worldly success (measurable in wealth) was a sign of election? It is at least as plausible to hypothesize that, in a society increasingly resting on work for pay, as was increasingly evident in the nineteenth century, besides being physically forced to work, ideological, that is, religious legitimation become popular. It should be kept in mind that in the nineteenth century it was argued that only a low compensation could motivate the worker to continuous labor.

The modern development is identifiable by the fact that, today, in all religions, a positive qualification of work prevails, so that this can be emphasized in the 'interreligious dialogue' as a common trait. Although it is considerably difficult to argue that the respective religious traditions are willing to attribute a high value to worldly work, theological acuity nevertheless has attempted to solve even this problem, by way of postulating a work ethic that will apply to all religions, corresponding to an economy that operates globally.

Literature

Klöckler, Michael/Tworuschka, Udo (eds.), Ethik der Religionen – Lehre und Leben, vol. 2: Arbeit, Göttingen 1985; Kehrer, Günter, "Arbeit," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 45-50; Marx, Karl, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy, 3 vols., New York 1977–1981 (Ger. [1]1867); Weber, Max, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, London/New York 1992 (Ger. [1]1904/05).

→ Everyday Life, Economy, Marxism, Poverty, Protestantism, Weber

Günter Kehrer

Writing

Writing and Reading as Cultural Techniques

1. The point in time at which the human being began to register data in writing can be referred to some 3,000 years before Christ. Naturally, the act of writing was possible before the invention of writing—by scratching, painting, etc., individual signs—probably as early as the Paleolithic. But it is undisputed that only the invention and application of writing, as a comprehensive code and means of preservation—for the storing and expansion of speech-connected information—resulted in the formation and flourishing of the early civilizations (→ Memory). In Mesopotamia, the phenomenon occurred as cuneiform writing, in Egypt as hieroglyphics. The invention of mobile vehicles such as the clay tablet (ancient Near East), papyrus (Egypt), parchment (Asia Minor), and paper (China) played a decisive role in the propagation of writing. Another critical development was that of the codex and the → book, which became the binding and archiving units. Familiarity with writing, and writings themselves, were applied first and foremost for the registration of data in the political, socio-economic, and religious areas. The appropriation of writing had need of a special formation. Accordingly, the writer belonged to the foremost political or religious class. Competency for writing, then, rested especially with the political elite, so that writing functioned as a means of rule and primacy. This dimension did not change, in principle, until modern times, since only those who enjoyed special training could write. However, illiteracy has faded away in modern times, in the process of the institutionalization of the modern ideal of education through universal obligatory education. In the nineteenth century, the mechanization of the art of writing (the typewriter) had, it is true, rather a negative effect on the popularization of writing at first (appearance of 'typists,' who had to be trusted with their newly developed writing art). But therapid spread of the typewriter and—beginning in the 1980s—the 'personal computer' completely overtook this temporary reversal. Electronic development simplified writing, which became 'typing,' and thus the composition of writings, as well. It was on this account that writing generally lost its specific class privilege. Although it remains difficult to establish whether the book culture is entering its demise today, it is certain that the culture of writing and recording by hand in the new electronic forms of → communication, such as e-mail and Internet, will possess an ever more relevant value in the immediate future.

A Japanese Zen Master, a member of the Rinzai School (founded in China by Lin-chi I-hsüan), writes in calligraphy (in Jap., Shodô, 'Path of Writing'). He writes a Chinese letter, qì (in Jap., ki), meaning 'spirit,' 'mind,' 'spiritual' or 'mental power,' or 'inner energy.' In → Zen Buddhism, calligraphy is a means to prepare for meditation, or in itself applied meditation. For this practice, calm and composure are prerequisites. Another prerequisite is absorption in Nothing, and submersion in it. A Chinese author of the Sung Dynasty characterized Zen Buddhist calligraphy as hsin yìn ('Seal of the Heart'). This spiritual attitude also appears in painting with watercolors, which, despite its simplicity, symbolically presents the religious dimensions both of human existence, and of the world.

2. In the area of religion, as well, writing specialists were regarded as enjoying a special relevance. That is, writing was a privilege belonging to the elite class (priests, monks, theologians), and this ability led to the legitimization of their primacy. Fixation in writing of various sorts of religious data, and their storage, were the principal task of these specialists. The writing and composing of religious documents ('Holy Scripture,' hagiographies, books of law, prayer books, and even the exposition [exegesis] of commentaries on authoritative texts) excluded, in principle, participation by the laity. Therefore the ability to write contributed to a cementing of internal class differentiation within the group. However, it frequently made possible the bond between religion and the key state instances that stabilized government (bureaucracy, royal chancery, ancient Eastern temples). Although, at present, writing is an activity open in principle to every person, it can still be recognized that a certain group of writers, especially in those traditions in which written (not printed) material possesses a high authority, play an important role in the community (e.g., copyist of the Torah; see also → Bible, with ill.).

3. In the religious colloquial, what is understood by 'scripture' is first and foremost 'the holy scripture(s),' that is, a corpus of texts that transmit religious information (messages). In most of the 'book religions,' the authorship of these scriptures is referred to God, or to the religious founder, which establishes their absolute → authority. Even though concrete historical persons, such as → Muhammad, can be identified as the authors, their writing activity does not take a central role, but only a passive, secondary one. God (or a spirit, an angel, etc.) dictates or writes, while human beings, at most inspired by God, or by beings resembling God, write down what has been heard or perceived (verbal inspiration). Writing in a condition of trance, as well, is frequently to be observed in other religions, as in Shamanism, or with written documents conveyed or prepared by persons with mediumistic talents (→ Spiritism; Channeling).

Interaction with Sacred Scriptures

4. Ever since their appearance, 'sacred' or 'holy scriptures' have assumed a founding or differentiating function vis-à-vis their corresponding communities.

For the preservation of the 'correct' meaning of the texts, there appeared a special social class, which, even today, remains concerned primarily with the exposition of the texts (scripture scholars or theologians). The task of these → specialists is to explain the 'true' sense or meaning of the texts, or of the letters, respectively, either in function of societal constellations that are constantly being transformed over the course of history, or else from an 'unchangeable' universal perspective. In all of the scriptural religions this social class receives a privileged position and exercises a decisive influence when it comes to dogmatic controversies.

While laity in the scriptural religions (e.g., Protestantism, Islam, or Mahayana Buddhism) are not excluded from access to sacred scriptures in principle, it is also true that, in certain traditions, these are part of secret or mysterious knowledge ('arcanum'; → Esotericism), with which only the initiate may deal (Egyptian Book of the Dead).

A consequence of the concept that what is written in holy scriptures comes from supra-terrestrial beings, is the veneration or adoration or their physical form. A typical example is the holy book of the Sikh religion, Adi Granth, which enjoys a quasi-divine veneration. In the above-described behavior with the sacred writings in various rituals, the character of holy scripture as an object of veneration is clearly expressed: ritual honor to be accorded to the scriptures is attested in Catholicism (Bible), Buddhism, and Lamaism (Sutras), Judaism (Torah scrolls in the synagogue), and state Shintô (Imperial Educational Edict).

5. Specific characteristics of scripture in religion can be recognized in magical behavior with what has been written. If the idea of the supra-terrestrial and magical power of what is written moves into the foreground, then the character of scripture as the vehicle of magical power gains more strength (→ Magic; Amulet). If something written (or a small fragment of

That the cultural technique of writing and reading (and thus knowledge of antiquity) was maintained in Western and Central Europe at the dawn of the early Middle Ages was the merit of the Christian monastic culture. Tirelessly, its writing specialists copied more or less sacred texts, in scriptoria (from Lat., scribere, 'write'), as Umberto Eco so clearly depicts in his mystery novel The Name of the Rose. By way of example, Alcuin's scriptorium at Tours, at the beginning of the ninth century, annually produced two complete bibles. This ancient and venerable tradition has undergone an astonishing renaissance in the age of computers and the Internet. The Trappist monks of Holy Cross Monastery, for instance, in Berryville, Virginia, along with their traditional fruitcake production, have earned their living since 1990 by executing computer assignments for secular enterprises. Trappists, who follow a strict version of the Cistercian Rule, are much in demand for their writing abilities, as they are highly motivated, and in addition, are bound by a rule of silence, so that they can concentrate entirely on their assignments in their writing niches. For the development of their writing business, to which belong ambitious tasks like the development and maintenance of data banks as well, the monks have founded a flourishing commercial enterprise. Its name, incidentally, is Electronic Scriptorium. (Hubert Mohr) sacred scripture) is regarded as charged with power, then one can apply the power-laden writing for certain magical purposes. If what is written takes the form of a book, then this magical aspect shows itself in, for example, the practice of soothsaying from the book ('bibliomancy'), in which presages are ascribed to certain verses in the book, for instance, in the Sibylline books, Homer, or the → Bible. That a paper or piece of wood on which certain verses are written should be worn as an amulet or talisman, fastened on or applied for decoration, likewise offers an example of this practice. We need only recall the mezuzah, a small capsule on the front doors of Jewish houses and dwellings, which contains a handwritten fragment of the Torah (Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21).

At the same time, it can be observed that certain letters, numerals, or formulas are ascribed special magical power, as with the letter or alphabetic mysticism of the → Kabbalah, and with magical formulae and 'syllables' (in Sanskrit, → mantra), in Brahmanism, → Tantra, and esoteric Buddhism. The conceptualization that certain letters incarnate physical or supra-terrestrial entities, can be recognized in, for example, Buddhist inscriptions, or → mandalas that, instead of the name of a Buddha or a picture of the Buddha, contain a letter (in Skt., bija) referring to the being and presence of the Buddha. In esoteric Buddhism, a written letter is often applied in meditation: here the first letter of the Sanskrit alphabet (a-kara), incarnating the cosmic being of time and space, is a special favorite.

The Oral Aspect: Expressions of What Is Written

6. Of course, the mystique and magic of the written must be considered in connection with the oral aspect (→ Oral Tradition). It is believed of mantras that their magic power develops only when they are actually pronounced in prescribed → rituals, and spoken precisely, and in such a way as to reproduce the sounds regarded as primordially supra-terrestrial, and as constituting the cosmos. Therefore the ritual relevance of the written ought not to be underestimated. After all, in community rituals, the oral or acoustical actions (reading, reading aloud, reciting, hearing; → Perception) play a role of the first importance, while, in the private practice of belief, the value of the written is relatively great (meditation in the presence of written signs or symbols).

Copying

7. Religious use of the writing faculty is not exhausted in the writing down of, and the ritual attention to, holy scriptures. The latter must also—completely or in part—be multiplied. In certain traditions, besides, copying itself is ascribed a religious value. Thus, copying from sutras, as in Mahayana Buddhism, constitutes an important religious practice, which can lead to a better understanding of the text being copied, and at the same time to a better spiritual disposition.

Calligraphy: Writing as an Ornamental Art

8. That writing and copying made up an important part of religious practice, in some traditions relates to the fact that the writing technique had become an independent artistic capacity at the hands of writing specialists. The capacity or ability in question was the art of 'beautiful writing,' (the literal translation of the Greek) 'calligraphy.' In Islam, beyond its religious relevance, the practice of calligraphy contributed to the fact that, out of the potential for decoration inherent in signs for writing, the latter developed into general patterns for the adornment of Islamic architecture. The above-mentioned copies of Buddhist sutras as calligraphic works, at the same time belong to the realm of the architectural art. In the thirteenth century, the monks of Japanese → Zen Buddhism were the principal vehicles of artistic calligraphy, and they still maintain this tradition today.

Modern Mass Production

9. In the electronic age, the meaning of writing, and of writings, is being transformed in the religions, as well. The blossoming of the information society makes possible the mass production of religious writings, and the latter, through the progressing electronic network, can be made available to all who are interested. Alongside 'old media,' such as electronic tapes or videotapes, in the future the computer could figure among the important vehicles of religious activities (→ Media). Approaches are recognizable in the private area of religious practice (Internet sale of consecrated Hosts, automated prayer service), although community rituals still exercise a greater power or attraction on the faithful. Even the formation of communities cannot escape this tendency. The fact that writings spread by the Internet do not have a concrete and limited circle of addressees, forces authors to address their messages to a potential audience unknown to them. The broad audience thereby assumes, first, a passive role (reading). Active writing (entering onto the Internet) can only follow for those willing to endorse virtual community. Today, it is difficult to establish the functionality of the act of writing, or that of the writings themselves, in the traditional schema.

Literature

Gaur, Albertine, A History of Writing, London 1984; Goody, Jack, The Logic of Writing and the Organization of Society, Cambridge 1986; Idem, The Interface between the Written and the Oral, Cambridge 1987; Graham, William A., "Scripture," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 13 (1987), 139-145; Idem, Beyond the Written Word: Oral Aspects of Scripture in the History of Religion, Cambridge 1987; Hooker, James T., Reading the Past: Ancient Writing from Cuneiform to the Alphabet, London 1990; Levering, Miriam (ed.), Rethinking Scripture: Essays from a Comparative Perspective, New York 1989; Steiner, Deborah Tarn, The Tyrant's Writ: Myths and Images of Writing in Ancient Greece, Princeton 1994.

→ Bible, Book, Communication, Language, Literature, Media, Memory, Oral Tradition, Text/Textual Criticism

Hiroshi Kubota

Yoga

Origins

The concept and practices of yoga come out of India (→ Indian Subcontinent). The Sanskrit word yoga is related to the English 'yoke.' In the ancient text of the Veda, accordingly, it meant first, the hitching (therefore, the 'yoking') of draught animals to a cart or plow.

Then, in the time of the Upanishads (from c. 900 BCE), as a systematic examination of human nature began in India, the concept was broadened to include a mental and religious dimension. A basic premise of the mystics of the days in question was that religious seekers must 'yoke' their senses and drives (constantly subjected, as they are, to transformation), that is, dominate them, in order to be able to venture an advance to their essential basis and ground—as eternally and changelessly apostrophized. Only thus, according to the teaching of the Upanishads, was 'liberation' (Skt., moksha) from the cycle of → 'rebirths' (samsara) to be attained. From such an allegorical comparison of human meaning with draught animals, the concept yoga in India gradually advanced to the status of an umbrella concept for the type of the praxis-oriented way of salvation.

Around the first centuries CE, the *yoga sutra*s (i.e. yoga verse) of Patañjali appeared, considered to be a basic text even today. In these maxims, a scant two hundred, yoga is defined as the "coming-to-rest of the activities of the human heart and soul," in the sense of a 'hitching up,' a yoking, of the mind and spirit. Here Patañjali teaches an eight-limbed "way of yogic practice," as follows.

- yama: general ethical commandments, such as nonviolence, truthfulness, not stealing, moderation, and not hoarding;
- niyama: specific ethical commandments, such as cleanliness, health, attention, self-study, and orientation to the immortal;
- asama: seating, and body position(s);
- pranayama: breathing exercises (→ Breathing);
- pratyahara: withdrawal of the senses inward;
- dharana: meditation;
- samadhi: immersion, being one. Yoga scholar Mircea → Eliade denotes the highest condition of yoga, samadhi, as 'entasy'—in the sense of a complete 'being at,' or 'being within' oneself, as distinguished from the frequently encountered religious → ecstasy, in the sense of a total 'being outside of oneself' (Eliade 1969).

Hatha Yoga

Besides the other kinds of yoga, beginning in the twelfth century CE, in India developed, on the spiritual foundation of tantrism (→ Tantra), hatha yoga (yoga of the 'power thrusts'), which valued the corporeal aspects of the 'way of the practice,' a differentiated physiology of its own. Here belongs, for example, the concept of chakras—thought of as delicate matter—a concept that today enjoys a growing popularity, especially in Western countries (→ New Age).

Yoga in the West

In the West, toward the end of the nineteenth century, yoga in its practical application was transmitted especially by the appearance of Indian Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902) at the World Congress of Religions (1893) in Chicago, and by the activities of the → Theosophical Society under Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Annie Besant (1847–1933). This first generation of Western adepts limited itself to yoga's concentrative and meditative practices. But, at the end of the 1930s, with the founding of the yoga schools of Boris Sacharov (1899–1959) in Berlin, and Selvarajan Yesudian (1916–1998) and Elisabeth Haich (1897–1994) in Budapest, the era of a Western yoga of a newer stamp began. This second phase in the development of yoga is characterized by the opening of instruction to a wider circle—unlike the exclusive guidance of a closed circle in the earlier phase of Theosophically marked yoga—as well as by a stronger orientation, during the exercises, toward psycho-physical events. Simultaneously, Western research offered its first verifications of the manners of operation of individual yoga exercises, as examined through medical and psychological studies.

Secularization

Today, many of the courses in Yoga offered in the West are extensively dissevered from the original, unambiguously religious relation of Indian yoga, and especially pursue corporeal purposes of regeneration and therapeutic prophylaxis. Accordingly, in Western countries, on the occasion of investigations into the motives of a participation in yoga or yoga courses, it is 'relaxation' and 'physical fitness' that are cited as first on the list (Fuchs 1990, 239f.). Along with content and direction, the current Western forms of the transmission of yoga are specified. Thus, practitioners of yoga in Europe and North America are rather rarely—as in traditional India—instructed by → gurus, who expect a high degree of personal dedication, but by yoga teachers, who are usually active in a second occupation, and direct their instruction to the didactic principles of adult education. This Western development can therefore be designated, as a whole, secularization of yoga. In this connection, it is likewise interesting that eighty percent of those three million people practicing and teaching yoga in Germany are women (Fuchs 1990, 198 and 201), while, in India, yoga is still a clear domain of men.

Literature

Sources: Malhotra, Ashok Kumar, An Introduction to Yoga Philosophy: An Annotated Translation of the Yoga Sutras, Aldershot 2001; Prasada, Rama, Patanjali's Yoga Sutras, with the Commentary of Vyasa and the Gloss of Vachaspati Mishra, New Delhi 1978.

Secondary Literature: De Michelis, Elizabeth, A History of Modern Yoga: Patañjali and Western Esotericism, London 2004; Eliade, Mircea, Yoga: Immortality and Freedom, New York [2]1969 (Fr. [1]1954); Feuerstein, Georg, The Philosophy of Classical Yoga, Manchester 1980; Fuchs, Christian, Yoga in Deutschland. Rezeption, Organisation, Typologie, Stuttgart 1990; Jarrell, Howard R., International Yoga Bibliography, 1950 to 1980, Metuchen 1981; Worthington, Vivian, A History of Yoga, London/Boston 1982.

→ Body, Breathing, Guru, Hinduism, Indian Subcontinent, Meditation, Mysticism, New Age, Occultism, Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society

Christian Fuchs

Zarathustra

No one knows exactly when and where Zarathustra, the 'founder' of → Zoroastrianism, lived. In fact, it is not even certain whether Zarathustra represents a historical individual at all. Even in the most ancient sources, the 'historical Zarathustra' appears as a remarkably nebulous figure, later to be repeatedly overlaid with mythology, theology, ritual, literature, iconography, and ideology.

The Gathas

The name Zarathustra (or Zarathushtra) appears in five very ancient hymns, the 'Gathas' ('songs'), composed in an ancient Iranian language. It is not certain who it was who composed these songs—Zarathustra himself? The place and time of the emergence of the Gathas is disputed. Most scholars assume that they were composed at the latest in the eighth century BCE, and perhaps even in the middle of the second millennium BCE, while some scholars opt for a date in the sixth/fifth centuries BCE. (The date of the composition of the hymns implies the date for Zarathustra.) It is generally assumed that these hymns were composed somewhere east of the borders of today's → Iran. In these songs, Zarathustra makes his appearance as an exceptional figure, an especially close confederate of the dominant god Ahura Mazda with whom he communicates and who grants him support. Together with a group of like-minded people, he is haunted by their adversaries.

The Later (Standard) Avesta

The Gathas probably belonged to the oldest layers of a liturgical text called the 'Yasna' (that at the same time is the name of a ritual in the course of which this text is recited). The Yasna makes part of a collection of ritual texts known as the 'Avesta' (which is often, rather misleadingly, referred to as 'the sacred writings' of Zoroastrianism). In contrast to the Gathas, the major parts of these texts portray a rather schematic view of Zarathustra: he acts as a powerful enemy of the demons, as a companion of the gods and goddesses, and as a partisan of good order, religion, and ritual. Many Avestan texts are rhetorically devised as dialogs between Zarathustra and the god Ahura Mazda: Zarathustra asks a question and the god provides the answers.

Biographies

In the Avestan texts, Zarathustra occasionally appears in a mythological or legendary light. Materials of this sort were later worked up into veritable biographies, in middle- and new Persian languages. Most episodes of those biographies entwine around Zarathustra's conception, his mother's pregnancy, his birth and childhood. The key event in these biographies is his (ecstatic) encounter with the divine beings at the age of thirty. At forty, he is supposed to have converted a prince or king to his religion, miraculously overcoming the resistance of 'wicked' priests. In these biographies, Zarathustra's death is mentioned marginally. These texts proved useful not only for edification and apologetics, but also for the legitimization of certain ideas and institutions.

Pictorial Representation

It was presumably only by way of contact with the visual piety of British Christians that, in the early nineteenth century, Indian followers of Zarathustra's religion, the Parsis (→ Zoroastrianism), developed the desire for a graphic representation of their 'prophet.' Consequently, a number of portraits of Zarathustra made their appearance, which nowadays play an important role in the everyday life and prayer life of the followers of Zarathustra. One of their favorite representations is the work of German painter Eduard J. D. Bendemann (1811–1889), and was originally prepared for the throne room of the Castle of Dresden.

Zoroaster in the West

Already in antiquity, there was a lively interest in Zarathustra (alias Zoroaster) in the West. The reports circulating concerning this Zoroaster include the biographical episode (also mentioned in the Iranian biographies) that he, alone among human beings, laughed at birth. Christian authors interpreted this as evidence either of his demonic character, or else of his special geniality. Similarly ambiguous was the report that it was Zoroaster who invented → magic and the liberal arts. Another influential tradition saw in Zoroaster a king, a successor of Noah. Furthermore, he was accounted a great astrologer and astronomer.

In the early modern age, along with Hermes Trismegistus, Zarathustra won prestige as representative of a very ancient, yet timeless, wisdom (prisca theologia; → Esotericism; Hermetism/Hermeticism), whose deciphering and 'renaissance' were to contribute to a renewal of religious life. Later, certain figures of the → Enlightenment looked on Zarathustra as the protagonist of a 'natural religion,' or 'religion of reason,' that looked as if it could shake Christianity to its foundations. Voltaire, in his struggle against the backward powers of superstition (l'infâme), appealed to Zoroaster.

Nietzsche and Sequels

Friedrich Nietzsche's Thus Spoke Zarathustra (part 1: 1883) produced a new Zarathustra discourse. In first drafts, → Nietzsche had used the Greek Heraclitus as his hero. Now, not without irony, he reached even further back, to the 'Persian,' Zarathustra. With Nietzsche's book, 'Zarathustra' received a new life of his own, and (like his creator) he became a cult figure for a new readership. To be sure, Zarathrustra's name could also unfold its charm without a careful reading of the book. There are several visual presentations of Nietzsche's Zarathustra, and with Richard Strauss's tone poem (1896) named after the book—which, in turn, straightway attained to cult status as music for Stanley Kubrik's "2001: A Space Odyssey" (1968)—Zarathustra even gained an acoustic presence. The fascination that shone in Nietzsche's book condensed in a number of sequels from the first third of the twentieth century. Nietzsche himself, in Ecce Homo, insisted that it had been the 'Persian Zarathustra' who had been the first to create the ominous error of the translation of morals into metaphysics. Therefore the confutation of this error had to come, once more, in the name of Zarathustra, the most truthful of all.

Mazdasnan

His admirers hailed the founder of the Mazdasnan movement as a 'new Zarathustra.' The relation to Zarathustra is reflected in his very name: Dr. Otoman-Zar-Adusht (!) Ha'nish (1844–1939). The name of the religion likewise plays on the Zarathustric religion ('Mazdasnan' is derived from Ahura Mazda). There are also some further modern religious movements that, in some way or the other, claim a link to Zarathustra (such as with Osho [→ Osho Movement], OHASPE, Theosophists, and Anthroposophists [→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society]).

A Modern National Hero

While he was praised as an ancient sage in some esoteric currents, Zarathustra has for long centuries ranked in the Islamic East as an antagonist. In the vicinity of Persepolis, however, there is a remarkable ancient building that the vernacular, by association with the great stone cube of Mecca, called 'Zarathustra's Kaaba.' With the rise of modern Iranian nationalism, Zarathustra has come, in certain circles, to perform a positive political function. As the epitome of a pure, brilliant, ethically directed, ancient Aryan Iranian civilization, Zarathustra was stylized into a kind of proto-national hero. In recent decades, furthermore, Zarathustra has been 'discovered' by certain Central Asian intellectuals (e.g., in Tajikistan). Moreover, a number of Kurds are convinced that Zarathustra was one of their 'prophets.'

Literature

Gnoli, Gherardo, Zoroaster in History, New York 2000; Kellens, Jean, Essays on Zarathustra and Zoroastrianism, Costa Mesa 2000; Rose, Jenny, The Image of Zoroaster: The Persian Mage through European Eyes, New York 2000; Stausberg, Michael, Faszination Zarathushtra. Zoroaster und die Europäische Religionsgeschichte der Frühen Neuzeit. 2 vols, Berlin/New York 1998; Idem, Die Religion Zarathushtras: Geschichte—Gegenwart—Rituale, vol. 1, Stuttgart etc. 2002.

→ European History of Religion, Esotericism, Iran, Reception, Zoroastrianism

Michael Stausberg

Zen Buddhism

1. Zen is the Japanese designation for the Chinese ch'an (in Sanskrit, dhyāna, 'meditation,' 'immersion'), and denotes a tradition of Mahayana Buddhism for which the key religious practice is '→ meditation sitting' (in Jap., zazen). What is characteristic of Zen can be summarized in four brief enunciations: (1) Zen understands itself as a special tradition outside of orthodox teaching; it emphasizes (2) independence of the authority of sacred scriptures; (3) a transmission of the teaching 'from heart to heart,' from master to pupil; and (4) the sight and observation of one's own being (kenshô). Zen stresses the priority of an experience of enlightenment over intellectual confrontation with Buddhist teaching and the performance of a polished ritualistics, such as that obtained in the schools of esoteric Buddhism (Tendai, Shingon). Further, Zen interprets the concept of ritual in a new manner. Everyday activities, such as raking leaves, eating, and drinking tea, in a context of schooling in mindfulness, are performed with consciousness and attention, and in this consciousness, become the daily ritual.

Zen in China

2. a) The founder of Zen is the half-legendary figure of the eighteenth Indian patriarch, Bodhidharma (d. 532). At the beginning of the sixth century, Bodhidharma brought the Buddhist teaching to China. There it connected with Daoist elements, and developed a character of its own. Bodhidharma became the first Chinese Zen patriarch. The sixth patriarch, Hui-neng (638–713), composer of the Platform Sutras, enjoyed a far-reaching influence. Master Pai-chang (eighth patriarch, 720–814) introduced a stable monastic rule for monks, thereby bestowing on Zen its independence from other Buddhist schools. A surprising development was the imposition of the commandment of daily work: "A day without work is a day without eating."

The Zen Practice of the Tea Ritual (in Jap., Sarei*)*

The founder of Japanese Sôtô Zen, Dôgen (1200–1253), made tea drinking a substantial component of daily life in Zen monasteries. Sarei, the tea ritual, celebrated on certain occasions, serves as a stimulant, with the tea ingested before the phases of meditation (in Jap., zazen), and at the same time has a community-founding function. From the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, tea was prepared and consumed as a mixture of water and tea powder, produced from pulverized leaves of green tea, and beaten foamy with a bamboo brush. This is the form of tea preparation that we find today in the 'tea ceremony' ('Tea Way,' in Jap., chadô). The monks of the monastery gathered before the image of the Bodhidharma, and drank tea from a bowl, passing it around in a circle. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a new variant of the tea preparation came into style, influenced by the China of the Ming dynasty, and suppressing the tea-powder variant. Tea was prepared by brewing green-tea leaves in a bowl or pot of hot water; and the broth was then consumed. This variant of the tea preparation is still the common form today for the monastic Tea Ritual Sarei, daily celebrated in the meditation hall. This is the form familiar to people in the West, which has its origin in the fact that tea first came to Europe in the time of the Ming Dynasty.

The tea culture originates in China. Japanese monks, pursuing Buddhist studies in China in the twelfth century, became acquainted with tea—as a medicine, as a sacrifice, and as a drink—and carried seeds and seedlings back to Japan. The most celebrated monk to have introduced and promoted tea farming in Japan was Zen master Esai (1141–1215), founder of the Rinzai Zen school. Along with Buddhist studies, Esai concerned himself with Chinese medicine, and, in his Kissayôjôki ("Notes for Tea Drinking for Health"), emphasized the purpose of tea drinking indicated in his title. One of Zen's most basic concepts, which made it possible for the art of tea (in Jap., chanoyu; lit., 'hot water for tea') to develop outside the monastery walls, comes from Dôgen. From an originally religious ceremony in Buddhist monasteries, the art of tea then became an aesthetic spiritual discipline for laity. (The concept 'Tea Way'—in Jap., chadô—comes from Dôgen.) According to the understanding of Dôgen, no distinction obtains between the sacred and the profane. Each instant, each everyday action opens out toward the experience of the Absolute. "Reflect that the Buddha and the Patriarchs express their true 'self' in daily actions such as drinking tea and eating rice. Such acts are the entire life of the Buddha, as also that of the Patriarchs. Apart from it, there is no 'way of the Buddha'" (Dôgen, Shôbôgenzô, Zurich 1975, 1:129). Schooling in attentiveness and immersion, which the Buddhist monk traditionally exercises in monastic meditation, is translated by Dôgen into daily deeds. In a source book for the Tea Way from the seventeenth century, monk Jakuan Sôtaku's Indications concerning Zen and Tea (Zencharoku), we read: "Under the thought that tea can be brought into agreement with the essential points of the Way of the Buddha, the 'Way of the Tea' appeared. [. . .] In the genuine sense, the preparation of the Tea Ceremony, as Zen practice, is a mental, spiritual exercise, that is essential for a clear grasp of one's own being. [. . .] To possess a heart arrested by nothing, and thus to have in hand the utensils for the tea—this is the meaning of immersion. Even when it is a matter of nothing but the teaspoon, let one give one's heart without reserve to that teaspoon, and think of nothing else at all."

In the Tea Way, the Zen method of the schooling of the consciousness in the accomplishment or everyday actions, in the sense of an utter surrender to the moment, wins an artistic dimension. One of the great molders of the Tea Way is Sen Rikyû (1521–1591), Zen adept and 'cultural manager,' as well as political adviser to Shogun Toyotomi Hideyoshi. With his design of the Tea Way, he contrived a new concept of human 'synanthropy' and ethics, oriented to Zen Buddhist principles. Here the foundational pillars represent the four virtues of harmony (in Jap., wa), attention (kei), purity (sei), and inner composure (jaku). The tea ceremony should realize at every moment artlessness, adaptation to circumstances, contentment, thankfulness, mindfulness, concentration, and the consciousness of transiency.

In this picture, European Zen pupils practice the rite of 'tea passing' at the beginning of a phase of meditation in the Meditation Hall of the Bodhidharma Zendo, the Zen Center founded in Vienna in 1979.

Sabine Bayreuther

Toward the time of the T'ang Dynasty (618–906), there arose five different Zen traditions—the 'Five Houses' (in Chinese, wu-chia)—with their respective peculiarities in understanding and schooling practice. During the time of the Kamakura dynasty, two of these lines, the Lin-chi (in Jap., Rinzai) and the Ts'ao-tung (in Jap., Sôtô) schools, found their way to Japan, and there they blossomed anew. In the late eighteenth century, Buddhism in China began an extensive retrenchment. In the T'ai-p'ing rebellion (1850–1865), the once flourishing monasteries lay abandoned, and Buddhist life was broadly paralyzed. At the beginning of the twentieth century, abbots and scholars undertook attempts at renewal, but these remained largely without effect. The general political and spiritual climate offered little space for religious activities. Buddhism's teachings were regarded as relics of China's 'feudal' past, and especially in the years of the Maoist Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), they were systematically repressed, while the monasteries' economic bases were widely destroyed. The consequences come down all the way into the present.

Zen in Japan

b) After the Gempei War of 1185, a political power switch occurred in Japan. The military nobility in → Kyôto repressed the court nobility, and assumed governmental power in the form of the shogunate. The seat of the military governors (Shogun) was Kamakura. The changed political situation favored the ascent of new Buddhist schools, especially the Zen schools, whose value concepts were so closely akin to Samurai ethics and Confucian virtues. Through Japanese Tendai monks, pursuing studies in Buddhist China, Zen teachings reached Japan. Eisai (1141–1215) founded the tradition of the Rinzai Zen in Japan, Dôgen those of Sôtô Zen. The principal temple of the Sôtô school is the Eiheiji, the Temple of Eternal Peace (Prefecture of Fukui), while the Rinzai line, by association with their Chinese exemplar, conceded special tasks and privileges to five large monasteries, the 'Five Mountains' (in Jap., gosan), in Kyôto and Kawakura. In the mid-seventeenth century, Chinese master Yin-yüan Lung-ch'i (in Jap., Ingen Ryûki) founded a third Zen school, the Ôbaku, with its principal monastery Mampukuji in Uja, in the vicinity of Kyôto. This parallel line of the Rinzai School retains little importance today.

At present, the Zen school in Japan has some ten million followers, slightly less than ten percent of the Japanese population. Actual Zen teaching and practice play a very subordinate role in the lives of lay Buddhists. The strict life of the Zen monasteries and the radical nature of Zen religious practice are quite unpopular among the population. This effect has been reinforced by the common practice, on the part of Japanese enterprises since the end or the 1950s, of obliging employees to undertake zazen schooling in Zen monasteries. The purpose is education in traditional Confucian virtues, such as discipline, respect, company loyalty, and readiness for commitment. Critics see in these practices a mere utilization of the Zen method, now reduced to the service of profit-oriented economic interests, for manipulating workers, and rendering them subservient. The aim, however, has nothing in common with the acquisition of knowledge, or with a spiritual life in the sense of the Buddhist ethic. One basis for the readiness of so many Zen temples to cooperate with company management may be, besides the financial aspect, a sharply declining interest on the part of the Japanese population in intensive Buddhist practice since the Second World War. The social function of Buddhist temples has been radically reduced (to the celebration of funerals and other offices of the dead). The structure of the Buddhist temple system in Japan provides that the eldest son of a priestly family become a monk, complete his religious formation in a monastery of the respective school-orientation, and take up the 'family temple.' This custom holds for Zen temples, as well. The motivation to go the Zen way as monk and priest is seldom based on a religious vocation, but is oriented to social advantages and traditions of legacy. This tends to deprive Zen of its depth in Japan.

Essential Traits of Zen

3. Along with the exercise of zazen, the work ethic is one of the most important elements of Zen practice. "All activities are the activities of the Buddha" (Suzuki Shôzan, 1579–1655). Enlightenment (satori) can be achieved not only in the condition of meditative immersion, but also in dedication to daily tasks. Everyday life is the place of religious exercise. Especially in the Rinzai tradition, daily physical work (samu) plays an important role in the monks' regulated daily round. Observance of the maxim, "Practical action is more important than religious theory," leads to Zen's radical simplification of cult: renunciation of elaborate ceremonial, rituals, images, and symbolism, rejection of philosophical abstractions, as well as of any exaggerated apparatus of aids to piety. A determination not to cling to religious objects (or writings) led to aniconic tendencies. Sixth patriarch Hui-neng was accustomed to shred scrolls of sutras, Master Tianran (738–824) burned a wooden Buddha to keep warm in winter. Such acts also manifest the anarchical moment that typifies Zen. Reactions can depreciate into the vulgar, the obscene, the subversive, and turn against received hierarchical structures, empty traditions and habits of thought. The Zen monk slips into the role of the religious clown, fool, or provocateur. Many masters are shown in watercolors laughing uproariously.

Daily Life and Schooling Practices in the Monastery

4. Zen monasteries levy no taxes. The monastic community lives on donations, on begging rounds (money, rice, vegetables), on its own agricultural projects, and on stipends received for religious services (e.g., funeral ceremonies). The life of the monks is marked by hierarchical structures, rules, discipline, and a day organized down to the last detail. Besides physical labor, monks' tasks and duties include the daily recitation of Buddhist instructional texts (sutras), and weeklong meditations (sesshin), nocturnal zazen, begging (takuhatsu), and, in Rinzai monasteries, the practice of the kôan. In this latter practice they receive from the master a proposition or application, frequently paradoxical or rationally insoluble ("What is the sound of one hand clapping?"), by means of which they are to school themselves to move past rational thinking, and to attain to an experience of oneness. In Sôtô Zen monasteries, where the kôan is not practiced, the master affords the practitioners the opportunity to present their problems in special question sessions (mondo). In addition, a number of the more experienced monks hold certain offices. For example, the senior monk supervises the meditation hall and introduces the zazen. Others are the cook in the monastery kitchen, cantors at the recitation of the sutras, personal servants of the Zen Master, and the monks whose tasks are the reception and entertaining of guests, or seeing to the monastery's bookkeeping and financial management. Furniture in Zen monasteries, like the Zen life practiced there, is characterized by simplicity, parsimony, plainness, and severity, and the practitioner must be content with little. His acts are to be upright and artless. We encounter this aspect of Zen in Zen aesthetics: in the art of reduction, for example, in the form of monochrome watercolors, in the simplicity of an artistic flower arrangement, or in the style of a Japanese Zen-garden (→ Garden/Paradise). Daily activities such as garden maintenance become aestheticized, and serve as a locus of spiritual experience.

Zen in the West

5. The transmission of Zen to the West occurred first and foremost through Daisetzu Suzuki (1870–1966), who came to America at the beginning of the twentieth century with the purpose of collaborating in the publication of East Asian, and especially Zen Buddhist, writings. He gave numerous lectures and addresses in the cities of America and Europe. Another master, Shigetsu Sasaki Sokei-an (1882–1945), founder and Master of the First Zen Institute of America, in New York, lived and taught in the United States from 1906 until his death in 1945. The pioneer generation of Zen research in Germany includes religion scholars Hans Haas (1868–1934) and Wilhelm Gundert (1880–1971), and Protestant theologians Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) and Karl Heim (1874–1958). In 1925, for the first time, Zen texts were published, with detailed commentary, in German (August Faust, Shuhei Ohasama). With Jesuit Father Hugo M. Enomiya-Lassalle, the 'Christian Zen' movement began. In 1968, after twenty years' Zen practice under Japanese masters, the priest began to teach Zen in Germany.

In Europe and North America, numerous groups of Sôtô and Rinzai Zen were established, and are members of umbrella organizations of Buddhist communities. Dangers accompanying the implantation of Zen in the West are exoticization, and unreflective adoption of Japanese structures. The establishment of Zen in the West is a difficult tightrope-walk between a temperate adaptation to Western lifestyles, and preservation of the essence of Zen.

Literature

Sources: Deshimaru, Taisen, Questions to a Zen Master, London 1991; Dôgen Zenji, A Primer of Sôtô Zen: A Trans. of Dôgen's Shôbôgenzô Zuimonki by Reihô Masunga, London 1978; Enomiya-Lassalle, Hugo M., Zen Meditation for Christians, La Salle 1974; Heine, Steven, Opening a Mountain: Kôans of the Zen Masters, Oxford 2002.

Secondary Literature: Abe, Masao, Zen and Western Thought, London 1985; Idem, Zen and Comparative Studies, Honolulu 1997; Anderson, Jennifer L., An Introduction to Japanese Tea Ritual, Albany 1991; Baroni, Helen J., The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Zen Buddhism, New York 2002; Bodiford, William M., Sôtô Zen in Medieval Japan, Honolulu 1993; Dumoulin, Heinrich, Zen Buddhism: A History, 2 vols., New York 1988–1990; Idem, Zen Buddhism in the 20th Century, New York 1992; Kapleau, Philip, The Three Pillars of Zen: Teaching, Practice, and Enlightenment, New York [25]2000 ([1]1965); Kraft, Kenneth (ed.), Zen: Tradition and Transition, New York 1988.

→ Buddhism, China/Japan/Korea, Esalen Institute, Kyôto, Martial Arts, New Age

Sabine Bayreuther

Zionism

1. Zionism is a movement in → Judaism, appearing at the end of the nineteenth century, with the goal of the creation of a 'national homeland' for the Jews scattered through the → Diaspora. The designation is derived from 'Zion,' a hill in → Jerusalem, where there once stood the Jebusites' citadel that David overcame ('City of David'; 2 Sam 5:7). Even in the Bible, the name was extended to the Temple Mount, all of Jerusalem, and, finally, Israel. As a mythical place, Zion stands for the 'Mount of God,' after the exemplar of the 'mountain far to the north,' home of the gods of Phoenician mythology (Ps 48; cf. 2:6). After the destruction of the Temple (70 CE), Zion became the symbol of Jewish longing for a return to the ancient homeland. This hope of return found expression in the Jewish liturgy, as, for instance, in the blessing and farewell greeting, "Next year in Jerusalem!" However, the idea long remained joined to Messianic hopes. Only in the nineteenth century were plans developed for the creation of a Jewish homeland. Premises for the creation of a Jewish homeland were, for one, the extension of a racist → anti-Semitism that erased the success of the Jewish emancipation, and for another, the rise of a nationalism that favored the emergence of a Jewish national movement.

Zionist Movement before 1948

2. The first impetus for the Zionist movement came from Eastern Europe. In reaction to the pogroms of the early 1880s, in Russia, Leon Pinsker (1821–1891) composed his Autoemanzipation, in which he presented the necessity of the foundation of a Jewish homeland. Likewise under the pressure of the Russian pogroms, there arose, in Eastern Europe in 1882, the Chibbat Zion (Heb., 'Love for Zion') movement, whose goal was the promotion of Jewish settlement-movements in Palestine. The activities of the Chibbat Zion can be denominated ‘practical Zionism.’ This direction met with sharp criticism from the side of the ‘cultural Zionists,’ especially Achid Haam (1856–1927), who championed the creation of a cultural and spiritual center in Palestine.

Commemorative postage stamp of the State of Israel for the one-hundredth jubilee of the first Zionist Congress in Basle in 1897, with the image of Theodor Herzl, the Basle Casino as the meeting place of the first and subsequent Congresses, and the Israeli state flag.

Theodor Herzl and Political Zionism

The founder of political Zionism is journalist and author Theodor Herzl (1860–1904). Under the pressure of the nationalistic strivings of Austria-Hungary and the influence of the Dreyfus Affair in France—where he had resided since 1891 as correspondent for Vienna’s Neue Freie Presse—Herzl developed his Zionist ideas. In 1896, he published Der Judenstaat – Versuch einer modernen Lösung der Judenfrage (Eng. as “The Jewish State: An Attempt at a Modern Solution of the Jewish Question”). There, Herzl represented the view that the ‘Jewish question’ could be solved only by the concentration of the Jews in a particular region. He regarded the ‘Jewish question’ not under a religious, but under a national aspect, and his piece provoked intense reaction. On the Orthodox side, he was declared a heretic, as his endeavors were deemed to stand in contradiction with the Messianic promises—an argument still put forward by the extreme Orthodox today. Assimilated Jews, too, turned against Herzl, as they feared that, with Zionism, any emancipation that had already been achieved would itself be in jeopardy. In 1897, the first Jewish Congress took place in Basle, at which Herzl founded the Zionistische Weltorganisation (Ger., “World Zionist Organization”), as an umbrella organization for the Zionist groups. Subsequently, “World Zionist Congresses” have been held every two years—since 1961, in Jerusalem. Herzl’s diplomatic efforts to reach Zionist aims politically at first met with no success. But Eastern European Zionists forged ahead with the settlement of Palestine. Immigration (in Heb., aliya, 'ascent') became an important basis for the realization of Herzl's ideas. Between the beginning of the 1880s and the founding of the State of Israel, there were six waves of immigration. The Jewish population (yishuv, 'inhabited land') swelled from 25,000 to more than 600,000. Often, immigration was accompanied by the influx of a manual labor force. With respect to the latter, the wish was for the creation of a productive basis for the new society. In place of the often physically unprepared Jews of the Diaspora, a new generation of strong, able-bodied persons would now step forward. Among the immigrants in the time from 1905–1926, socialist tendencies prevailed. Beginning in 1909, and influenced by socialist idealism, Kibbutzim (pl. of Heb. kibbutz, a 'gathering') appeared. These were community settlements, based on rigorously socialist principles, extensively corresponding to the commune of an ideal type. The Kibbutzim played a decisive role in the settlement of the land, and in the political development of the Jewish community system. The socialist tendencies of this time are also responsible for the fact that it was the labor union Histadrut, founded in 1920, that set up state structures in many areas.

Political acknowledgment of Zionist goals materialized only as a result of the 1917 Balfour Declaration, in which Great Britain certified its support of the creation of a Jewish homeland in → Palestine. The proclamation of the State of Israel, to be sure, came only in 1948, after millions of Jews had been sacrificed to the National Socialist evil. After the → Shoah, a rejection of the State of Israel seemed inconceivable.

Zionism and the State of Israel

3. With the founding of the State of Israel, the supreme Zionist goal had been attained. Zionism then had to define its content anew, as many of its tasks had been assumed by the Israeli state. Concentration was then on the pro-Israeli work in the Diaspora, and care for new immigrants. From some 650,000 Jews at the founding of the state, the population grew by nine-fold by the turn of the century (1997: 5,836,000).

National Religious 'Neo-Zionism': The Settlers' Movement

The Six Days War of 1967 represents a turning point in the history of Zionism, in which Israel occupied East → Jerusalem, with Mount Zion and the Wailing Wall, the Sinai Peninsula, the area of West Jordan, the Golan Heights, and the Gaza Strip. By way of the additional regions won in the Six Days War, the Arab minority increased considerably in the Jewish state. This demographic change moved to the foreground the question of the relationship with the Arabs, who were creating an identity of their own, as 'Palestinians.' In addition, after this demonstration of Israeli strength Zionism found nearly complete pan-Jewish support. Many Jews saw the victory, with its conquest of the Old City of Jerusalem and the Temple Mount, as well as of the biblical focal point from Nablus/Sichem to Hebron, as a divine sign. A new 'settlement movement' sprang up, representing a fundamentalistic, national-religious (Neo-) Zionism, and introducing religious arguments for the annexation of the occupied territories. A religious variant of Zionism, that until now had played only a marginal role, grew in importance in the years after 1967, and traditional secular Zionism was overshadowed. This development reached its climax with the murder of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by a fanatical religious Jew, in November 1995.

Gush Emunim and Protestant Zionism

One result of this merging of (non-religious) political Zionism and religious messianic Zionism was the growth of the radical Gush Emunim movement (Heb., 'Block of the Faithful'), still influential in Israeli politics today. In a strange alliance with North American pre-millennialist Protestant Zionists—who view the 'gathering of the people of Israel' in the 'Holy Land' and the Jews' subsequent conversion to Christianity as a birth pang of the Messianic age (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm)—the religious charging of Zionism with Messianism changed the political landscape of the Near East.

Anti-Zionism

4. At the dawn of the twenty-first century, Zionism has numerous problems to combat. Immigration into Israel—after a powerful wave of immigration at the beginning of the 1990s, from the region of the former Soviet Union—is now shrinking, while the number of emigrants is climbing. The Zionist assumption that, with the existence of a Jewish state, enmity towards Jews would come to an end, has proved to be untenable. Not only in Arab space did Anti-Zionist attitudes spring up; the Soviet Union pilloried Israel, in the Cold War, as an outpost of United States imperialism, availing itself, as did other Eastern bloc countries, of anti-Semitic stereotypes. A similar argumentation was mounted by a large number of spokespersons from the 'Third World,' and, to an extent, by the leftist movements of the West, which alleged Israel's colonialist character, and criticized a racist dimension in Zionism. In 1975, a UN resolution (Nov. 10, 1975, no. 3379) even defined Zionism as a form of racism. The resolution was rescinded (Doc. No. A/RES/46/86, 74th plenary meeting of Dec. 16, 1991). However, this did not mean the end of anti-Zionism. Anti-Semitism, no longer respectable since the Shoah, here found its prolongation.

Zionism in Crisis

5. Since the 1980s, Zionism has itself been under academic discussion. 'New historians' Benny Morris, Han Pappe, Avi Schlaim, and Tom Segev, whose position is often the object of allusion, included the standpoint of the Palestinians in their consideration of Israeli history and society, and criticized various aspects of Zionism. Thus, they maintained their attitude against a background of the Intifada, and of the aporias of the Israeli occupation policy. The inclusion of their criticism in a new history textbook, from 1999, sparked a battle among Israelis. The pride with which the delegates of the Thirty-Seventh Zionist Congress looked back on the one hundred years gone by since the first Congress, cannot conjure away the crisis of the present.

Literature

Sources: Herzl, Theodor, Briefe und Tagebücher, ed. by Alex Bein et al., 7 vols., Frankfurt/M. 1983–1996; Schoeps, Julius H. (ed.), Zionismus. Texte zu seiner Entwicklung, Dreieich 1983.

The 'New Historians': Morris, Benny, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem 1947–1949, Cambridge 1988; Pappe, Ilan, The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict 1948–1951, London 1992; Segev, Tom, 1949—The First Israelis, New York 1992; Idem, The Seventh Million: The Israelis and the Holocaust, New York 1993.

Secondary Literature: Avineri, Shlomo, The Making of Modern Zionism: The Intellectual Origins of the Jewish State, New York 1981; Berkowitz, Michael, Zionist Culture and West European Jewry before the First World War, Cambridge 1993; Laqueur, Walter, A History of Zionism, London 1972; Morris, Benny, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001, new ed., New York 2001; Silberstein, Laurence J., The Postzionism Debates: Knowledge and Power in Israeli Culture, New York/London 1999; Vital, David, The Origins of Zionism, Oxford 1975; Idem, Zionism: The Formative Years, Oxford 1982; Idem, Zionism: The Crucial Phase, Oxford 1987.

→ Anti-Semitism, Diaspora, Jerusalem, Judaism, Millenarianism/Chiliasm, Palestine/Israel, Shoah

Isabel Herkommer

Zombie

Concept

1. The word zombi(e), or zumbi, comes from the Bantu languages (→ Africa), and means 'enslaved spirit.' Zombies are 'un-dead' or 'living corpses,' of whom it is supposed that they can be awakened to life for purposes of black magic. 'Zombie' can denote either: the spirit (of someone dead), as the soul separated from the body, or a 'living corpse,' a body without a soul. The zombie concept originated in the → Voodoo religion, but is also familiar in other parts of the Caribbean, and in Brazil.

In order to understand the phenomenon, it is important to indicate that in no traditional African religion is there a contradiction between magical and religious practice. Magic, as an effort to reach a purpose (rain and fertility, wealth, a love object) by supernatural means, is part of regular religious practice. But in addition, there is a discourse concerning witchcraft—possibly also a practice of the same—centering on harmful spells and the conjuration of the dead (necromancy). In Haitian Voodoo, the conceptualization prevails that a 'black magician,' with magical knowledge and magical powers, can catch the souls of living, or even dead, creatures, human or beast, and contrive to have them serve him. By his magical power, the sorcerer entraps these spirits and keeps them under his control. He can even hold them prisoner in a magical doll. In the background is the belief, itself actually African, that the human body hosts two souls: one, the 'vital soul' (in Creole, gros bon ange), and the other, the 'shadow soul' (petit bon ange), which leaves the body during sleep, and, after death, wanders aimlessly through the world as a zombie. The practice of black magic consists, first, of catching the petit bon ange—at a 'vulnerable' moment, when the connection to the body, and thus with the gros bon ange, is interrupted—and reducing it to one's service. In Brazil, the word 'zombie' is used only of persons who retain their bodies, and are still in life, but who have lost their (shadow) souls and character through magic. Then, it is believed, they can no longer distinguish between good and evil. Far more spectacular is the other apprehension: that of a dead body that the soul spirits are deemed to have abandoned. In that case, it is widely believed, the sorcerer ought to 'zombify' someone, by giving him a poisoned drink, so that he falls into the rigidity of death. Then, during the night, the sorcerer exhumes the victim and drips a magical fluid on his grave. Now the corpse rises from the earth as a zombie, without a will, a body without a soul, who must obey his lord and sorcerer in all things, and must work bearing burdens, or in the field. As with human beings in former times under colonial law, a slave zombie can be purchased from a sorcerer and resold. Here, the zombie status can be perceived mythically, as a social code for slavery, and less as a real event—although Haiti has explicit laws against the fashioning of zombies, and zombification has been brought into connection, in recent years, with local secret societies, which are prohibited and punished by law.

2. Especially under the influence of the American film industry, the zombie has become familiar the world over. This began with Jacques Tourneur's

With "I Walked with a Zombie" (1943, dir. Jacques Tourneur, prod. Val Lewton), after Victor Halperin's "White Zombi" (1932), Haiti's voodoo religion had conquered the cinemas of the Western world once and for all—granted, in the horror genre, as exotic trimming for a well-crafted spine-tingler. "Forbidden Voodoo secrets sensationally revealed," the poster advertised, and set the visitor reverentially a-shudder at such a prodigy of magical pagan gestation. The gentleman with blemished eyes, who obstructs the two ladies' way to the gathering place of the followers of Voodoo, in the middle of a sugar-cane field, is obviously on the scene to give the appearance of a zombie, one of the 'living dead.' True, he is called 'Carrefour' (Fr., 'Intersection'), and watches a crossroads—thus representing the god (Loa) Legba in his guise as Mâitre Carrefour. In Haitian Voodoo, however, the latter is represented as a feeble old graybeard, on crutches. The film develops the zombie theme purely in subordination to a story of whites: Jessica, wife of a plantation owner (left in the picture), is caught between two alienated half-brothers, and has been 'zombified.' Betsy (center), her nurse, attempts to heal her, but the project goes amiss. Finally, it is seen horror classic, "I Walked with a Zombie" (1943), in which Haiti's Voodoo cult is used effectively for a movie scenario. Close on the heels of this piece followed a whole sub-genre of horror films, which promptly broke with the cultural roots of the zombie myth. The Western audience, shivering with delight, were here offered not so much tales of soul thievery, as modern versions (if rather exotically detached) of the old European fear of 'those who return' (the revenants; → Spirits/Ghosts/Revenants), and of the 'undead.' As B-movies, they belong today to the popular culture of the Western world and to its → new myths.

Literature

Slayter, Jay (ed.), Eaten Alive! Italian Cannibal and Zombie Movie, London 2002; Wade, Davis, Passage of Darkness: The Ethnobiology of the Haitian Zombie, Chapel Hill 1988.

→ Afro-American Religions, Magic, New Myths/New Mythologies, Popular Culture, Spiritism, Spirits/Ghosts/Revenants, Voodoo

Claudio Mattes

Zoroastrianism

Designations

'Zoroastrianism' is the modern designation (established in colonial times) for one of the oldest living religious traditions of mankind. The name refers to one of the Greek names of its 'founder' Zoroaster, known as Zarathushtra in the sources from ancient → Iran (→ Zarathustra). In antiquity, most Greek authors referred to the religion simply as 'the religion of the Persians,' while indigenous sources termed it as the 'good' or the 'mazda-worshipping' religion—the latter term focusing on the god Ahura Mazda ('the Wise Lord' or, alternatively, 'Lord Wisdom') who is venerated as the main god, the 'strongest' of the gods (their 'father' and 'fashioner') who has put the universe in good order.

Ancient History and Indigenous Historiography

Zoroastrianism is a religion of considerable historical importance. While its precise origins—both as to the questions of time and space—are a matter of ongoing academic dispute, it had reached the mainland of Persia at the very latest during the reign of the Achaemenian Dynasty, Persian kings who (from the late sixth century BCE onwards) created and ruled over the first world-empire in history, until they were defeated by Alexander and the last Achaemenian king (Darius III) was murdered in 330 BCE. Some Achaemenian kings heavily drew on Zoroastrianism as a source of legitimation for their construction of political empire. For instance, Darius I ('the Great') who is mainly known for his great building projects (Persepolis), his administrative genius and his failed attempt to conquer Greece referred to the 'will' (alternatively: the 'size') of Ahura Mazda as the source of his political success in his royal inscriptions. (The king had seized power from a rival and hence was in need of 'extra' legitimacy.) However, the glory and splendor of the Achaemenians (which is regularly displayed in exhibitions in major museums of the world) was all but forgotten by the later indigenous Zoroastrian historiography that would only remember the fatal onslaught of Alexander the 'accursed' who was blamed for a violent loss of religious traditions. In retrospect Alexander was accused of having murdered priests and scholars, having carried off writings and having them translated, having extinguished ritual fires and having destroyed temples (a somewhat anachronistic accusation since there probably were no fire-temples at the period in question).

While Zoroastrianism struggled under Hellenistic and Roman rule and flourished under the reign of the Arsacid dynasty that controlled large parts of Mesopotamia and Iran (generally known as the 'Parthian' empire) from the third century BCE through the early third century CE, the later Zoroastrian religious tradition praised the Sasanian kings (reigning from 224–651 CE) for powerfully reestablishing the religion. As a matter of fact, several Sasanian rulers highlighted Zoroastrianism on such official propagandistic media as inscriptions, reliefs, and coins. Some kings are reported to have gathered and strengthened the religious traditions. The Sasanian period saw the establishment of many fire-temples, powerful religious endowments, and the rise of a hierarchically differentiated professional priesthood. Occasionally, clashes occurred between different religions operating on Sasanian territory, and there were several instances of persecution of Christians. The very fact that Christianity was developing a powerful base in Iran is indicative of a plurality of competing religions and local cults and practices that tend to be marginalized by the often held idea that there was something like a 'Sasanian state church.' While the Sasanians present themselves as pious Zoroastrians and later sources celebrate some Sasanian kings as exemplary devout kings, among modern Iranian Zoroastrians the Sasanians are often held responsible for a decline of the religion and its misuse for political purposes that would pave the way for the downfall of the empire. As a matter of fact, the Sasanian empire was conquered by Arabic troops in the mid-seventh century CE. Still to this day, most Zoroastrians use the presumed that the local Voodoo cult had been infiltrated and manipulated by a white female physician. Incidentally, the film was made directly after Haiti's last and most vigorous 'Campaign to Combat Superstition' (1940–1941). In the course of the latter, temples of the Voodoo religion were plundered and destroyed, cult objects were burned, and Voodoo priests were thrown into prison. Furthermore, every Catholic had to take a special oath, in which he or she abjured the 'diabolical cult of Voodoo.' (Hubert Mohr) date (631 CE) of the coronation of the last Sasanian ruler (Yazdgird III) as the beginning of their era (2005 CE = 1374 Y). There is no strictly religious era—one of the many signs of the ethnic character of the religion.

The Coming of Islam and Its Aftermath

The Arabic conquest marked the beginning of a process of Islamization of the country that would last over several centuries (→ Islam), but by the thirteenth century CE the Zoroastrians were reduced to an insignificant minority and they were concentrated in some small parts of the country only. In this way, the geographical outreach of the religion was severely reduced—both in Iran and neighboring regions such as Central Asia where it had developed varieties that were markedly different from the main Iranian tradition, for instance with respect to visual representations. (Already in the late third century, when king Tiridates had adopted Christianity in Armenia and had it imposed on the population, Zoroastrianism had declined in that region, but modern research has pointed to many Zoroastrian 'traces' in the religion of the Armenians.)

The deteriorating living conditions of the Iranian Zoroastrians led some to seek refuge at the Indian West coast (Gujarat) where pockets of Zoroastrians had probably by the twelfth century CE established lasting community structures (→ Indian Subcontinent). The Indian Zoroastrians came to be known as the 'Parsis' (an ethnic term presumably referring to their homeland). In the course of time, they developed a specific ethnic identity with a strong sense of shared history, a peculiar language (Parsi-Gujarati), particular rites, ceremonies, and ritual spaces (by law inaccessible to non-Parsis) and their own dress codes and culinary preferences (the latter two have by now mostly disappeared from every-day life but are carefully staged on 'auspicious occasions' such as initiations and weddings).

Colonialism, Diasporas, and Current Demographics

The Parsi communities blossomed during Mughal and British rule. In the collective memory of many Parsis the colonial age is still regarded as something like the 'golden age' of the community in terms of material wealth, social prestige, cultural achievements, and political influence. At the same time, the religion underwent considerable transformations building on economic, legal, spatial, and ideological changes. An unprecedented number of temples were built, most of them in urban Bombay (Mumbai), the modern stronghold of the religion. On the other hand, a number of practices and beliefs became less important (especially the once universal fear of demons had all but vanished). The socio-religious position of the clergy declined and lay leadership was firmly established (partly, but not fully, along democratic lines), and a new code of personal law was enforced (which, among other changes, for the first time consistently established women as autonomous subjects). Social and religious reform movements started to forge new identity-discourses (fighting against 'superstition' and advocating a return to what they regard as the pristine teaching of the prophet), and esoteric movements (building on doctrines of the → Theosophical Society) made an impact on conservative sections of the communities. Since the late nineteenth century, the question of the permissibility of conversion to Zoroastrianism and mixed marriages has been a topic of ongoing debates and (re-) negotiations about Zoroastrian, or Parsi, identities, sometimes involving secular courts. Conversions are still not permitted among the Parsis and while intermarriage is a reality in most families, it is still regarded as a taboo and the religious status of the persons concerned is a matter of dispute.

Some Parsis enthusiastically welcomed independence, but it created a trauma for many others. A rhetoric of crisis seems to pervade the Indian communities. The most visible sign of crisis is the continuous demographic decline that in the long run seems to threaten the very survival of the community in India. (The Indian communities now number less than 70,000.) Part of the explanation for this decline is a reluctance to procreate that is typical for certain sectors of modern societies, while it at the same time is clearly at odds with the exhortations to bear children which can be found throughout the religious literature.

In part, the demographic decline of the contemporary Parsis can also be explained by → migration abroad. Starting with the late eighteenth century, Parsis temporarily or permanently settled not only in different parts of the subcontinent (including what is now Pakistan), but also in distant points of the colonial global trading networks, including Japan, China, Burma, Ceylon, Arabia, Eastern and Southern Africa. While most of these settlements are in decline, migration to Europe (mainly Britain) continues. Since the 1960s, new waves of emigration brought Parsis to the United States and Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and the Gulf states. These developments have contributed a strongly diasporic dimension to modern Zoroastrianism (→ Diaspora).

In → Iran, at the end of the nineteenth century, Zoroastrianism had been reduced to a tiny minority of less than 10,000 who had to bear a wide range of harsh discriminatory practices from the dominant Muslim population. The intervention of their fellow-believers from India, labor migration to India, and substantial political and legal changes have ever since greatly improved the lot of the Iranian Zoroastrians (and led to a tripling of their number). Many Zoroastrians left agriculture, migrated to the modern capital Tehran (which is by now the main stronghold of the Iranian Zoroastrians), and went into the new middle-class professions. Just like in India, some even found great success.

Religious Transformations in Modern Iran

Modern Iranian Zoroastrianism has undergone fundamental changes. As Zoroastrians have been freed from many restrictions, so the religion has been reconceived as a message of freedom (the presumed essence of Zarathushtra's message). In many respects, the ceremonial system has been deliberately neglected, and many rules and rituals that are still carefully upheld by Indian priests have been all but abandoned by their Iranian colleagues. The Yasna, for example, which the Parsis regard as an important liturgy (it takes a pair of trained priests several hours to perform it), is nowadays only celebrated rarely and in a drastically reduced format by some Iranian priests. Most of the → purification rituals have been abandoned and—contrary to the Indians—the Iranians no longer use cow's urine as a purifying agent (and hence there is no more need to perform the elaborate ceremony to consecrate it). The professional priesthood has seen a sharp decline and the leading priests have joined the social and intellectual elite in a crusade to uproot ancient 'superstition,' including some female rituals, devotion to 'lesser' divinities such as Mithra and animal → sacrifice (that had already been abandoned in India some centuries back). The fear of being classified as 'fire-worshippers' led the priests and other spokespersons of the community to emphasize the 'symbolic' role of fire-worship; some new temples even house gas fires. Accordingly, ancient consecrated fires are no longer tended according to the rules that were followed in the past. However, in modern times a number of smaller shrines have emerged as places of memory and devotion.

In order to safeguard their place as a modernizing religion in a modernizing country, the so-called 'towers of silence'—walled funerary structures in which the corpses would be exposed to the sun and birds of prey (→ Funeral/Burial)—were abandoned during the twentieth century to be replaced by cemeteries, where, however, care was taken to protect the earth from direct contact with the corpses. (The 'towers of silence' were introduced in the centuries after the Islamic conquest, and were refined in India, where they are still in use, despite the fact that there are no more vultures to devour the corpses.)

Some varieties of modern Iranian nationalism sought to construct a non-Arabic national identity. In this discursive context Zoroastrianism has emerged as a national legacy, and in its reconfigured shape (the religion of freedom and morality representing the splendor of ancient Iran) it turned out to be an appealing ideological alternative for many Iranians, and some Iranians have actually converted to Zoroastrianism. Nowadays, an international organization based in California (the 'Zarathustrian Assembly') is actively promoting the religion (or their heavily revised version of it) and 'accepts' people willing to convert. This organization, however, is violently opposed by others, including a neo-traditionalist organization based in Bombay ('Zoroastrian Studies').

Conversion is out of the question in the Islamic Republic of Iran that was established in 1979. Many Zoroastrians have left the country since 1979 and settled in North America, Australia, and Europe (e.g. Britain, Sweden, and Germany) contributing their share to diasporic Zoroastrianism. In Iran itself the Islamic Republic has blown some wind into the sails of religion. Religious events are among the few accepted occasions for collective merriment and entertainment. Moreover, the Zoroastrian casualties of the first Gulf War (against Iraq, 1980–1988) are nowadays celebrated as Zoroastrian → 'martyrs,' a concept previously unknown in the Zoroastrian vocabulary.

Literature

Boyce, Mary, Zoroastrianism: Its Antiquity and Constant Vigour, Costa Mesa 1992; Choksy, Jamsheed K., Evil, Good and Gender: Facets of the Feminine in Zoroastrian Religious History, New York 2002; De Jong, Albert, Traditions of the Magi: Zoroastrianism in Greek and Latin Literature, Leiden/New York 1997; Hinnells, John, The Zoroastrian Diaspora, Oxford 2005; Kellens, Jean, Essays on Zarathustra and Zoroastrianism, Costa Mesa 2000; Kreyenbroek, Philip (in collaboration with Shehnaz Neville Munshi), Living Zoroastrianism: Urban Parsis Speak about Their Religion, Richmond 2001; Luhrmann, Tanya M., The Good Parsi: The Fate of a Colonial Elite in a Postcolonial Society, Cambridge 1996; Stausberg, Michael, Die Religion Zarathushtras: Geschichte—Gegenwart—Rituale, 3 vols, Stuttgart 2002–2004; Stausberg, Michael (ed.), Zoroastrian Rituals in Context, Leiden 2004.

→ Indian Subcontinent, Iran, Islam, Zarathustra

Michael Stausberg

At the celebration of the New Year, the Afro-Brazilian population offer sacrifice to the goddess Yemanjá, on the banks of the Rio de Janeiro: flowers, dolls, and other gifts especially dear to the goddess are committed to the sea. In their sacrificial prayers, believers beg of Yemanjá the granting of their requests and wishes. (J. Drexler)

A special sacrifice, under the all-seeing eyes of the Buddha, at the ornamented stupa of Bodnath (Katmandu, in Nepal). At this Tibetan Buddhist sanctuary, it is seen as spiritually meritorious to have limewater poured from the edge of the one-meter-high hemisphere by temple workers, in exchange for a monetary contribution. The action is performed several times a day, so that, in the some five centuries of its existence, the monument has materially expanded. A second form of ritual libation is more expensive: from the base of the hemisphere, in high bows, saffron water is cast up upon the limestone to make dark stains, from which emerges the pattern of a lotus blossom—a sacred symbol in Buddhism. (E. Stapelfeldt)

In many religions, the burning of sweet-scented essences (incense, rosin, sandalwood, aloes, myrrh, camphor, cedar, etc.) constitutes an important component of worship or cult. In Catholicism, for example, the burning of incense (or 'incensation') has been practiced since the fourth century, and stands as an image and symbol of the prayer that ascends to God. The sacrifice of smoke and fragrances serves for the consecration or dedication of places, for ritual purification, to dispel demons, and to rejoice the gods by the ascending fragrance. Especially in → Daoism, the burning of incense sticks plays an important role in ritual, and in the everyday practice of believers: the vessels for sacrifices of smoke are key components of the temple. Here a young mother in Hong Kong offers a bundle of incense sticks in a Daoist temple, dedicated to the gods Man and Mo. Both deities go back to persons who, according to legend, lived some 1,500 years ago. Man, the God of Literature, is the patron of government officials, while Mo, the God of Martial Arts, is venerated by both police officers and the criminal milieu. (Benita von Behr)

The village of Charazani celebrates the Feast of Todos Santos (Sp., 'All Saints'). Here, the Christian feasts of All Saints and All Souls, November 1 and 2, are connected with pre-Christian conceptualizations of the return of the dead (cf. → Death and Dying). In this region, loved ones return after their deaths as almas nuevas (Sp., 'new souls') for three feasts of All Saints, and visit the cabins in which they have lived. On November 2, the villagers go out to the cemetery, accompanied by music groups, whose flutes and drums have played uninterruptedly since the day before. Families with a 'new soul' bring gifts along. Days before, sugar-cane poles have been constructed, in their cabin, hung with breads and fruits, and standing on a richly draped table. Nor must bottles of whiskey be lacking. Many of the celebrants are already tipsy, since, after Mass on November 1, they have entered the homes in which the 'new souls' have paid a visit, spoken prayers, and conversed all night long, drinking alcohol. At the cemetery, the gifts are supposed to be placed at the graves. In what one might call the Quechua catechism, the position taken by the Catholic Church with regard to the usages of Todos Santos becomes ambivalent. Nevertheless, in the everyday ritual of the Bolivian Andes in the area of the usages pertaining to the dead, a contiguity of Christian and non-Christian religious elements is feasible. (Kirsten Holzapfel, following Ina Rösing)

How difficult it is, especially in the modern age, to distinguish religious characteristics from profane, entertainment from bestowal of meaning! This similarity is seen in many examples from today's team sports. The rituals of the opening and closing ceremonies of great presentations such as the → Olympic Games, or world championships, provide productive material. At the kickoff celebration of the world soccer championships in France, on June 9, 1998, four twenty-meter-tall "ethnofuturistic giants" (German Press Association dpa) float in a star march to Place de la Concorde in Paris, intended to symbolize the (soccer) cultures of Asia, Africa, Latin America, and Europe. The figures were escorted to their destination by balloon figures of (in order) musicians, dancers, in-line skaters, and speaking soccer-players. Hundreds of thousands of attendees lined the processional route. The closing ceremonies, to be seen here, remind those reared as Christians, of the 'dance around the golden calf' (the stylized soccer-ball goblet in the middle). A less critical sort can identify the spectacle with the motto Seid umschlungen, Millionen! (Ger., "Embrace, ye millions!"—Schiller, in the "Ode to Joy" of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony). That the scene is not simply to be divided into 'sacred' and 'profane,' but that it presents a multi-layered civic ritual, is suggested by a glance at the giants: they stand in the tradition of Baroque continent-allegories, as well as in the folkloristic magical festive custom of over-sized dolls, the mannequins (for example, in the Tarascon in Southern France). Third and finally, they can be ascribed among the figures of a modern hero-cult—after all, the ritual exaltation of sports stars into superhuman demigods is known from Greek antiquity. But does this now make them 'soccer gods'— → idols of a 'religion of the masses'? (Hubert Mohr)

On November 4, 1995, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was murdered in Tel Aviv. In recognition of his work in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, he had received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1994, together with Yassir Arafat and Shimon Perez. During the weeks after the act of terror, persons, mainly youth, assembled at the square where he had been murdered, and they held protest vigils, carrying storm lanterns, flowers, and letters. The wall at the place of the crime was spontaneously filled with images and graffiti. The government offered its contribution only later, with a memorial plate in the soil and by officially naming the square "Rabin Place." The graffiti, of which the picture shows a section, were varnished, and kept as a historical memorial. In this time of terror, the graffiti writers adopted the Hebrew biblical expression, Yakum Damo—"His Blood Be Avenged!" Whether these words represent a petition to God or a challenge to human beings, remains ambiguous. The references to the Song of Moses (Deut 32:43), as well as that to Ps 79:10, indicate that the murder calls for the wrath of God, as it brought down a person who acted according to God's will, Yitzhak Rabin. The expression used at parting, Shalom, Haver—"Goodbye, Friend" (on the left, under the portrait)—originally an expression of sympathy, grief, and shock, has long since become a widespread saying. It was the last sentence in President Bill Clinton's address (otherwise in English) at the funeral ceremony. Meanwhile T-shirts and bumper stickers recall the deceased. Members of the Socialist Party use it to greet Rabin as a comrade. Partisans of the peace movement appeal to him as a person of like mind. And a fragment in the picture suggests the frequently applied verse Ata Haser ("We Miss You"). The greeting of peace has become a slogan, with which inhabitants of Israel express their support for the peace process. (A. Kleefeld and Kirsten Holzapfel)

An interesting form of the secularization of trance can currently be observed in Morocco. The cult actors of the Gnawa Brotherhood are disconnecting themselves from their old traditions, and broadening their opportunities. Selected by a Danish gallery director, some of them have even begun to paint pictures while in a trance, and thus to render visible their inner life. This process becomes extremely clear in a painting by Mohamed Tabal. Here Tabal expresses his own possession by the spirits of the water, and thereby alludes to the origin of Gnawa on the Niger River. One can see fish, but also camels, which represent the voyage from Nigeria to Morocco. The expression on his face is that of a person all in ineffable rapture and referring to a frenetic presentation of the spirits, who incite self-mutilation. (F. Welte)

The young Peronist who lights an altar candle in the meeting room of a local Peronist group of Buenos Aires, pays tribute to the founding couple of the Party, Juan Domingo Perón (1895–1974) and his wife, Eva ('Evita') Duarte (1919–1952). Perón led Argentina from 1946 to 1955 with an authoritarian presidential regime that had taken on the characteristics of a mass, social revolutionary, → political religion, such as that recognized in the European Fascism of the twentieth century. His wife 'Evita,' a singer and motion picture actress by profession, succeeded, in exultant scenes, in making herself and the regime advocates of the 'shirtless' poor (Span., descaminados) and women. Evita's early death from cancer, at the age of 33, contributed to her becoming the object of an enthusiastic cult of the dead, promoted by Perón's Labor Party (Partido Laborista). Her corpse was embalmed, and her mausoleum was preserved as a place of pilgrimage, while her office at union headquarters became a room for memorial and meditation. In modern political movements, the veneration of persons encourages an intentional eradication of the boundaries of nation, party, and salvation movement. The devotional shrine pictured here may serve as an example. It is at party headquarters, and features a Catholic altar furnished with missal, crucifix, and Madonna, but dominated by photographs of the 'holy couple,' Juan and Evita. The transition from commemorative picture to image for meditation (perhaps even divine idol) seems fleeting. Granted, charisma and veneration of persons cannot be planned, as was acrimoniously shown at the close of Perón's career. After his political comeback in 1973, Perón tried to 'clone' Evita, presenting his second wife, dancer María Estella Martínez (b. 1931), as 'Isabel,' the new popular leader. After Perón's death, Isabel did succeed him in the presidential chair, but did not possess the capacities for control of the masses that her predecessor had demonstrated, and in 1976 she was ingloriously overthrown by a military junta. (Hubert Mohr)

A ceremony of initiation into a Wicca coven, a ritual group of the new witches movement (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). High priestess Zsuszanna Budapest presents the initiand (right) with an amulet of feathers. That only women are present has its basis in the fact that Budapest is founder of the feministic direction of 'Dianic Wicca' (after Roman goddess of the hunt Diana), whose ritual groups accept women exclusively. Budapest, born in 1940 in the Hungarian capital, combines traditional techniques used by Eastern European female soothsayers and healers (her mother was a medium), and 'feminist spirituality,' a concept that, she declares, she herself coined. Since 1970, she had been in Los Angeles, and later was a women's liberation activist, reformulating the political tenets of radical feminism in religious concepts and terms. In 1975 she founded the first feminist Wicca coven, Susan B. Anthony Coven Number 1, which became the model in Dianic Wicca. Her Feminist Book of Lights and Shadows (1975; republished in 1989 as The Holy Book of Women's Mysteries) had the effect of creating a cult. In 1975, she was arrested for reading Tarot cards—which led to a paradigmatic trial, and ultimately, in 1983, to the abrogation of California's Law Against the Practice of Divination. Today Budapest moderates her own TV show ("Thirteenth Heaven"), and leads the Women's Spirituality Forum in San Francisco. (Hubert Mohr)

LIST OF ENTRIES

LIST OF MAPS*

Volume 1

Volume 2

Volume 3

* In square brackets: the title of the article to which the map belongs.

Volume 4

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

LIST OF CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES

GENERAL INDEX

Terms that are covered by a single entry are marked bold.